But the failure of Walesa to reappear at the conference was "unfortunately not an isolated fact," the Peruvian minister said, because there are "many countries in which the full exercise of trade union rights is still a risk and a distant aspiration."

POLAND'S military dictatorship flouted the ILO's "tripartite" rule that the government delegates of the organization's 147 member states must be accompanied by representative worker and employer delegates, who also enjoy voting rights.

But Poland's communist rulers preferred to send only government delegates rather than leave themselves open, in the absence of Walesa, to charges of having sent a stooge as spokesman for the country's workers.

In his speech, Mitterand stressed the importance of the ILO's "tripartite" structure because cooperation between labor, government and employers is "even more necessary" in these times of world economic crisis.

"I INSIST once again on tripartism—on giving the unions their rightful place—because it is a structure which can make research, experience and awareness a reality, provided that the imagination and initiative of all the social partners are mobilized," the French president said.

The conference's trade unionists elected the AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown, the U.S. worker delegate, to both their own group's steering committee and to the key conference selections committee, which oversees the work of the session.

The AFL-CIO team assisting Brown includes Michael Boggs, assistant director of the Dept. of International Affairs, who serves as substitute worker delegate.

President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, with Director Jack Golodner, AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees as backup, is speaking for the delegation in a committee considering how vocational training can best help disabled workers.

Steelworkers Vice President Leon Lynch is a member of the panel working on new international rules to be adopted by the conference for the protection of workers from unfair dismissal.

A committee putting the final touches on a new convention, or treaty, for assuring the pension and social security rights of migrant workers includes Jean Ingrao, executive secretary-treasurer of the Maritime Trades Dept., and Charles D. Gray of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

Eugenia Kemble of the Teachers is serving on the resolutions committee. She is seconded by Patrick J. O'Farrell, the African-American Labor Center's executive director, who is also sitting on a committee dealing with issues raised by South Africa's racist apartheid policies.

A PROJECT for improving the lot of plantation workers in the tropical regions is under review in a committee on which Jesse A. Friedman of the American Institute for Free Labor Development represents the U.S. worker team.

Dale Good, assistant to President Lane Kirkland, is on a committee examining proposed ILO constitutional changes.

Legal adviser to the group is Washington attorney Edward J. Hickey, Jr., who sits on the committee that prods member states to live up to the standards set by the ILO conventions.

James Baker, former AFL-CIO regional director who is now deputy to Brown in the AFL-CIO European office in Paris, rounds out the conference team.

and approved by the Education & Labor Committee.

He pressed Congress to enact both mortgage interest subsidies for moderate-income homebuyers and comparable rental housing assistance.

Labor has called for domestic content legislation and temporary curbs on job-destroying imports, Roberts pointed out. He emphasized the potential of the expiring Credit Control Act to bring down interest rates and start up the economy. Congress should extend that law, he urged.

The path to recovery, Roberts urged, should include "compassion for those who have least" and fair tax policies to finance public needs. "Economic progress and social justice go together," he insisted.

Other labor witnesses at the hearings testified to some of the specific problems their members have encountered as recession snowballed through the economy.

- Linda Puchala, president of the Flight Attendants, told the panel how Braniff airline workers found out first-hand the weaknesses of the bankruptcy law, despite provisions supposed to give preference to claims by employees.

Bimonthly paychecks that were supposed to have been delivered on the day Braniff filed for bankruptcy were never distributed, she noted. "Thus, 1,800 flight attendants and thousands of other employees were deprived of pay for work already performed."

- High interest rates have "shackled" the national economy, Machinists Legislative Rep. Marjorie Phyfe testified. She cited the ripple effect of the airline industry cutbacks, stretching beyond the thousands of airline employees left without jobs. As airlines cancel orders for new planes, thousands of other workers are laid off by aircraft plants and contractors. Yet, "mortgage payments must be met, bills must be paid and food put on the table," she pointed out.

- The once-booming coal industry has been hit by the spreading economic crisis, Research Director Mike Bruckner of the unaffiliated Mine Workers testified. More than 30,000 UMWA members are unemployed, he said, "due to reduced demand for electricity and steel—the prime consumers of coal."

Labor Endorses Study of Program To Spread Rights

The AFL-CIO has endorsed a proposal by the American Political Foundation to study ways in which the United States could encourage and support the building of democratic values and institutions in other nations.

Federation President Lane Kirkland will serve on the oversight panel selected by the bipartisan foundation to guide the study.

Kirkland pointed out that the goal is to determine the risks and benefits from a program of overt American assistance to democratic forces in foreign countries and to suggest ways and means of carrying out such a program.

The mission of the program would be to help other countries develop a structure for human rights and basic democratic freedoms.

Labor Dept. Sued on Rules Gutting Davis-Bacon

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVII Saturday, June 19, 1982 No. 24

Building trades unions and the AFL-CIO have asked a federal court to block new Labor Dept. regulations that would undermine prevailing wage protections of the Davis-Bacon Act on government-funded construction.

Their suit contends that the regulations, scheduled to take effect July 27, violate the law they are intended to enforce and would push down wages.

AT A NEWS conference announcing the court challenge, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. accused the Labor Dept. of putting "the force and power of the federal government" on the side of anti-union contractors.

The final version, he said, was even more devastating than the Labor Dept.'s earlier list of proposed changes. He termed it a "complete capitulation to the anti-union position."

These are the principal regulatory changes that the suit seeks to block:

- Approval for almost unlimited use of semi-skilled "helpers," working across craft lines and replacing both journeymen and apprentices. Georgine charged this would create a permanent second-class category of workers and destroy the apprentice system.
- Abolition of the "30-percent rule," which has been used since 1935. This defines the prevailing wage as the rate paid to the largest number of workers in a craft, provided that at least 30 percent of workers in the survey area are paid at that rate. Anti-union contractors complained and the Labor Dept. agreed to use a weighted average for an area unless more than half the workforce received the prevailing rate.
- Further lowering the average by not counting wages paid on existing federal contracts toward determination of the prevailing rate. Another change would bar consideration of metropolitan area wage data for jobs in rural locations, even when the workforce is drawn from the metropolitan area.
- Ending the requirement that con-

GOP Budget to Force New Cuts

POLISH ARTIST Jan Sawka tells a Washington news conference his poster art expressing the hopes of Polish people for worker rights and free trade unions will serve as a message to the world that the spirit of the Solidarity trade union movement still lives. The AFL-CIO is distributing the poster worldwide, with the proceeds earmarked for the federation's Polish Workers' Aid Fund.

Labor Keeps Spotlight On Polish Oppression

By James M. Shevis

The American labor movement — remembering the thousands of Solidarity members still in prison following six months of martial law in Poland—pledged not to rest until Lech Walesa and his colleagues are restored to freedom.

"We of the AFL-CIO are determined to do what we can to keep public attention focused on the suppression of the Solidarity trade union movement," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a statement read by his executive assistant, Kenneth Young.

"We remember too well how quickly the free world forgot about the Soviet invasions of Czechoslovakia and Hungary."

Young read the statement at the unveiling of a huge sign counting the number of days the Solidarity members have been held captive by Polish communist authorities—183 on June 13, the six-month anniversary of the military crackdown in Poland. The sign, which also took note of America's high unemployment rate, is on display at the AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington.

Young said the 24-foot sign highlights two major policy concerns of organized labor, and "serves notice that we will not rest until Lech Walesa and all other Solidarity members are freed—just as we will not rest until unemployment in this country is reduced by a turnaround in the Administration's disastrous economic policies." Unemployment in May reached 10.5 million, with a jobless rate of 9.5 percent, the highest level in more than 40 years.

AT THE SAME time, Young introduced Jan Sawka, a young Polish artist expelled from his country in 1976 for his outspoken views on human rights. Sawka, who has received international acclaim for his poster art—painting-like works that frequently illustrate socio-political concerns—has produced a poster to serve as a graphic symbol of the Polish workers' movement.

The AFL-CIO has launched a campaign to distribute the poster throughout the world as a message to the Polish authorities that they have not succeeded in destroying the spirit of Solidarity among the Polish people.

Sawka, 36, told reporters that Solidarity's Warsaw branch last year asked him to design an official poster to be mass repro-

Filibuster Stalls Senate Passage Of Voting Rights

Delaying tactics by a handful of senators slowed but failed to derail a labor-backed bill to renew enforcement powers of the Voting Rights Act and clarify some of the law's provisions.

The bill before the Senate is almost identical to the measure the House passed last year and has strong bipartisan support.

If it is passed without controversial changes, the House will take the Senate bill without the need for a conference and the President will sign it into law. That's the scenario being pursued by the civil rights coalition.

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), who is leading the opposition, is using delaying

Deeper Slashes Scheduled For 'Safety Net' Programs

By David L. Perlman

A Republican budget being put in final shape by a House-Senate conference committee will compel Congress to follow through with deep new cuts in an already frayed safety net for recession victims, the sick and the elderly.

Laws will have to be rewritten to conform to reduced "entitlement" to Medicaid and Medicare, food stamps, family assistance, child nutrition—and the remnants of an already ravaged trade adjustment assistance program for those whose jobs have been wiped out by imports.

BASED ON BOTH the House and Senate versions, the budget aftermath will compel further cuts in housing, transportation, job training and other programs that could have provided employment along with needed public facilities.

Ironically, most of the program cuts were harsher in the budget version adopted by the nominally Democratic House than in the budget voted by the Republican-controlled Senate. That's because a bloc of conservative Democrats for the second year in a row swung over to defeat their own party's alternative budget—which labor supported as a start to getting America back to work and easing the recession's hardships.

But only three Republicans swung the other way on the vote that counted—despite grumblings by moderate Republicans about the hardships inflicted by Reaganomics. (Rollcall, Page 6.)

PRESIDENT REAGAN had endorsed both the House and Senate versions at the time of their passage, despite the differences, and Republicans on the conference committee agreed to split most differences —and to use some fancy arithmetic to hold down the projected deficit. Democrats make up a majority of the House conferees, however, and the final figures had not been agreed to as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

The Senate budget, based on assumptions developed by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office, projected a 1983 fiscal year deficit of close to $116 billion, with estimated outlays of $784 billion and anticipated revenues of $668 billion.

As passed by the House, the Republican budget had a deficit estimate of $99 billion —which GOP leaders considered psychologically important in defeating a Democratic alternative that broke the $100 billion level.

BY THE FIGURES used in the debate, the Democratic plan would have resulted in a $107 billion deficit. Its total spending was equal to the Senate level, but with more allocated to domestic programs and less to the military. The deficit was less because tax reforms would have brought in more revenue.

It turned out, however, that the House Republican figures had assumed lower costs and higher revenues than the Congressional Budget Office was willing to project. At the start of the House-Senate conference, the Congressional Budget Office put the deficit of the House-passed budget at $110 billion.

To overcome that obstacle, Senate Republicans expressed their willingness to go along with the arithmetic of their House GOP colleagues instead of using the non-partisan Budget Office estimates.

THE BUDGET skirmishing is still not over, even if the conferees are able to get the full House and Senate to approve their final figures.

In many areas, spending ceilings are in broad categories that give committees leeway in allocating funds. If past practice is

Congress Pressed to Revive Trade Adjustment Program

The AFL-CIO and unions whose members have been thrown out of work by rising imports pressed at House hearings for restoration of trade adjustment assistance for workers.

Congress gutted the program last year, reducing cash benefits to the level of state unemployment insurance payments and narrowing eligibility. Now the Administration wants to do away with cash benefits entirely and let other government programs cover job training functions.

AUTO WORKERS Sec.-Treas. Raymond Majerus charged the Reagan Administration with breaking a "20-year covenant with U.S. workers." The 1962 Trade Expansion Act and its successors promised special assistance in cash benefits, retraining and relocation allowances to workers whose jobs were sacrificed through trade concessions.

AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan and Steelworkers Legislative Rep. John Powderly, along with Majerus, strongly urged the Ways & Means subcommittee to reject the Administration bill and approve instead a measure introduced by Rep. Donald J. Pease (D-Ohio) and supported by the Democratic leadership.

Subcommittee Chairman Sam M. Gibbons (D-Fla.) is one of 27 co-sponsors of the bill, which would restore training for displaced workers as an "entitlement" and make other improvements. The Secretary of Labor now "may" make training available for displaced workers, if funds permit, but doesn't have to do so.

RALLY MARKING the sixth-month anniversary of the suspension of Solidarity, the Polish free trade union movement, drew some 250 people outside the Soviet consul office in New York City June 13. AFL-CIO Regional director Michael Mann joined others at the Polish-American Congress-sponsored rally in calling for the release of Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa and other members of the workers' association and an end to martial law in Poland.

Labor Movement Pledges To Keep Spotlight on Poland

duced for distribution to every corner of Poland at Christmas. The poster was to convey an expression of hope to the Polish people that Solidarity—the first free trade union movement to arise in a communist-ruled country—would one day overcome the repression that has settled in on Poland.

IN NEW YORK, where he had moved following his expulsion from Poland, Sawka created a simple, yet dramatic and colorful, landscape representing the whole of Poland. A sun on the horizon symbolized the dreams and aspirations of Polish workers in the form of Solidarity.

Sawka put the finishing touches on the work last fall, and arranged to smuggle the art into Poland, where the union displayed it at its national headquarters. But just as Solidarity's printing presses were beginning to reproduce the poster in quantity, the Dec. 13 Jaruzelski coup took place. The presses were silenced, and the original artwork destroyed as the Polish government moved forcibly to suppress individual freedoms.

Undaunted, Sawka recreated the work and asked the AFL-CIO to pick up where Solidarity left off and distribute the poster worldwide, with the proceeds going to the federation's Polish Workers' Aid Fund, a major source of assistance to the Polish workers' movement.

AT THE press conference, Sawka thanked the AFL-CIO for undertaking the project. He said it gave him a certain "private pleasure that this poster was reborn . . . a private personal revenge on my enemies. I am very familiar with the thinking of communist bosses. If there is something they don't like, they destroy it. But they are infuriated if the item reappears."

As bold as Solidarnosc itself, the poster is a positive statement that Solidarity lives and its spirit will never die.

Prints of the poster may be ordered at $7.50 a copy from the AFL-CIO Polish Workers' Aid Fund, P.O. Box 37522, Washington, D.C. 20013. Orders up to 99 are $6 each; over 100, $5; over 500, $4.50, and over 1,000, $4.

Wholesale Prices Hold Steady, But Upturn Expected

Wholesale prices on a seasonally adjusted basis showed no change in May, the third straight month of stable prices at the dealer level, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Analysts were quick to note, however, that rising gasoline prices will probably reverse the trend in the government's producer price index for finished goods in the coming months.

BECAUSE BLS is a month late in reporting prices for refined petroleum products, the May wholesale price report did not reflect gasoline price increases now showing at the pump. The May report showed gasoline prices fell an adjusted 5.9 percent, after dropping 7.2 percent in April. But pump prices have risen about 10 cents a gallon in the past month.

Declining energy costs offset food price gains in May. Prices for finished consumer foods rose an adjusted seven-tenths of 1 percent, after increasing 1.6 percent in April. A marked slowdown in price increases for pork, beef, veal, and fish contributed to the smaller rise in May. Prices for eggs and fresh fruits went down following increases the previous month, and coffee prices fell even more than they had in April.

ON THE OTHER hand, prices climbed rapidly after declining in April for fresh and dried vegetables and milled rice, and prices rose faster than a month earlier for processed poultry, shortening and cooking oils, and flour base mixes. Refined sugar rose 3.9 percent, following no change in April.

Wholesale prices for nonfood items decreased by two-tenths of 1 percent after declining four-tenths of 1 percent in April. Prices for capital equipment rose four-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in April.

Pope Addresses ILO, Calls Unions Essential For 'New Solidarity'

Geneva—Pope John Paul II, looking beyond international systems, regimes, and ideologies, called for a new attitude of solidarity in the world of work—"a new solidarity without frontiers" based on the primacy of human work over the means of production.

Addressing the annual conference of the International Labor Organization here, the Pope said workers' solidarity is needed for the common good of the world, which in many areas is experiencing hunger and poverty.

REITERATING a main theme of his encyclical, "Laborem Exercens," issued last year, John Paul stressed that trade unions able to operate in "full independence from the political authorities" are essential for forming a "society of solidarity."

"Laborem Exercens" declared trade unions "an indispensable element" of modern industrialized societies.

The Pope delivered his hour-long address before some 2,000 government, trade union, and management delegates, who jointly represent their countries at the 149-nation ILO. Several members of Poland's suspended Solidarity trade union, armed with a smuggled warrant from their leader, Lech Walesa, to represent the union at the conference, were in the galleries to hear John Paul speak. Walesa has been held by Polish authorities ever since the military regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski declared a "state of war" in Poland six months ago.

AT A MEETING with worker delegates, the Pope spoke briefly with one of the Solidarity representatives, Bogdan Cywinski, who earlier warned an ILO conference committee that Poland was close to an explosion because of the continuing military crackdown. Soviet bloc delegates walked out during Cywinski's speech.

The Polish-born Pope spoke from the same podium from which Walesa addressed last year's conference as a Polish worker delegate. This year, the Polish government did not include any workers in its delegation, even though ILO rules call for their participation.

Irving Brown, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, is the U.S. worker delegate to the conference. Federation President Lane Kirkland also is attending the meeting, along with an AFL-CIO team of advisers.

JOHN PAUL, who was prevented from addressing the conference last year because of the assassination attempt which wounded him, spoke on a wide range of subjects but returned time and time again to the need to accord dignity to work.

Human progress should be judged by whether the labor it requires really serves man and respects his dignity, he said.

"One must ask oneself whether this progress is 'human' enough and 'universal' enough, whether it serves to level injustices and favor a peaceful future for the world, whether the work provides for the fundamental rights of the individual, the family and the nation," the Pope said.

Global solidarity and common action in the world of work had already taken shape in the last century as a reaction to the degradation of the worker, he observed.

"IN SPITE OF improvements since then, in spite of the greater and more effective respect for fundamental rights of workers in many countries, different systems based on ideology and on power have let flagrant injustices persist while creating new ones," he said. "A greater awareness of social justice has uncovered new injustices which by the geographical extent or scorn for the human person are a real threat to humanity."

ILO Director-Gen. Francis Blanchard noted in introducing the Pope to the conference that John Paul knew the life of a worker because he had worked as a young man in Poland in a stone quarry and in a chemical factory.

Speaking of the common struggle of the Catholic Church and the ILO for human rights and the freedom and dignity of workers, Blanchard said it was now urgent to implement United Nations development strategy, and to agree on methods for multiplying jobs and distributing income fairly to make work more human.

"IT IS HERE that spiritual forces and social movements must continue to act by enlightening minds, awakening consciences, and opening hearts," Blanchard said.

John Paul called for special attention to the worldwide problem of unemployment, with its "harsh consequences for the workers which are too often overlooked." He said that one of its causes lies in the advanced development of labor-saving technology, which limits man's direct role in the production process.

The solution to unemployment must be found in accepting the principle of the primacy of human work over the means of production and the primacy of the person at work over the demands of production or purely economic laws, he declared.

"THE HUMAN person is the first and last criterion for employment planning," he said.

And, he continued, the right to join unions of one's choice should be the right of all workers.

Freedom of association is fundamental to the world of work, offering the means for active participation, guided by concern for the common good, the Pope observed. This right, enshrined in ILO Convention No. 87, is nonetheless threatened, sometimes scoffed at today, both in principle and — more often — in substance, leaving it disfigured, he said.

Don Stillman Appointed To Key UAW Staff Post

Detroit—Don Stillman has been appointed director of the Auto Workers governmental and international affairs department, UAW President Douglas A. Fraser announced. Stillman, 36, has headed the UAW's public relations and publications department since 1975.

Fraser also named David Mitchell to succeed Stillman as PR and publications director and appointed Alan Reuther as assistant general counsel of the UAW's Washington, D.C., office. Mitchell has been on the union's PR staff for four years and Reuther was formerly an attorney in the UAW legal department.

In Convention Action

Retail-Wholesale Union Votes Per Capita Boost

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the 14th convention of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union voted increases in per capita tax and monthly dues to keep up with rising costs and bolster organizing efforts.

The nearly 800 delegates also voted to delete a provision from the union's constitution that had permitted local unions to disaffiliate from the international. A companion measure gave the international the power to impose trusteeships.

THE PER CAPITA tax will increase in stages from the current rate of $2.50 a month to $3.50 by July 1, 1985. The minimum dues will go up from $10 monthly to $11 effective July 1 and to $12 in 1984. New language was adopted permitting affiliates to set local dues schedules of two hours pay a month or at least the minimum dues.

President Alvin E. Heaps and Sec.-Treas. Lenore Miller were re-elected by acclamation to new four-year terms. Elections were also held for 21 vice presidents.

In his keynote address to the delegates, Heaps scored the Reagan Administration for policies that are having a devastating effect on U.S. workers and stressed that Canadian workers are in a similar economic plight.

"We are mired in a depression never before seen by most of us, remembered only by those of us who were in our youth in the dark days of 1929 and the following days of despair," Heaps observed.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland told the convention that even though the economy is "sick indeed and getting sicker," those in authority in the government "show no sign of taking positive action to improve it or prevent it from getting worse."

Kirkland said the congressional elections of 1982 are the labor movement's most urgent business, and he stressed that despite economic and social adversities, there is "a spirit of solidarity" in the labor movement.

To correct "the pattern of misgovernment that is threatening to sink a whole society," Kirkland said, the labor movement must "elect a Congress that will restore equity to the operations of government by taking into account the needs of human beings and the long-range interests of the United States as a human society rather than as a collection of banks and investors and boards of directors."

SEC.-TREAS. Miller criticized the Reagan Administration's "tragic" firing of striking Air Traffic Controllers and "mindless" cuts in the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's programs and enforcement activities.

The ballot box is organized labor's greatest weapon for fighting back, he said.

The constitutional change adopted by the convention forbids affiliates from "dissolution, secession or disaffiliation." Should a local take any of those actions, its assets would become the property of the international union.

The issue of merger with the Service Employees was not before the convention since the talks were suspended by the RWDSU executive board in January.

Among other speakers addressing the delegates were Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.); Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.); President Joyce Miller, of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and Vice President Robert White of the Canadian Labor Congress.

LABOR IS STRONG and united in its determination to work toward the election of a Congress in November that will restore human concerns to government and look at the long-range interests of the country, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the more than 800 delegates to the 14th convention of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union in Bal Harbour, Fla. Seated at Kirkland's left are RWDSU President Alvin E. Heaps and Sec.-Treas. Lenore Miller.

Building Trades Sue Labor Dept. On Davis-Bacon

tractors submit a copy of weekly payrolls to the federal contracting agency for verification. The suit charged that this change would violate requirements of federal anti-kickback laws.

Joining in the court challenge were the AFL-CIO, the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the 15 building trades unions affiliated with the department, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

The unions asked the federal court for the District of Columbia to grant a preliminary injunction to prevent the Labor Dept. from putting the new regulations into effect pending a court decision on a permanent injunction.

Georgine said the new Labor Dept. regulations "are what anti-union elements have long sought without success." He said the building trades unions will "do everything within our power," through the courts, on Capitol Hill and within the Administration, to stop the Davis-Bacon Act from being gutted.

Steelworkers Hail Finding Of Unfair Trade Subsidies

The Steelworkers welcomed preliminary Commerce Dept. findings of unfair trade practices against nine foreign governments in subsidizing steel products shipped to the United States.

As a result of the decision, the Commerce Dept. announced plans to levy duties on the subsidized imports. Subsidies on some imported items exceeded 40 percent of their selling price in the U.S. market, the government found.

THE USWA endorsed a petition filed by seven basic steel firms in January charging that the unfair subsidies of the foreign-made steel were causing severe injury to the American companies and their workers.

Named in the petition were Britain, France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg—all European Economic Community members—as well as Brazil and South Africa.

USWA President Lloyd McBride said that the government's findings should come as no surprise in light of the extended and unfair assault on the U.S. market by foreign steel producers.

"PERHAPS NOW with the message having been said to those who would ship their unemployment to this nation, American steel producers and their workers can get on with the task of engaging in fair competition for their own home market," McBride declared in a statement.

Effective with the preliminary findings is a requirement that U.S. importers of steel products from the nine countries post cash bonds equivalent to the estimated subsidy to ensure payment of countervailing duties when the final findings are made. The Commerce Dept. said it would issue the final subsidy determination by Aug. 24.

The preliminary findings showed that subsidies ranged from less than 1 percent to more than 40 percent of the value of the imports. Based on current prices in the U.S. steel market, duties on imports could range from about $3 to $200 a ton.

STEEL IMPORTS from the nine countries in 1981 were valued at $1.4 billion. The USWA has repeatedly pointed out that the flood of foreign steel contributed substantially to layoffs in the United States, with the unemployment rate in the domestic steel industry approaching 25 percent.

Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldridge acknowledged in issuing the findings that there are 106,000 American steelworkers laid off and that an additional 28,000 are working short weeks.

He also said that because of the current recession, the American steel industry is operating at 42.5 percent of capacity—the lowest rate since 1938—a condition which "may have been aggravated by subsidized import competition."

Baldridge, however, expressed "regret" for having to take action against the nine countries. "I extend my sympathies to those hurt by our necessary enforcement of U.S. law and the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT) subsidies code," he said. The seven European Community countries are signatories to the GATT code that prohibits export subsidies. Brazil and South Africa are not.

Furniture Union Sounds Political Action Call

Nashville, Tenn.—Political action that will reverse the social and economic damage done by the Reagan Administration was the key theme of the Furniture Workers convention here.

The more than 200 delegates acted on 12 major resolutions including a demand for an immediate overhaul of the nation's tax structure "to lift the burden off the backs of workers" and force corporations and the wealthy to pay a fair share.

THE DELEGATES scored the Administration's "deregulation" of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and called for an expansion of OSHA's standards and activities to protect workers.

In his keynote speech, UFWA President Carl Scarbrough blamed President Reagan for the "hopelessness, joblessness and homelessness being experienced by millions of Americans."

The recession is "a close runner-up to the depression of the 1930s," he said, asserting "the only thing keeping it from becoming worse" is the safeguards enacted under President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

"If you are not mad," Scarbrough said, "look what is happening to you, to your members and to your country. And then tell me that you are not mad."

"WE ARE in this mess because the working people didn't get out to vote," Scarbrough declared, pointing out that only half the eligible voters went to the polls in 1980 and only half of those voted for Reagan.

He suggested that Reagan's 1980 campaign quote, "Are you better off today than you were a year ago," may "come back to haunt him because the answer is 'Hell, no.' "

Scarbrough blasted the Administration for "busting" the Professional Air Traffic Controllers union and "blacklisting" its members, and he scored the President's appointment of John Van de Water to chair the National Labor Relations Board.

VAN DE WATER was "the chief hatchet man" in over a hundred union-busting campaigns and does not "merit the right" to sit on the NLRB, Scarbrough asserted.

"It's time to turn things around" by hard work and getting out votes, Scarbrough declared.

A convention resolution endorsed the AFL-CIO's efforts to turn Election Day into "Solidarity Day II" and put a Congress in the Capitol "more concerned for people than profits."

The delegates also urged an end to racism in a resolution that included condemnation of the "philosophies and practices" of the Ku Klux Klan.

THE RATIFICATION of the Equal Rights Amendment was strongly endorsed, and the convention voted to send telegrams voicing this support to state officials in Illinois, Oklahoma, Florida and North Carolina where campaigns were in progress to win ratification in three more states before the June 30 deadline set by Congress.

Financial support was voted for the 170 UFWA members striking Indiana Desk. A national boycott of products of the Jasper, Ind., company was sanctioned by the AFL-CIO Executive Council in May after the firm launched a union-busting campaign.

The union's annual Fred Fulford Scholarship was presented to Lee Faulkner, a member of UFWA Local 1 in Nashville.

OTHER SPEAKERS at the convention included William E. Roehl, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and Al Barkan, former AFL-CIO COPE director.

Merle London, former managing editor of the Furniture Workers Press, was given a standing ovation by the delegates in recognition of her 15 years of service to the union.

Kirkland Backs Israel On Action in Lebanon

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed Israel's military action in Lebanon "entirely justified," adding that "no nation is required to suffer daily terrorist attacks on its population without striking back at the source of those attacks."

Kirkland said that in the absence of effective international guarantees that would protect Israel's northern borders and in the face of continuing terrorism within Israel by the Palestine Liberation Organization, the Israelis have a right to act in defense of their own security.

Instead of "carping and scolding," the Reagan Administration ought to accord Israel sympathetic support, Kirkland said.

Supply-Side Nonsense

A NEW COMMERCE DEPT. survey of business investment plans should set alarm bells clanging in the board rooms of the Reagan Administration, or wherever the high priests of supply-side economics hang out these days.

It reveals that American businesses plan to invest less this year in real dollar terms than they did last year—despite the windfall of multi-billion dollar tax cuts that were supposed to touch off an investment boom and lift the nation back to prosperity.

Instead, the economy will be running backwards. Business is taking the money and running.

That's not the way it was supposed to work. Last year, President Reagan sent his package of business tax cuts to Congress with the assurance that its enactment would cause corporate investments to rise 11 percent a year in after-inflation dollars for at least the next five years.

When the final version of the business tax cuts cleared Congress—retroactive to Jan. 1, 1981—the Secretary of the Treasury hailed the prompt enactment and told reporters: "This is President Reagan's economic tax recovery plan."

THE FLIP SIDE of the Administration's tax strategy was, of course, its highly touted three-year cut in individual income taxes coupled with an added bonus for high-income investors whose maximum tax rate was immediately slashed from 70 to 50 percent. At the same time, the maximum tax rate for capital gains profits was dropped from 28 to 20 percent.

Add to this, the obvious fact that a 10-percent tax cut means a vastly greater number of take-home dollars to the $200,000-a-year executive than to a $20,000-a-year working couple.

At the Administration's request, the Treasury Dept. has just done an analysis of the impact of this year's scheduled income tax cut.

The study concluded that the combination of inflation and higher social security taxes will result in most families with incomes under $40,000 a year paying higher taxes than they did for last year. And even if the 1983 tax cut were repealed entirely, the Treasury study noted, families with incomes over $100,000 would come out ahead because they would still benefit from the special investment income tax breaks.

It's puzzling, at the least, that the Administration believes the Treasury study makes a case for leaving the scheduled tax cuts in place.

BUT IT DOES make a case—a very strong case—for the AFL-CIO's proposal that the individual tax cuts be capped at $700 a year. At that level, nearly all taxpayers with up to $40,000 in family income would receive the full amount of the scheduled tax cut. Those in the higher income brackets would get $700 a year in tax savings, which is no small amount to most of us.

That $700 cap alone would bring in about $28 billion of badly needed revenue.

Congressman Thomas J. Downey (D-N.Y.) and a number of his colleagues have sponsored this in the Equity Tax Act, now before the House Ways & Means Committee.

It makes enormous sense.

Cruel Economic Facts

Millions of Mothers Hold Jobs To Pay for Their Family Needs

By Gus Tyler

YOU'RE A KID under the age of six. What are the chances that your mother will be holding a job away from home?

The chances are almost fifty-fifty: 44.9 percent of pre-school children have mothers in the labor force—as of 1981. A year earlier, the percentage was less—43 percent.

In absolute numbers, there are more than 8 million kids under 6 with working mothers. Last year, there were 7.7 million.

IF YOU ARE under the age of 18, the chances are better than fifty-fifty that your mother holds a job away from home. There are 31.8 million such youngsters, about 55 percent of the total.

There are many reasons women with children, including small children, go to work. The reasons have to do with the changing status of women in the society, with mechanical appliances to handle housework, with baby-sitting and nursery school arrangements. But a look at the cold—sometimes cruel—economic facts suggests that many women work because they have to.

To begin with, there are the mothers who are the sole support of their families, more of them than you might expect. As of this March, one family out of every six is headed by a woman who is either divorced, separated, widowed, or never married. Of these more than 9 million families, there are almost 6 million where women were either working or looking for work.

Then there are the families where the women co-chair the household with both mother and father at work, with occasional added income from children. A look at such family earnings reveals much about why women have a strong economic incentive, perhaps even compulsion, to work.

AS OF 1980, the average annual income for a family with one earner was $16,603—before taxes. With taxes and inflation eating away at that income, this sum of some $300 a week is much smaller than it once was.

That income may hold body and soul together. But it is hardly enough to pay for the mortgage or for a college education for one or more children.

When there are two earners, family income rises. The average in 1980 for a family with two or more earners was an income of $27,115. Generally speaking, women at work add about one-third to a family's income.

These figures refer to "averages," which means that some do better and some do worse. At the unhappy level of this story are some 745,000 where there are two or more earners and where the family still ends up below the poverty line.

AT AN EVEN MORE desolate level are the families headed by women, some 3 million of them, that are below the poverty level, including about one and a quarter million families with one earner and an additional quarter of a million families with two earners.

Since it is common to conclude that all these families in poverty are either black or Hispanic, it is informative to note that, of the families so listed, 4,337,000 are white, 1,863,000 are black, and 768,000 are Hispanic. Families headed by women make up a sizable portion of such families, although among whites the number of poor families headed by a married couple is greater than the number headed by a woman alone.

Keeping Count on Days of Oppression

Sunday, June 13, marked six months since the Polish government declared a state of war against the Polish people—six months since Lech Walesa and thousands of Solidarity members were rounded up and deprived of their freedom.

We of the AFL-CIO are determined to do what we can to keep public attention focused on the suppression of the Solidarity trade union movement. We remember too well how quickly the free world forgot about the Soviet invasions of Czechoslovakia and Hungary.

We are keeping count of every day that Lech Walesa and his colleagues are denied their freedom, and we will not rest until they are restored to their families and to the workers of Poland.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, June 14, 1982.

Letters from the Underground

An Anguished Pole Returns To Press Solidarity's Struggle

The author of this article has requested anonymity because "we still are quite worried about the well-being" of the Polish journalist who is the story's subject, "and we fear—perhaps paranoically—that any public identification of his friends here could somehow lead back to him personally."

IT DIDN'T SEEM remarkable at the time. It was just another all-night session in which a group of reporters wallowed in righteous indignation—our gripes about editors and self-proclaimed censors growing in direct proportion to the beer we consumed.

The slender, brown-haired man chain-smoked and tossed down straight whiskey. His nervous energy made his right foot tap a staccato beat on the hardwood floor. He described dispassionately the daily censoring of "bad" news from his stories.

I don't recall exactly what he said that made me interrupt to demand: "But what about the First Amendment?" But I remember his bemused smile and patronizing glance. They caught me up short and made me laugh, joylessly, at myself. I had forgotten. He was Polish. He had no First Amendment.

Today, he has no job. He is in hiding. He escaped by minutes a round-up of "dissident" journalists in December after martial law was declared in a dropping of the heavy weight on Poland's Solidarity union movement.

"IT IS HARD to describe the feelings," we read in poorly typed letters smuggled from Poland.

"The strangest of them all is when you sit in a room, listen to the noise of cars carefully to hear if any of them brakes in front of the building. You have your coat ready, toothbrush, piece of soap and disposable shaver in the pockets—just in case.

"And still you know that you have not done anything against the law, you have not violated even their laws. But you are a hunted animal, no longer protected by any law, by any doors of any home."

He would not, even if given the opportunity, sign a loyalty oath that he "shall renounce his anti-socialist activities."

We would laugh if it didn't hurt so much. For all his diatribes against the state he never could be called anti-socialist. Poland cannot afford not to be a socialist state, he argued.

WE WERE suspicious when the fiery, brilliant world-traveller arrived in our midst. He spoke authoritatively. In fact, he monopolized our conversations, even intimidating the most outspoken of us, with his lecturing suggestions that we led a pampered life, sheltered from harsh world realities.

In our naivete, we wondered whether a journalist from a state-controlled press really could be as outspoken a critic of the communist regime as he sounded. Or, was he playing a game with us American babes-in-the-world?

Too late, we learned that he was struggling. Caught between his desire to practice journalism unfettered and his sense of duty to his homeland, he returned to Poland.

We didn't realize what was happening. We didn't know how to write bland letters that would send a message. We weren't persuasive enough in our arguments that he should remain in the United States.

HE WAS SO proud when he was elected a leader of a new, Solidarity-affiliated journalists' union. He hailed the local's censuring of a journalist who reported the state's patently false charges against a Solidarity member without reporting the union justification.

So what happened, we asked? He wryly admitted the local journalist was promoted—by the state. So why bother, we asked again? The message spread, he explained. Solidarity and the workers it represented made that man a leper among the clean. He was effectively cut off from the people about whom he was supposed to report.

It was a small victory. But it was a forging of workers who, in unity, could begin to improve their lot. Wasn't that the point of a union, our friend asked? It was a first step that, perhaps, a Norma Rae might understand. He was enormously proud of it.

WHEN SOVIET tanks rolled across Czechoslovakia on Aug. 21, 1968, many of us had been alarmed and angered. Might the same thing not happen to Poland, we inquired later?

He didn't think it would. Czech reforms, which so infuriated the Politburo, had come from top political circles.

Poland was different. It was a peoples' movement—it was an effort by workers to take back some control over their lives and livelihoods.

Last December, we cried for Poland and, more specifically, for our friend. He wrote, "It has been difficult to recover from the shock."

During months of anguish, we could learn nothing from foreign correspondents or other contacts inside Poland about our friend. Amnesty International knew nothing.

Then, a letter came, and a second and a third. We don't bother to inquire how they get out. It is enough that they come.

But we rail against our helplessness.

"WHAT WE fear most is to be forgotten by the outside world," he writes. "The western Europeans are willing to forget that uncomfortable issue. They want their gas deal, their comfort of better job safety—an illusion since the countries they want to trade with don't have any money—their beefsteak and wine.

"And what we need to survive is the feeling that someone remembers what we fought and what we fight for. One gets little news from censored mail, we can seldom get a smuggled copy of a western newspaper. But we need moral support, we need a letter from time to time, maybe some material support."

IF THE CURRENT recession was brought on by Reaganomics, the blame for the prolonged slump has been pinned on the high cost of borrowing money, and rightly so.

Consumers can't afford to buy things like cars, appliances and houses on which the economy runs. Business can't sell its products at a profit so, instead of expanding, it idles its machines and workers.

Although some interest rates have declined a bit in recent months, "real" interest rates, meaning the cost of money minus the inflation rate, remain at record post-Depression highs.

The current high rates are largely the result of the deliberate tight money policies of the Federal Reserve Board, backed by the Reagan Administration.

ALTHOUGH PRESIDENT Reagan publicly bristles at the suggestion that the Administration is trying to fight inflation through high interest rates, recession and unemployment, that is exactly what it adds up to.

On this score, some of Reagan's advisers—especially the doctrinaire "monetarists" who have urged the Federal Reserve to keep money tight—have been more candid than the President in prescribing "pain" for the economy.

Pain, that is, for working people, not for the bankers and coupon-clippers who profit from the high rates. As with the Administration's social program cutbacks, the jobless and the poor were drafted as front-line soldiers in the "war against inflation."

In that regard, a recent study released by the National Council for Low Interest Rates, a coalition of labor and consumer groups, revealed that "high interest rates have resulted in a massive transfer of capital from non-financial businesses and the U.S. government to wealthy individuals."

Mainly as a result of a rapid climb in interest rates, the study said that "interest payments made by the U.S. government, corporations and individuals about doubled between 1978 and 1981."

In 1981, government interest payments, mainly to affluent bond holders and institutional investors, totaled $96 billion. This was nearly $21 billion more than interest paid in 1980, an amount which the study points out "was more than half the much-publicized cuts in fiscal 1981 social programs."

Although the economy as a whole has been battered by the high rates, the biggest losers have been the construction industry, the auto industry, farmers, savings associations and public utilities, the study pointed out.

BUT THERE ALSO have been big winners, the study found. "Wealthy individuals gained the most from rising rates. Between 1979 and 1981, personal interest income rose 47 percent—from $209 billion to $308 billion."

The big banks also have profited. Their profits rose from $4.4 billion in 1976 to $8.3 billion in 1981, according to the study.

"Rates are so high," said the study, "that they are now feeding on themselves. Like many Third World countries, corporations and the federal government are increasingly borrowing money simply to meet their debt obligations. This demand for credit places upward pressure on rates."

ORGANIZED LABOR and others have called on Congress to extend the Credit Control Act of 1969. President Carter's use of that Act early in 1980 brought down interest rates dramatically.

Through credit controls, credit for such unproductive uses as corporate takeovers could be restricted. This would leave more credit available for such constructive and job-creating purposes as home loans and plant modernization.

Congress must begin assuming more responsibility for the economy before it sinks even deeper into a depression.

Fighting Rules, Not Hazards

Industry's Safety Role Scored

EMPLOYERS ARE spending more to escape from coverage of the federal job health and safety law than they are spending to correct workplace hazards that kill, maim and disable hundreds of thousands of workers every year, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety & Health Director George Taylor charged in a network radio interview.

Industry is not "straining itself" to improve job site conditions, Taylor observed, pointing out that its major emphasis and most of its resources are concentrated in legal battles and administrative procedures aimed at preventing OSHA from operating. He said the estimated $3 billion that industry will put into on-the-job health and safety this year is about the same amount industry was spending on that effort before the federal safety law was signed into law 12 years ago.

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO program, Labor News Conference, Taylor said President Reagan's OSHA administrator, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne Auchter, displays "a great deal of enthusiasm" in neutralizing the worker protections that Congress shaped to "end this terrible human carnage." He said that although Auchter, when he came into office, assured the labor movement that he would make only minor management changes and rule refinements, he "has made fundamental changes" that have actually led to retrogression.

Taylor charged that Auchter has taken the lead in the drive to water down health standards, weaken the enforcement process, cut worker health and safety training programs and turn the responsibility for workplace safety and health back to the states, whose poor records in that area were the main reason for adoption of the law.

EMPLOYER EFFORTS to escape OSHA coverage are siphoning off most of the resources industry is willing to spend on workplace health and safety, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George Taylor, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Lance Gay of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program was aired over the Mutual radio network.

House Vote Kills Job-Building Budget

The House had a choice on June 10 between a Democratic budget plan that would have helped get America back to work and a Republican plan that makes deep new cuts in programs for the needy and endangers unemployment insurance benefits in 25 states.

It made the wrong choice when it rejected the Democratic plan on this key 225-202 rollcall. Voting right (R) were 199 Democrats and 3 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 39 Democrats and 186 Republicans.

Numerals show congressional districts. A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong.

Serembus Elected President

Upholsterers Hike Dues, Press Organizing Goals

Philadelphia—Delegates to the Upholsterers' centennial year convention voted to increase monthly dues and per capita payments and to continue assessments to finance organizing activities.

The convention also elected John Serembus, formerly first vice president, to succeed retiring President Martin L. Garber.

IN APPROVING a two-tiered per capita structure, the 200 UIU delegates called for raising payments $1 for members in locals that have full-time business agents and $2 for those that do not.

Effective next Sept. 1, the per capita payment for business agent-staffed locals will rise from the current $3.25 a month to $3.75 and to $4.25 in September 1983. For locals without busines agents payments will rise from $3.50 to $4.50 in September and to $5.50 a year later.

For U.S. members, the minimum dues will increase from the $8 a month to $10 in September and to $12 in 1983. For Canadian members, the minimum month dues will rise to $9.50 and $11.50 respectively.

Citing a sharp decline in membership attributed to layoffs resulting from the Reagan Recession, the convention approved continuation of the monthly organizing assessment of 25 cents per member to bolster the union's depleted organizing staff.

AFL-CIO SEC.-TREAS. Thomas R. Donahue, in an address delivered by his executive assistant James J. Kennedy, traced the connection between Reaganomics and layoffs as the nation's unemployment rate climbed to 9.5 percent in May.

Donahue charged that Reaganomics is a throwback to discredited trickle-down economic theories of past eras when workers and their unions were used as scapegoats.

"The difference between today and 1919 when Upholsterers President Edwin Graves was sentenced to prison for leading a strike against Chicago working conditions is a difference of degree, not kind," Donahue observed.

"TODAY, THE union-busters don't use clubs but use more sophisticated methods, such as arranging to have President Reagan appoint John Van de Water as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. And today, we call them 'labor-management consultants' instead of by the more colorful names that pop out of your centennial history."

A portion of the eight-day convention was devoted to the union's centennial observance. The UIU founding convention was also held in Philadelphia on Feb. 5, 1882.

Serembus, who was elected to a four-year term, has been a member of the UIU since 1943. He served as a shop steward of UIU Local 37 in Philadelphia during the 1950s and was named to the union's organizing staff in 1963. He has been a vice president of the UIU since 1970.

The convention unanimously elected Garber president emeritus. Garber had been a UIU vice president since 1953 and succeeded the late Sal B. Hoffmann as president a year ago.

DELEGATES ALSO elected Duane Giesler as first vice president and re-elected UIU Treas. Paul W. Heaton to a new four-year term. Four new vice presidents were elected to the union's executive board: Ernest Shock, upholsterers division; Earl Graves, wood products division; Gary Walston, burial casket division, and Kenneth McAvoy, Sr., at-large.

Kay McMurray Named to Direct Mediation Agency

Kay McMurray, a 64-year-old Republican, has been named by President Reagan to succeed Kenneth E. Moffett as director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Board. Moffett plans to remain at the agency.

Moffett, 51, took over as acting director at the beginning of 1981 after the resignation of Wayne L. Horvitz. Moffett was named permanent director 11 months later to avoid legal obstacles preventing reductions in force at the agency.

McMurray served on the National Mediation Board from 1972 to 1977, including one year as its chairman.

Since leaving the NMB, McMurray has served as an arbitrator, primarily in the airline and railroad industries. Earlier, he was a governmental affairs consultant for United Airlines and from 1953 to 1971, he was executive administrator of the Air Line Pilots. A United pilot from 1940 to 1949, McMurray at one time served on ALPA's negotiating committee.

Republican Party Announces New Labor Advisory Council

The Republican Party has formed a new labor advisory council "to open doors of communication" with organized labor.

The council, whose formation was announced by Richard Richards, chairman of the Republican National Committee, will be headed by former Labor Sec. W. J. Usery. It includes leaders of AFL-CIO national, regional and local organizations; unaffiliated unions; three members of Congress, and Gov. James Thompson of Illinois.

RICHARDS SAID that the committee would not engage in policy-making, but as a grass-roots organization "will advise the Republican Committee on ways to develop a constructive dialogue" with labor.

He said one member of the council would be named a nonvoting member of the RNC executive committee, serving in that capacity until rules pertaining to the makeup of the committee can be changed during the 1984 GOP convention. The name of the designated member was withheld pending official announcement.

National representatives of AFL-CIO unions named to the panel are Presidents Jesse Calhoon of the Marine Engineers, Thomas Gleason of the Longshoremen, John J. O'Donnell of the Air Line Pilots and Shannon J. Wall of the National Maritime Union.

REPRESENTATIVES of unaffiliated groups are President Frank Chiappardi of the National Federation of Independent Unions, President John Sytsma of the Locomotive Engineers, and President Leo Marchetti of the Fraternal Order of Police.

Representatives of local and regional organizations are Sec.-Treas. Stan Arnold of the Michigan Building & Construction Trades Council, Sec.-Treas. Dave Richardson of the Nassau & Suffolk County (N.Y.) Building & Construction Trades Council, President Charles Marciante of the New Jersey State AFL-CIO, Vice President Bruce Foster of the Amalgamated Transit Union, Vice President Bill Brogan of Operating Engineers Local 399, and President Bob Cruz of Machinists Local 780.

Richards said that President Roy Williams of the unaffiliated Teamsters has agreed to serve on the committee "at a later time." Members of Congress named to the panel are Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.), Rep. Margaret Heckler (R-Mass.), and Rep. Claudine Schneider (R-R.I.).

Unions Seek Restoration Of Trade Adjustment Aid

The Pease bill also would return to the earlier definition of eligibility when imports have "contributed importantly" to unemployment. And while it would not restore the previous provision of cash benefits above unemployment compensation levels, it does provide relocation funds and a $15-a-day stipend for training that continues after unemployment benefits have been exhausted.

FUNDING WOULD be provided largely through customs receipts, in effect requiring importers to pay part of the cost of job displacement.

Koplan said the bill falls short of what the AFL-CIO would like enacted and is not "a substitute for a fair trade policy." But it provides "needed improvements," and the AFL-CIO welcomes the subcommittee's decision to speed consideration of the bill.

One change the AFL-CIO has urged would extend trade adjustment assistance to displaced workers who had been employed providing parts and services to a plant closed down or curtailed by imports.

Powderly told the subcommittee that one-third of U.S. steelworkers are unemployed while more than one out of every five tons of steel entering the U.S. market during the first four months of this year was of foreign origin.

Establishing a trust fund out of custom duties to pay benefits to displaced workers "makes eminent good sense," Powderly declared.

IF THE United States allows foreign producers to "dump their goods into our markets," he said, "we should require that these foreign suppliers pay for the injury to American workers."

Under Sec. of Labor Malcolm Lovell, testifying for the Administration bill, acknowledged that imports have wiped out U.S. jobs, but contended that "spending money is not necessarily the answer." Further, he said, future job losses are more likely to stem from technological changes and "no one really knows" the best solution to the problem.

Majerus, testifying for the UAW, said the problem of job displacements that trade adjustment was intended to alleviate has been worsening, not shrinking.

"UNLIKE MOST recessions, the total value of manufactured imports continues to rise while total U.S. employment declines," he noted.

The Administration's concern over "the inequity of treating one group of unemployed workers different from the larger army of the unemployed might ring more true if there was an adequate federal program to help the growing masses of the unemployed," Majerus commented.

But since there is no meaningful assistance to those out of work, the argument for "equal treatment of the unemployed" amounts to advocating "equally inadequate treatment," he contended.

'Safety Net' Aid Programs Face Deep New Cuts

followed, Congress will be asked to vote on a reconciliation bill which will be a composite of committee recommendations.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. told reporters he was "bitterly disappointed" that the Democratic plan lost in the House. The 39 defections, although substantially fewer than a year ago, included three black liberals, who said the Democratic budget was too inadequate to support, as well as mostly southern "boll weevil" conservatives.

O'NEILL SAID he had hoped for the support of moderate Republican "gypsy moths" but didn't get it.

In addition to the three Republicans who voted for the Democratic plan—Cooper Evans and Thomas J. Tauke of Iowa and Robert W. Davis of Michigan—12 others voted against the Republican plan. But after the Democratic plan was beaten, there was no doubt in anyone's mind that the Republican alternative would carry—making the "gypsy moth" protest largely meaningless. But their votes would have reversed the outcome of the 225-202 defeat of the Democratic plan.

House Keeps Copyright Act Printing Rule

The House voted 339-44 approval of a labor-supported bill that would continue the domestic manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act for another four years—and save several hundred thousand jobs in printing and related industries.

It's now up to the Senate to complete action by July 1, when a domestic printing requirement that has been in the law since 1890 is scheduled to expire.

The section at issue requires that books written in English by American authors or writers domiciled in the United States must be printed and bound in the United States or Canada in order to obtain full copyright protection.

THE ADMINISTRATION has opposed continuation of the requirement, contending that it is a non-tariff trade barrier of a sort that the United States has opposed in other countries.

But the four-year extension had overwhelming bipartisan approval, as members stressed the immediate impact on jobs. Hong Kong, Singapore and other low-wage areas have extensive publishing facilities, and the Labor Dept. has estimated a direct loss of 78,000 to 172,000 jobs in printing and publishing, with more than double that number as the ripple effect reaches into related fields such as papermaking.

At committee hearings, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan warned that with more than 10 million Americans unemployed, "Congress can ill afford to watch from the sidelines" while jobs are wiped out "in yet another U.S. industry."

The bill had to clear both the House Judiciary Committee, which approved it by a 22-0 vote, and the Ways & Means Committee, which gave voice vote approval. It was then brought to the floor under a no-amendment procedure which required a two-thirds vote for approval.

WHEN CONGRESS last rewrote the Copyright Act four years ago, it provided for the 1982 phaseout of the manufacturing clause at the urging of book publishers seeking to cut costs by contracting printing abroad.

Senate approval of the House bill will grant a reprieve for the workers whose jobs are threatened, but will leave unsettled the future course. The AFL-CIO had urged that the manufacturing requirement be made permanent.

LABOR-CONSUMER COALITION rallies support for passage of a Cincinnati "right-to-know" ordinance to curb hazards of toxic chemicals in workplaces. Addressing the demonstrators is President Tom Mooney of the Cincinnati Federation of Teachers. The city council adopted the measure over strong opposition by employer groups.

Stalling Tactics Block Senate From Acting on Voting Rights

tactics to try to force concessions that would weaken the bill, and perhaps endanger its enactment. He also told reporters that "it has crossed my mind" to offer such high-controversy proposals as anti-abortion and school prayer legislation as amendments to the Voting Rights Act.

In a letter to senators, the AFL-CIO reiterated its strong support for the bill as it came out of the Senate Judiciary Committee. Legislative Director Ray Denison urged its passage "without delay or damage."

Helms began his filibuster on the motion to take up the committee bill. And even after the Senate went through the cumbersome procedure of invoking cloture—which requires advance notice and the votes of at least 60 senators—it took two more days to get the preliminary motion approved.

THE SENATE voted 86-8 for cloture. But even after cloture is invoked, senators can speak for up to three hours each and total debate can be prolonged for up to 100 hours through quorum calls that compel the presence of senators on the floor.

The motion to call up the bill was finally passed on June 17, a full week after it was made. And that marked the official opening of debate on the merits of the bill and of amendments that might be proposed.

As passed by the House, the legislation continues requirements that nine states and portions of 13 others must obtain advance clearance from the Justice Dept. before changing voting laws or election district boundaries. It sets up simplified "bailout" procedures, starting in 1984, for jurisdictions to free themselves of this requirement by demonstrating to a three-judge panel in the District of Columbia a 10-year record of non-discrimination.

TO OVERCOME a Supreme Court interpretation, the bill makes clear that it is not necessary to prove intent to discriminate if an election law change results in discriminaton. The Senate Judiciary Committee allayed concerns about that change by specifying that the law is not meant to impose a racial quota system for elections.

That change—and pressure from congressional Republicans—turned the Reagan Administration from opposition to support of the legislation.

Cincinnati Acts On Labeling of Toxic Hazards

Cincinnati joined a growing list of cities and states that have adopted "right-to-know" statutes requiring employers to inform their workers about toxic substances they encounter on the job.

The hard-fought battle for city council passage of the ordinance was spearheaded by the Cincinnati chapter of the Ohio Public Interest Campaign, a labor-consumer coalition.

ADDRESSING A victory rally, local campaign director Brewster Rhoads termed the ordinance "the strongest right-to-know law in the country," one that could well serve as a model for other communities.

After the Reagan Administration killed a proposed federal toxic labeling standard that had been drafted by the Carter Administration, a nationwide grass-roots campaign was launched by the AFL-CIO for state and local regulation of hazardous substances.

The effort has resulted in the passage of right-to-know laws in seven states—Maine, Connecticut, Michigan, New York, California, West Virginia and Wisconsin—and several cities, including Philadelphia and San Diego. Similar measures are pending in a number of other states and cities.

REAGAN APPOINTEES at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration withdrew the federal toxic labeling proposal under heavy pressure from industry and employer groups. But after labor's grass-roots drive began to show results in the states and cities, employer groups switched signals and persuaded OSHA to propose a watered-down "hazard communication" standard.

Because of its limited scope and weak enforcement provisions, labor safety specialists charged that OSHA's substitute proposal would give employers a "right-to-conceal" regulation by keeping workers in the dark on hazardous substances.

Coverage of the new proposal would extend to only about 14 million workers in manufacturing, while leaving out millions more workers in construction, service trades, mining, farming and transportation.

The Cincinnati ordinance was adopted over the strong opposition of the Chamber of Commerce. Participating in labor's campaign for passage was the Ohio River Valley Committee for Occupational Safety & Health—ORVCOSH.

SPEAKING FOR ORVCOSH, Cincinnati AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. William P. Sheehan said the ordinance "represents a clear victory for the health of workers and residents of Cincinnati" which has the highest cancer mortality rate of the 35 largest U.S. metropolitan areas.

City Council Member Thomas Brush, chief sponsor of the ordinance, said the city's high cancer death rate is linked to worker exposure to hazardous substances.

High Court Upholds Union Election Rule

A union may bar candidates for office from financing their campaigns with contributions from non-members, the Supreme Court ruled.

Its 5-4 decision upheld a provision in the Steelworkers constitution that had been adopted overwhelmingly by more than 4,000 delegates to the union's 1978 convention.

The AFL-CIO had joined the Steelworkers in the legal defense of the convention's action, and USWA President Lloyd McBride welcomed the Supreme Court decision as signifying that "the union belongs to its members and no one else."

THE SUPREME COURT majority reversed a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia that the restriction on outside funding conflicts with Landrum-Griffin Act guarantees of rights of union members.

Justice Thurgood Marshall, writing for the court majority, termed the restriction on campaign contributions "rationally related to the union's legitimate interest in reducing outsider interference with union affairs." It was also "reasonably related to the protection of the organization as an institution," the court noted.

The court challenge had been brought by Edward Sadlowski, Jr., and others who had supported his 1977 campaign for president of the Steelworkers.

SADLOWSKI lost to McBride in that election, in which one of the campaign issues was the heavy reliance on outside funds for Sadlowski's campaign.

In the convention held after the referendum election, delegates wrote into the union's constitution a ban against future solicitation or acceptance of financial support from a non-member. The only outside assistance allowed would be an individual's volunteered personal time.

The Supreme Court decision explored and rejected the various arguments raised against the campaign funding restriction.

It noted that the legislative history of the Landrum-Griffin Act shows that "Congress regarded the desire to minimize outsider influence as a legitimate purpose."

WHILE THERE may be an advantage for an incumbent or a candidate supported by an incumbent, the history of the Steelworkers shows that incumbents have been frequently challenged and sometimes defeated. Union staff members are free to take sides or refrain from doing so without reprisal, the court noted, and the union is large enough so that "requiring candidates to rely solely on contributions from members will not unduly limit their ability to raise campaign funds."

Marshall was joined by Justices Lewis F. Powell, William H. Rehnquist, John Paul Stevens and Sandra Day O'Connor in the majority decision.

Writing for the four-member minority, Justice Byron R. White said Congress intended to protect union members against abuses of "entrenched union leadership" through, among other means, "the check of democratic elections."

HE STRESSED that the minority justices were not "by any means" suggesting that the Steelworkers had the characteristics that Congress sought to curb. But the union's constitutional restriction on outside contributions, White held, should be "construed" with reference to the abuses that concerned Congress at the time of the 1959 law.

Voting Rights Renewal Passes Congress Intact

TWO THOUSAND trade unionists and members of allied groups marched on the Wisconsin state capitol in Madison to protest President Reagan's economic policies. The rally was sponsored by the Madison AFL-CIO with the support of scores of church, civil rights, women's and environmental organizations. Under Reaganomics, rally speakers pointed out, unemployment in Wisconsin has climbed from 7.2 percent in 1980 to 10.4 percent.

Budget Battle Continues on Program Cuts

Congress narrowly adopted a Republican-written budget resolution, but the bloodiest battles are still to come.

To comply with its newly adopted spending ceilings for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1, Congress would have to reduce non-defense programs and services more than $12 billion below current levels.

Nearly half that "savings" would require passage of legislation to cut back on "entitlement" to Medicare and Medicaid health services and programs such as food stamps and family assistance that were heavily slashed in last year's budget.

BUT HOUSE SPEAKER Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., put Republicans on notice that the GOP will have to swing its own budget axe—and produce the majorities necessary to make each of the mandated cuts.

Last year, the spending cuts needed to meet the budget ceiling were lumped into a single reconciliation bill and adopted intact. In fact, with the White House calling the signals, the reconciliation package was rushed through Congress so fast that most members had only the most general idea of its contents.

This time, O'Neill said, committee recommendations will be brought to the floor one at a time. And if Democratic-controlled committees choose not to make the sharp cuts the budget resolution assumes in a popular program such as Medicare, it will be up to the Republicans to propose and muster a majority for the program cuts needed to maintain the integrity of the budget resolution.

TO COMPLY with the resolution, the tax-writing committees of the House and Senate will have to come up with legislative proposals to bring in an additional $20.9 billion in revenue. That amounts to about 22 percent of the tax cut scheduled to take effect during the fiscal year.

A rise in defense outlays of $26.5 billion in fiscal 1983 would help boost the projected budget deficit to $103.9 billion by Republican computations — and to about $116 billion under the economic assumptions used by the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office.

Because of the high deficit, House Republican leaders had to push hard to get the final version of the budget resolution adopted by a scant 210-208 votes.

THE REPUBLICAN MAJORITY in the Senate mustered a 54-45 vote for the budget, but not without a tongue-lashing from Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia.

The "deep cuts," Byrd said, are "aimed at our elderly, our working people," who are already battered by recession and high interest rates.

Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (R-N.M.) assured the Senate that the budget will be well-received "in the market place."

Senate Kills All Moves to Weaken Act

By David L. Perlman

A voting rights bill the civil rights coalition considers vital to preserving hard-won access to the ballot box and the legislative chambers passed Congress intact and will be signed into law by President Reagan.

The year-long legislative battle ended triumphantly with the Senate crushing a filibuster, decisively defeating all weakening amendments, and passing the bill by an 85-8 margin. The House had approved a similar measure last October, 389-24. It agreed unanimously to accept the Senate version without further change in order to avoid the risk of new delaying tactics.

THE LABOR-SUPPORTED bill extends for 25 years enforcement provisions of the Voting Rights Act which otherwise would have expired on Aug. 6. It also clarifies the intent of Congress to bar changes in election laws that result in discrimination, without requiring proof that the jurisdictions involved intended to disadvantage blacks or language minorities.

Despite the one-sided House and Senate votes, the legislation had to overcome numerous obstacles, including the initial hostility of the Reagan Administration.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard termed the outcome "an impressive demonstration that the civil rights coalition remains a strong political force, even in a conservative Congress."

The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, which includes labor, religious Administration Proposal Scored

House Panel Hits Attack On Service Contract Act

A House subcommittee report accuses the Reagan Administration of attempting to wipe out wage protections of the Service Contract Act and thereby change the law through administrative action.

The report by the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations charges that revised regulations proposed by the Labor Dept. last August "are riddled with changes which violate the letter and spirit of the Service Contract Act." It called on the Administration to withdraw the proposals.

At oversight hearings last fall, the AFL-CIO warned that the changes would slash wages and benefits of workers covered by the law and urged Congress to reject the proposals.

"Thousands upon thousands of service contract workers who can ill afford the depressed wages and fringe benefits" would be victimized by the revised regulations if the proposals become final, the report concluded.

The 1965 law, which was twice strengthened by Congress, requires employers who provide services to federal agencies to pay locally prevailing wages and benefits as determined by the Secretary of Labor. It is comparable to Davis-Bacon Act protections for construction workers.

IN ISSUING the proposed revisions, the Administration contended that government expenditures would be substantially cut by reducing paper work for contractors.

But the subcommittee report said that the Administration analysis of the proposed revisions contained "fundamental flaws," including the failure to measure the impact of the changes on workers and the use of erroneous methodology.

The analysis "fails to take into account that the Service Contract Act is a remedial statute enacted for the benefit of service contract workers," the report points out.

"Rather, it is based on the assumption that if proposed regulations slash the wage levels which service contract contractors are required to pay—thereby allegedly lowering government costs—the purposes

Big New Price Rise Called Evidence of Policy Failure

By James M. Shevis

A sharp jump in consumer prices in May proves again that the Reagan Administration's only economic policy is one of overall recession, the AFL-CIO charged.

"America has no effective anti-inflation program," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald declared.

ON A SEASONALLY adjusted basis, the broader of the government's two main consumer price indexes, CPI-U, increased a full 1 percent last month, or 12 percent on an annual basis. The other index, CPI-W, which is used in calculating cost-of-living adjustments under union contracts and government entitlement programs, climbed nearly as much, nine-tenths of 1 percent.

"Trying to bring down prices with an engineered recession that intentionally throws people out of work is folly," Oswald said. "An annual inflation rate of 12 percent to go with an unemployment rate of 9.5 percent is the worst possible news for American workers and their families.

"The Reagan Administration should switch to a program that strives for full employment through credit controls, direct job creation, and ending the suffering of the nearly 11 million Americans out of work. And the fight against inflation should be aimed at the causes, like gasoline, instead of relying on high interest rates."

The May CPI rise was the sharpest in the index since last September's 1.1-percent climb and followed seven months of increases averaging three-tenths of 1 percent. While still below last year's level,

47 States Suffer Higher Jobless Rates Over Year

Unemployment rates rose in 47 states and the District of Columbia between April 1981 and April 1982, according to preliminary data released by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics.

Michigan continued with the highest jobless rate in the nation, 15.5 percent. Oklahoma had the lowest, 4.9 percent.

The BLS report said 28 states recorded their highest April unemployment rates since these data became available in 1970. The areas with the highest unemployment are located in the East North Central and South Central regions and in the Pacific Northwest.

Among metropolitan areas, unemployment rates rose in 204 of the 222 areas reporting, the BLS said.

Flint, Mich., had the highest jobless rate, at 23.2 percent. Rates over 19 percent were reported by Anderson, Ind., Modesto, Calif., and Youngstown-Warren, Ohio. Stamford, Conn., had the lowest unemployment rate, 3.9 percent.

IAM Ratifies Pact to End Airline Strike

Minneapolis—Northwest Airlines employees represented by Machinists Local 143 returned to work after voting overwhelmingly to ratify a new contract that preserves the union's stand against the hiring of part-time employees.

The airline's proposal to hire 200 part-time workers had been cited by the union as the major issue in its 26-day strike against the company. The Machinists viewed the plan as threatening the loss of full-time jobs.

WHEN NORTHWEST withdrew its proposal and the parties agreed on wage and fringe benefit increases, a settlement covering the 3,600 striking mechanics and related personnel was quickly reached.

Wage increases under the new 38-month contract include a 9-percent boost retroactive to last Nov. 1, 9 percent next Jan. 1, and 5.6 percent on Jan. 1, 1984. Hourly pay for mechanics will rise from $13.39 to $16.80 over the life of the agreement.

Other contract changes include a 30-cent hourly increase in shift differential pay and a rise in monthly pension benefits from $27 to $32 multiplied by a worker's length of service. A number of insurance improvements also were negotiated.

NINETY-TWO percent of the members eligible to vote on the pact favored the agreement. Balloting took place in 36 cities around the country.

The IAM members, who walked off their jobs on May 21, had rejected an earlier company offer by a 5 to 1 margin. During the strike, the airline grounded most flights and used supervisory personnel to get the remainder in the air.

Earlier, members of the Railway & Airline Clerks ratified a new three-year agreement with Northwest. The contract, covering some 3,500 reservation clerks and other workers, provides annual pay boosts and improved pension and health and welfare benefits.

NEW PRESIDENT of Actors' Equity Ellen Burstyn accepts gavel from outgoing president Theodore Bikel at the union's annual membership meeting in New York. Bikel did not seek re-election after nine years in the office. Burstyn is the first woman elected to the top office in the 30,000 member union of theatrical performers, founded in 1913.

Reagan's Economic Policies Draw Heavy Fire in Idaho

Couer d'Alene, Ida.—Delegates to the Idaho AFL-CIO convention here roundly condemned the Reagan Administration for policies that are fueling unemployment and high interest rates.

The 168 delegates to the state's 24th annual meeting called on the Administration to change its course and begin programs "that create jobs instead of providing welfare for the rich."

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland told the delegates there has been "a change in the political climate" in the past year with "those who hailed the most heartless budget cuts in history" beginning to have second thoughts.

The Reagan Administration's policies were to "touch off great waves of business confidence and economic growth" but instead have "generated nothing but disaster," Kirkland said.

He told the delegates many Americans "are learning once again, the hard way, that their prosperity does not stem from tax concessions and budget cuts but from a strong foundation of good jobs and decent wages for the workers of America."

THE LABOR movement "is setting out to change Congress" in 1982, Kirkland declared. Although it should be easy to persuade voters "not to send even one more Reaganite to the State House or Capitol Hill," because of "what Reaganism has done in this state and every other," the job will still be difficult because of the large amounts of money being poured into the elections by the opposition, he said.

"What we have going for us," Kirkland said, "is the fact that whatever else it can do, money can't vote. Only people can do that, and people is what the labor movement is all about."

The convention approved constitutional changes to increase the state federation's monthly per capita tax by five cents, bringing the total to 60 cents. The term of the president will be changed from two to four years beginning with the next election in 1983.

At a COPE conference preceding the convention, endorsements were approved for seven top state offices, including Gov. John V. Evans (D), who is seeking his third four-year term.

Evans, who was also a convention speaker, vetoed a "right-to-work" bill earlier this year and would not sign two attempts to repeal the state's prevailing wage law.

THE CONFERENCE also heard and endorsed Democrats Richard Stallings and Larry LaRocca for the state's two congressional seats. Stallings will face incumbent George Hansen, looking for his fifth term, and LaRocca is challenging first-term Rep. Larry E. Craig.

A convention resolution praised the Steelworkers for the union's assistance in helping the state federation and workers cope with the closing of the Bunker Hill silver mine in Kellogg. The mine and smelter, once the state's second largest employer with more than 2,100 workers, was purchased in 1968 by Gulf Resources & Chemical Corp., an out-of-state conglomerate that began the shutdown of the facility in late 1981.

Other speakers included Mike Mitchell, candidate for lieutenant governor; Washington State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams; Oregon AFL-CIO President Irvin H. Fletcher; COPE Region 6 Director Walter Gray, and Earl E. McDavid, national representative of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

NFL Players Charge Bias In Lack of Black Coaches

The National Football League Players Association renewed its charge that the team owners are discriminating against blacks in the hiring of coaches.

Although about 50 percent of the players are black, there are no black head coaches and only 19 black assistants, NFLPA President Gene Upshaw told the House Education & Labor Committee's subcommittee on employment practices.

UPSHAW, AN offensive guard with the Oakland Raiders, said the NFL has "hidden behind the premise that there is a lack of qualified blacks" for the 270 coaching positions. "The fact is," he said, "there are many qualified black coaches throughout America" who coach at small schools and produce "some of the best players in the National Football League."

"If you can supply a constant stream of talent for the NFL, many of all-pro stature, as the nation's black coaches have done, then you can also coach in the NFL," Upshaw said.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard told the committee that the citizens' panel on equity in the NFL, which he chairs, had reviewed a study by a Johns Hopkins University sociologist and agreed with the results showing "an obvious pattern of discrimination" in the owners' hiring practices.

"IT IS OUR belief," Pollard testified, "that the NFL has a network for the recruitment of coaches which limits and denies equal opportunity, especially to blacks."

The study by Dr. Jomills Braddock II titled, "Institutional Discrimination: A Study of Managerial Recruitment in Professional Football," looked at NFL records and 5,000 players' records over the period 1960 to 1979.

In that time, of 261 assistant coaches and 68 head coaches hired, no head coach was black and 20 of the assistants hired were black, the study found.

Braddock, who also testified, said that if black and white players had been promoted from the ranks equally, the 28 NFL teams should have hired 10 black head coaches and at least 92 black assistants.

HE SAID the study showed that in hiring coaches, owners consider educational attainment, professional accomplishments and whether the applicant held one of the so-called leadership positions while a player.

Upshaw emphasized that black players are steered away from those positions—quarterback, linebacker, offensive guard and center—by professional coaches even if they played them in high school and college.

He said he believed NFL Commissioner Pete Rozelle was sincere in saying that he has urged the owners to change discriminatory practices, but he said it is "hard to believe" Rozelle's contention that he is powerless to do more.

Upshaw cited Rozelle's recent negotiation of a record $2.1 billion television contract for the league.

Also testifying were NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey, former San Francisco 49ers defensive back Kermit Alexander, former Redskins defensive back Brig Owens, who is secretary-treasurer of the Professional Athletes, and former St. Louis Cardinals running back Johnny Roland.

IUD Presses Job Disease Benefit Plan

Atlanta—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has called on Congress to legislate a comprehensive federal program that would adequately compensate victims of occupational disease.

A resolution adopted at the IUD executive council's quarterly meeting here said that a federally administered workers' compensation program is long overdue and coverage of state plans is woefully inadequate.

"AT LEAST 100,000 workers die each year from job-related diseases and another 400,000 are disabled from them," the resolution said. "But only about 5 percent of these dead or disabled victims receive any compensation under state workers' compensation programs."

Another problem with state compensation plans, the IUD observed, is that occupational illness frequently doesn't show up for decades after the worker is exposed to the cause, and often not until long after the state deadline for filing claims.

Under the present system, the IUD noted, taxpayers must pay for the cost of treatment and compensation through social security, welfare, Medicaid and veterans' programs.

"UNTIL EMPLOYERS are required to shoulder the full burden for occupational diseases, they will have no economic incentive to improve job safety and health," the resolution maintained.

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards, addressed the council on the legislative prospects of a federal occupational disease compensation program.

In other resolutions, the 24-member council urged IUD affiliates to negotiate automatic checkoff provisions for political fund contributions in contract bargaining, and voiced support of the collective bargaining goals of the National Football League Players Association. A key NFLPA contract objective in current negotiations with team owners is the allocation of a fixed portion of gross revenues to players' salaries and benefits.

IN OTHER action, the council approved the affiliation of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees, bringing the number of IUD affiliates to 59.

The 59-member IUD executive board also held a one-day meeting at the Martin Luther King, Jr., Center. Presentations were made by Coretta Scott King and the Rev. Joseph E. Lowery, president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

CBS Technicians Win Major Gains In New Contract

Columbia Broadcasting System radio and television technicians represented by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers ratified a new three-year contract providing substantial improvements.

The national agreement, which is retroactive to Oct. 1, 1981, covers about 2,000 workers at radio and TV stations and news facilities across the country that are owned and operated by CBS. The workers are skilled technicians and engineers.

IBEW President Charles H. Pillard said wages under the agreement will rise in stages from $560 to $710 a week over the three-year term of the pact.

Other gains widened work area jurisdiction and provided improvements in per diem expenses, meal premium payment, overseas premium pay, travel insurance coverage, dental care, and vacation pay for temporary employees.

Pillard said the new agreement, which was worked out with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, was approved by a substantial majority of members covered by it. Negotiations had been under way since July 1, 1981.

At ILO Assembly

Worldwide Effort Urged To Curb Unemployment

Geneva—Irving Brown, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, called on governments, trade unionists and industry at the International Labor Organization's annual conference here to develop "mutually acceptable programs" to meet the world's unemployment problems.

As the only organization that brings together governments, workers and employers, the "tripartite voice of the ILO must be heard" wherever the unemployment problem is tackled, Brown said in his principal address as the U.S. worker delegate to the three-week assembly.

THE ILO'S audience should extend not only throughout the United Nations and all its agencies, he continued. It should reach to such high levels of the industrialized nations as the Organization of Economic Cooperation & Development and their economic summit conferences, he said.

Turning directly to the plight of jobless young people that ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard highlighted for the conference, Brown warned that jobs for them should not be created by the "lowering of workers wages and standards."

"We must resist programs that result in the creation of an army of low-paid young workers," he continued. "There must not be established a new class to be exploited by offering jobs at any price and under any kind of working conditions."

BROWN REGISTERED his "deep resentment" that Lech Walesa, interned head of Poland's Solidarity trade union movement, was not back as Poland's worker delegate.

He congratulated Alfonso Grados Bertorini, Peru's labor minister, for having forthrightly denounced Walesa's absence as well as the denial of freedom of association and other trade union rights in many other parts of the world besides Poland.

"It is in this same spirit that we also support the struggle against apartheid in South Africa," Brown said. "We must now rededicate ourselves to this struggle in South Africa and in all countries where freedom of association is menaced, absent, or being smashed," he urged.

These remarks pricked the Polish government delegate, Ryszark Karwanski, into protesting what he termed Brown's "slanderous allegations" that the "constitutional authorities" were responsible for the disappearance of freedom of association in Poland.

Meanwhile, communist-backed Arab attempts to use the ILO for political ends suffered at least two temporary setbacks early in the UN labor agency's session.

The first came when the conference's resolutions committee voted to give top priority to a resolution sponsored by Brown and other free workers calling on the ILO to intensify its campaign to promote freedom of association and trade union rights "everywhere in the world."

THE VOTE relegated to second place in the order of the committee's consideration a politically motivated anti-Israel resolution. Presented by 16 Arab countries, this proposal wants the ILO to observe a "day of solidarity" with the Palestinians.

Then, Conference President Grados, after consulting with other conference officers, refused the request of the Arab delegations that he read out a letter viciously attacking Israel that they had addressed to him.

Instead, Grados said that because of the political nature of the letter, he would simply forward it to UN Sec. Gen. Javier Perez de Cuellar.

The conference's committee that oversees how member governments observe their ILO commitments hauled the Polish government on the carpet for denying Polish workers' rights spelled out in the ILO freedom of association convention.

THE WATCHDOG group rejected communist contentions that it was unduly interfering in Poland's internal affairs. Instead, it endorsed in its report to the conference a finding that Warsaw's "general suspension of trade union activities constituted a serious infringement" of the convention.

Poland was told it should fully realize in the "near future" the principles and objectives of the convention both "in law and in fact."

Polish Worker Assures ILO Solidarity Continues Struggle

Geneva—Poland's free trade union movement is very much alive, a close associate of Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa assured some 1,800 worker, employer, and government delegates to the annual meeting of the International Labor Organization.

Bogdan Cywinski, who was authorized by Walesa and by other Solidarity leaders now in enforced exile to represent the Polish union at the ILO meeting, thanked delegates from the free world for their support of Solidarity, and pledged the organization would continue to struggle for the rights of Polish workers.

CYWINSKI, one of those Solidarity leaders who were out of the country when martial law was imposed on Poland last December, created a stir when he took the floor at a caucus of the conference's worker delegations. Delegates from communist-ruled states pounded their desks, and stridently protested Cywinski's appearance.

Led by Vassili I. Prokhorov, billed as vice president of the Soviets' All-Union Central Council of Trade Unions, the communists stomped angrily from the meeting place as trade unionists from all continents chanted "Out! Out!" to encourage their departure.

Cywinski and several other Solidarity representatives were allowed to attend the ILO meeting as members of observer delegations representing the International Conference of Free Trade Unions and the World Confederation of Labor.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland attended the conference in the company of a delegation representing U.S. labor as Pope John Paul II addressed the delegates earlier.

Meanwhile, the delegates were given evidence that constant ILO pressure on member states to make good their commitments to the United Nations body does bring results.

Milos Masek, a government delegate from Czechoslovakia, while addressing the ILO conference's Committee on the Application of Standards, conceded in guarded terms that his government's denials for four years that signers of the Charter 77 human rights manifesto had lost their jobs for political reasons were not always completely accurate.

BUT THE terms were not guarded enough to prevent the committee from accepting the statement as an admission by the Czechoslovak government that it had contravened an ILO human rights convention. This particular convention, or treaty, ratified by Czechoslovakia, bans dismissals for political, religious, color or other discriminatory motives.

Leather Goods Union Elects New Officers

The 15th convention of the Leather Goods, Plastic & Novelty Workers unanimously ushered into office for a five-year term a new leadership team headed by President Ralph Cennamo, Sec.-Treas. Randolfo Bobe and Executive Vice President Domenic Di Paola.

The 250 delegates also approved unanimously several changes in the union's constitution, including increases in per capita payments, local minimum dues and initiation fees, effective July 1.

IN LOCAL unions collecting dues on a weekly basis, the rate will increase from $1.85 to $2.30 per week, while the per capita payment will go from 75 cents to 92 cents weekly. For locals in which dues are paid monthly, the increase will be from $8 to $10 per month, while the per capita payment to the international union will go from $3.25 to $4 monthly.

Further increases will be effective with the first negotiated wage boost on or after Jan. 1, 1983, when minimum dues will go to $2.80 weekly or $12 monthly and the per capita payment to $1.15 weekly or $5 monthly.

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue blasted the supply-side economic policies of the Reagan Administration as "a new version of the infamous and discredited 'trickle-down' theory that precipitated the Great Depression of the 1930s."

HE CHARGED that "the spectre of economic disaster haunts the nation," citing the sharp growth of unemployment, the unprecedented number of business failures and the "chilling" impact of high interest rates and tight-money policy on the housing and automobile industries.

"The poor are becoming poorer," Donahue observed, "while millions of middle-class persons, including workers, are thrown into poverty."

Donahue called on the delegates to help mobilize support for Solidarity Day II—Election Day, Nov. 2—urging them to "make union members out of dues-paying members."

Another major speaker, Rep. Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.), denounced the Administration's budget policies as a "facade" behind which "they are wrecking the social programs which have been built up during the past five decades." Biaggi noted that a focal point in this offensive is the social security system.

HE STRESSED that with the "full backing of organized labor," it would be possible for the Democrats to dislodge the Republican control in the Senate and to enlarge Democratic majorities in the House of Representatives.

Other speakers included COPE Director John Perkins and his predecessor, Al Barkan; Josyln Williams, president of the Washington, D.C., Central Labor Council; Stanley Nehmer, economic consultant who discussed the impact of Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative on the leather goods industry; John Mara, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Frank Drozak, president of the Maritime Trades Dept.; Sandy Newman, director of Project Vote, who pointed out practical ways in which to maximize registration and vote-getting results; Sid Lew of the Community Services Dept. of the New York City Central Labor Council, and Ben Feldman, president emeritus of the union, who reminded the delegates that the union will be celebrating its centennial in 1986.

Cennamo, the union's new president, has served as secretary-treasurer since 1976. He succeeds Frank Casale, who resigned in March. Sec.-Treas. Bobe had been assistant manager of the union's four joint boards for the past two years.

Elected with the top officers were six vice presidents—Rita Palter, Charles R. Szabo, Carmine Salvatore of New York State, Peter Donatello of New Jersey, Ernest Jean of Massachusetts and Andrew McKenzie of Missouri.

AMONG THE 52 resolutions adopted, was an indictment of the Reagan policy on international trade, including the whittling down of adjustment assistance and the introduction of the Caribbean Basin Initiative which was denounced as "another potential contributor to the job erosion our members suffered as a consequence of the leather goods industry in this country being placed on the sacrificial altar of phony free trade."

The delegates on two successive days went to Capitol Hill in busloads to contact their senators and congressmen to impress upon them the need not only to scuttle the Caribbean Basin Initiative but also to strive for a fairer and more equitable trade policy. The group also visited the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Yardmasters Sign Pattern Accord With Railroads

The Yardmasters approved a new 39-month agreement with the nation's major railroads, leaving the United Transportation Union and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers the only unions yet to settle with the industry.

The pact follows the general pattern of the agreement negotiated and signed last November by six unions and subsequently approved by four others. Wage and cost-of-living adjustments over the life of the agreement are estimated to yield a total increase of 32.5 percent.

The UTU's negotiations with the National Railway Labor Conference, the bargaining agent for the carriers, are being mediated by the National Mediation Board.

UTU President Fred A. Hardin said the main obstacle in the talks was the carriers' demand for national negotiations on what historically have been local work rules.

The BLE is in a 30-day cooling-off period after rejecting arbitration.

Who Gave Us This Mess?

WHEN THE REAGAN Administration first proposed its economic program 17 months ago, the AFL-CIO stood nearly alone denouncing it for being inherently unfair and clearly unworkable. Time has proved the federation was correct—our worst fears and predictions have come true.

Halfway through the Administration's second year, this is the picture: the economy has suffered two quarters of serious, total decline, the worst recession since 1937; unemployment at 9.5 percent is the highest since the mid-1930s; bankruptcies and foreclosures are at all-time highs.

When the White House is asked about this cruel profile, the answer is, well, we lowered inflation. Now, the latest price index for May suggests that that claim may be short-lived.

Wait until interest rates come down, the Reaganites proclaim. Well, interest rates are up again after some modest softening.

When it comes to that sore issue of budget deficits and their effect on interest rates, the White House points the finger toward Congress. Well, again, some facts: the President's budget did not get a single vote in Congress; his own party abandoned that scheme and the President never submitted a replacement.

THE CONGRESS will next address the question of raising revenues in order to keep the record-high deficit within some kind of reasonable dimension. But the White House prefers to cut more social spending; it will not hear of taking back the big tax giveaways of 1981 which have torn the back door off the Treasury and contributed so greatly to the deficit.

All of this adds up to the question of responsibility—who is to suffer the political indictment for permitting the economy to get into such a mess?

The AFL-CIO has said the blame goes directly to the Reagan White House and its advisers who put together the voodoo economic policy that old-timers recognized from the beginning as the discredited trickle-down theories of 50 years ago.

As time goes on, more and more reputable observers are reaching the same conclusion.

The New York Times, for instance, put the lie to President Reagan's recent claim that "there have been no budget cuts," that only the rate of spending growth has slowed. "That's the kind of statement that has given Mr. Reagan such a reputation for compassion," the Times said. "Almost any way you slice the budget figures, spending for people in need is being cut. The poor are being penalized. The special pleaders, if that's how Mr. Reagan thinks of advocates for the voiceless poor, are right."

ON THE ISSUE of overall economic management, the conservative British weekly, The Economist, recently examined the President's record following his recent tour of Europe. In conclusion, the magazine observed that Mr. Reagan, "can certainly take credit for having set the terms in which at least part of the political debate in American is conducted."

"But," the editorial continued, "the President must also take the blame for the size of the current recession: it is a direct consequence of his belief that it is possible simultaneously to cut taxes, increase defense spending and balance the federal budget. Mr. Reagan's stubbornness in persisting in this belief could yet undo his presidency."

Hefty Tax Breaks for Business Fail to Bring Promised Outlays

By Gus Tyler

YOU PROBABLY didn't notice because it was just a small item on a back page in a few papers and was totally absent in most papers and in the electronic media. But this datum tells us just about everything we have to know about what has increasingly come to be known as Reaganomics.

First, the fact. "American corporate leaders are continuing to scale back their plans for spending on expansion and modernization, the government reported today. The businessmen estimate a 2.4 percent decline this year from their 1981 outlays, after allowing for inflation." That's the lead in the story sent out by the Associated Press from Washington, D.C.

BUT PLAINLY, American business is putting less into business this year than last year.

But, it was not supposed to be that way. American business was given gigantic tax breaks so it would put more into expansion and modernization, to create new jobs and to make facilities more productive. They were given investment credits; they were given lower taxes on capital gains; they were given a 5 percent cut on personal income taxes, a benefit that added up to billions for an economic elite.

The rich were enriched because, it was proclaimed, their riches would enrich everyone as those great riches flowed into the economy—to expand and modernize.

But that money is not flowing into the economy; it isn't even trickling down; indeed less of it is being invested in 1982 than in 1981 before the great tax bonanza.

IN EXPLAINING what is happening, Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige says: "The general downward revision in business investment reflects low levels of operation and the continuing interest rate problems."

"Low levels of operation" means that facilities are being run at levels far below their capacity. Why? Because most of the people in this country—those who live on wages and salaries—have seen their buying power shrinking, so they can't buy; and our productive plant is idled.

"Continuing interest rate problems" means that our interest rates are too high. But these high rates were set high as a means to restrain the economy, on the cockeyed belief that that's the way to check inflation.

But there is still another reason why businessmen are not putting money into their businesses. There is a faster way of making a fast buck: by speculation. Almost $83 billion went into businesses buying businesses last year instead of businesses expanding and modernizing businesses.

IF THE PRESIDENT and Congress really want to get businessmen to invest productively:

Repeal the tax cut for the elite and give a better break to the other hard-working citizens.

Then tell the Federal Reserve Board to lower the interest rates.

Finally, raise the tax on capital gains (unless it is on new issues) so that speculation will be discouraged and true investment encouraged.

In other words, pursue Reaganomics in reverse.

Fighting Inflation The Wrong Way

The May jump in consumer prices, led by food and energy proves again that America has no effective anti-inflation program. An annual inflation rate of 12 percent to go with an unemployment rate of 9.5 percent is the worst possible news for American workers and their families.

Trying to bring prices down with an engineered recession that intentionally throws people out of work is folly.

The Reagan Administration should switch to a program that strives for full employment through credit controls, direct job creation, and ending the suffering of the nearly 11 million Americans out of work. And the fight against inflation should be aimed at the causes, like gasoline, instead of relying solely on high interest rates.

Adulators of Japan's Growth Gloss Over Serious Drawbacks

The following is from an article by Yoshio Sugimoto, director of the Japanese Studies Center in Melbourne, Australia. It appeared in Japan's Mainichi Shimbun and was translated by the Asia Foundation's Translation Service Center.

JAPANESE ARE beginning to look down on foreign countries. This scornful attitude is abetted by a chorus of praise for Japan from some American and European scholars.

Prominent among them are Ezra F. Vogel in his "Japan as Number One," Richard Pascale and Anthony G. Athos, co-authors of "The Art of Japanese Management," and William G. Ouchi of "Theory Z."

The common assumption behind these works is that the degree of a society's success can be gauged primarily through economic indicators such as national income productivity and technological development. Viewed in terms of these indicators, Japan's phenomenal economic growth in the recent decades is clearly outstanding. Hearing the praise from abroad, Japanese have understandably become self-confident and have even developed feelings of superiority.

INSOFAR AS the Japan-directed scholars added a new dimension to development theory, their books have made a contribution to the social sciences. But I see serious flaws in the way they analyze Japanese society today. Let us consider three of them.

First, the Japan-model advocates fail to correlate the success and failure dimensions of Japanese modernization. They do not altogether ignore the darker aspects such as environmental pollution, sexual discrimination, the disparity between big and small businesses, poor housing, and the pathological effects of frantic competition for entrance into prestigious schools.

Books and articles written largely in praise of Japan mention these problems. But they treat the negative phenomena as though they were isolated from the more positive aspects.

In Japanese society, as in any other, all component parts are interdependent. Economic growth is sustained at the cost of environmental disruption. Concentration of business activity in large cities causes workers to endure long rides on packed commuter trains. Any serious discussion of Japan's development should evaluate the cause-and-effect relationship between favorable and unfavorable factors.

A BALANCED assessment of Japan's modernization is particularly important when the Japanese experience is being considered as a development model for other nations. Any country trying to fashion itself after Japan will have to accept both the strengths and weaknesses of the model.

The second problem in the adulation of Japan is its built-in bias toward elitism. Advocates of the "learn-from-Japan" thesis give credit for Japan's success to concentration of men of high caliber in the central government and large corporations.

They have a point, but hidden behind the argument is the assumption that those working in small and medium industry and local governmen agencies are inferior in intellect and ability.

These avid sympathizers of the Japan model project this centralization of intellect as the core requirement for economic development. They say it is an ideal pattern for distribution of human resources. A discriminatory classification of jobs into two categories based on IQ is accepted as necessary to smooth economic growth. This line of thinking is not only unethical but reveals flaws in the development theory itself.

THE ELITE employees in the central government and leading corporations naturally find the meritocracy concept appealing. But there has been no empirical proof of the correlation between the pattern of IQ distribution and economic growth.

Moreover, GNP growth alone is not the most important thing for society. We have yet to find out how information, knowledge and human talent should be allocated in post-industrial society.

The third problem in the Japan boom is the misinterpretation of decision-making by consensus. The popular thesis holds that the Japanese economy grew at the speed it did because both workers and management revel in team play and unanimous decisions.

But does this represent consensus in the true meaning of the term? By definition, consensus means agreement reached voluntarily, without coercion. So-called Japanese groupism has little to do with individual spontaneity.

IF JAPANESE WORKERS contribute voluntarily to their group interests, why do so many companies herd their employes together at the start of the day's work, exhorting them with pep talks and the singing of the company song?

What is called Japan's unique groupism is, in fact, part of an authoritarian political system. Systematic control by management and officialdom is a characteristic of Japanese society. Most theories of the Japan watchers confuse the results of authoritarian control with voluntary consensus.

Japanese offices are usually of an open plan, there are no partitions. The top man in the room can keep an eye on everybody at all times. When there is train service disruption during morning commuting hours, the Japanese worker must get a written certificate from the railway station to explain his late arrival.

Japan's nationalism was once an expression of a weakling challenging the world. Japan has now grown into an economic super-power, and its nationalism is no more than an ideology of self-nationalization by a bully.

THE ADULATION of Japan by foreign observers is being used selectively at home to justify the established social order. Japanese leadership also uses it as an ideological weapon in external negotiations and trade expansion.

The spread overseas of a distorted image of Japan can proliferate international misunderstanding in the guise of international understanding.

THE EXTENSION and strengthening of the landmark Voting Rights Act of 1965 must stand as a victory for that most basic of democratic rights—the right to vote.

The broad, bipartisan support of the legislation marks a defeat for those who would turn back the clock to the dark period when blacks, Hispanics and other minority people were denied the franchise through intimidation of chicanery.

Extending vital provisions of the law, due to expire this August, has been the number one priority of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. This coalition of more than 160 labor and other organizations has been on a campaign footing for a year to push the extension through Congress.

THE LEGISLATION has survived the gauntlet of crippling amendments offered and rejected last fall in the House; attempted filibusters by right-wing senators; and, foot-dragging, flip-flops and backhanded "support" from President Reagan and his attorney general.

Congressional opponents of the legislation, a tiny minority led by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), exhumed the discredited arguments about states' rights and regional discrimination. One also hears the claim that the federal voting rights law is no longer necessary.

But at hearings last year before a House civil rights panel, a wide array of experienced witnesses testified that the law is needed now as much as ever because the legacy of voting discrimination remains strong in many parts of the country.

This sad fact was documented in a 132-page report released early this year by the Southern Regional Office of the American Civil Liberties Union.

Titled "Voting Rights in the South—10 Years of Litigation Challenging Continuing Discrimination Against Minorities," the report first notes that the 1965 law has resulted in dramatic increases in black voter registration and in election of black officials in the South.

BUT THE REPORT goes on to point out that in none of the southern states covered by the key election law "preclearance" provision "are blacks elected to office in numbers approaching their presence in the population."

Moreover, "voter registration also remains lower for blacks than for whites" in the South, the report states. In Georgia, for example, 73 percent of the whites are registered, but only 56 percent of the blacks.

Under the Act's preclearance provision, nine mostly southern states and parts of 13 other states must submit for prior approval by the Justice Dept. or federal court in the District of Columbia any changes in their election laws and procedures.

Despite the law, the report shows that many jurisdictions have failed to submit changes for preclearance and that others have gone ahead with changes despite Justice Dept. disapproval. This non-compliance has often led to time-consuming litigation.

CHANGES USED to dilute minority voting strength include racial gerrymandering, annexations, switching from ward to at-large voting, and majority rather than plurality votes, which often force black-white runoffs. Times and places for registering also may be made intentionally inconvenient.

Congress now has strengthened the Act by making it easier to challenge discriminatory voting changes.

The law will allow discriminatory "effect" to be considered in judging election laws and procedures, not just "intent," which is hard to prove. This will clear up the confusion about the law created by a 1980 Supreme Court ruling.

It's time for the nation to move forward again in this quest for justice and full political participation by all its citizens.

Reagan's Policies Undercut Union Bargaining Gains

The following is from an address by AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald to a conference on the impact of current economic policy on labor relations, sponsored by the Institute of Industrial Relations, University of California, Berkeley, June 8, 1982, San Francisco.

THE RADICAL CHANGE in the Reagan economic policies is what is plaguing the nation. While it is no radical departure for a union to listen to company proposals for wage concessions when the company has been in poor financial condition, what is radical is the actions of the federal government pushing the economy deeper and deeper ino a recession.

While various unions have tried to save jobs and companies, there is no way that workers' concessions alone can offset the negative effects of Reagan's program.

THE FIRST debilitating pill of the Reagan program is the tax cut that is supposed to starve the governmental sector so that it can no longer perform. By cutting taxes in a fashion that primarily benefits the affluent and the corporate sector, Reagan's tax program will reduce revenues by $750 billion through 1985, while moving the tax structure further away from any semblance of equity. That $750 billion is more than the total governmental receipts this year.

While Reagan's tax cuts were hailed by his ideologue supporters as the key to increased capital formation and economic growth, real investment and economic growth has in fact declined precipitously in spite of the fact that the Reagan business tax cuts were retroactive to January 1981.

DURING 1981 real buiness investment was lower than its 1979 level, and the decline continued during the first quarter of this year. Moreover, business investment plans for 1982 indicate that real investment will decline for all of this year.

With nearly 30 percent of existing capacity unused, and with interest rates remaining at exorbitant levels, it's not surprising that there is no new investment. The increased corporate cash flow generated by the tax cut is of questionable utility in stimulating investment even in good times. Much of the money will be used for speculation, dividend increases, foreign investment, and mergers and acquisitions. Just look at DuPont's purchase of Conoco and U.S. Steel's merger take-over of Marathon.

BUT THE Reagan tax cuts are even worse in collective bargaining terms. They undo on the tax side everything that collective bargaining tries to do in the private sector.

Instead of improving the distribution of income—as collective bargaining tries to do—the Reagan tax cuts worsen income distribution by virtually eliminating the corporate income tax and by skewing the tax cuts in behalf of the wealthy. How can collective bargaining correct this inequity?

Randolph Institute Conference

1982 Elections Termed Referendum on Reagan

"The 1982 election is as important and perhaps more important than the 1980 presidential race," President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute told over 1,100 black trade unonists and community leaders taking part in the institute's 13th national conference. Hill pointed to the coming elections as "a referendum, not merely on the performance of an incumbent, but on a political philosophy, an entire approach to government and society."

He called the Reagan Administration's conservative supply-side economic policies "a tragic disaster," and urged the delegates to help ensure "that this economic disaster is translated into a political disaster for its architects."

HILL POINTED out that progress for blacks and other minorities is dependent on their ability to appeal to and obtain redress from the three branches of government.

"Today, however, the White House is in the hands of a President who shows little inclination to defend the rights of minorities," he observed. "The Supreme Court, as a result of appointments by Presidents Reagan and Nixon, is more conservative than at any time since the 1950s; the Senate is in the hands of the right; and the House is adrift."

Hill suggested that the only way to change this imbalance is to "get the vote out in 1982 and elect leaders who reflect the will of working people."

AFL-CIO SEC.-TREAS. Thomas R. Donahue praised the contributions of the Randolph Institute to increased black voter participation, the advancement of black workers, and the work of the labor movement as a whole.

Donahue also assailed President Reagan's policies, charging that "this Administration is the first one in history to try deliberately to reverse the direction and halt the progress that we've made toward liberty and justice for all."

The emotional high point of the conference occurred during the screening of "Miles of Smiles: Years of Struggle," a documentary film on the work of A. Philip Randolph and the heroic struggle to establish the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters. The film's narrator, 100-year-old Rosina Tucker, was a contemporary of Randolph and former president of the union's ladies' auxiliary.

ANOTHER highlight of the conference was the presentation of the 1982 A. Philip Randolph Freedom Award to Mrs. Maggie Boseman and Mrs. Julia Wilder, two Pickens County, Ala., voting rights activists, who were convicted of "voting fraud" by all-white juries and sentenced to four and five years imprisonment on the basis of questionable evidence. The award cited them for their commitment to "increased black voter participation."

The A. Philip Randolph Achievement Award was presented to Gene Upshaw, a guard for the Oakland Raiders and president of the National Football League Players Association, who was recognized for his contributions to "the cause of trade unionism."

Also addressing the conference were Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) and Washington Mayor Marion Barry, who both issued ringing indictments of the failures of the Reagan Administration, and Ralph Oman, general counsel to the Senate Judiciary Committee, who spoke on behalf of Sen. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.), then leading the successful fight for passage of an extension of the Voting Rights Act.

JANE HLONGWAME, general secretary of the Steel, Engineering & Allied Workers, a black trade union in South Africa, gave a stirring account of the struggle of South Africans to achieve human dignity and decent working conditions.

Moral Aspects of Job Safety Explored at IUD Conference

Williamsburg, Va. — Future directions of federal job safety regulation were explored at a conference co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.'s Labor Policy Institute and the College of William & Mary.

The two-day conference brought together labor leaders, scientists, government officials, management representatives and scholars to examine the values underlying regulation. Funding was provided by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

In opening the conference, IUD President Howard D. Samuel noted that "the debate over environmental control, particularly the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, has been dominated by economists and scientists."

"What we are seeking to inject into the equation is a sense of the ethical concepts which largely have been ignored in seeking to resolve the complex issues surrounding environmental regulation," Samuel stressed.

The 160 participants heard from leading scholars in philosophy, sociology, law and science, including University of Chicago Prof. Alan Gewirth, a leading moral philosopher.

Gewirth took the position that workers have "generic rights" to health and safety on the job that supersede the "property rights" of employers.

President Robert Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, who chaired one of the sessions, stressed that rights of workers to freedom and well-being require that they be given all information relevant to their health and safety in the workplace.

IN ANOTHER session, President George Parker of the Flint Glass Workers said, "The bottom line in the debate on OSHA regulations is that money talks. Employers are always going to be more interested in how much a regulation costs than in how many lives it will save."

Dr. Irving Selikoff of Mt. Sinai School of Medicine said government and management must pay more attention to the prevention of occupational disease. Scientific research has advanced to the point where scientists can estimate with precision how many workers will die from exposure to certain chemicals, he said.

In setting OSHA standards, "now the question is, who is going to decide who is going to live and who is going to die," Selikoff said.

The IUD Labor Policy Institute is an independent, non-profit center that serves as a vehicle for research and education on economic and social issues of concern to workers.

Sit-In Persuades Firm to Respond To Union Queries

Pasadena, Calif.—A union sit-down at the corporate headquarters of the nation's largest nursing home operator persuaded the firm to agree to answer questions on its record of violations of state laws and on lawsuits against its facilities.

A 30-hour sit-in at the headquarters of Beverly Enterprises here was staged June 10-11 by AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. President Robert F. Harbrant with four other representatives of the department and local unions of the Service Employees and the Food & Commercial Workers. The union representatives called off the action when the company agreed through its lawyers to answer a list of questions about its record prepared by the FBTD.

Beverly Enterprises owns, leases or manages more than 500 nursing homes in the United States. Fewer than 5 percent are organized.

HARBRANT BEGAN the sit-in when Beverly officers blocked his attempts to introduce resolutions at shareholders meetings. These measures called for an independent study of patient care at Beverly facilities and expansion of the company's board of directors to include former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Arthur S. Flemming and Virginia Boyack, an expert on aging.

The company agreed June 11 to answer the department's inquiries about the number and type of violations cited by state authorities against Beverly operations and to provide details on settled and pending civil suits brought by patients or their relatives.

Some 300 UFCW and SEIU members, joined by members of the National Council of Senior Citizens and the Gray Panthers, marched in demonstrations outside the Beverly offices June 10 and 11 in support of the sit-in.

Gompers School Honors Novik for Long Service

New York—Morris S. Novik has been given the Friend of Gompers award of the Samuel Gompers Vocational - Technical High School here in recognition of his services to the school. In his youth, Novik was an associate of Gompers.

A radio consultant to the AFL-CIO, Novik was instrumental in founding the school's Charles Zimmerman award, named for a former vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers. The award offers a cash prize to students demonstrating the highest commitment to the ideals of the labor movement.

July Calendar Announced For Labor Studies Center

Institutes in mini-computers and organizing techniques will be offered during July by the George Meany Center for Labor Studies at Silver Spring, Md. The courses are open to representatives of all AFL-CIO affiliates. There is no charge for tuition.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) will conduct training sessions on campus during the month as will two AFL-CIO unions. The schedule:

Mini-Computers for Local Unions, July 18-21—A four-day survey for union officers who need an introduction to mini-computers. No prior computer knowledge is expected of the students. The course will be taught in jargon-free language by specialists who understand local union procedures.

Organizing Techniques, July 18-23—A review of the elements in a successful organizing campaign: making the initial survey, programming in-plant committees, developing winning issues, making house calls and responding to employer attacks.

Unions using the center for their own staff training are the Carpenters, July 11-17 and 18-23, and Flight Atendants, July 12-15.

The Dept. of Community Services will conduct an institute for local labor agency leaders, July 6-9. Subjects include program and service goals, coalition building and the use of public relations, television and radio.

The AIFLD will have 40 Spanish-speaking women trade unionists from 17 Latin American countries on campus until July 23. They're studying political theories and trades unions and trade union leadership skills.

Seventy students enrolled in the Meany Center's college degree program will be on campus July 25-30 for their semi-annual week in residence. Four are set to graduate with Bachelor of Arts degrees from Antioch University on July 26.

A new feature of the college degree program will be a two-day institute, July 26-27, for those who have graduated from the program. Its purpose: to update their knowledge on the national economy, changing industrial patterns and scientific developments.

Information on these or other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Price Surge Held Proof of Policy Failure

the current 6.5-percent inflation rate is expected to come under strong upward pressures in the next few months. Interest rates show no sign of declining, and gasoline prices are on the rise.

"WE NEED several more months to see where the acceleration in May will lead," Commissioner Janet L. Norwood of the Bureau of Labor Statistics told the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

The BLS, which compiles the monthly price index, said three-fifths of the May increase resulted from a "dramatic reversal" in gasoline prices, which increased nine-tenths of 1 percent after falling 6.7 percent in April. Norwood attributed substantial declines in gasoline prices in each of the first four months of 1982 to the world oil glut, but she noted that "inventories have now been drawn down, and it appears that this glut is over."

THE REAL earnings of American workers remained unchanged last month as a rise of seven-tenths of 1 percent in average hourly earnings and an increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours were offset by the month's rise in consumer prices. BLS said that real earnings, or earnings in constant 1977 dollars, were down by 1.2 percent from the year-earlier level, however.

Nonfarm production workers averaged gross weekly earnings of $267.05 in May, a $12.52 increase from a year earlier, but stripped of inflation's impact over the past five years this figure was reduced to $169.45, or $2.53 less than in May 1981. Combined with the tax effect, workers' take-home pay was even less—$146.02 a week.

Besides higher prices for gasoline, jumps in food costs and housing outlays helped push up the May CPI. Food prices rose an adjusted eight-tenths of 1 percent following an increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in April. The housing component of the index went up 1.4 percent after climbing nine-tenths of 1 percent in April, mostly due to a 2.6 percent rise in home prices.

Budget Struggle To Continue on Program Slash

The spending ceiling of $769.8 billion is at this point merely a "target." A second and binding resolution is supposed to be adopted before the start of the fiscal year. But the figures in the first resolution will become final if Congress does not adopt a second budget resolution by Oct. 1.

FUTURE congressional decisions will largely determine the nature of the cuts that will be made in the various programs. But these are some of the "assumptions" that went into the House-Senate conference agreement on cutbacks from the amount that would be necessary to maintain current levels of service after adjustment for inflation and for anticipated changes in workload:

- Medicare expenditures to be cut $3.6 billion.
- Medicaid reductions of $700 million.
- Food stamps reduced $900 million.
- Aid to Families with Dependent Children reduced $500 million.
- Education, training, employment and social services cut $1.8 billion, including a cut of $674 million in job training and related programs.

The conferees dropped a Senate provision for a pay freeze for federal workers and "assumed" a 4 percent annual increase for federal civilian and military personnel and a 4 percent "cap" on the cost-of-living adjustments for civilian, military and postal retirees.

UNION RETIREES CLUB of the Washington area heard a panel discussion on New Deal legislation and the Franklin D. Roosevelt years at the George Meany Center for Labor studies. From left are Nelson Cruikshank, former AFL-CIO social security director; Mary Keyserling, a former director of the U.S. Women's Bureau; Daniel Lazorchick, moderator; Clara Beyer, an associate of Labor Sec. Frances Perkins during the FDR years, and Joseph Keenan, a former AFL-CIO vice president and secretary-emeritus of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Jobless Rate Skies To 10.2% in Canada

Ottawa—The Canadian national jobless rate soared six-tenths of 1 percent to a seasonally adjusted, post-Depression high of 10.2 percent in May.

Statistics Canada, a federal agency, said the actual number of jobless Canadians, not adjusted for seasonal variations, reached a record 1,241,000 last month — a huge, 45.3-percent increase over the year-earlier level.

As with the United States, Canada is hard hit by economic recession. Unemployment in May rose in every province, with job losses mounting in manufacturing, transportation, communications, utilities, construction, finance and real estate, and public administration.

PATCO Loses Appeal on Issue Of Decertification

The government ruling decertifying the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization as the representative agent for the nation's air traffic controllers was upheld by the 2nd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

The 3-to-0 decision found that the Federal Labor Relations Authority "did not abuse its discretion" when it ruled last October that PATCO could no longer represent its members because it had called an illegal strike.

"OBVIOUSLY, we're disappointed," said PATCO President Gary W. Eads. "Although essentially the court's decision leaves us in exactly the same position as we were before the ruling, a reversal of the original FLRA decision might have provided both the government and our union with another chance to settle this entire dispute for the benefit of everyone concerned."

Some 11,000 PATCO members were fired by the Reagan Administration in August 1981 when they refused to call off their strike against the Federal Aviation Administration and return to work.

As to whether PATCO will appeal the appeals court's decision to the Supreme Court, Eads said, "We are considering that option, but as yet we have not made a decision."

More important than any possible appeal, Eads said, "is the question of how to return this nation's air traffic system to a safer and more efficient operation.

"Now that much of the debate as to what penalties should be imposed against PATCO is over, the attention of all of us, in labor and in the government, should be directed toward returning thousands of highly skilled, professional air traffic controllers to their jobs."

SINCE LAST summer's walkout, the air traffic system has been kept operating by nonstriking controllers, supervisors, and controllers borrowed from the military.

Although the union is no longer the exclusive representative of the controllers, Eads said PATCO is still a viable organization.

Year-Long Battle Produces Victory on Voting Rights Act

and good government organizations, mustered bipartisan support and co-sponsorship for the bill. It had played the same role when the Voting Rights Act was first adopted in 1965, when it was renewed in 1970, and when it was strengthened in 1975 to deal with problems of language discrimination.

The experience of Mississippi shows why AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed the Voting Rights Act "the most successful of this country's civil rights laws" when he testified at Senate hearings earlier this year.

In 1964, only 6.7 percent of the state's voting age blacks were registered to vote. And in 1965, when the Voting Rights Act was adopted, every Mississippi congressman and both of the state's senators voted against it.

WITH BARRIERS to voting struck down, the percentage of blacks registered to vote in Mississippi climbed above the two-thirds mark. And not by coincidence, three out of five Mississippi congressmen and both of the state's senators voted for the current extension of the law.

At issue was whether states and localities where discrimination was presumed to have existed in the past should continue to need Justice Dept. approval for changes in voting laws or legislative districts.

ANOTHER ISSUE was whether comparable anti-discrimination safeguards for Hispanics and other language minorities should remain in the law. Congress expanded the Voting Rights Act to cover these groups and to assure bilingual election information when it renewed the law in 1975.

Also at issue was the manner in which states or sections of states could get free of the requirement for advance approval of election law changes.

And especially at issue was what civil rights groups saw as an urgent need to overcome a Supreme Court ruling that seemed to require evidence of intent to discriminate before an election law change could be nullified.

THE FIRST stage of the battle was in the House Judiciary Committee, where efforts to shape a bipartisan consensus were only partially successful. Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) and Civil Rights Subcommittee Chairman Don Edwards (D-Calif.) held firm against amendments the Leadership Conference considered damaging to the law, and many of the issues were refought on the House floor. But the committee majority was upheld and the bill passed by a one-sided vote after the weakening amendments were beaten.

The Reagan Administration took no position on the House bill. The President indicated he supported the law "in principle," but later indicated the Administration would seek various amendments.

While the Administration was still trying to make up its mind, the civil rights coalition was lining up a majority of the Senate to co-sponsor the House-passed bill, along with Senators Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.) and Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the principal sponsors.

There was still a serious risk of a filibuster strong enough to at least compel acceptance of weakening amendments as the price of achieving the 60 votes needed to limit debate.

BUT THAT THREAT dwindled when the bill's sponsors worked with Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.) to include language specifying that the law does not require a racial quota outcome of elections.

At that point, the Administration hopped on the bandwagon, and only a scant handful of opponents joined the nine-day filibuster that Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) mounted against the bill.

After an 86-8 vote for cloture, Helms first sought to continue delaying tactics to block a vote, but finally abandoned the effort under pressure from his colleagues. He said he had exacted from the Senate Republican leadership a promise of early consideration of constitutional amendments he has proposed to ban abortions and allow prayers in public schools.

THE CIVIL rights coalition had urged senators to reject all substantive amendments to the Judiciary Committee bill, and the Senate did so by substantial margins.

As finally passed, the legislation allows states to free themselves of the requirement for government approval of election law changes, starting in 1984. They can do so by demonstrating to the satisfaction of a three-judge panel in the District of Columbia a 10-year record of non-discrimination.

Fired Workers Declared Eligible For Postal Jobs

Newark, N.J. — Eighty-six members of the Postal Workers, dismissed from their jobs for participating in strikes four years ago, will be allowed to apply for new jobs in the Postal Service under a court-directed settlement.

Judge Frederick B. Lacey of the U.S. District Court here announced the settlement June 2. While there is no guarantee that applicants will be reinstated, the USPS told the court that all would be fairly considered. Lacey retains jurisdiction over the settlement and will check the USPS's compliance with the order.

The settlement culminates a series of lawsuits against the Postal Service sought by workers at postal facilities in Jersey City and Kearney and by the APWU's New York Area Postal Union. Nearly 100 employees at the two locations were fired in late July 1978 after walking off their jobs. Another 50 workers at a bulk mail facility in Richmond, Calif., were dismissed at the same time.

APWU President Moe Biller called the settlement an important victory for labor, and said he hoped the example it offers would lead to reinstatement for thousands of air traffic controllers fired by President Reagan following their walkout.

As Unemployment Spreads

Emergency Funds Asked For Public Sector Jobs

Legislation to fund 250,000 short-term public sector jobs in unemployment-riddled communities is urgently needed and has labor's strong support, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison testified at House hearings.

Denison stressed to a House Appropriations subcommittee the "tragic toll of human suffering and economic waste" as plant closings and layoffs dump new waves of unemployed into a job market saturated by victims of earlier cutbacks.

THE EMERGENCY funding bill that the AFL-CIO endorsed would pump $1 billion for the remaining months of the 1982 fiscal year into public sector and youth employment programs authorized under Titles III and IV of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA) but left unfunded since the Reagan Administration took office.

Sponsors of the emergency job-funding appropriations bill include House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.), Education & Labor Committee Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) and Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), chairman of its Employment Opportunities subcommittee, and James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.), chairman of the Economic Development subcommittee of the House Public Works Committee.

Denison reminded the panel that in 1977 Congress put a substantially larger public service program into operation as the unemployment rate was rising to the danger point.

At that time, "at the urging of an administration more attuned to the plight of jobless workers, Congress passed the Economic Stimulus Appropriations Act, providing $8 billion for public service employment," Denison noted. It was signed into law in mid-May, and by the Sept. 30 end of the fiscal year, "597,000 formerly jobless workers—many of them low-income, long-term unemployed persons—had jobs. And much useful community work was done."

The proposed 250,000-job program would be easier to implement and would be "clearly targeted to the areas and individuals with the greatest needs," Denison noted. The temporary jobs funded would include repair and rehabilitation of public facilities, public safety and health services and other community projects.

Denison told the subcommittee of the efforts being made by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute to put together programs to help place victims of plant closings and mass layoffs.

IN BIRMINGHAM, he said, HRDI is working with the Steelworkers to counsel and assist displaced workers.

At U.S. Steel's Fairfield plant, some 3,000 workers expect to lose their jobs in the near future, Denison testified. "They will join about 5,500 who were laid off at Fairfield in the past two years," most still unemployed.

Nor is that all. From the same union, Denison noted, the closing of a Pullman plant some 18 months ago threw 2,400 Birmingham area workers out of jobs. These workers have exhausted their unemployment benefits, but their job prospects remain "dismal."

THESE ARE among the people who would have priority for public sector employment if the appropriations bill is enacted, Denison stressed.

The AFL-CIO continues to seek "a large-scale comprehensive jobs and training program" as mandated by the Humphrey-Hawkins full employment law, Denison said.

But until such a program can be enacted, he said, Congress has an obligation to "act promptly" on providing funds for an immediate jobs program.

Republicans Appoint O'Donnell to RNC Post

Air Line Pilots President John J. O'Donnell has been appointed a member of the Republican National Committee's executive committee.

An AFL-CIO vice president, O'Donnell will serve as a nonvoting, ex-officio member of the RNC panel, Chairman Richard Richards of the Republican National Committee said. His appointment brings the total executive committee membership to 46, including 16 ex-officio members.

Earlier, O'Donnell was named to the RNC's new 18-member labor advisory council headed by former Labor Sec. W. J. Usery.

TRANSPORT WORKERS present House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. with petitions calling on Congress to provide the funds needed to keep the Railroad Retirement System alive. The signatures were gathered in the 17 cities where the union has railroad locals and brought to Washington, D.C., during the meeting of the TWU Presidents' Council. Presenting the petition to O'Neill are, from left, TWU Vice President Albert A. Terriego, director of the union's railroad division, and Robert Flohr, assistant director.

Health Care Cost Controls Pressed to Maintain Benefits

The AFL-CIO pressed Congress to reform the method of paying for health care costs instead of reducing Medicare benefits for the elderly and Medicaid services for the poor.

Congress has adopted a budget that will compel fewer services and greater costs for beneficiaries of government health care programs. AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten told a House Ways & Means Committee that's the wrong way to deal with the cost problem.

"IT IS THE providers and suppliers of health care services who decide who needs health care, when they need it and how much they need," McGlotten pointed out.

"Until serious efforts are taken to change the way providers are reimbursed, there is no relief in sight for the federal government or for the financially overburdened consumer," he stressed.

McGlotten expressed the AFL-CIO's strong support for the plan proposed by the Health Security Action Council, whose director, Melvin A. Glasser, also testified at the hearings.

While reaffirming the AFL-CIO's conviction that comprehensive national health insurance is "the only way to assure all Americans access to quality health care they can afford," McGlotten urged immediate steps to bring health care inflation under control.

GLASSER spelled out the proposal advanced earlier this year by the Health Security coalition of prominent Americans and leading organizations. Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser is chairman of the council and of its parent Committee for National Health Insurance, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue is secretary-treasurer of the two groups.

The plan, described in detail in the Apr. 3 issue of the AFL-CIO News, would be phased in over two years. Initially, hospitals and nursing homes would be barred from raising charges higher than the rise in the overall cost of living index. Physicians' fees would be held to present levels under Medicare, Medicaid and private insurance programs, with increases allowed only to cover overhead costs as reflected in the cost-of-living index. The same principle would be applied to laboratory and X-ray services.

AFTER TWO years, a prospective budgeting system would be mandatory for hospitals and nursing homes under state-operated programs that allow some flexibility to meet special circumstances. Physicians' fees would be negotiated with the state agency administering the program, as would contracts with health maintenance organizations.

McGlotten told the subcommittee that this labor-endorsed proposal "is a viable alternative to the pain and suffering that will exist in our country if the Administration's cutbacks in vital health programs are enacted."

Economic Signs Mixed, Layoffs Continue

Private and government reports continued to paint a mixed picture of the nation's economic outlook.

In addition to rising prices and persistently high interest rates, the dark side of the picture showed rising business failures, reduced factory capacity utilization, and other economic weakness.

A tentative government estimate of economic growth in the April-June quarter provided some encouragement in terms of production. The Commerce Dept.'s so-called "flash" figure on real gross national product showed the economy expanding at an annual rate of six-tenths of 1 percent in the current quarter. Real GNP—the value of all goods and services adjusted for inflation—declined a revised 3.7 percent from January to March after falling 4.5 percent in the final quarter of 1981.

OTHER REPORTS from the Commerce Dept. showed a rise in housing starts and in new orders for durable goods placed in May. But analysts in and out of government warned that unless interest rates soon begin to come down, the capital-spending recovery needed to sustain strong growth may not materialize.

With an industry-wide prime lending rate of 16.5 percent, builders must pay banks at least a point or two above that level for construction money, severely crimping their activity. Mortgage rates of between 16 and 17 percent are keeping most prospective homebuyers out of the market.

Meanwhile, Dun & Bradstreet, the financial reporting firm in New York, said that business failures soared for the second consecutive week, bringing the total so far this year to 10,978, the highest level since the Thirties. If the current trend of failures continues, the firm said, 80 of every 10,000 businesses could fail in 1982, compared with about 62 of every 10,000 last year.

BIG COMPANIES, such as Textron Inc.'s Bell Helicopter unit, Asarco Inc., and others, announced layoffs of workers in the face of continued weakness in the economy.

Factory production fell by only two-tenths of 1 percent in May, the Federal Reserve Board reported, but factory capacity utilization fell by the same rate to 70.8 percent. One year ago, factories were using 80 percent of their capacity.

May's drop in the factory capacity rate came despite a production gain in the hard-hit automobile industry.

"The capacity utilization rate for the motor vehicles and parts industry rose substantially in May for the fourth consecutive month, but the industry still was operating at less than 60 percent of capacity," the Fed reported.

AUTO ASSEMBLIES rose to an annual rate of 5.6 million units in May, up about 10 percent from April, the Fed announced in its report on industrial production. Production of lightweight trucks also increased.

The overall decline in output of two-tenths of 1 percent marked the ninth monthly decline in the past 10 months, with the production index of the nation's factories, mines, and utilities now down 8.8 percent from its peak in July 1981.

Offsetting the gain in autos was a 1.6-percent cutback in the production of business equipment. Output of construction supplies rose four-tenths of 1 percent in May following two months of large declines, but remained 15.4 percent lower than a year earlier.

Despite the relative strength in May auto production, the industry reported that mid-June sales of new American-made cars were the worst for the period in almost a quarter-century, down 22.4 percent from their 1981 levels.

of the SCA have been furthered. This is contrary to the letter and spirit of this law," the report declares.

It also points out that the proposals would "dramatically alter the scope of the law by eliminating the current interpretation that all service employees are covered except where they are "incidental" to the contract. With the proposed changes, a contract would be covered only if the work is performed "principally through the use of service workers."

And the change in the definition of locality, the report warns, "would simply channel service contracts into low-wage areas, create turnover and labor-management instability, and depress service contract wages."

GE Accord Protects Wages, Jobs

WASHINGTON TRUTH MARCH drew more than 4,000 demonstrators to Capitol Hill to protest anti-union actions and statements by the Reagan-appointed Public Printer, Danford L. Sawyer, against Government Printing Office workers and their unions. The march was organized by the council of 13 local unions at GPO and co-sponsored by the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO and the federation's Public Employee Dept. (Story, Page 4.)

65,000 Win Major Gains In IUE Pact

By James M. Shevis

Members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers will vote July 6 on a new nationwide contract with General Electric Co. that provides substantial economic gains and dramatic job-security protections.

The three-year agreement covers some 65,000 IUE members, and replaces a contract that expired June 28. Leaders of the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers also approved the pact, and representatives of 11 other unions gave their backing to the IUE agreement at a meeting of their Coordinated Bargaining Committee.

IUE PRESIDENT David J. Fitzmaurice and Chairman John Shambo of the union's GE Conference Board said the new contract contains "many historic gains."

"Despite GE's efforts to join the takeaway parade, it is an entirely forward-looking settlement," they said in supporting ratification of the settlement.

Fitzmaurice and Shambo said the unity of the 13 unions of the CBC also contributed significantly to the negotiation of "an outstanding agreement."

The settlement would give the average GE worker earning about $9 an hour an immediate 7-percent pay increase and raises of 3 percent each on June 27, 1983, and June 25, 1984.

A COST-of-living adjustment due in December will be calculated according to the formula in the old contract that provides a one-cent hourly increase for every rise of two-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index. In 1983 and 1984, however, adjustments will be figured at the rate of one cent for each rise of .175 percent in the CPI. Payments will be made semiannually as under the old agreement.

In addition, GE agreed to a special pay structure adjustment for workers making more than $8.35 an hour to maintain the relationship between job classifications. The adjustment will result in immediate

Kirkland Vows Continued Fight For ERA Goals

By Susan Dunlop

"The Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution and the principles embodied in it are issues that will not die," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared as the campaign for ratification of the ERA remained three states short on the June 30 deadline.

The debate on ERA will continue and the measure will be reintroduced in Congress, Kirkland said. But with or without ERA, he stressed, "a positive, ongoing women's rights agenda exists for the future."

THE AFL-CIO, he said, stands "side by side with the Coalition of Labor Union Women, women's organizations, civil rights groups and other segments of the society with common concerns working to change laws, policies, institutions and attitudes to bring about equity and justice for all."

The amendment, which would have established a constitutional prohibition against all forms of discrimination based on sex, was ratified by 35 states between 1972 and 1979. Congress extended the original seven-year deadline of Mar. 22, 1979, to June 30, 1982. But a final strong

Congress Toes the Line

Reagan Vetoes Scuttle Anti-Recession Program

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan used vetoes and veto threats to make an increasingly restive Congress toe the Administration line and abandon independent efforts to lick the recession.

His first veto killed an "urgent" appropriations bill that included $3 billion for mortgage subsidies to bring down housing costs and generate up to half-a-million construction-linked jobs.

REAGAN SAID it wouldn't be fair to single out the depressed housing industry for "special relief."

After all, he said in his veto message, "the recession and high interest rates have created hardship and unemployment for farmers, small businesses, the thrift industry, automobile manufacturers and dealers and many others."

The AFL-CIO termed the veto "a tragedy" and protested that Reagan, "like Herbert Hoover 50 years ago, wants to wait until the economy, somehow, cures itself." But the House fell short by 17 votes of the two-thirds majority needed to override the President.

CONGRESS then sent Reagan an alternative bill, without the $3 billion mortgage subsidy. But that, too, was promptly vetoed.

It included, as had the first bill, Administration-opposed funds to enlarge the summer youth employment program, to increase the supply of rental housing for low-income families, to roll back part of the devastating postage rates increases that hit publications of non-profit organizations earlier this year and some other funds that weren't on the White House request list.

The House had begun its scheduled two-week recess by then, but it had taken the precaution of passing a bare-bones resolution that would provide minimal funding authority until July 20. That would allow government agencies to function normally and let Congress make a fresh try at getting a bill enacted.

That version passed the House by 342-25, with even the most stalwart Reagan supporters voting for it on the assumption that the President would sign it.

BUT WHEN IT got to the Senate, the word from Office of Management & Budget Director David Stockman was that even this version was unacceptable because it departed in several places from the White House script and only ran until July 20.

Faced with a third veto, Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.) "negotiated" with Stockman on the provisions of a bill acceptable to the Administration. Stockman then gave Hatfield a letter saying that if the new version were to be approved by Congress "without additional amendments or unrequested funding, I would recommend to the President that he sign it."

A Message to Our Readers

New Role for the News

By Murray Seeger
AFL-CIO Director of Information

With this edition of the AFL-CIO News, the federation is embarking on a new publications program. The first of many planned changes and improvements will be seen in this week's newspaper.

The goal of the new program is to make the News a more complete, more relevant newspaper for its prime audience, the key leaders—officers and staff—of the 101 affiliates of the AFL-CIO.

In this edition, for instance, the back page is devoted to the Legislative Alert, which was formerly mailed to a special list of interested readers. Now, all readers of the News will get the Alert on a regular basis.

Next week, the back page will be devoted to the Memo from COPE, another publication which had been previously mailed separately. Now, all readers of the newspaper will also see the COPE Memo on an alternating basis with the Alert.

Within a few weeks, the readers of the News will find inserted into the cen-

Supreme Court Rebuffs R-T-W Move

The Supreme Court rebuffed the National Right to Work Committee by refusing to review an appellate court decision that a state law prohibiting union shop agreements does not apply to federal "enclaves" located within the state.

Labor's position was also upheld in a 6-3 Supreme Court decision holding that the Norris-LaGuardia Act barred a court injunction that would have compelled the Longshoremen to suspend a boycott launched after the Soviet Union's invasion of Afghanistan.

THE FEDERAL enclave case stemmed from a suit brought by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation on behalf of eight employees of RCA International Service Corp. who were working at Air Force and aerospace installations in Florida.

Their claim, which was rejected last year by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, was that Florida's "right-to-work" law nullified RCA's union shop agreement with a local of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

A district court had held that the union shop could be enforced at an Air Force base that had been ceded to the federal government before the date of Florida's "right-to-work" law, but not at an aerospace installation that had become federal property at a later date.

The appellate court held, however, that union security agreements were valid at both locations.

That decision, which now becomes final, is in accord with the position taken by a different appellate court in a similar case.

ON THE ILA boycott of cargo to and from the Soviet Union, the Supreme Court decision was in accord with its own precedents and with the AFL-CIO's interpretation of the 50-year-old Norris-LaGuardia Act.

In this case, the operator of a Jacksonville, Fla., shipping terminal had contended that the refusal of union members to load a shipment of agricultural chemicals bound for the Soviet Union in early 1980 violated the no-strike pledge in the ILA's contract.

The employer sought and obtained from a federal district judge both an order that the issue of violation of the no-strike agreement must be submitted to arbitration and a preliminary injunction to compel the ILA local involved to resume work on Soviet cargo pending completion of the arbitration process.

BUT THE 5th Circuit appellate court, in a decision that the Supreme Court affirmed, agreed only that the issue of violation of the no-strike agreement be arbitrated. It concluded that the injunction was barred by the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

Two Supreme Court precedents were involved.

Under one, the Supreme Court had held that a court may enjoin a strike over a grievance that is subject to arbitration under the terms of the contract.

The other, which was found applicable in this case, held that an injunction could not be granted if the cause of the work stoppage is not subject to arbitration and only the question of violation of a no-strike provision is arbitrable.

IN THIS case, the ILA boycott was political and aimed at the Soviet Union for its invasion of Afghanistan, not at the employer. Thus, the "underlying issue" could not be resolved through arbitration. But since the dispute over the no-strike clause is a labor dispute, it is subject to the Norris-LaGuardia Act restrictions on federal court injunctions.

The Supreme Court noted, as had the AFL-CIO in its brief, that the legislative history of both the 1932 Norris-LaGuardia Act and the 1947 Taft-Hartley Act bear out this distinction.

In both 1932 and 1947, the court noted, the issue of politically motivated strikes was discussed, and Congress refused to make them subject to injunctions.

The decision does not affect the Supreme Court's unanimous ruling earlier this year that the ILA's refusal to handle cargo to and from the Soviet Union violated the secondary boycott prohibition of the Taft-Hartley Act and left the union subject to damage suits from firms claiming financial losses as a result of the union's boycott.

Chief Justice Warren E. Burger argued in a dissenting opinion that "there is no rational way" to reconcile the two decisions, but the court majority clearly disagreed with him.

IN ANOTHER action, the Supreme Court ruled that Philadelphia area contractors that used the hiring hall referral program of a local of the Operating Engineers did not have to share the cost of a court-ordered affirmative action apprenticeship and training program for minority workers.

A federal judge had ordered the employers to pay 10 percent of the cost. But a 7-2 majority of the Supreme Court said the union should pay the full amount since there was no evidence the employers intended to discriminate. It held that the 1866 civil rights law on which the discrimination suit was based required evidence of intent.

Justices Marshall and Brennan dissented vigorously, objecting to limiting remedies for discrimination to cases where "intent" can be proved.

Profits Not Prerequisite for Executive Perks

The system by which the corporate world pays its top executives their huge salaries is more often than not pockmarked with contradictions and irrationality, Fortune magazine reports in its latest issue.

"The madness of that system can be seen in an analysis of pay vs. performance," the magazine observes. "In the compensation of chief executives, any similarity between rewards received and performance demonstrated often seems almost coincidental."

A CASE IN point is the contradiction between the 1981 compensation given ITT Chairman Rand V. Araskog and Raytheon Chairman Thomas L. Phillips. While Phillips's $635,000 "is a long way from food stamps," Fortune notes, "in the firmament of conglomerates where both companies reside, that pay puts Phillips in the underclass.

"Yet Raytheon's performance in recent years has been superb," Fortune noted.

In contrast, ITT's performance has been dismal, yet Araskog made $1,150,000 in 1981, or $133,000 more than he got in 1980. The total includes $173,000 that ITT pays in carrying costs on a cooperative apartment that Araskog bought so he could live close to the company's Manhattan headquarters, Fortune notes. Araskog is also paid $1,000 for every board meeting that he attends.

For the article on executive compensation, Fortune studied 140 large companies, comparing last year's return on stockholders' equity for each firm with the compensation paid its chief executive.

LONG-TERM forms of compensation—stock options and multi-year incentive plans—were excluded because the future payoffs on current plans are uncertain, and payoffs already realized cannot logically be tied to a single year, the magazine said.

Among the 20 largest multi-industry companies, the firm paying its chief executive the most in 1981 was W. R. Grace. J. Peter Grace, 69, grandson of the founder, got at least $1,549,000—but that does not include a bonus for 1981, the size of which had not been determined when Fortune made its study.

GOING BY his past salary and bonus record, the magazine estimated that Grace would get a bonus of $265,000 for last year, which would put his total compensation at $1,814,000. The striking thing about this total, Fortune notes, is that it includes still another bonus—a $1 million award from the directors "in recognition of his accomplishments during his 36-year tenure as the company's chief executive."

If "accomplishments" meant benefitting Grace shareholders, Grace's performance was below average, Fortune points out. From the end of 1945, the year Peter Grace took the helm, through 1981, Grace stock rose at an annual rate, compounded, of only 2.7 percent.

Statistics also show that Grace stockholders earned an average annual dividend yield over the period of 4.7 percent, which combined with the appreciation gave them an anual return of 7.4 percent.

"That is distinctly low grade," the magazine says. "One can only imagine how much more the directors might have awarded Peter Grace had he succeeded in making W. R. Grace just average."

The Fortune study found that, rather than performance, the factor that seems most to determine executive compensation is the size of the firm. "The phenomenon of increased pay for increased size is easiest to see when two companies merge," the magazine says.

WHEN DART Industries merged three years ago with Kraft, Dart's chief executive, Justin Dart, made about $500,000, while Kraft's boss John Richman, received $460,000. In 1980, Richman as chief executive officer of the merged firm made almost $700,000 and last year he was up to $750,000.

Over the past decade, the trend has been toward ever higher compensation for executives. A mere decade ago, Fortune notes, the chief executives of some major corporations were getting under $100,000.

The accompanying chart shows the astronomical percentage increases since then, and comparisons with other salary earners in non-business fields.

New Album Preserves Solidarity Day Sounds

The sounds of Solidarity Day are brought together in a mixture of music, speeches and song in a newly released commemorative album.

The 45-minute record, "Solidarity Day," captures the flavor of the Sept. 19, 1981, demonstration in the nation's capital that drew nearly a half-million trade unionists and their allies to protest the harsh economic policies of the Reagan Administration.

The album can be ordered from Worker Records, 1233 Kearney St. N.E., Washington, D.C. 20017. The cost is $8.50 per record, plus $1.50 for handling and postage.

Producer Joe Uehlein, an organizer for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., said proceeds from the sales will be donated to COPE.

65,000 Win Major Gains In GE Accord

increases of from two cents to 32 cents. The "decompression" increases, as they are called, will apply to day workers, salary and incentive workers alike.

Job security, along with cost-of-living increases, had emerged as the two main issues of the negotiations with GE, the nation's largest electrical equipment manufacturer, since talks got under way on May 4. The major breakthrough for IUE occurred in new contract provisions for job and income security in the face of plant closures and growing automation, including robots.

THE AGREEMENT gives broad protection to a production worker whose job is eliminated due to a transfer of work to another plant, introduction of a robot, or automated manufacturing machinery. In such an event, a worker forced to take a lower-paying job will be entitled to retain the old pay rate for up to 26 weeks.

Among other job-security provisions:

- GE agreed to give six-months' notice in cases where it plans to close plants or transfer work to another site and a minimum of 60 days' notice when it intends to install robots or automated equipment.
- Employees with 15 years or more service will get two weeks of severance pay for each year, plus half a week's pay for each additional three months' service.
- Workers who lose their jobs because of a plant closing will receive assistance in finding new work and learning new skills. The contract provides that workers with more than two years of service may get up to $1,800 in retraining funds.

OTHER CONTRACT improvements include a fifth week's vacation after 20 years of service instead of 25 and added pension and insurance benefits.

Monthly pension benefits will increase from the current range of $10 to $15 times years of service to a range of $14 to $19.50, effective in 1984. Medical and dental benefits also were improved, and catastrophe medical insurance was raised from a maximum $350,000 to $500,000.

Present and future retirees will receive increased medical coverage, and GE will increase its supplmental payment to those who retire between the ages of 60 and 62.

THE UNION and other members of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee now shift their attentions to negotiations with Westinghouse in Pittsburgh. Contracts with that firm are scheduled to expire July 11. Besides IUE and UE, the CBC includes representatives of the Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Steelworkers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Auto Workers, Carpenters, and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Free World Delegations to ILO Thwart Arab-Soviet Maneuvering

Geneva—A searching discussion of how best to promote freedom of association in the world blocked a communist-backed move by Arab governments that could have wrecked the International Labor Organization's annual assembly on political reefs.

The resolution on freedom of association, sponsored by U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown and other free worker delegates, was given priority within committee over an Arab proposal for an ILO "Day of Solidarity" with the Palestinians.

THE PROLONGED discussion of the resolution left the committee with no time to complete action on it. As a result, the committee did not get to the Arab proposal and had nothing to report out.

This denied the Arabs and communists the opportunity to reopen old political wounds at the three-week session of more than 1,800 trade union, employer and government representatives of the ILO member nations.

Meanwhile, the conference received a report from its committee on the application of standards placing Poland's military government on a blacklist of "special cases" for denying workers the right to have free trade unions.

IN ITS report, the committee also noted the findings of ILO experts that despite Moscow's denials Soviet workers do not enjoy freedom of association because of the subordination of their "trade unions" to the Communist Party.

The Soviet Union was also rapped by the committee for failing to clear up the suspicion that workers on collective farms are subjected to a form of forced labor in contravention of ILO standards.

Although the conference approved the report by a 230 to 3 vote, the total vote cast was just eight short of the quorum of 241 needed for adoption. The 173 abstentions recorded by a coalition of Soviet bloc, Arab and some Third World countries did not count toward the quorum under the ILO rules.

NEVERTHELESS, Michel Walin, Belgian government delegate, called the vote for what it was when he rose to say "for me, this report, adopted by 230 votes to 3, is a victory."

"I am sorry," he said in urging a revision of the voting rules, "that strategic tricks can deform the sense of a vote."

Expressing the views of free trade unionists, French worker delegate Marc Blondel denounced governments that try to welsh on their ILO commitments by claiming that ILO monitoring of the observance of standards intervenes in their internal affairs.

Delegates who fail to uphold the procedures for assuring observance of ILO standards to protect human and trade union freedoms are "destroying one of the foundations of the ILO," Blondel declared.

CONCURRING with these views, Brown later commented that the impact of the hard-hitting committee report on application of standards was undiminished by the aborted vote in plenary session.

"The technicality that prevented the report's formal adoption by the conference does not erase from the record that the violations of ILO standards were examined in depth," the leader of the AFL-CIO worker delegation said.

"Neither did it erase the accounting that governments of all colors were obliged to give of their violations, nor did it alter the fact that the committee representing all the ILO workers, employers and governments approved its report unanimously," Brown stressed.

NEVERTHELESS, he said, the major success for ILO supporters was achieved in the conference's resolutions committee.

"The Arab resolution was part of a politically motivated campaign that is out of place in the ILO," said Brown, who is director of the Dept. of International Affairs.

"The sidetracking of the resolution headed off a political demonstration that would have had a serious adverse effect on the ILO as a specialized UN agency with the mission of improving the lot of workers everywhere," he added.

On the positive side of the conference ledger was the adoption of a convention over employer objections for assuring workers better protection against unfair dismissals.

The convention, binding on governments that ratify it, places on employers the burden of proving that layoffs are justified.

Kirkland Message to NAACP Stresses Unity on Elections

Boston—Labor and the civil rights movement must pool their voting strength to "reverse the disastrous policies of the Reagan Administration," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged.

In a message to the NAACP's 73rd convention here, Kirkland stressed the "devastating and intolerable" unemployment inflicted by Reaganomics.

"WE MUST have a program that makes the creation of a full employment economy a top priority," he insisted.

Union and civil rights contingents marched side by side in last September's massive Solidarity Day demonstration, and Kirkland stressed that "the alliance must continue and flourish." The Nov. 2 election is Solidarity Day II, Kirkland reminded the NAACP. "We urge you to join with us and other concerned citizens and march to the polls."

Earlier, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks and Urban League President John E. Jacob had written their local branches and chapters calling for close cooperation with AFL-CIO central bodies on issues of common concern.

"WE HAVE joined in coalition to fight the budget cuts and the dismantling of social and economic programs designed to help the disadvantaged in our society," Kirkland wrote in his message to the NAACP convention.

"We have been appalled at the Administration's appointments of hostile and unqualified people to serve in leadership positions in government agencies. We have raised our voices together to protest the general erosion of civil rights enforcement. We stand solid in our commitment to affirmative action programs," Kirkland said.

The theme of unity and alliance was stressed also by Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts, who addressed NAACP delegates at the convention's traditional labor luncheon.

WATTS SAID two years of the Reagan Administration have pushed the economy to the "brink of disaster" and plunged black Americans especially into a depression comparable to the 1930s.

"It becomes our duty to change the direction of government policy," Watts declared, and to hold those in Congress "accountable" for their actions.

The keynote speech by Hooks, the NAACP executive director, included the comment that "the NAACP was in business before Mr. Reagan came to office, and we will be here when he leaves. We will help him all we can to leave office as quickly as possible."

push for ratification which concentrated on Oklahoma, North Carolina, Illinois and Florida was unsuccessful.

The ratification drives in the four key states were strongly supported by the AFL-CIO, state and local central bodies and many unions.

KIRKLAND emphasized that "throughout the nation, working people are rededicating themselves to the essential work that must be done at the state and local levels" to put to work the principles of the Equal Rights Amendment.

The labor movement reaffirms its commitment, he said, "to strive for the elimination of all discrimination against women, especially women in the work force," and will "push forward" in such areas as organizing, child care, affirmative action, pay equity, eliminating sexual harassment, and "encouraging the full involvement of women in all aspects of trade union life as part of our strategy to tear down the barriers to social and economic equality for women in America."

Congressional supporters of ERA have said they plan to reintroduce the amendment as early as July 14 after Congress returns from its July 4 recess.

CLUW PRESIDENT Joyce Miller, an AFL-CIO vice president, said in a statement that those who fight for women's rights "have lost a battle but we have certainly not lost the war."

"If anything," Miller asserted, "women working together have been strengthened. We face the future with even greater resolve to continue to work together to achieve full economic and political equality for all women."

President Eleanor Smeal of the National Organization for Women told several thousand demonstrators at a rally in Washington's Lafayette Park that women who want ERA "are not tired; we're not even winded."

SMEAL LAID the blame for ERA's defeat on the Republican Party, which she accused of not only deserting women's rights, but leading the attack against them. She scored President Reagan for opposition to ERA and "insensitivity" to the needs of women in the current recession through budget cuts that are especially harmful to women.

She stressed that the Democrats should not take women for granted, however, and pledged that NOW's emphasis will be on political action and on asserting that women "are a majority and we are determined to play majority politics."

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT setback is only temporary and the fight for ERA will continue until it becomes part of the Constitution, National Organization for Women President Eleanor Smeal tells demonstrators at a rally in Washington, June 30. The date marked the end of the ratification period for the labor-supported measure passed by Congress in 1972. Rally speakers pledged the strong political action organization cemented by the ERA fight will be used to "vote out" all those who voted against ERA and elect candidates who support women's rights.

Capitol Hill Rally Protests Attack on Printing Unions

A march protesting the anti-union campaign of the head of the Government Printing Office drew more than 4,000 demonstrators to Capitol Hill on June 29.

The "Truth March" organized by the council of 13 local unions that bargain jointly at the GPO was planned to present facts countering the charge of Public Printer Danford L. Sawyer that the government's printing arm is "overpriced, overstaffed, overpaid and inefficient."

THE MARCH and rally were co-sponsored by the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO and the federation's Public Employee Dept.

Sawyer, a former Florida advertising executive appointed by President Reagan, claims the GPO is losing money largely because of "excessive wages."

William J. Boarman, president of Columbia Typographical Union 101, which represents the largest number of GPO workers, called Sawyer, "a union-buster who doesn't tell the truth about the volume of work produced by GPO printers or its cost."

GPO wages are comparable or even less than those in the private sector, Boarman asserted, emphasizing that the agency is not losing money according to its own financial reports.

The demonstrators also protested a move by Sawyer to defy Congress and unilaterally impose six days of "furloughs" without pay for all GPO union workers. The congressional Joint Committee on Printing, which oversees the GPO, ordered Sawyer to drop the furlough idea, but he has announced that the first furlough will take place July 6 and he contends Congress has no legal right to interfere.

The GPO unions have asked the U.S. District Court to issue an injunction forbidding the furloughs and to require Sawyer not to take other actions against workers without the congressional committee's approval.

Sawyer may not like the law, Boarman said, "but this is not a question of one man's likes and dislikes. It is a question of law. Danford Sawyer should obey it."

IN TESTIMONY before the House District Committee, Boarman said Sawyer's allegations that the GPO is losing money are based on figures that are "grossly distorted or plainly false."

The GPO, which prints such documents as the Congressional Record as well as numerous government books and pamphlets, does not operate on a set budget, but bills other agencies on a fee-for-service basis.

Boarman pointed out that while Sawyer claims the furlough system will save taxpayers some $600,000 for each of the six days, the GPO bills its "customers" for about $2.5 million a day. Thus, if the furloughs are allowed to take place, the GPO actually will record a net loss of some $1.9 million for each of the furlough days.

The demonstrators also protested Sawyer's bargaining tactics in the recent negotiations at the GPO which consisted only of a "final offer" of a 22-percent wage cut over three years. The unions rejected the offer, and the joint congressional committee must now by law act to bring about a settlement. The contract expired June 18.

GPO AND postal employees are the only federal workers allowed legally to bargain for wages.

Also at issue were Sawyer's plans to lay off some 2,000 of the 5,000 GPO workers in the Washington metropolitan area and to seek sharp restrictions in collective bargaining rights as well as stepped-up "contracting out" of work.

Participants in the march and rally included Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Rep. Michael D. Barnes (D-Md.), D.C. Mayor Marion Barry, Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock who is also PED president, and Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO President Joslyn Williams.

Wall Street Plots Social Security Cuts

Twenty-seven Wall Street financiers are organizing a big business drive to slash social security benefits and increase consumer taxes.

Their goal: to push down the federal deficit without tampering significantly with the generous tax windfalls Congress gave to corporations and wealthy investors.

"THE AMERICAN people have a fight on their hands," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned. "Wall Street wants to defraud social security and Medicare recipients of their earned rights."

A Wall Street Journal news story reported that the financial leaders have joined in "an informal coalition to push for major changes in the federal budget."

The plan, reportedly based on proposals made by a group of former Cabinet members, is keyed to take effect in the 1985 fiscal year, but would be pushed to enactment early in the next Congress.

Its chief ingredients are:

- Cuts in social programs totaling about $60 billion—on top of the many cutbacks already made. The biggest share would come through reductions in social security entitlements.
- Additional defense cuts of about $25 billion.
- Tax increases of about $60 billion, which the Wall Street Journal story said would be "imposed chiefly on consumption, particularly energy use."

Peter G. Peterson, a former Secretary of Commerce and chairman of Lehman Brothers, Kuhn Loeb, Inc., is quoted on the timing of the campaign.

IT WILL be pushed early in the 98th Congress—the one that will be elected this November. The six months after the election, Peterson said, represent a "unique opportunity" to make changes in social security and other entitlement programs with a minimal risk of political backlash. The period for Congress to act is short, Peterson is quoted as saying, because it should be accomplished before the 1984 presidential campaign.

The Wall Street Journal said the financial executives plan to line up support from corporate officials.

The organizers of the campaign include heads of many of the nation's leading securities firms which, the newspaper noted, have "considerable reach into corporate offices as a result of investment banking ties with big companies."

Reagan's Vetoes Block Programs To Spur Housing

The Senate dutifully tabled all amendments, despite grumbling about Congress becoming a rubber stamp for the President. But House Democratic leaders had not decided, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, whether to call the House back from recess in order to act on the Senate bill, whether to pass it by voice vote in a "pro forma" session attended by only a handful of members, or put off action until Congress returns on July 12, counting on Executive Branch ingenuity to find a way to avoid major disruptions of government services or payrolls.

The Senate also prepared to leave for a recess, after making the pending order of business the proposed constitutional amendment to compel a balanced federal budget unless three-fifths of the House and Senate vote to allow an exception. (See Legislative Alert, Page 8.)

More than the required two-thirds of the Senate has endorsed the amendment. That includes some who agree privately that it is both unworkable and undesirable but fear that taking a public stance would leave them politically vulnerable.

A Message to Our Readers

ter of their newspapers a magazine supplement. This will be the new edition of the Federationist, the venerable magazine which has filled a vital role in distributing labor's message for nearly 90 years.

These are the major changes planned in the publications program, but readers will find more. As the weeks pass, there will be more modifications in the physical appearance of the News. Some old features will disappear, and new ones will be introduced.

The enlarged News will be must reading for everyone interested in the labor movement. We expect to expand our reporting efforts to better communicate across the broad spectrum of the AFL-CIO ranks the events of greatest significance to working people and their leaders.

These new changes and improvements will be made slowly and carefully; the changes already made came only after serious consideration by many individuals.

On the business side of the question, all those who have paid for subscriptions to any of the four publications—the News, the Federationist, the Alert and the Memo—will receive the newspaper until their current subscriptions expire.

Affiliated unions will be allocated a fixed number of copies of the News under a new subscription plan and can subscribe for additional copies for their members at a new rate of $8.50 a year. Other individual subscriptions will be accepted at a cost of $10 a year.

In Convention Actions

State-County Delegates Map Political Battle Plan

Atlantic City, N.J.—The State, County & Municipal Employees pledged to fight the Reagan Administration's attacks upon public services and public employees as the union's 25th convention drew up its battle plan.

In a keynote address to more than 2,000 delegates, AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee blasted the Administration for "turning over the White House to the corporate rich" and for "bleeding the cities, the states, the middle-income families, the poor, the handicapped, and the old."

AFSCME WILL work to "change the political climate of this country, not just at the national level, but in city halls and state legislatures," McEntee declared.

He also promised a stepped-up organizing drive: "We're going after California, and we're going after the Sunbelt, and we're even organizing those anti-union fortresses, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas."

Delegates to the four-day convention also heard from other speakers, including AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and two of the leading Democratic presidential contenders, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and former Vice President Walter Mondale.

The convention adopted a number of resolutions on major national and international issues, and featured a memorial tribute to Jerry Wurf, president of the union from 1964 until his death last December.

McENTEE SCORED the Administration's July 1 tax cut as "another giant tax giveaway to the rich," and promised that AFSCME would fight to elect a progressive slate of congressmen and defeat those legislators who have stood by Reagan.

Under the new tax cut, McEntee said, the 31.7 million people who make $15,000 a year or less will get to split $2.9 billion. A handful of people who make $200,000 a year or more—and there are only 162,000 of them—will take in $3.6 billion, he said.

"That's $91 for each of you and better than $22,000 for each of them, and that's the way this Administration wants it," he said.

McEntee lauded the contracts that AFSCME bargainers have negotiated in the past two years. These have averaged 8 percent a year in wage increases. He warned, however, that public sector workers are still far behind private sector workers in both pay and benefits.

AFSCME'S SUCCESS in organizing public employees was praised by Kirkland. "You have the leadership that you need to maintain and accelerate the progress that you have made over the last 20 years, and that is good news for the entire labor movement," he said.

Delegates approved resolutions endorsing future efforts to win ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and pay equity for working women. Other resolutions called for major public investments in building and maintaining public facilities and in education and job-training programs.

The convention also pledged support for Solidarity Day II on Election Day when organized labor will seek to elect candidates favorable to working people, urged a freeze in developing nuclear weapons by both the United States and the Soviet Union, registered opposition to a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, and pledged active support for boycotts of anti-union companies called by the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

IN A TRIBUTE to Wurf, Kirkland recalled the late AFSCME president's intense commitment to the goals of Solidarity Day last year.

"I remember the courage and the fierce determination with which Jerry rose from what proved to be his deathbed to add his voice and spirit to that massive protest against the cruelty of Reaganomics," Kirkland said.

"I remember that vast sea of AFSCME members who poured in from all across the nation to form the largest delegation of any organization that marched that day."

Addressing the delegates, Mildred Wurf said of her late husband: "He gave his life to the union, and the union gave him life. They were synonymous."

THE CONTINUING struggle for civil rights was emphasized by two speakers, President John Jacob of the National Urban League and Eleanor Holmes Norton, former director of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission.

In the only election at the convention, delegates from the union's Caribbean region elected Blondie Jordan of Orlando, Fla., the daughter of Georgia sharecroppers, as their new international vice president. Jordan, a member of AFSCME Florida Council 79, replaces Thomas Fitzpatrick.

Transit Contract Dispute Relegated To State Courts

A transit union seeking to compel a municipal government to live up to a collective bargaining commitment required by federal law must pursue its claim in state courts, the Supreme Court held.

At issue was the recourse that a Jackson, Tenn., local of the Amalgamated Transit Union had when the city reneged on a contract negotiated with the union. The ATU brought a federal court suit challenging that the city had violated its obligation under Sec. 13(c) of the Urban Mass Transit Act when it froze wages and repudiated a cost-of-living clause. The law requires a local or state government to agree to maintain existing collective bargaining protections as a condition of receiving federal funds to acquire a private transit system.

THE 6TH CIRCUIT U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the union's right to sue the city in federal court, but its decision was reversed by a unanimous Supreme Court.

The court's opinion, written by Justice Harry A. Blackmun, held that the legislative history of the law shows "that Congress intended these contracts to be governed by state law applied in state courts."

The Supreme Court said the union could file suit in state court for breach of contract. And it noted that the federal government can respond to a violation of the collective bargaining obligation "by threatening to withhold additional financial assistance."

SOLIDARITY RALLY drew nearly 2,000 trade unionists to Jasper, Ind., in support of striking Furniture Workers who are in a long-running contract dispute with Indiana Desk Co. Thirty years of stable relations with the UFWA soured when the company hired a union-busting consultant and 120 strikebreakers. Indiana Desk products were placed on the AFL-CIO boycott list in May.

Mass Rally Builds Support For Indiana Desk Strikers

Jasper, Ind.—Nearly 2,000 trade unionists from surrounding communities and several states demonstrated in a strong expression of support for 170 striking Furniture Workers seeking a fair contract settlement with Indiana Desk Co.

Marching through the southern Indiana city to a "Solidarity Day" rally at the courthouse square, they voiced their outrage at the company's union-busting tactics which led members of UFWA Local 334 to strike three months ago.

RATHER THAN negotiate with the union in good faith, the UFWA said, the company retained an Indianapolis management consulting firm that has an established record of pursuing decertification elections—a move that has soured 30 years of stable bargaining relations.

Since the strike began on Mar. 29, Indiana Desk has hired 120 strikebreakers and a contingent of armed security guards that patrols the plant grounds with attack dogs.

Two months into the strike, the AFL-CIO Executive Council placed Indiana Desk on the federation's boycott list, urging "all union members to join the fight for justice."

LED BY UFWA President Carl Scarbrough and local union leaders, the demonstrators marched by the desk factory calling on its owner: "Amos Braun. Amos Braun. Get the goons out of town."

Scarbrough said the union is willing to sit down and negotiate "anywhere" and "anytime" in an effort to settle the dispute.

Only one negotiating session has been held since the strike began. But because management refused to drop its take-it-or-leave-it position, no progress was made, the UFWA reported.

A major issue in the dispute is the company's insistence on taking away the union's pension and insurance plans and the right to grieve on incentive rates.

Scarbrough called on city officials to understand fully the plight of strikers in the face of armed-camp conditions at the plant.

EARLY IN the walkout, a picket was run down by a car driven by a strikebreaker, the union reported. Pickets have been pushed, jostled and threatened by the armed guards. And recently, the UFWA said, metal bolts have been flung out the windows of the factory at the pickets.

Scarbrough warned that the UFWA would not continue to take that kind of abuse.

Rally participants also heard addresses by religious leaders, elected officials and trade union representatives, including the Rev. Clark Field of Evansville, Ind., State AFL-CIO President Ernest C. Jones, AFL-CIO Regional Director James Freeman, State Sen. Mike Kendall (D) and Floy County Prosecutor Stephen Beardsly.

Perkins Stresses Political Independence

Philadelphia — The AFL-CIO remains politically independent and will support candidates who share the concerns of America's workers "regardless of their party affiliation," COPE Director John Perkins said.

Perkins was asked about labor's political ties in a National Public Radio interview during the Democratic Party's national conference here—the so-called mini-convention.

WHILE LABOR is not becoming a "branch of the Democratic Party," it has difficulty finding Republican candidates who share its views, Perkins said. He noted that in recent years such prominent Republican friends of labor as Senators Jacob Javits of New York and Clifford Case of New Jersey were denied renomination in GOP primaries.

Perkins agreed that it is much more likely that the labor movement will support the Democratic presidential candidate in 1984 than a Republican candidate committed to the Reagan Administration's economic policies. But the AFL-CIO still hopes the Administration will change its direction. If not, he suggested, "this country is in for some very tough times."

A number of questions dealt with the AFL-CIO's intention to seek an early consensus among its unions on a labor-supported candidate for the presidency—in time to play a role in the primary elections and the nominating process.

PERKINS SAID he didn't see an early endorsement as representing any more of a gamble than the past practice of waiting until party selections have been made before considering an endorsement. Delaying an endorsement risks ending up, as has happened, "with a candidate that we can't enthusiastically support," he said.

Several proven friends of labor are seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, Perkins agreed, "but you have to make those hard choices."

With all the AFL-CIO's affiliates represented on the federation's General Board, "there will be plenty of input in terms of their preferences, of who is electable, who supports us on the issues." Labor's leaders have a "responsibility to lead," he noted.

The AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education addresses its efforts to union members and their families, Perkins stressed.

"WE FOCUS on getting our members registered, getting them educated in terms of the candidates' positions and voting records, and then trying to assist them in getting to the polls on Election Day." This is independent of any party, he said.

Perkins noted that the AFL-CIO, through its new Institute of Public Affairs, will be using polling techniques to find out what matters most concern union members, "and we hope to address those concerns."

While retaining the labor movement's independence, union leaders and officials are actively participating in Democratic Party affairs, and union officials who are Republicans are taking part in the newly-created Republican Labor Advisory Committee.

"We are a bipartisan organization," Perkins stressed.

'Oh Say, CAN'T You See?'

Public Employee Study Finds Tax Cut Only Benefits Rich

Philadelphia — Reagan Administration policies have more than wiped out the savings most people will receive from the 10 percent federal income tax cut that took effect July 1, according to a study by the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

The analysis, made public by PED President Kenneth T. Blaylock at a news conference during the Democratic Party's national conference, concludes that only the "very rich" will come out ahead.

BLAYLOCK, joined by House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., termed the tax cut a "hoax on working Americans."

He said the Public Employee Dept. study shows that states and localities have been forced to raise taxes and fees to make up for loss of revenue resulting from Reagan Administration policies.

Since the largest tax cuts went to those with the highest incomes, the July 1 reduction amounts merely to "a shift in taxation from the wealthy to working Americans," Blaylock said.

THE PED report stresses the role of the Administration's "new federalism" in piling new burdens on states and cities.

It links Administration policies to:

- Disproportionately large cuts in grants-in-aid to state and local governments.
- A recession that has caused sharp reductions in tax collections and sharp increases in claims on government services.
- Creation of new federal tax-exempt investment opportunities that have effectively crowded out the market for state and local bonds.
- Reduced state revenues from state and local conformity to federal tax changes giving businesses accelerated depreciation writeoffs.

THE REPORT cites the reduction in services and facilities stemming from Administration policies, including cuts in job training, education, road maintenance and other functions.

"The impact of the Reagan budget on state and local governments is just as detrimental to the goal of economic growth as it is to the goal of tax fairness," the PED analysis concludes.

Convention Action

Radiation Hazard Study Sought by News Guild

Los Angeles—Questions about possible radiation hazards from video display terminals (VDTs) "are mounting up faster than answers," the Newspaper Guild's 49th annual convention declared as it called for "immediate" government research into the biological effects of two forms of radiation endemic to the machines.

Revelations at an international forum in Ottawa early in June that "extremely low frequency" radiation from VDTs may pose a hazard to pregnant women and others operating the machine "make it imperative" that agencies "move quickly" to try to determine the "degree and extent of the hazard," the convention declared.

THE MORE THAN 200 delegates also called for research into the effects of "radio-frequency" radiation in the low frequency range "characteristic of VDTs," the delegates added, noting that an Air Force study indicated it "may have effects on the immune system, at least in heavy doses."

With millions of employees operating VDTs in the newspaper and other industries, "delay" in launching the research would be "inexcusable," the convention declared.

At the same time, however, the convention made it clear it had no illusions that initiation of any new safety research will be easily come by under the Reagan Administration.

That Administration has been "weakening health and safety protections" while "reversing the whole of the federal government's approach to workers and their unions" and encouraging tighter restrictions on access to government information by the press and the public in general, the convention pointed out.

IT CALLED on the Guild's U.S. locals and members to join wholeheartedly in labor's mobilization to make November's congressional elections the "equivalent of last fall's Solidarity Day" in order at least to show the increased suffering resulting from the Administration's social and economic policies.

The convention also urged greater efforts to win contract clauses providing voluntary checkoff of political contributions and reminded locals that under federal law corporations that provide checkoff for supervisors and stockholders also must make it available to unions.

A convention resolution echoed a call by Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., for increased use of collective-bargaining to provide reporter members a meaningful voice in shaping the day-to-day journalistic practices, procedures, ethics and values currently being subjected to sharp criticism from both inside and outside the news industry.

"RIGHT OR wrong," Perlik said in his opening address to the convention, "our members, their training, their attitudes, their methods of work and their performance are increasingly the target of this criticism, and in many cases they are being called to account for sins which they are not responsible. . . .

"If we are going to be held responsible for what is going on in this industry, then we had damn well better acquire some responsibility for it."

Responding to another call by Perlik, the convention authorized a special convention in the fall to take up a proposal for merger of the Guild and the International Typographical Union, if the proposal is completed by September or October.

PERLIK reported that, after a year's hiatus, resumed talks between the unions early in June had produced significant progress on issues unresolved in the previous 41 months, and that he had hopes a full merger proposal could emerge from additional talks scheduled for late August.

In other actions, the Guild convention:

- Approved increasing the union's minimum dues by one-half percent, to 5.5 percent of a week's pay per month effective Dec. 1, and to 6 percent effective next May 1, subject to membership referendum in the fall.
- Called for greater efforts to eliminate sexual harassment in the workplace whether perpetrated by members of management or the Guild.
- Pledged the Guild's full support for re-introduction and ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.
- Condemned the Polish military regime for its suppression of the Solidarity union movement and its official dissolution of the Solidarity-affiliated Polish Journalists' Association. Delegates contributed $620 to TNG's Polish Journalists' Aid Fund.
- Endorsed the movement for an immediate bilateral freeze on "the production, testing and deployment of nuclear weapons as the first step toward a reduction and elimination of the world's nuclear arsenals."

Chemical Disclosure Rule Scored as Ineffective

By John R. Oravec

The Reagan Administration's proposed "hazard communication" standard needs strengthening in a number of areas to assure that workers receive adequate information about dangerous substances they encounter on the job, the AFL-CIO said.

Federation witnesses testifying at the opening round of Occupational Safety & Health Administration rulemaking hearings in Washington branded the proposal woefully lacking in scope and effectiveness.

PRESIDENT FRANK D. Martino of the Chemical Workers charged in presenting the AFL-CIO testimony that the OSHA rule would fall far short of a strong "right-to-know" standard that labor has sought for the past decade.

"Rather," he stressed, "the proposed regulation is a legal license for industry's continued 'right-to-conceal' from workers and their representatives the identities and hazards of workplace chemicals."

As the standard is currently drafted, Martino pointed out, only about 14 million workers in manufacturing industries would be covered, while some 60 million workers in construction, transportation, warehousing, service trades and agriculture would be left unprotected.

"One in every four workers throughout all sectors of American industry is potentially exposed to toxic substances," he said. "Yet after 10 years of federal health and safety protection, most workers in this country have no idea about the identity of the chemicals they work with or the hazards of exposure. Trade names, code names and inadequate warnings characterize the information most workers have available on a daily basis."

A long-awaited right-to-know standard was proposed by the outgoing Carter Administration in January 1981, but "the Reagan Administration dealt the working people of this country a cruel blow by arbitrarily withdrawing the proposed regulation at the request of the chemical industry," Martino charged.

Only after labor groups began to succeed in attaining toxic labeling statutes at the state and local level did the Administration come up with proposals that had the backing of the chemical industry and other employer groups.

"UNFORTUNATELY," he observed, "this industry support is not motivated by a belief or conviction in the worker's 'right-to-know' but by the hope a federal regulation will preempt or sidetrack local activity."

The watered-down proposal that OSHA is now considering gives too much leeway to industry to make trade secret claims, the AFL-CIO charged.

Only chemicals determined hazardous by the manufacturer under loose definitions and procedures would have to meet requirements for labeling, listing, safety data sheets and training.

"The AFL-CIO believes that all chemicals, regardless of the hazard determination, must be covered by meaningful identification provisions," Martino told the hearing panel.

In cross-examination comments following the testimony, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor pledged that the federation and its affiliates would continue to press for state and local toxic labeling laws "as long as we can and until such time as we see a strong federal standard."

TAYLOR SAID he expects long delays before final issuance of an OSHA labeling standard, which would then face Office of Budget & Management review and court challenges.

The federation's call for an effective standard was reinforced in testimony by representatives of affiliated unions.

Director J. Donald Millar of the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health also questioned the adequacy of the diluted OSHA draft, zeroing in on the scope of coverage and the hazard definition.

"We feel that significant changes are needed to ensure that such a rule is effective in protecting the health and safety of American Workers," Millar testified.

OSHA will hold additional hearings on the proposal in Houston beginning July 13; in Los Angeles, July 20, and in Detroit, July 27.

Social Security Benefits Up 7.4% in July Checks

The nation's 36 million social security beneficiaries were to receive an almost-full 7.4 percent cost-of-living increase in their July benefit checks. But the deduction for the optional medical insurance to pay doctor bills also went up.

The increase, based on the cost-of-living rise from the first quarter of 1981 to the first quarter of 1982, raises the average single beneficiary's payment by $27—to $406 a month. In many cases, the increase is less than the full 7.4 percent since Congress last year decided to economize by rounding off benefits to the next lower dollar.

Monthly premiums for the optional medical insurance were raised $1.20, bringing the deduction to $12.20 a month.

Reagan's Shell Game

DO NOT BE surprised if that highly publicized tax cut that went into effect this week does not look like much in the paycheck. Like all the other big changes that the Reagan Republicans have brought us, the income tax cut was aimed to make life easier for those in the upper, upper tax brackets.

The financial pages of the newspapers give early warnings of where the rest of the tax cut is going. On just one day this week, the U.S. Treasury had to pay 14.96 percent interest over four years to borrow $4 billion. That's about $2.4 billion in interest alone over those four years, and it means interest rates are rising again.

The bottom line is that because the Reagan Administration slashed taxes so deeply for corporations, real estate speculators and rich individuals, there are not enough savings in the economy to finance the huge federal deficits, new industrial investment and the needs of small businessmen, farmers and individuals who simply want to buy a new car or a house.

At the county fair, they used to call that the shell game. In this case, the tax cut handed out by one hand is being paid back to the banks in the form of higher interest.

Skirting the Trade Rules

The following letter by AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald was published by the New York Times, June 29, 1982.

ON WEDNESDAY, June 8, 1982, the New York Times published another story about the possibility of retaliation by the European Community if the United States enforces its trade laws. Both the reporting and the statements by the Europeans raise some very serious questions about the meaning of international trade agreements.

In 1979, the U.S. Congress acceded to the demands of the European Community and changed U.S. law in order to require an injury finding for action to counteract subsidized imports. Congress was told that this was the "price" of getting the Tokyo Round settled. In return, the Europeans agreed to sign a subsidies code. This code clarified agreements that subsidized exports are a violation of international trade rules.

U.S. LAW IS NOW being enforced in accordance with that agreement. The subsidies code declares export subsidies a violation of international agreements per se. Thus, the producers in the European Community are the guilty parties under both national and international law.

The New York Times, in reporting the threat by the Europeans to retaliate against the United States, should not have omitted the fact that the Europeans are violating the international agreement and U.S. law. When the New York Times does not recall or report this fact, it appears to make those who are illegally subsidizing exports of steel to this market the injured parties.

Rather, it is U.S. industry and its workers who are injured and have the legal right to retaliate. No trade war should follow.

It is time to decide whether only the United States is to suffer in trade and play by the rules, or whether other nations have an obligation to meet their commitments under rules which they agreed to only three years ago.

Reagan's Unpopular Policies Provoke Widening Backlash

By Press Associates, Inc.

IS THE REAGAN Administration out of touch with the American people? Is the conservative coalition of Republicans and southern Democrats which controls Congress out of touch with the voters?

The 1982 elections are drawing closer and only then will we know whether the voters will be expressing anger, apathy or agreement. For now, we can only look at numbers.

The "numbers of politics" are becoming more and more important in public affairs. The unemployment rate can be politically explosive, especially since it is at record postwar levels. And even if there is a sluggish recovery, the inflation rate will begin moving upward again, stirring mass anxiety.

THE NUMBERS NOW flowing from respected polling sources should be scaring the wits out of conservative incumbents, the Republican Party and the business establishment.

Louis Harris, the pollster, offered some surprising numbers in a recent speech to the American Public Health Association in Washington.

Harris said surveys taken at the start of the Reagan Administration gave conservative leaders a vision that "the Reagan Revolution would produce an earthquake change in American politics" similar to FDR's New Deal.

But now, just over a year later, Harris said, the numbers show that "the Reagan earthquake change is rapidly producing a counter earthquake change the likes of which we have not seen in many a year."

WHEN REAGAN presented his economic program in February 1981, Harris noted, 79 percent of the people wanted to give it a chance. On budget cuts, there was public support for cutting CETA jobs, food stamps, public works and even jobless benefits.

Last year, the people wanted "no cutbacks whatsoever" in social security benefits, Medicaid, Medicare, federal aid to education, health programs, veterans benefits and military spending.

Harris said doubts began to grow after six months, doubts about the fairness of the Reagan program to the elderly, the poor and the handicapped. In the environmental area, as people got to know James Watt and Anne Gorsuch, the idea grew that the Administration wanted to roll back the Clean Air and Clean Water Acts. But, said Harris, the people wanted the laws kept or made even stronger, 84 percent for clean air and 94 percent for clean water.

The reaction against the Reagan program really took hold in 1982, Harris said.

WHERE PEOPLE thought a year ago, by a 70 to 21 percent margin, that the Reagan economic program would be fair to them, the view now has been reversed. Today, by 51 to 44 percent, a majority of the people believes the program is unfair. A majority of 62 percent feel it is unfair to small business; 59 percent say it is unfair to farmers; 72 percent view it as unfair to the elderly and 76 percent as unfair to the poor.

The deepest recession of the post-World War II era has added fuel to the fire of this rising sentiment, Harris said. And, he added, "major goofs" have soured millions of Americans. The prime example, he said, is in the 50-64 year-old age group, which voted for Reagan by a 17-point margin, higher than any other. Now that group gives Reagan a 62 to 33 percent negative rating. The reversal came with the plan by Health & Human Services Sec. Richard Schweiker and Budget Director David Stockman to cut early social security retirement benefits by 40 percent.

This group has never forgiven the Administration, Harris said, even though his research shows that 65 percent of the 50-64 age group never wants to retire early or even at 65.

Harris said the people are now becoming convinced that America could well be stripped of all its compassion for decency and humanity, and that the establishment has been taken over by those who would repeal enlightened legislation and help for the less privileged.

IN HARRIS'S view, women now are more militant, the elderly alarmed, the young and affluent worried about nuclear holocaust, workers hurt by the economy, farmers being foreclosed, small businesses fearful of bankruptcy and environmentalists up in arms.

There is no conservative earthquake, Harris concluded, but just the opposite. The question is whether the discontent will be translated into action in the fall elections.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Balanced Budget Amendment Will Cost You Money

The Constitutional amendment to force balanced budgets is scheduled to be taken up by the Senate upon its return from the Independence Day recess on July 12. There is still time to fight this unwise legislation, but a big showing of opposition is needed to prevent it from being railroaded through the Senate.

Political Appeal Leading Senators Astray

Many Senators are engaging in political posturing on the issue--backing the amendment publicly even as they admit privately that it's a bad idea economically and Constitutionally. As Congress votes for the most unbalanced budget ever, and has to keep increasing the debt limit, they see this Constitutional amendment as an easy way to show the voters that they favor the goal of balanced budgets.

Unfortunately, the vote is not a meaningless gesture--the amendment would in fact do irreparable harm to the budget process, forcing immediate and massive new cuts in programs and enormous tax hikes.

It is not respected economists who are pushing this legislation but rather fund-raising pressure groups such as the National Taxpayers Union and National Tax Limitation Committee. If the balanced budget amendment is passed, these right-wing groups will stand back and watch as programs such as Social Security are slashed and your taxes are increased.

WRITE YOUR SENATORS NOW

U.S. Senate
Washington, DC 20510

Dear Senator _____:

S.J. Res. 58, the balanced budget amendment, would prevent Congress from using its taxing and spending authority to end depression, natural disaster or other emergency. If in place this year, it could require new budget cuts about 3 times as large as last year's.

Transient economic policy has no place in the U.S. Constitution. I urge you to oppose S.J. Res. 58.

Sincerely,

Cuts in Unemployment Compensation Take Effect

As the Reagan recession throws millions of Americans out of work, the Reagan budget cuts made in 1981 are now denying unemployment compensation to many of the jobless. Recently the Reagan cuts forced the following five states to "trigger off" the extended unemployment benefits program, ending payments to anyone jobless longer than 26 weeks.

State/Date EB ended	Number of Jobless Immediately Losing Benefits
Arkansas/7-3-82	5,776
Maine/7-3-82	3,146
Massachusetts/6-26-82	13,590
Missouri/6-19-82	15,751
	73,548

WHAT YOU CAN DO: A bill to provide 13 weeks of supplemental unemployment compensation to those who have exhausted all other benefits may reach the House floor soon after the recess. Urge your Representative to support H.R. 6369 (formerly H.R. 6085) by Rep. Harold Ford (D-TN).

Wall Street Leaders Set Lobbying Drive To Alter U.S. Budget

Plan Asks Social Security Cuts, Reduced Defense Outlays, Boost in Consumer Taxes

WALL STREET JOURNAL, Thursday, June 24, 1982

Business Blames Recession on Federal Deficit, But Lobbies To Keep Their Tax Windfalls

Wealthy individuals and businesses successfully lobbied Congress for a massive tax cut in 1981. As a result, federal revenues are reduced and the deficit has risen--but do business leaders blame themselves? No, they want you to make up that shortage.

1) There are two ways to cut the deficit: tax increases and more program cuts. Either way, business wants you to pay.

Regarding tax increases, business groups are lobbying to retain all of their windfall tax cuts, and Republicans on the Senate Finance Committee have agreed to try to place new tax burdens on you:

- Higher taxes on tobacco and telephone rates: you pay.
- More stringent limitations on federal tax deductions for medical care and casualty losses: you pay.
- Requiring federal workers to pay the Medicare portion of the Social Security tax: federal employees pay.

Regarding budget cuts, this year the business/GOP coalition is focusing on middle-class "entitlement" programs, particularly Social Security, Medicare, and veterans' benefits.

2) The AFL-CIO has a fairer proposal: Why not repeal those tax windfalls of 1981 which caused the huge deficit? As the chart shows, the 1981 Reagan tax cuts for the wealthy are substantially responsible for the record-high deficit.

	All figures FY 1983
Current Reagan/GOP budget deficit:	$104 billion
Portion of Reagan tax cuts that benefit wealthy individuals, corporations:	$60-70 billion
Tax increases called for in new Reagan/GOP budget:	$21 billion
Revenues raised by AFL-CIO-backed H.R. 6257:	$34 billion

3) If business wants to cut the deficit, here's where to begin. The AFL-CIO-backed Equity Tax Act, H.R. 6257, would go a long way toward lowering the deficit. H.R. 6257 includes:

- A $700 cap on individual tax cuts, maintaining full tax cuts for those who make $40,000 or less
- Restoration of estate and gift taxes
- Restoration of windfall profits tax on oil companies
- Repeal of tax "leasing" and other loopholes

Mid-Session Status Report

VOTING RIGHTS ACT: Success! Strong extension passed by Senate, signed, enacted.

EIGHT-HOUR DAY: Another victory. Amendment to kill the 8-hour day for workers on federal contracts killed in Senate.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY JOBS: Senate approved House-passed bill to maintain law requiring U.S. book manufacturers to publish here. 350,000 jobs saved if bill is not vetoed by President.

EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT: Urge your Senators to cosponsor the resolution reintroducing ERA by Sens. Paul Tsongas (D-MA) and Bob Packwood (R-OR). Urge your Representative to cosponsor the ERA resolution by Reps. Patricia Schroeder (D-CO) and Don Edwards (D-CA).

BANKRUPTCY AMENDMENTS: The consumer credit industry wants to prevent bankruptcy relief for virtually all debtors, no matter how unfortunate the circumstances. Urge opposition to S. 2000 in the Senate and H.R. 4786 in the House.

Vol. XXVII | Saturday, July 10, 1982 | No. 27

MERCILESS POLICIES of the Reagan Administration are moving the country backward, destroying half a century of programs that help plain people and creating the highest unemployment since the Depression, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told thousands of demonstrators who ignored a rainstorm to attend the protest organized by the New York State AFL-CIO on the capitol grounds in Albany. With Donahue is Al Provenzano, New York legislative director for the Transport Workers. (Story, Page 6.)

Jobless Rate Holds At 9.5% as Layoffs Continue to Mount

By James M. Shevis

Joblessness remained unchanged at 9.5 percent in June, but the rate—the highest since the Depression of the 1930s—masked severe structural deterioration in the job market. Unemployment among adult men, black teenagers, and so-called "discouraged" workers hit new highs.

"For those fortunate enough to be working, their number of hours on the job were reduced," observed AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. "Specific employment declines continued in mining, construction, manufacturing, transportation and public utilities, and wholesale trade.

"WITH THIS sad background, the effect of President Reagan's recent veto of job-creating, homebuilding legislation comes into sharp focus. This callous action ignored the demand of 12 million Americans for jobs and the necessity for a new national policy to create jobs," he said.

"It is nonsense to talk about the recession ending given this persistent, high rate of unemployment."

The current level of unemployment is the highest since 9.9 percent for all of 1941, and if the discouraged workers—individuals who have given up looking for work—and those working part-time because they cannot find full-time jobs were factored in, the true extent of joblessness would be much higher than official government figures reflect. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which compiles the monthly employment and unemployment figures, does not include these workers in computing the national rate of joblessness.

THE NUMBER of discouraged workers rose 160,000 to a record seasonally adjusted 1.5 million over the second quarter. Workers on part-time status for "economic reasons" dropped by 300,000 to 5,763,000 in June, an unusually large decline. The AFL-CIO, which counts all of the discouraged and half of the part-time workers in estimating true unemployment, calculated last month's true jobless rate at 13.2 percent, with 14.7 million unemployed workers.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that despite the steadiness in the rate, the labor market "appears to have been somewhat weaker in June than it was in May."

Norwood pointed to the rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the jobless rate for adult men, to a post-war record 8.7 percent, and a decline in seasonally adjusted factory employment as signs of a weakening job market.

ONLY ONE-THIRD of the nearly 200 nonfarm industries surveyed by BLS reported increased employment in June, compared with 50 percent in May. Analysts consider the unemployment rate

Benefits Cut Off For Millions of Slump's Victims

Cuts in unemployment insurance protections that Congress imposed last year have slashed the safety net for more than 4 million recession victims, according to estimates by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Even as the jobless rate stuck at its post-war high of 9.5 percent, the number of states paying extended unemployment benefits continued to drop. One of the changes adopted by Congress in last year's budget-slashing binge eliminated the national trigger for the extended benefits program. Another changed the method of calculating state triggers so that the workers unemployed for more than 26 weeks would no longer be counted.

THAT LAST money-saving gimmick alone was largely responsible for the fact that only 30 states still pay extended benefits, according to Arleen Gilliam, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Union Stand Upheld

Federal Court Blocks GPO Furlough Order

By Susan Dunlop

Union workers at the Government Printing Office scored a key victory when a federal judge ordered the head of the GPO to obey Congress and drop plans to furlough employees for six days without pay.

The ruling of Judge Oliver Gasch of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia supported the stand of the unions and workers at the GPO that Public Printer Danford L. Sawyer has no authority to defy an order from the congressional Joint Committee on Printing to cancel a series of six one-day furloughs of the facility's 6,000 employees.

THE JULY 2 decision came in time to block the first of the layoffs, which had been scheduled for July 6.

William C. Boarman, president of Columbia Typographical Union 101 which represents the largest number of GPO workers, called the decision a victory "for the rule of law." The order confirms the unions' position that the Public Printer "is subject to the control of the Joint Committee on Printing" which oversees GPO, Boarman said at a press conference following announcement of the court's ruling.

Sawyer, a former Florida advertising executive appointed by President Reagan, had claimed the furloughs were necessary to cut costs at the GPO under a general mandate to reduce government spending. He also argued that the volume of work is declining at the GPO which does government printing, including the Congressional Record, on a fee for service basis.

SAWYER HAD refused to negotiate with the unions over the furloughs, maintaining that the joint committee had no

High Court Upholds Civil Rights Boycott

By David L. Perlman

The Supreme Court upheld the free speech rights of Mississippi blacks who launched a civil rights boycott 16 years ago.

The court's 8-0 decision, bristling with judicial outrage, nullified a state court verdict that at one time threatened to bankrupt the national NAACP and impoverish its most active supporters in Claiborne County, Miss.

The AFL-CIO had more than a passing interest in the case.

A STATE chancery judge, acting without a jury, in 1976 awarded 12 Claiborne County merchants and their attorneys damages totaling more than $1,250,000. He based his verdict on doctrines of conspiracy, malice, secondary boycotts and antitrust claims reminiscent of the blatant management attempts of an earlier era to thwart union organizing.

JOINTLY LIABLE with the NAACP were more than 100 individual defendants. Most of them were accused of nothing more than "regular attendance and participation at the Tuesday meetings of the Claiborne County branch of the NAACP."

To appeal the decision, the NAACP had to post a cash bond of $1.6 million—equal to 125 percent of the amount of damages as required by Mississippi law.

It could come up with only $763,374, and the AFL-CIO promptly offered to guarantee the balance of more than $800,000. The Industrial Union Dept. and the Auto Workers joined for $200,000 each of the guarantee.

Lane Kirkland, then the AFL-CIO's secretary-treasurer, explained labor's involvement: The civil rights and trade union movements are allies in the battle for social justice, and "We do not abandon our friends in the midst of battle."

SUBSEQUENTLY, more enlightened courts reduced the bond; the Mississippi Supreme Court found the penalty excessive and struck down part of the findings of the chancery judge. The state's highest court concluded, however, that the entire boycott was unlawful and damages must be paid because there were incidents of unlawful force or threats during the various periods of the boycott.

But the U.S. Supreme Court saw merely robust free speech, protected by the Constitution, in the words spoken at the boycott meetings held in the First Baptist Church in Port Gibson, the county seat.

Most of the 12,279 residents of Claiborne County are black. But in 1966, both the newly passed Voting Rights Act and the Civil Rights Act were just beginning to make their impact felt and the black citizens of the county were still largely frozen out of both political power and all but the most menial jobs.

NAACP Upheld on Mississippi Rights Boycott

THIS WAS the situation on the night of Friday, Apr. 1, 1966, at a meeting called by the NAACP to hear the report on a petition that had been presented to public officials of Port Gibson and Claiborne County.

As the court records show, the petition called for the desegregation of schools and public facilities, the hiring of black policemen, street improvements in black neighborhoods, integration of bus station facilities and an end to verbal abuse by police.

It said that "Negroes are not to be addressed by terms such as 'boy,' 'girl,' 'shine,' 'uncle,' or any other offensive term, but as 'Mr.,' 'Mrs.,' or 'Miss,' as is the case with other citizens."

IT CALLED for the hiring of blacks as store clerks and cashiers. And it expressed the hope that "selective buying campaigns" wouldn't be necessary to achieve these goals, because the time and energy "could be better directed at solving these problems which exist by mutual cooperation and efforts at tolerant understanding."

As the Supreme Court noted, "a favorable response was not received." And at the Apr. 1, 1966, meeting, "it was the unanimous vote of those present, without dissent, to place a boycott on the white merchants of Port Gibson and Claiborne County."

In the audience, conspicuously taking notes, was the white county sheriff. At some subsequent meetings, tape recordings were made by public authorities and transcripts were to be introduced in evidence to back up claims made by the merchants that there were threats against any blacks who did not participate in the boycott.

In particular, a speech by Charles Evers, an NAACP field representative and brother of slain civil rights leader Medgar Evers, was quoted by the state court as a summons to illegal violence. But the Supreme Court didn't find it so.

"STRONG AND effective extemporaneous rhetoric cannot be nicely channeled in purely dulcet terms," Justice John Paul Stevens wrote in the high court's decision. "An advocate must be free to stimulate his audience with spontaneous and emotional appeals for unity and action in a common cause." Stevens quoted from an earlier Supreme Court decision that "debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open."

The Supreme Court said perpetrators of specific acts of illegal violence could be punished under state law and held responsible for damages specifically linked to the illegal actions. But it refused to go along with the state court's assumption that the boycott was so tainted by illegality that it should be enjoined and its supporters punished.

MORE TO the point than occasional inflammatory words, a broken window, or tough talk to a black seen patronizing a boycotted store, the Supreme Court found, was this excerpt from the state court transcript when a woman identified as Julia Johnson was asked how she observed the boycott. This was her reply:

"I just stayed out of the stores, because I had my own personal reasons to stay out of the stores. There were some things I really wanted, and the things I wanted were the right to vote, the right to have a title—Mrs. or Mr. or whatever I am, and not uncle or aunt, boy or girl. So that's what I wanted.

"And if I wanted a job, a qualified job, I wanted to have the opportunity to be hired. Not because I'm black or white, but just hired."

JUSTICE STEVENS, writing for the court, noted the absence of evidence that any illegal conduct was "authorized, ratified or even discussed" at any of the boycott meetings of the NAACP branch, even though "the sheriff testified that he was kept informed of what transpired at the meetings" when he was not himself present.

Thus "to impose liability for presence at weekly meetings of the NAACP" would not even be "guilt by association," Stevens commented. It would amount to "guilt for association." Neither doctrine "is permissible under the First Amendment," he stressed.

Justice Thurgood Marshall, the Supreme Court's lone black member and a former counsel for the NAACP, did not participate in the decision.

THE ORIGINAL boycott had been stopped and renewed on two occasions. But while the lawsuit made its slow way through the state and federal courts, times were changing in Mississippi's Claiborne County.

Dr. Aaron Henry, who then and now was president of the Mississippi state NAACP organization, told the AFL-CIO News of some of the changes.

Black office holders dominate the county government and share city offices, he said. And Claiborne County's sheriff is a black.

When he goes into the First Baptist Church these days, it's not with a tape recorder.

Balanced Budget Amendment First on Senate's Schedule

Congress faces a thicket of budget-related controversies when it returns from a holiday recess on July 12.

The immediate agenda includes a proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced federal budget and resumption of an appropriations battle that has already resulted in two presidential vetoes and unpaid "furloughs" for some government workers whose agencies have run out of funds.

SIMMERING in both House and Senate committees is a witches' brew of proposals for the further cutbacks in government programs needed to bring spending estimates in line with the budget restrictions Congress adopted last month.

On the other side of the coin, the Senate Finance Committee agreed on recommendations to raise the $21 billion in new tax revenues called for in the budget, and the House Ways & Means Committee was scheduled to begin its markup shortly. The Republican-controlled Senate committee ignored the AFL-CIO's principal proposals to undo the tilted-to-the-rich bias of the tax cut Congress enacted last year. But the AFL-CIO's tax expert, Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor, said elements of the Senate committe's proposal "at least move in the right direction."

The proposal to write into the Constitution a requirement that Congress adopt a balanced budget each year, with rare exceptions, has only recently been viewed as a real danger to American government and not just another crackpot theory of the far right.

Labor has fought the proposal from the start as wrong in principle and unworkable in practice. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and presidents of leading unions joined with nationally known economists, law professors and public figures in sponsoring a newspaper advertisement attacking the proposal.

THE ADVERTISEMENT quoted the words of the famed Supreme Court justice of yesteryear, Oliver Wendell Holmes, that "a Constitution is not intended to embody a particular economic theory."

The signers of the advertisement note that they do not all agree on the appropriate level of federal spending, but oppose tying the hands of Congress and the President "to respond to a domestic economic crisis" or to upgrade national security. Further, the amendment "assumes that budget planning is an exact science when all recent experience shows that there are many uncontrollable forces which affect revenues and expenditures," the advertisement pointed out.

Court Blocks Hospital's Bid To Desert Social Security

San Francisco—A federal appeals court order obtained by the Service Employees has blocked at least temporarily an attempt by the Ralph K. Davies Medical Center here to end unilaterally social security coverage for its workers.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney hailed the stay issued by the 9th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals as a possible turning point in the union's campaign to prevent an "epidemic" of withdrawals by non-profit hospitals from the social security system.

CONGRESS MADE social security coverage optional for public employers and non-profit organizations.

Once an institution chose to be covered, it had to remain for at least eight years and could withdraw from the system only after a two-year notice to the Internal Revenue Service.

The SEIU and other unions representing health care workers have expressed alarm at the wave of scheduled pullouts by hospitals seeking to avoid the social security payroll tax—and at the fact that many of these institutions never notify their workers when they file an intent to withdraw.

The Service Employees Union has pending a Freedom of Information court suit, to compel the Internal Revenue Service to disclose the names of hospitals that have served notice of withdrawal.

IN THE San Francisco case, the National Labor Relations Board is also involved as the result of an unfair labor practice charge brought by the SEIU. The hospital did not notify the union that it had filed notice of withdrawal until 18 months after the fact—even though it had negotiated a renewal of the union contract in the interim.

When it belatedly got around to notifying the union that it was cancelling social security coverage—and protection—for its employees, the hospital offered its own private pension plan as a replacement.

The SEIU challenged the company's right to unilaterally drop social security coverage and brought an unfair practice charge with the NLRB. The San Francisco regional director initially refused to issue a complaint, but he was overruled by the NLRB general counsel on June 22. The SEIU and the NLRB then sought a district court order blocking the abandonment of coverage, but were turned down.

The appellate court then granted a stay, just hours before the withdrawal was to have become effective.

That guarantees a further hearing on the merits, Sweeney noted. But even if successful, he said, the ban would only apply to institutions where workers are organized.

He strongly urged the passage of labor-supported legislation that has been introduced in Congress to bar employers from withdrawing from the social security system.

Sweeney charged that the wave of withdrawals stems in large part from the advice of "outside consultants who are marketing various types of replacement plans" which are touted as costing the non-profit health care institutions less than social security coverage.

Unions Upheld As Judge Blocks GPO Furloughs

authority over him in the matter.

Judge Gasch's decision cited federal laws, including the 1924 Kiess Act, which require the public printer to bargain with the agency's workers and give the joint committee of Congress broad authority over the agency and final decision-making power in disputes with employees.

The unions have also been stung by what they have called a "smear campaign" and an attempt at union-busting by Sawyer.

In speeches before conservative groups and in newspaper articles, Sawyer has called GPO workers "overpriced and underworked" in comparison to private sector workers.

Boarman has pointed out that the wages of GPO workers are comparable to or slightly less than those of union workers in similar private sector jobs and that GPO's own financial statements disprove the argument that the agency is operating in the red.

THE JOINT Committee on Printing will begin fact-finding on July 12 before reaching a decision on terms of a new contract for GPO union employees.

Under the Kiess Act, the decision was referred to the committee when the unions and the Government Printing Office management were unable to agree on terms before the contract expired June 18.

Sawyer's "final offer" consisted solely of a proposal for a 22-percent wage cut over three years, Boarman said.

Jobless Rate Continues at 9.5 Percent

among adult men one of the most significant statistics in BLS's monthly report, since men generally are the last to be laid off in a recession.

Among other labor force categories, the jobless rate for full-time workers rose slightly, from 9.2 percent in May to 9.4 percent in June; factory joblessness rose over the month from 11.6 to 12.3 percent, matching the 1975 record, and construction unemployment climbed from 18.8 to 19.2 percent.

Black workers continued to bear the brunt of unemployment, with an overall Depression-like jobless rate of 18.5 percent, a two-tenths of 1 percent decline from the May level. But black teenage unemployment jumped from 49.8 percent in May to a new record of 52.6 percent.

THREE OF the 10 largest states reported double-digit unemployment last month, with Michigan at 14.4 percent, Ohio at 12.3 percent, and Illinois at 11.3 percent.

Joblessness has steadily increased since July 1981, when most economists believe the Reagan Recession began. The jobless rate a year ago was 7.2 percent. A further rise is conceded by analysts in and out of government.

The number of unemployed workers dropped last month by 122,000 to 10,427,000, as labor force participation fell from an abnormally high rate in May. The labor force declined 475,000 to 110,191,000 while employment fell 353,000 to a seasonally adjusted 99,764,000 after rising 777,000 in May.

BY INDUSTRY, manufacturing suffered the biggest employment setback, declining by 143,000 jobs in June. Other large losses were in construction, 42,000; transportation and public utilities, 25,000, and wholesale trade, 24,000.

In addition, long-term unemployment—joblessness of 15 weeks or more—increased significantly in June with the average duration rising almost two weeks to 16.5 weeks. The average workweek for nonfarm workers fell to 34.8 hours.

IUE Locals Approve General Electric Pact

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers overwhelmingly approved a new nationwide contract with General Electric Co.

IUE President David J. Fitzmaurice said 76 of 86 IUE locals representing 52,726 members had ratified the three-year agreement. Results from the other locals were not complete.

The settlement provides wage increases and significant job and income security. Twelve other unions represented by the Coordinated Bargaining Committee of GE and Westinghouse Unions have also agreed to the pact. IUE represents the largest number of workers covered by the contract.

GROWING POLITICAL UNITY among AFL-CIO affiliates is emerging in the battle against the Reagan Administration's threat to "every piece and thread of social legislation" put together in the last half century, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the Railway & Airline Clerks legislative and political conference. More than 500 delegates at the three-day meeting also heard BRAC President Richard I. Kilroy point out that working people will have an opportunity to help turn around Reagan's policies through their votes in this year's elections.

Air Controllers Submit Petition For Bankruptcy

The government could save millions of dollars by rehiring members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization discharged for ignoring President Reagan's back-to-work order last summer, PATCO President Gary Eads said as he filed a bankruptcy petition in behalf of the union.

"President Reagan has proved his point to everyone," Eads said at the U.S. District Court building in Washington, where he filed the necessary papers with the U.S. Bankruptcy Court. "It is logical to ask, what more can be gained by a policy which lacks understanding and flexibility and appears to be designed only to prove a point?"

IF THE DISMISSED controllers were reinstated, and the government were to forgo its massive retraining program for new hires, the nation's air traffic control system would be operating at full capacity in a matter of weeks, not years, and at a much reduced cost, Eads said.

"If this Administration is truly concerned about the cost of operating the government and about government waste, obviously reinstatement would be the most logical course of action they could take," Eads said.

Some 11,000 PATCO members were fired by the Administration in August 1981 when they refused to call off their strike against the Federal Aviation Administration and return to work. PATCO's certification as bargaining agent for the controllers was withdrawn last October by the Federal Labor Relations Authority, and the decision was upheld by a federal appeals court last month. The union's latest action was a petition for liquidation under Chapter 7 of the bankruptcy laws.

Business Failures Increase As Jobs, Production Decline

The Reagan Recession tightened its stranglehold in June as production, new orders, and employment in the industrial sector all dropped, and more business failures were reported.

A survey by the National Association of Purchasing Management showed that a composite index of purchasing at 250 industrial companies stood at 39.6 percent last month, higher than May's level of 35 percent, but the same as in April. The index, which is seasonally adjusted, indicates the economy is declining if the figure is less than 50 percent.

NEW CAR sales by the three leading U.S. auto manufacturers dropped 17.5 percent in the last 10 days of June, the companies reported.

Meanwhile, despite some signs of a revival in consumer spending, the Commerce Dept. said it expects business capital spending to decline further and slow down the rate of recovery from the nation's eighth post-war recession.

More companies reported worker layoffs. One of the most recent was Republic Steel's announcement of a shutdown of its South Chicago plant and the temporary layoff of 2,000 workers.

Ford Motor Co. scheduled a one-week closing of its operations in Wayne, Mich.; Edison, N.J.; Lorain, Ohio, and San Jose, Calif., that will temporarily idle a total of 8,100 hourly workers. Volkswagen of America, Inc., said it plans a two-week halt in output of cars and light trucks at its New Stanton, Pa., plant.

The Administration expressed cautious optimism that May's slight three-tenths of 1 percent increase in the government's index of leading economic indicators might be a sign of economic recovery, but other developments seemed to refute this.

ANOTHER government report showed sales of new single-family homes up 13.3 percent in May, after plunging 10.4 percent in April, but the new level was still nearly 19 percent below the year-earlier level.

Commerce Dept. chief economist Robert Ortner said future sales "will be on the slow side" because mortgage interest rates have not come down. They are now averaging a prohibitively high 17 percent.

In its report on leading indicators, the Commerce Dept. said five of 10 components that make up the index contributed to the May increase—average workweek, new orders in constant 1972 dollars, building permits, stock prices, and changes in crude materials prices.

FIVE OTHERS registered a negative impact—initial claims for state unemployment insurance, the pace of business deliveries, contracts and orders for new plants and equipment, change in liquid assets, and the money supply in 1972 dollars.

The index—a barometer of the future economic course of the country—had been falling for a year until an eight-tenths of 1 percent rise was recorded a month ago. The government later revised that figure to show a 1.3-percent increase.

The Commerce Dept. also revised its March figure, originally reported as a five-tenths of 1 percent decline, to show an increase of two-tenths of 1 percent. Revisions in the figures as much as several months back are common.

THE IMPACT of the recession was reflected also in the increasing number of business failures, which in the first six months of 1982 exceeded the total for all of 1980.

Dun & Bradstreet Inc. reported that failures for the six months ended July 1 amounted to 11,948, or an average failure rate of 460 a week. This compared with 11,742 failures for all of 1980, when an average 317 concerns a week failed.

In 1981, a total of 17,040 businesses closed their doors for the last time, according to the credit rating service. During the first six months of 1981, 8,235 concerns folded.

Maine and Arkansas were dropped from the extended benefits program on July 3. New Jersey, Massachusetts and Missouri had "triggered off" two weeks earlier. Other states are considered vulnerable.

But that's not all. Additional restrictions imposed by Congress last year will take effect on Sept. 25, 1982, and could rule out extended benefits in all but a handful of states.

The September changes alone will deny extended benefits to an estimated 1.1 million workers whose 26 weeks of regular state benefits will have run out, Gilliam said.

PAST CONGRESSES, under both Democratic and Republican administrations, have provided additional unemployment benefit entitlement during heavy recessions instead of cutting back.

The House Ways & Means Committee has taken a step in that direction by approving a bill by Rep. Harold E. Ford (D-Tenn.) for an additional 13 weeks of extended benefits, and House leaders plan to call it up soon after Congress returns from its recess.

Senate Rejects Assault On Overtime Pay Rule

A labor-opposed attempt to scuttle the eight-hour-day standard for workers employed on government contracts was blocked in the Senate by a 50-45 vote.

Government contractors now must pay overtime rates after eight hours in a day, as is customary under most private industry collective bargaining agreements. But legislation introduced by Sen. William L. Armstrong (R-Colo.) would allow government agencies to drop that requirement for their contractors.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison protested to senators that the effect would be to penalize unionized employers in bidding for federal contracts and to undermine the basic eight-hour standard throughout the economy.

Armstrong's attempt to get his bill attached to a relatively non-conroversial measure dealing wih flexible working hours for federal employees was tabled by the 50-45 vote. But it can still be brought up at a future date and remains a threat.

THE CONCERT HALL was the Cleveland plant of Fabri-Centers of America. Rolls of drapery material were stacked on pallets and the 150 employees, members of Local 48 of the Upholsterers, sat on bales of material for the mid-day performance. The plant's management as well as Local 48 joined with the Cultural Arts Committee of Cleveland's United Labor Agency in sponsoring the program.

Clive Lythgoe, a concert pianist with a commitment to bringing music and art to workers, is shown in the top photo talking to his factory audience of the works he was going to play—by Mozart, Liszt, Gottschalk, Debussy, with a Gershwin encore.

Lythgoe is artist-in-residence and dean of the faculty of the Cleveland Music School Settlement and has been a soloist with the Cleveland orchestra. The performance was filmed for later television showing.

At right, some of the enthusiastic Local 48 members applaud the performance. The Cleveland Plain Dealer's music critic, who reviewed the event, reported that the worker audience proved "the equal of any audience that frequents Cleveland's more conventional concert halls."

And unlike most concert goers, he noted, they applauded "without hesitation at exactly the right moment."

Lower Limits Urged on PAC Contributions

Federal limits on congressional campaign contributions should be tightened rather than loosened, the AFL-CIO urged at House hearings.

Special Counsel Laurence Gold expressed labor's concern that corporations and single-issue groups are tilting the political process by using a fast-growing network of political action committees to expand their influence.

POLITICAL ACTION committees were first set up to allow small contributors to pool their resources to offset the influence of wealthy campaign contributors—as with union members through COPE. But increasingly, Gold noted, PACs set up by corporations, trade associations and professional groups have expanded "the already disproportionate influence" of wealthy contributors.

A House Administration Committee task force is exploring various proposals to change the campaign financing law. Under present law, a candidate for Congress can't receive more than $1,000 from a single individual or more than $5,000 from a single political action committee. But there is no limit on total PAC contributions to a campaign.

In the 1980 elections, Gold noted, PACs sponsored by business and professional groups contributed more than $35 million to congressional candidates—nearly two-thirds of total PAC contributions.

Labor's preferred solution would be public financing of congressional campaigns along the lines of the presidential campaign financing system, Gold testified.

He acknowledged, however, that there is "little chance" that this Congress would approve such a plan. "Short of public financing," he said, the best solution is an overall limit on PAC contributions to a congressional candidate.

GOLD WELCOMED a bill by Representatives Dan Glickman (D-Kan.), Mike Synar (D-Okla.) and Jim Leach (R-Iowa) that would set a $75,000 limit on total PAC contributions to any single House election. But he opposed a provision in the bill that would raise the limit on individual contributions to a candidate from $1,000 to $2,500.

"Wealthy contributors are already playing a disproportionate role in the campaign finance system," Gold said. For the same reason, he testified, the AFL-CIO opposes increasing the present limit on tax credits for political contributions.

D.C. Area Unions to Monitor Telecasts of Religious Right

The AFL-CIO Metropolitan Washington Council announced it will monitor the television broadcasts of the radical religious right in the capital area to determine the fairness of their content on political and economic issues of concern to union members.

Council Chairman Joslyn N. Williams told a news conference at AFL-CIO national headquarters: "We feel a concern that union members may be misled by the one-sided opinions they may hear on these programs. We want to insure that union members are aware of opposing points of view."

THE COUNCIL, which represents 250,000 members in 150 local unions, will begin the monitoring project shortly after Labor Day and continue it through the end of the year. Two independent television channels that carry the programs of religious evangelists who have made one-sided statements are particular targets of the project.

"The so-called Moral Majority has interfered for too long in the internal affairs of our city," Williams said.

AFTER MONITORING the programs, the council will decide whether to file complaints with the Federal Communications Commission for possible violations of the FCC's Fairness Doctrine and to seek equal time to air labor's views.

"We're at a critical period in time," Williams said. "We are coming up close to Election Day. The Moral Majority has made it quite clear that they plan to play a significant role in the elections. We are concerned that the American public should be educated on all the controversial issues." Rev. Jerry Falwell is leader of the Moral Majority.

Williams said one TV channel has already agreed to give the council 30 minutes to express its views on issues raised on the 700 Club, hosted by Pat Robertson. "This is a good beginning," Williams said, "and recognition by the station that it has an obligation to air alternative views on controversial issues."

WILLIAMS stressed that the purpose of the media fairness project is not to impinge on the freedom of speech or opinion of religious broadcasters.

"We are not mounting an anti-religion campaign, although we suspect that our effort may be portrayed as such by the evangelists targeted by our monitoring project," he said.

"Simply stated, we want to assure that these programs carry commentary on economic and political issues, broadcasting stations which carry the programs will provide air time for opposing viewpoints by qualified spokespersons as required by the FCC's Fairness Doctrine."

OTHER AFL-CIO organizations may wish to follow the progress of the project, and perhaps use it as a model to stem the one-sided use of the public airways by the Moral Majority in their locales, Williams said.

The monitoring will be conducted by affiliates of the D.C. Labor Communications Association and People for the American Way, a group of church and lay leaders organized in 1980 by TV-film producer Norman Lear to contend with the "far right."

Arizona Labor Starts Planning For Vote Drive

Prescott, Ariz.—Delegates to the Arizona State AFL-CIO's annual convention concentrated on political action techniques and on ways to improve job safety conditions through collective bargaining in the wake of federal health and safety cutbacks.

The nearly 170 delegates to the two-day meeting took part in a series of COPE workshops on voter registration programs, voting rights of minorities, absentee ballots and state laws on voting.

The state COPE report, made by Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock, pointed out that business and conservative organizations outspent unions by a margin of five to one in the 1980 elections, underscoring the need for labor to draw the maximum effectiveness from its greatest asset—people.

IN WORKSHOPS on occupational safety and health, John Lund, health and safety coordinator for the Pacific Northwest Labor College, scored the Reagan Administration's attempt "to take us back to the good old days before OSHA." He urged local unions to bargain for strong contract language on safety and health to offset the cutbacks that he said have made OSHA "a shadow of its former self."

The delegates endorsed Pat Bosch for the 3rd Congressional District seat and Jim McNulty for the 5th District.

The State AFL-CIO executive board will meet in Phoenix on July 16 and a special COPE convention will be held July 17 to formalize endorsements for other state and national offices.

Speakers at the meeting included Bosch and McNulty and former AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan.

Rail Engineers Announce July 11 Strike Deadline

The unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers said it would strike the railroad industry July 11 at 10:30 p.m. (local time) unless President Reagan intervenes and orders a "cooling-off" period.

BLE is one of only two railroad unions yet to settle with the railroads in the current round of talks. The United Transportation Union is the other. Fourteen other unions have reached agreement on new contracts with the National Railway Labor Conference, the industry's bargaining arm.

A WALKOUT by the Engineers would affect all U.S. rail traffic, except Conrail, the quasi-government freight and commuter system in the Northeast, and part of Amtrak, the government-run national passenger service.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the President has the power to order a 60-day "cooling-off" period and appoint a fact-finding board that would report to him with recommendations for a settlement.

In the UTU talks, which are being mediated by the National Mediation Board, the main obstacle is the carriers' demand for national negotiations on what historically have been local work rules.

Fire Fighters Blast Federal Program Cuts

America's high rate of death and property loss due to fire demands a federal commitment to fire prevention and protection, Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon said in recent testimony to a Senate subcommittee.

Gannon was sharply critical of a Reagan Administration plan to abolish the U.S. Fire Administration and many of its fire prevention programs and to scatter its functions among other agencies.

"WITH THE United States continuing to experience one of the highest rates of fire death and property loss among industrial nations, the need for federal focus and assistance remains strong," Gannon said in a statement to the Senate Housing & Urban Development independent agencies subcommittee.

The Fire Administration was established in 1974 at the urging of the union and state and local fire fighting groups. It became part of the Federal Emergency Management Agency in 1978.

Along with the IAFF, the fire chiefs association and other fire prevention and safety groups have challenged the Reagan Administration's contention that the USFA is no longer needed because it has "significantly" met its goals of reducing deaths, fire-related injuries and property losses.

THE AGENCY'S current programs will expire Oct. 1 if Congress does not provide budget money to keep them functioning. Among the USFA's programs are fire education, arson prevention, research and development of fire fighters' equipment, and promotion of the use of smoke detectors and sprinklers.

Gannon urged Congress to support the agency's request for fiscal year 1982 funding, emphasizing that even that budget was "the absolute minimum essential funding level."

He also stressed that the establishment of the National Fire Academy had been a major goal of the union. The academy, which is also part of FEMA, has "presided over significant advances in educating and training fire prevention and fire fighting personnel in the United States," Gannon said.

Gannon specifically called for support of the joint USFA/National Fire Academy Open Learning program that offers fire fighters university-level training in fire science while they remain in their jobs.

In his testimony, Gannon, who is also chairman of the Joint Council of National Fire Service Organizations, outlined the role of the council in the government reorganization program that made the Fire Administration part of FEMA. At that time, he said, fire fighting organizations were promised that the USFA "would not be dismantled."

IRON WORKERS COMPETE at scaling a 45-foot vertical steel beam in one of the strength and skill demonstrations at the first Building Trades Family Jamboree in Santa Clara, Calif. More than 30,000 people attended the event at the county fairgrounds sponsored by area Building & Construction Trades Councils. Other competitions pitted electrical workers, crane operators, carpenters, millwrights, cabinet makers, lathers, cement masons and others. The jamboree included a concert by singer Merle Haggard.

Drozak Protests Evasion Of Cargo Preference Laws

Corrective steps must be taken to stop the illegal abuse of existing cargo preference laws by government agencies before it is too late, Seafarers President Frank Drozak warned Congress.

"Cargo preference programs are one of the last things keeping this industry alive," Drozak testified before the Senate Subcommittee on Merchant Marine.

HE POINTED OUT that the maritime policy of the United States, stated in the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 and reaffirmed in the Cargo Preference Act of 1954, mandates that 50 percent of government-generated cargoes be carried by U.S.-flag vessels. But violations of the law continue, he said.

Drozak outlined a program to stop noncompliance with these laws. First, he said, the President should issue an Executive Order directing all agencies to comply with the letter and intent of cargo preference laws. Second, the Merchant Marine Act should be amended to clarify the types of programs covered by cargo preference to make it more difficult for agencies to use loopholes to evade the intent of the law. And, third, the Maritime Administration should be given the authority and the manpower to oversee compliance.

DROZAK, WHO is president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., told another congressional unit that the commercial side of the nation's shipbuilding base is being allowed to die while the Navy is being built up.

"This Administration is killing the construction differential subsidy program, has cut back on the Title XI Loan Guarantee Program, and wants to make foreign commercial building and repair work a permanent fact of life. MTD does not see how this adds up to anything other than the death of the commercial shipbuilding and supporting industries," he told a House Merchant Marine & Fisheries subcommittee.

In a series of other congressional appearances, Drozak addressed a number of maritime issues:

- Waivers or amendments to the Nicholson Act, which forbids foreign-flag vessels from unloading their seafood catches in the United States, would cost American jobs. The SIU will oppose any State Dept. actions to permit such waivers, he said.
- The SIU endorses legislation to allow gambling on U.S.-flag passenger vessels. The legislation would require that 10 percent of the gross be deposited in a special fund to be used in building new passenger vessels, constructed and documented in the United States.
- Future shipments of strategic minerals should be planned in advance by the government to allow U.S.-flag ships ample opportunity to qualify for carrying such cargo. Drozak scored the General Services Administration for a recent shipment of Jamaican bauxite for the U.S. strategic minerals stockpile.

DROZAK ALSO released a letter to the MTD's executive board in which he questioned and reviewed the Administration's proposed national maritime policy.

"The initial proposals clearly lack the one basic element on which the ability of American shipping to expand its role depends—cargo," he wrote. "Any maritime program which dismisses or ignores this crucial element cannot succeed."

Sweatshop Crackdown Fizzles Out

New York—Instead of beefing up its raids on sweatshops as Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan promised, the Reagan Administration has been cutting back on the number of investigations of wage-hour violations, a new Ladies' Garment Workers study charged.

As a result of budget reductions, the Reagan Administration has conducted far fewer inspections than the Carter Administration, the union observed.

"Sweatshops are flourishing more than ever," the ILGWU reported. "If the Administration fought the Cold War the way it fights its war against sweatshops, the Russians would be in Chicago."

Under President Carter in 1979, the Dept. of Labor made 75,153 labor standards investigations around the country, checking to see whether wage and hour regulations were being upheld, the ILGWU noted. In 1980, the Carter Administration's last year, the number rose to 76,377.

But in 1981, the first full year of the Reagan Administration, the number of Labor Dept. investigations dropped to 69,228, a decline of almost 10 percent. The number this year is expected to fall still further to about 63,000, a decline of more than 20 percent over the last Carter year.

Of the 69,228 investigations conducted last year, only 888—1.3 percent—involved men's, women's, and children's apparel, the study pointed out. Of these 888, only 382 found evidence of wage-hour violations—only 43 percent of all investigations.

By contrast, the California Division of Labor Standards Enforcement inspects about 925 apparel shops each year in the Los Angeles area alone, the ILGWU noted, and three-fourths of the shops are found to be violating the state labor laws, which are similar to the federal laws. Even more, 93 percent of the shops, were found to be violating laws on record-keeping.

The ILGWU said the Labor Dept.'s record is especially poor in the New York area where it conducted only 324 investigations in the apparel industry in 1981 and found violations in only 76 cases. Only five New York contractors were taken to court by the Labor Dept. in all of 1981, the union said. The rest of the cases were settled out of court.

Copyright Act Rule Cleared By Congress

Congress has sent to President Reagan a labor-supported bill that would continue the domestic manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act for an additional four years —and avoid the loss of several hundred thousand printing-related jobs.

It would preserve a requirement that has been part of the law since 1890, that books written in English by authors living in the United States must be printed and bound in the United States or Canada in order to receive full copyright protection.

The Administration has opposed continuation of the requirement, but bipartisan sponsors of the legislation expressed the hope that the President will sign the four-year extension to avoid a new wave of job destruction in the midst of recession.

Labor Dept. studies estimate that a flight of publishers to low-wage printing facilities in Asia would wipe out from 78,000 to 172,000 printing trade jobs, with at least as many more jobs lost in related fields such as papermaking.

The bill had passed the House 339-44 and the Senate approved it by voice vote before it began its holiday-period recess. The Senate adopted the House-passed four-year extension to avoid further delay, setting aside its own bill to make the manufacturing clause permanent.

Court Rules Firm Must Live Up to Neutrality Pledge

Cincinnati—The 6th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals upheld a lower court injunction enforcing a management pledge of neutrality during a union organizing drive.

The court, with one judge dissenting, ruled that the injunction was called for because of irreparable injury suffered two years ago by the Auto Workers in efforts to organize a Gastonia, N.C., plant of the Wix Corp., a wholly-owned subsidiary of the Dana Corp.

IN JUNE 1980, a federal judge in Toledo, Ohio, ruled that Wix must live up to the pledge in a letter by Dana's corporate director of industrial relations to "communicate with our employees, not in an anti-UAW manner, but in a positive pro-Dana manner" during the organizing campaign.

The election was scheduled for June 12, 1980, but the UAW withdrew its representation petition in the aftermath of management's anti-union activity. The lower court imposed a contempt citation against Dana after Wix President Benny Hoyle denounced the union in captive audience speeches, declaring that unions "were no better than communists," particularly the UAW.

Writing for the court, Judge Anna Diggs Taylor concluded that even without the neutrality pledge, the remarks by Hoyle constituted thinly veiled threats that violated federal labor laws and therefore were not within the scope of any First Amendment privilege as claimed by the employer.

Neutrality pledges were signed by Dana beginning in October 1976. Various supplements to the union's master contract with the firm also included the pledge. The 1979 letter stated in part:

"WE HAVE NO objection to the UAW becoming the bargaining representative of our people as a result of . . . (a representation) election. Where the UAW becomes involved in organizing our employees, we intend to continue our commitment of maintaining a neutral position on this matter."

Judge Boyce Martin's dissent to the appeals court's finding asserted that the injunction enforcing the neutrality pledge was an unconstitutional prior restraint. He said the pledge was vague because the term "neutral" was not defined and because management retained the right to take a "pro-Dana" stance.

NEW YORK RALLY FOR JOBS drew over 3,000 union members to the state capitol grounds despite a drenching rain for a demonstration organized by the New York State AFL-CIO to remind state officials of workers' growing concerns over high unemployment and other economic and social issues, including jobs lost to unfair competition from imports.

3,000 New York Unionists Mount Jobs Rally in Albany

Albany, N.Y.—A "rally for jobs" organized by the New York State AFL-CIO drew more than 3,000 union members to the state capitol "to collectively express their opinions on the economy, jobs, social insurance benefits and other issues that affect workers," as State federation President Raymond R. Corbett put it.

The rally was held during the final week of the legislature's 1982 session to dramatize for state officials the effects of high unemployment in New York and the nation.

AMONG THE issues the demonstrators spoke out on was the decision by the New York City Metropolitan Transit Authority to award contracts for new subway cars to foreign firms.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared in the keynote speech that the Reagan Administration is not moving the country ahead, but backward, by "using the same Republican policies that brought about the Great Depression of the 1930s."

The Administration claims that it is "the very programs that saved the American people from complete despair and destitution," put in place by the Roosevelt Administration, that are causing the nation's current problems, Donahue observed.

HE SAID the Reagan Administration is promising that "prosperity is just around the corner" provided the nation stops spending for public health, education, housing and jobs as well as social security and unemployment compensation and gets rid of "all the programs that elevate the quality of life for plain people."

The point of Reagan's tax cuts for the rich, his "new federalism" plan and his industrial policy is to "concentrate all of the country's physical and financial assets in the hands of the smallest number of corporations. Then we'll have the kind of country that Ronald Reagan and his supporters want us to have," Donahue said.

He charged that the "tax gimmicks and trade concessions that make it so much more profitable to close plants here and open new ones overseas and to sell out American workers and import the products of others" are a result of "naked greed on the part of American corporate leaders, investors and bankers."

THE AFL-CIO has for 20 years been "a voice crying in the wilderness" in urging Congress to enact fair and "even-handed" trade laws and to demand fair treatment from other countries, Donahue said.

Corbett told the demonstrators that if all the jobless workers in New York stood in one unemployment line "it would stretch more than 400 miles."

"Organized labor in New York State is angry," he said, "and the unemployment situation must not be tolerated by government leaders."

Ben Stahl Retires From HRDI Post

Ben Stahl, regional director for the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Intitute in Philadelphia, has retired after nearly 40 years of close association with the labor movement.

Stahl, a long-time member of the Teachers, served on the field staff of the CIO and the AFL-CIO from 1943 to 1969, with a four-year interlude on the staff of the Jewish Labor Committee in Philadelphia. He became one of HRDI's first staff members in 1969.

HRDI President Alan Kistler and Executive Director Michael M. Arnold said Stahl played a key role in developing labor involvement in employment and training programs for the jobless and disadvantaged.

Religion-Labor Parley Shapes Strategies

Milwaukee—The third national Religion & Labor Conference brought together more than 200 representatives of labor, religious, community and women's organizations to discuss cooperative strategies for dealing with critical social issues.

The conference was sponsored by the National Religion & Labor Conference, Inc., an organization formed to help local religious and labor coalitions in efforts to bring about social and economic justice through institutional and political change.

THE NRLC IS chaired by Msgr. George Higgins of Catholic University and Alan Kistler, AFL-CIO director of Organization & Field Services. John H. Dunne, secretary-treasurer of the Professional & Technical Engineers, holds the same post with the NRLC.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, a director of the NRLC, said that organized labor and the churches are the country's "two greatest forces for social justice" and "reinforce one another's individual and common interests."

Donahue stressed that no one is exempt from the duty "to enlarge the dimensions of justice and mercy in the world." He pointed out that over the last century many church teachings about social justice "have been achieved through collective bargaining and legislative activity, and over the same span the American labor movement has been at the center of the struggle."

DONAHUE denounced "those who are able somehow to discern their own programs and goals as the true expression of God's will, while dismissing all others as mere 'secular humanism.' "

He pointed to the inseparable blending of "the immediate human values" such as those defended by the Polish workers federation, Solidarity, with "the timeless, universal values" of the Catholic Church in Poland "in common cause against the monolithic, all-powerful state."

In this country, Donahue said, "I am unable to see that to deny aid and compassion to those in need is the work of the Lord. If government is to have no place in feeding the hungry, housing the homeless or healing the sick; if government has no business to protect the weak from the strong, and no mandate to promote human development through education and training for useful work, then government is reduced to no more than Pontius Pilate, washing his hands of the whole human enterprise."

THE ROLE OF government and of all human institutions needs to be reconsidered, he asserted, "in the light of what contributions they can make to the advancement of justice and mercy in the world."

The conference theme, "Coalitions for Today's Challenges," included discussions of the economy, jobs and technology, politics and political action, organizing in the 1980's and local coalition building.

Workshops covered ways the religious and labor communities can respond cooperatively to issues such as plant closings, jobs lost to new technology, organization of women and minorities as well as of religious institutions, organizing in "right to work" states, the problems of the Reagan Recession, expanding economic democracy, union-busting, and worker plant ownership.

OTHER SPEAKERS at the three-day conference included, from labor, President Frederick O'Neal of the Actors & Artistes, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney, Barbara Hutchinson, director of the women's department of the Government Employees, AFL-CIO Region III Director Walter Waddy, and William Kircher, assistant to the president of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees.

Speakers from the religious community included Sister Carol Coston, director of Network; Rabbi Robert Marx, Temple Solel, Chicago; Rev. Richard Poethig, director of the Institute on the Church in Urban-Industrial Society, Milwaukee; Dr. John Rains, Temple University, and Rev. Jim Sessions, executive director of the Commission on Religion in Appalachia.

Time Running Out

THE WINDUP of the 97th Congress is not many weeks away, and one can at least hope that a significant number of our congressmen and senators realize that they are in poor shape to face the voters. Not even the most passionate Reaganite can find much to point to with pride.

Some House and Senate members clearly have a valid claim to the continued support of working Americans—and those who would be working if jobs were available. But the 97th Congress as a whole rubber-stamped the Reagan Administration's program last year, and must share responsibility for the outcome. And this year, its record to date has been only marginally better.

There are two courses that mainstream Republicans and those Democrats who bowed to what they took to be the political winds of conservatism can take at this late juncture.

They can follow Mr. Reagan's example and blame the recession and its hardships on "misguided" policies of previous administrations. Or they can look at their districts, listen to their constituents, admit that the economy is in sorry shape and that people are hurting—and try to do something about it.

THEY CAN recognize that 9.5-percent unemployment means that the only recourse for millions whose benefits have run out is public welfare—unless Congress undoes some of the damage it inflicted on the unemployment compensation program last year and adds additional weeks of entitlement.

They can use funds that would be available from imposing some reasonable ceilings on the income tax windfall for the wealthy to provide somewhat more adequately for those the President once spoke of as the "truly needy." There are a lot more of them now.

And Congress can avoid getting distracted, in the weeks left to deal with the nation's concerns, by such obvious nonsense as the proposed balanced budget constitutional amendment. Time is running out.

Lower Interest for Whom?

REPETITION DOESN'T make misstatements of facts true, but there is always the risk that people hearing President Reagan's repeated claim that interest rates have fallen since he took office will assume that must be the case.

To set the record straight, Americans buying new homes must pay substantially higher mortgage rates than was the case before the Reagan Administration—a jump from slightly over 13 percent to close to 17 percent or higher.

There have been comparable increases in interest rates for tax-exempt municipal bonds and for bonds issued by top-rated corporations.

There have been a few interest rate indicators that have gone down, but you have to look hard for them. Thus, three-month Treasury bills do indeed carry a lower interest rate, but the interest on both three-year and ten-year Treasury bonds is very substantially higher.

But very few workers are buying Treasury bonds these days, and with mortgage rates at prohibitively high levels, fewer and fewer are able to buy new homes.

Attitudes Need Reshaping

Minority Representation Plans Mired in Mathematical Mess

By Gus Tyler

IF A MINORITY—called Xites—make up one-tenth of a state's population, are they entitled to get one-tenth of the seats in a state legislature, or one-tenth of that state's congressional delegation?

At present, official sentiment says, yes. At least, that is what New York State has been trying to accomplish by designing legislative districts that will give blacks and Hispanics representation in Albany and Washington that is in accord with their population strength in the state.

AFTER LABORING long over how to accomplish this, the state was informed by the U.S. Dept. of Justice that its plan discriminated against blacks and Hispanics in several of the city's counties. The districting was declared invalid, and the state will have to start all over again.

But no matter what the state does, it will not succeed because it is posed with an impossible arithmetic problem.

For the state to make certain that a black representative is elected, it must carve out a district that is predominantly black. Otherwise, the blacks might not elect one of that race even if they were 50- or 55-percent of the district population. So the state carves out a district that is 65-percent black.

BUT, ARGUE BLACK and other minorities, it is not sufficient that a district be made up of two-thirds minority constituents. Because a high percentage in such minority populations does not vote, it is necessary to map a district that is 80 percent minority.

But, by overconcentrating blacks in one such district, there are obviously fewer blacks who can vote in another district. So instead of four districts—let's say—with 65-percent black population, there are only two districts, each with 80-percent or more black population.

So, in the process of guaranteeing black representation, the total representation is automatically reduced and the final count does not reflect the minority population in the state.

TO MAKE matters a bit more complex, to guarantee the representation of one minority it often becomes necessary to curb the representation of another. Thus, in Brooklyn, the Justice Dept. found that to create a safe Hispanic district, it was necessary to construct an unsafe black district.

If the problem appears to be beyond solution today, what would happen if racial and ethnic integration were ever to take place? Under such a circumstance, in the absence of black ghettos and Hispanic barrios, it would be virtually impossible to design any district in which the ultimate demographic result would be predictable.

PERHAPS THE only long-range answer is—Tom Bradley. Here is a black, who lives in a city with a clear minority of blacks, who runs for mayor and gets elected because the voters believe he is a good man.

Perhaps the question is less how to shape districts than how to shape ideas, less a matter of arithmetic than of attitudes.

Reagan's Charm Lost On Recession Victims

Perhaps the President believes that even in 1984 there will still be enough people . . . who, out of ingrained ideology, will carry him to re-election.

More likely, Reagan believes, or simply hopes, that there will be a strong recovery from this devastating recession and that . . . the voters will say, "You were right. Give us four more years."

The automobile, housing, steel, savings bank and other industries in America may never regain the vibrance or dominance of bygone eras, so millions of Americans who have lost jobs, homes, spouses and hope during this supply-side flirtation will carry painful scars for the rest of their lives.

Does Ronald Reagan really believe that they will forgive and forget to the extent that in 1984 he can turn on his TV charm and convince them that he did them a favor?

I don't think he can fool enough of these victims of Reaganomics enough of the time.

—From column by Carl T. Rowan in the Washington Post, July 7, 1982.

MEMO FROM COPE

That Phantom Democratic Majority

The House: Turning Illusion into Reality?

Give or take two seats at different times due to deaths or resignations, Democrats have held a 49-seat margin—242-193—over Republicans in the U.S. House in the present Congress

That's a huge bulge.

Now, presto, watch it disappear before your very eyes. Take 35 away from the Democratic total of 242. You get 207. Next, add 35 to the GOP total of 193. You get 228.

The Democratic 49-seat bulge converts to a GOP advantage of 21 votes (though not seats).

Was the figure 35 pulled out of a hat? Not at all. It's the average vote provided major Reagan-Republican economic proposals from the ranks of the 45 so-called "Boll Weevils," a platoon of conservative Democrats mostly from the South and Sun Belt.

There is no fully offsetting group among Republicans. There are the so-called "Gypsy Moths," moderate GOP House members from the Northeast and Midwest, about enough of them to field a football team.

They stuck with President Reagan on the first round of his economic program and got stuck by it. Their districts are among the most hard-hit by unemployment. In the second round, this year, some of them jumped ship, but not enough of them to stave off another recession-deepening dose of Reaganomics or to counterbalance "Boll Weevil" support for the Reagan program.

So, the "Boll Weevil" Republicans-in-Democratic clothing make the Democratic margin on paper a mirage in practice. Most of them occupy safe seats (though one of the two northern members, Rep. Ron Mottl of Cleveland, was defeated for renomination in his recent primary). That means the "Boll Weevils" will be largely intact when the dust settles after election day, November 2.

If a real, as opposed to merely apparent, Democratic House majority is to emerge from November 2 voting, it's going to have to come mostly from two sources:

1. Districts presently held by first-term GOP members;

2. New districts created as a result of population shifts reflected in the 1980 Census.

The freshmen Republicans are the soft underbelly of GOP ideological control of the House. There are 54 of them (52 from the 1980 elections, two more from special elections since). Many represent districts that were traditionally Democratic. They came in with the 1980 Reagan tide.

Many others represent districts that were once hidebound GOP—but went Democratic in the post-Watergate 1974-76 elections. Voters in these districts learned that the world kept spinning on its axis even with a Democrat representing them, and a lot of them might not like the economic results of two years of GOP leadership.

Even under the favorable political circumstances (for them) of 1980, most of them won by skinny enough margins to be considered vulnerable this year. Of the 54, 18 won with less than 52 percent of the vote. Only seven exceeded 55 percent.

The surprise sources of possible Democratic gains are the new seats created as a result of the Census. They are mostly in the South and Sun Belt. There are 17 of them, and all but one was shifted out of northeast and midwest industrial centers.

They are surprising because initially they were expected to provide a windfall for the GOP. In fact, GOP leaders were licking their chops, anticipating at least a 10-seat gain from these new districts, and this gain was to be the springboard to GOP numerical control of the House.

It now appears Democrats will win more of these new seats than the GOP. And in the rest of the states where serious remapping of district lines occurred, favorable court decisions plus some clever gerrymandering (the GOP did its share, too—it's a two-edged sword) left Democrats in a strong overall position.

Even if Democrats pick up seats through redistricting, the big gains can only come through denting the GOP freshmen. The importance of doing this comes through clearly from figures on the aggregate voting record of GOP first-termers.

According to the official AFL-CIO scorecard for the 1981 session of Congress, among them the GOP freshmen cast 132 "right" votes, 646 "wrong" votes, a voting performance 83 percent "wrong."

A cutback in strength of this group of down-the-line Reaganomics loyalists is the shortest route to a real, as opposed to illusory, Democratic majority in the House.

Conservative PACs—Enough Hard Cash To Put All They Want Where They Want

No doubt you've been sitting around wondering how the corporate, trade association and right-wing political committees are doing in their fund-raising. They're doing just fine, thank you.

The Federal Elections Commission reports that from Jan. 1, 1981, through March of this year, more than 3,300 PACs have collected an aggregate exceeding $109 million. Better than 85 percent of this cash belongs to PACs which contribute overwhelmingly to conservative and right-wing candidates. They're on a hot roll. They will have enough money to put all they want where they want.

So-called "new right" PACs alone amassed nearly $34 million through March, topped by the $6.7 million that flowed in to the Congressional Club, controlled by Sen. Jesse Helms (N.C.). Another $5.8 million was collected by the National Conservative PAC, which waged successful negative "independent expenditures" campaigns against several pro-people Senators in 1980 and is at it again now.

NCPAC has targeted some of the best friends workers and unions have in the U.S. Senate for the treatment: Paul Sarbanes (Md.), George Mitchell (Maine), Don Riegle (Mich.), Quentin Burdick (N.D.), others. Under the "independent expenditures" cover, election law allows a PAC with no ties to party or candidate to spend as much as it can and say whatever it pleases about a candidate as long as it doesn't openly ask for votes for his/her opponent. NCPAC used the device effectively in the past three elections.

The amount of money collected by all PACs through March ran 52 percent higher than for the same period in the 1979-80 election cycle, and it foretells almost undreamed of sums before this 1981-82 cycle is over next December 31. The really big money hasn't even begun to show up yet, and the possibility is that $109 million will be more than doubled by the time voters head for the polls.

Most of the funds collected by corporation and trade group PACs are earmarked for a holding operation. Big donors to many of the conservatives elected for the first time in 1980, they want to keep these newcomers in office, and to shore up other conservative and ultra-conservative incumbents.

The feisty right-wing PACs, however, are gunning for new gains in the House and Senate and will provide fat funding for rightist challengers.

So far, the big-money PACs from the business and trade group world are—again as of March—the American Medical Association, $1,842,026; Realtors, $1,570,158; Auto Dealers, $752,373; Home-Builders, $705,941.

Odds 'n Ends

TRIMMING SAILS AGAIN, a Reagan Administration spokesperson—Budget Director David Stockman—now says July 1 tax reduction isn't going to lead to stronger economic growth in any big hurry. What was going to have an immediate effect (that's what the Administration promised when the tax cuts were enacted—the mere anticipation of them, with budget cuts, would send the economy into orbit) now will "contribute to growth over time," Stockman says in a masterpiece of gobbledygook, providing a "long-term change in the economy's incentive structure."

LOSS OF ERA might have spin-off results President Reagan—who opposed Equal Rights Amendment—and other ultra-conservatives never anticipated. Many women's groups that fought for ERA now look to electoral politics to advance women's issues outside of the context of the amendment. They're collecting large sums of money for political action. This, together with news that recent polls show women turning away from Reagan-conservative program on key issues in far higher percentages than men, could spell trouble for rightists in November. Recent poll found 52 percent of women disapproved of Reagan's performance in office, while 40 percent approved. Figures for men were the opposite, 52-42 approval rating. What gives the women's percentage added wallop is the fact that there are more women eligible to vote than men.

TALK ABOUT PLOYS, a mailing signed by Moral Majority leader Rev. Jerry Falwell begs for funds from supporters, because without them, Falwell warns, "I have been advised to disband Moral Majority." False alarm, says MM's second in command, administrative vice president Ronald Godwin. When asked about disbanding, Godwin said, "Don't hold your breath. . . . That's a letter to get our people's attention."

NOT CRYING POOR are Republican campaign committees. One of three such groups, the GOP Senate Campaign Committee is earmarking $781,000 for its candidate for the Senate in Texas. That's almost half of the entire Democratic Senate Campaign Committee fund.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT! PAGE 8

OSHA Scored For Retreat on Access to Data

By John R. Oravec

The federal job safety agency wants to sharply curtail worker and union access to toxic exposure data and medical records kept by employers, the AFL-CIO charged.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed changes in the 1980 access standard would lop off coverage for about 11 million workers and slash by 90 percent the list of hazardous substances on which companies are required to maintain exposure records.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor characterized the Reagan Administration proposal as "yet another of the seemingly endless actions to weaken safety and health protections."

Taylor stressed that "no documentation or factual evidence supports the proposed amendments which would limit the scope of coverage, cut back records retention requirements and, for all practical purposes, eliminate access rights for short-term employees."

But in announcing the proposal, OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter termed it an effort to "streamline" record-keeping requirements for employers.

"THE COMPLEXITY and burden of the present requirements discourage employers from creating records which would then be subject to the standard," he said.

The revisions would reduce the number of workers covered by the access rule from the current 28 million to about 17 million, an OSHA representative said, noting that the change would largely affect white-collar workers not regularly exposed to hazardous substances.

Labor's concerns focus on four areas of the OSHA proposal, Taylor said. They are:

- Changing the definition of a "toxic substance," which narrows the scope of covered chemicals from nearly 40,000 to 3,500. This means that employers would no longer have to keep exposure records on 90 percent of the chemicals now on the toxic substance list.
- Reducing the time employers are required to retain exposure and medical records, particularly for short-term workers who are employed less than a year. This change would affect workers employed by subcontractors in operations such as hazardous waste containment, building demolition or removal of asbestos materials.

The proposal also would shorten the time span for retention of records for long-term employees, currently the duration of employment plus 30 years.

- Permitting employers to withhold the identity of certain chemicals they deem a trade secret. The current standard requires employers to release information on chemical identity even if it is a trade secret.
- Soliciting comments on whether a union's automatic access to exposure records should be continued, contending that since this right was recently upheld by the National Labor Relations Board, it therefore does not have to be spelled out.

OSHA has scheduled a public hearing on the proposed changes for Oct. 5 and will accept comments until Sept. 14. The existing standard will remain in effect until the changes are made final, OSHA said.

Congress Crushes Veto, Extends Copyright Law

AUTO WORKERS President Douglas Fraser kicks off petition drive aimed at demonstrating to Congress the depth of public support for a bill to require that all cars sold in the United States have substantial domestic parts and labor content. Fraser launched the campaign at a news conference at Washington National Airport. Signatures will be gathered by the union in airports, shopping centers and on unemployment lines in other cities including Baltimore, Detroit, Atlanta, Chicago and Los Angeles. With Fraser are UAW Community Action Program Director Henry Lacayo, left, and a UAW member. (Story, Page 3.)

Job-Saving Bill Rebuff To Reagan

By David L. Perlman

Congress rebelled against the further destruction of American jobs and for the first time overrode a veto by President Reagan.

A 324-86 vote in the House and an 84-9 vote in the Senate saved the manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act, which requires that most books by Americans and other printed material be produced in the United States or Canada to enjoy full copyright protection.

IF THE President's veto had been sustained, hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs would have been wiped out by the shifting of printing to low-wage countries of Asia. The Labor Dept. last year estimated that as many as 367,000 jobs would be wiped out, including jobs in paper mills and other printing-related industries.

The domestic manufacturing requirement, which has been part of the law since the year 1891, was scheduled to expire this month, and Congress approved a compromise bill extending it for another four years, until July 1986.

Reagan vetoed the measure with the explanation that "my Administration has placed a very high priority on strengthening free trade" and America's "trading partners objected to the manufacturing clause."

THE AFL-CIO responded that "America's workers object even more strenuously to the loss of their jobs," and Legislative Director Ray Denison called on Congress "to stand up to its convictions and make sure the bill becomes law. To allow the veto to stand would be sharing responsibility for job destruction," he warned.

Before the vote, the AFL-CIO wrote members of Congress of labor's concern at the ripple effect of the job losses on top of already severe unemployment.

Labor Cites Peril to Economy

Opponents Rally to Fight Balanced Budget Plank

Political sparks began to fly in the continuing Senate debate over a proposed constitutional amendment to compel a balanced budget and set a ceiling on tax revenue.

Some came from the White House, where President Reagan told a Rose Garden gathering that the constitutional amendment is needed to stop the government from "squandering and overtaxing." Ironically, as critics were quick to point out, Reagan just a few months ago asked Congress to adopt a budget containing a record $100 billion deficit.

AND SOME CAME from House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., who warned senators not to count on the House to block approval. His warning was aimed at senators who say privately the proposed amendment is unworkable and unwise. But they don't want to rile the single-issue groups that have pushed calls for the constitutional amendment through 31 state legislatures.

Voting for such an amendment is "cowardly," O'Neill said. He warned that if the Senate does so, "I don't think we could keep it off the floor of the House."

Only a handful of senators had been on the floor during most of the debate, but there were signs that the dangers of such an amendment were starting to arouse national concern. Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) introduced into the debate a statement by 80 prominent economists, including Nobel Prize winners. They noted that they hold "a variety of views regarding national economic policies" but "we are unanimous in our conviction that such an amendment is not in the national interest."

Labor sounded an early warning about the hazards of the proposed amendment, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland protested against "shackling the Constitution to prevent the nation from dealing with unemployment."

Kirkland's warning that a balanced budget in the current economic atmosphere "would bring on a new Great Depression" found support in a study released by the State, County & Municipal Employees on the eve of the Senate debate.

Labor Asks Court to Bar Rules Gutting Davis-Bacon

Building trades unions and the AFL-CIO have asked a federal court to stop the Labor Dept. from putting into effect on July 27 changes in Davis-Bacon Act regulations that would destroy prevailing wage protections.

One motion filed with U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene seeks a summary judgment upholding on its merits labor's complaint that the new Davis-Bacon Act regulations should be invalidated because they are clearly contrary to the intent of the law.

A COMPANION motion asks the court to issue a preliminary injunction preventing the regulations from going into effect until the case has been decided on its merits.

A 12-page affidavit from President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. backs up labor's contention that the regulations promulgated by Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan add up to repealing the Davis-Bacon Act and related laws "without a vote" of Congress.

It relates the concern of Congress that federal construction contracts not be a vehicle for undercutting local wage and benefit standards based on "the special characteristics" of the industry.

GEORGINE NOTES in his affidavit that "firms are constantly being formed and dissolved," requiring little capital investment since most necessary equipment can be leased. Workers generally are hired "only for the duration of a particular job" and the industry is "plagued by persistently high unemployment."

Energy Costs Pose 'Heat or Eat' Choice to Elderly

High home energy costs are devastating to the needy elderly who are being forced to choose whether to "heat or eat," a report released by the National Council of Senior Citizens demonstrates.

The average American household spends roughly 6 percent of income on home energy costs, the study notes, but 70 percent of low-income elderly households, even after getting federal energy assistance money, lay out 20 percent or more of their total income for energy bills.

THE REPORT, "Seared Hopes and Frozen Promises," was prepared by the NCSC's Project EnergyCare, an information and assistance program that concentrates on the home energy needs of the elderly and disabled poor. It is funded under a grant from the Community Services Administration.

The report points out that only about half the low-income households that need it get help from federal energy assistance programs, and it warns that without a massive federal assistance role, many elderly will face heating bills this winter "that they simply cannot pay."

The Reagan Administration's 1983 budget energy proposals that slash energy assistance should be rejected, the NCSC said in releasing the report, because the large cuts called for "would make 'heat or eat' a national policy for the poor and the elderly."

FEDERAL RESOURCES will be best used, the report emphasizes, if they combine a program of fuel payment assistance with an expanded weatherization program.

The NCSC also found that the highest energy costs are now being borne by users of fuel oil heat, but the situation could worsen for users of natural gas as prices are allowed to rise under deregulation.

A key finding of the study, NCSC said, was that energy services are needed by many thousands of the elderly poor in every community "from the colder Northeast to the warmer Southwest and Southeast."

The difficulties with energy costs that the elderly already face are likely to worsen, the report concludes, "as funding for critical federal energy programs is reduced or eliminated" and other energy prices escalate.

THE STUDY found that one of every four elderly poor households spends more than 40 percent of its income on heating bills during the winter. In the poorest households—those receiving supplemental security income—energy bills during the coldest months may even exceed their income.

Of the households surveyed, 45.5 percent had incomes of less than $300 per month, and 69 percent had less than $400 a month.

With incomes this low, the NCSC said, energy bills, especially in the winter, force the elderly to choose between paying the bills or buying food and medicine. Most pay the heating bills and tighten belts elsewhere, if necessary borrowing money to buy food, the report said.

The NCSC report also stressed that policy decisions about the amount and distribution of low-income energy assistance should take account of varying regional and seasonal needs as well as fuel types.

About 17 percent of the nation's elderly poor now heat with fuel oil compared to about 60 percent who use natural gas. But present policies call for full decontrol of natural gas prices by 1985, the study noted, and those costs, already rising "will have an especially severe impact on those regions where gas is the predominant fuel." When the prices become nearly equivalent to oil, as much as $19 billion could be added to the "cost of survival" for the needy, the study said.

The data gathered by Project EnergyCare, NCSC said, shows that "the real need for energy assistance among the poor and the elderly is enormous," but in addition to cash assistance, weatherization of homes can provide substantial savings in total monthly energy bills for the elderly. The nation as a whole benefits from the effects of fuel conservation, the study stressed.

INFORMATION collected by Project EnergyCare demonstrated that for a $1,000 investment in weatherization, average energy cost savings were about 23 percent, and the savings were about 34.5 percent for a $2,000 investment.

Because the percentage of savings is greater when the rundown homes low-income citizens are likely to live in are weatherized, the program is a "sound investment" for aiding the poor and saving fuel, the report observed.

Weatherization, the study emphasized, also helps create jobs where they are needed in low-income areas, both through the projects themselves and by freeing capital for other types of investment.

The NCSC study called for the rejection of the Reagan Administration's 1983 budget for energy assistance because it is inadequate for the needs of the poor. The budget would slash federal energy assistance by $500 million, down from $1.8 billion to $1.3 billion.

"THIS WOULD leave recipients with between one-fifth and one-fourth of their incomes going to pay for energy after receiving energy assistance payments, and this is on an annual basis which does not reflect the concentration of energy costs in the winter months," the report pointed out.

The Reagan budget, NCSC said, would count energy assistance as income for purposes of Aid to Dependent Families and food stamp eligibility.

Grants to all AFDC families would be reduced by the amount of energy assistance they receive.

"In effect," the report observes, "this would eliminate the benefits of energy assistance for AFDC recipients, no matter how high their energy costs. In addition, food stamp benefits would be reduced up to $5.25 for each $10 received in energy assistance.

New Ship Simulator Trains Merchant Marine Officers

Linthicum, Md.—The Marine Institute of Technology & Graduate Studies offers "the finest technological training in the world" for U.S. maritime officers, Capt. Robert A. Lowen, president of the Masters, Mates & Pilots described as he "commissioned" a new, one-of-a-kind ship simulator for the institute.

The facility held dedication ceremonies June 29 for the simulator (shown in the two photos below) which will expand its Maritime Advancement, Training, Education & Safety Program (MATES).

THE INSTITUTE is run by the Masters, Mates & Pilots, an affiliate of the Longshoremen, in cooperation with the union's contract companies. Lowen serves as chairman.

The simulator uses maps, photographs and scale models converted to film by computer technology to recreate conditions "facing any ship in any harbor in the world," the union said.

The machinery combines 360 degree sight and sound and all ship's motions to create day or night scenarios "virtually indistinguishable from the real world," and instructors can program situations that simulate any condition an officer might encounter. Any part of the mission can be frozen and rerun to suggest alternatives, and failures in the system can be programmed to sharpen the officers' ability to make decisions about secondary systems.

THE BRIDGE is fitted with standard equipment and instruments used aboard modern ships as well as many advanced communications, navigation and ship monitoring and control systems. These components can be arranged to fit the configuration of any bridge layout the trainee is likely to face.

In addition to the new full mission training program and simulator, institute programs also offer specialized training in fields such as all-weather navigation, gas carriers, electronic navigation, ship's law, business and medical care and others.

THE INSTITUTE was established in 1967 as a training program sponsored by the union and shipping companies at the Texas Maritime Academy. It was moved to the 55-acre Linthicum campus near Baltimore in 1972.

In addition to its classrooms and simulators, the institute includes residential and recreation facilities for students.

Petition Drive Presses Auto Content Law

The Auto Workers have launched a nationwide petition campaign to demonstrate broad public support for legislation to require that foreign cars sold in the United States have a high percentage of American-made parts and materials.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser kicked off the signature-gathering drive at a press conference at Washington National Airport. He told reporters the domestic content bill now before Congress could save 868,000 jobs in the auto and related industries by 1985.

THE PETITIONS will be sent to congressional leaders, Fraser said, adding that "more and more members of Congress with long records as 'free traders' are realizing that this slogan of 'free trade,' particularly as practiced with the Japanese, has to be coupled with a demand for 'fair trade.' "

The bill has the strong support of the AFL-CIO and is at the top of the UAW's legislative priority list. It has 218 sponsors in the House and 16 in the Senate and has already cleared the House Energy & Commerce subcommittee.

The content provisions would be phased in over three years and would require companies, such as Toyota, that sell more than half a million cars a year in the United States to use American labor and parts for 90 percent of their content.

Companies with lower sales volume would face lower content requirements based on a sliding scale. U.S. companies that buy auto parts from foreign firms would also be affected.

COUNTERING the contention that the bill would provoke retaliation, Fraser pointed out that other countries already have content laws of their own. Without such a law, U.S. auto makers are at a disadvantage, he asserted.

Rather than worry about predictions of retaliation, Fraser said, Congress "should worry about this country's industrial base," of which the auto industry is a critical segment.

The UAW said the signature drives will be pressed in airports, shopping centers and "on unemployment lines" in other cities including Baltimore, Detroit, Atlanta, Chicago and Los Angeles.

PENSION INVESTMENT developments are discussed at a meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council Committee on Investment of Union Pension Funds. The committee, chaired by Ironworkers President John H. Lyons, at left, reviewed strategies to encourage investments that advance the labor movement's social concerns and create jobs.

Frank Myers Appointed To N.E. Regional Post

Frank G. Myers has been appointed assistant director of the AFL-CIO New England states region, Federation President Lane Kirkland announced.

Myers, 41, has been on the Dept. of Organization & Field Services staff in Region VIII since 1966. Earlier, he was an organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers.

John F. O'Malley is director of the region, with headquarters in Boston.

Court Urged to Block Gutting Of Davis-Bacon

With few exceptions to the doctrine that contracts are let to the low bidder, "it is very easy for a fly-by-night operator to go into the construction industry, pick up some semi-skilled or unskilled workers at rock-bottom wages and make a quick profit," Georgine stressed.

Prevailing wage requirements give reputable contractors "a fair chance to compete for government projects" on the basis of skills and efficiency, Georgine said, rather than "on the basis of the low wages they pay."

AND TAXPAYERS are protected, he noted, because a dam or a missile silo shouldn't be entrusted to unskilled workers "hired off the street simply because they are willing to work at substandard wages."

Georgine discussed the various regulatory changes in terms of the Davis-Bacon Act's intent and concluded that it would achieve "by administrative fiat" what foes of the law were unable to accomplish through legislation.

As one example, "the new regulations will permit wholesale employment of workers in helpers and other subjourneymen classifications at depressed wage rates" regardless of local practice.

CHANGING THE definition of prevailing wage from the rate paid to the largest number of workers in the craft involved, so long as it is at least 30 percent of the total, would "substantially diminish" the law's protection, Georgine said. The 30 percent rule has been in existence since 1935, he noted.

Restricting the area base for computing wages and abolition of weekly payroll record-keeping requirements are other changes that would undermine the prevailing wage law, Georgine said.

Ohio Campaign Launched For Big Election Turnout

Cleveland—The call for political unity among workers was sounded throughout the 13th biennial convention of the Ohio AFL-CIO which drew nearly 1,200 delegates representing 625 local and 63 international unions and approved endorsements for statewide offices.

Speaker after speaker, in keeping with the convention's theme of "Solidarity Day II—Let's Turn It Around," called on the delegates to mobilize their membership for a massive pro-labor voter turnout in the Nov. 2 general election.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue charged in an address to the delegates that the Reagan Administration's economic policy "has generated nothing but disaster" for workers, pointing out that there are more Americans unemployed now than at any time since the Great Depression.

"More than 10.5 million men and women are looking desperately for jobs that do not exist," Donahue said. "Fewer than half of them are receiving any unemployment compensation at all" and hundreds of thousands of the long-term jobless will exhaust their benefits shortly, he noted.

Calling for a reversal of Reaganomics and rejection of members of Congress who embrace faulty White House policies, Donahue observed that "there are three-quarters of a million trade unionists in Ohio who are determined not to curse the national climate, but to go out and change it—and that means changing some of the political players come Nov. 2."

HE NOTED that huge sums of money from employer and right-wing political action committees are being poured into every state "to keep Reaganism in the saddle."

It is not surprising "that the fat cats should want to repay the President for his solicitous attention to their interests," he added. "What we have going for us is the fact that, whatever else it can do, money can't vote. Only people do that. And people is what the labor movement is all about."

Also addressing the three-day gathering were the state's two Democratic senators, Howard Metzenbaum and John Glenn; National COPE Director John Perkins; AFL-CIO Region III Director Walter Waddy, Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP; Jerzy Warman of the Committee in Support of Solidarity; and Stewart Jaffy, legal counsel to the state federation.

AMONG THE 90 resolutions acted on, the convention called on Congress "to adopt forthwith the AFL-CIO's alternative program designed to create jobs, restore fairness to the tax structure and sharply reduce the President's budget deficit."

President Milan Marsh and Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith were re-elected to new four-year terms along with the 34-member executive board.

Heading the list of endorsed candidates are Metzenbaum, who is up for re-election, and former Lt. Gov. Richard Celeste, the Democratic candidate for governor.

Nathan Peskin Dies at 65, Workmen's Circle Official

New York—Nathan Peskin, executive director of the Workmen's Circle since 1979, died June 23 after a heart attack. Peskin, who was 65, served more than 40 years with the Jewish fraternal organization, which has maintained close ties with the labor movement since its founding.

In a message to the officers of the organization, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Peskin will be remembered "as a dedicated leader whose service to Workmen's Circle was service to all of his fellow men."

Heritage Foundation Keeps Scaring Up Funds

The right-wing Heritage Foundation churns out research reports supporting conservative causes, but its most imaginative writing can be found in fund-raising letters.

Early on, the tax-exempt foundation discovered that there's nothing like a good scare to make people reach for their checkbooks, and some of its efforts have been dillies.

THERE WAS the appeal, a few years back, for "desperately needed" contributions to stop Congress from imposing "compulsory unionism of our armed forces." That letter warned of soldiers striking during a combat alert and "shutting down a strategic airbase during contract negotiations."

Then there was the year in which the Heritage Foundation needed "every dollar you can send" to stop "nationalized medicine" in which you would be assigned a "government doctor," by number rather than name, and would be forced to comply with a health plan issued by a mythical federal agency.

And now there's a fund-raiser aimed at senior citizens receiving social security that was persuasive enough to induce a staunch supporter of social security to write a check to the Heritage Foundation under the impression that he was helping to protect social security from those who would cut its benefits.

THE FUND-RAISING letter enclosed an official-sounding questionnaire, entitled "National Survey on Social Security, especially prepared by the Heritage Foundation, a tax-exempt public policy research institute." It even included three "optional questions," thus leaving the impression that the 11 other questions are in some way mandatory.

And the return letter includes a paragraph to be checked, declaring: "I've enclosed my tax-deductible contribution to the Heritage Foundation for its Campaign to Save Social Security. Please use it to fund research and develop legislative proposals to restore fiscal stability to social security."

It takes a careful reading of the rambling four-page cover letter from Rep. Philip Crane (R-Ind.) on behalf of the Heritage Foundation to find out that the foundation is hostile to such social security features as survivors and disability benefits, early retirement and Medicare. Social security has become "an economic drain on the country," Crane's letter asserts.

THE UNION member who sent a copy of the fund-raising material to the AFL-CIO said his father was under the impression that he was responding to "an official congressional questionnaire" and was about to mail it back with a contribution to the "campaign to save social security." The Heritage Foundation was started in 1973 with seed money from Joseph Coors of the beer company family, who was one of the earliest financial backers of Ronald Reagan's presidential campaign.

In addition to seeking money from senior citizens, its fund-raising gimmicks this year have included a taped endorsement of the foundation by President Reagan on a toll-free number, followed by an appeal for contributions, and a letter from White House Counselor Edwin Meese III.

And last year, it invited its more affluent donors to contribute at least $1,000 to join the foundation's "President's Club."

"You will be provided with an access to Washington policy makers which cannot be had at any price," donors were promised.

DIVISIVE POLICIES of the Reagan Administration on social and economic issues could lead America to a "two-class society" and produce the first generation less educated than their parents, Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.) warns the 2,300 delegates to the Teachers' 66th annual convention in New York. Seated at right is AFT President Albert Shanker.

Political Action Stepped Up

Reagan Policies Scored At Teachers' Convention

New York—Using political action to fight the anti-public education and "ruinous" economic policies of the Reagan Administration was a dominant theme of the 66th annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers.

AFT President Albert Shanker, who was re-elected without opposition to his fifth two-year term, declared that "Ronald Reagan has been a great teacher" in making members aware that the problems of rising unemployment, high interest rates and a worsening economy affect them directly and forcefully and that they must therefore be more heavily involved in politics.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S proposal of tuition tax credits for parents who send their children to private or parochial schools must be countered with a strong national campaign, Shanker said.

To emphasize the union's opposition to this scheme, which would cost the U.S. Treasury billions of dollars annually, delegates of the Teachers and the National Education Association, meeting in Los Angeles, held an unprecedented joint press conference from each convention site to announce their resolve to fight the proposed tuition tax credit legislation.

A simultaneous resolution passed by delegates to both national conventions warned that such a tax credit proposal is "bad economic policiy, improper public policy, harmful educational policy and violates the spirit and the letter of the U.S. Constitution."

TO BRING that message home to Congress and the President, the Teachers will be seeking a million signatures by Election Day on petitions being circulated this summer at beaches, supermarkets and public assemblies. The petition drive is being coordinated by a national coalition of education, civil rights, parents, civic and labor organizations.

Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.), in a major address to the 2,300 AFT delegates, warned that, under the Reagan Administration, "for the first time in this country's history, we may be headed in a direction where the next generation may be less educated than their parents."

Sarbanes, who has been the target of far right-wing groups, charged that the Administration's economic and social policies are fostering a "two-class society" in America.

Another speaker, Charles Manatt, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee welcomed "the new partnership and active involvement of the AFT and labor in the Democratic National Committee."

Manatt accused the Reagan Administration of "forgetting the future" because of its cuts in social and economic programs. "Reagan has forgotten to invest in human capital, in physical capital and in social justice," he declared.

Shanker termed the overall voting record of the 97th Congress "a chronicle of the most anti-education and anti-labor administration" in recent history, based on the findings of a detailed AFT survey rating congressional votes.

On 12 education, labor and social issues, only 91 House members and 11 senators had perfect records.

SHANKER SAID: "No amount of supply-side voodoo or other economic jargon can justify the anti-education and anti-labor policies of this Administration, or excuse the members of Congress, House and Senate, Democrat and Republican, whose votes made Reagan's program the law of the land."

Delegates also attended all-day "mini-schools" on a wide-ranging series of professional and issue-oriented subjects during the convention, with those dealing with political activity among the most heavily attended.

The program included sessions on setting up a basic political structure at the local level, establishing an effective phone-bank operation, and a "graduate" course on planning and conducting political campains.

In other business, the delegates considered resolutions dealing with educational issues, human rights, legislation, international relations, women's rights, health care and economic issues.

AMONG THESE was a resolution on controlling nuclear weapons, which called for "serious strategic arms control negotiations consistent with the maintenance of overall parity with the Soviet Union," and including provisions for mutual, verifiable freezes, and balanced mutual reductions of nuclear forces.

The delegates also approved an increase of 25 cents in the monthly per capita payment to help finance the purchase of an AFT headquarters building.

They also voted to hold conventions biennially, instead of yearly, effective in 1984.

Congress Pressed to Revive Authority for Credit Controls

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to revive the credit control law that helped choke off a 1980 recession and provide an alternative to high interest rates as an antidote to inflation.

Henry Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, testified at House hearings that "the modest use of credit control authority" during a three-month period in 1980 "led to a rapid reduction on interest rates and cut the life of a developing recession to the shortest on record."

THE STANDBY credit control authority Congress gave the President in 1969 expired last month, and legislation to renew it has been introduced by Rep. Frank Annunzio (D-Ill.), chairman of the Consumer Affairs subcommittee, Chairman Fernand St Germain (D-R.I.) of the parent Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs Committee, and some 45 co-sponsors.

Testifying along with the AFL-CIO at the House hearings in favor of the extension were Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner on behalf of the National Council for Low-Interest Rates, Auto Workers Research Director Sheldon Friedman, and representatives of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, National Association of Homebuilders, U.S. League of Savings Associations and National Farmers Union.

Schechter said the 1980 use of credit controls led to a reduction in interest rates on new mortgages from a peak of over 16 percent to about 12.5 percent, with a corresponding rise in housing starts. The prime interest rate charged by banks dropped from 19.5 percent to 11 percent over three months.

BY CONTRAST, he pointed to the present recession-breeding restrictive monetary policy of the Federal Reserve Board and the Reagan Administration along with the sharp rise in business bankruptcies and in unemployment.

"There is a growing consensus that a meaningful recovery from this depressed economic condition is not possible without a significant reduction of interest rates," Schechter testified.

A byproduct of high interest rates, Schechter noted, has been a furthering of the gap between moderate-income households that are hurt by the high interest rates that bear so heavily on the cost of the necessities they buy and the relatively improved position of affluent investors with surplus funds to put into money-market securities and other high-interest investments that form an increasing portion of their total income.

THE HOUSING market has been particularly hurt by the flow of capital away from savings institutions and other traditional sources of mortgage funds, Schechter stressed.

The assorted forms of adjustable rate mortgages can't overcome the fact that mortgage interest rates remain "at levels beyond the reach of a large part of the potential housing market," he said.

Turner, representing a coalition that includes the Conference of Mayors, Consumer Federation of America, NAACP, housing and public power organizations as well as unions and the Industrial Union Dept., warned that "high interest rates are undercutting our ability to function as a society."

He cited massive unemployment in the construction trades, economic collapse of farmers, small businesses and big industries alike, and the higher costs to consumers.

"THE CALL for lowering interest rates is a nearly universal one," he said.

Friedman told the subcommittee that auto sales shot up during brief periods when manufacturers offered to finance new car and truck purchases at below-market interest rates.

He cited a University of Michigan consumer survey showing that one-third of all households were postponing major purchases because of high interest rates.

Study Bears Out Need for NLRA Reform

Employers increase their chances of defeating a union organizing drive when they break the law and fire union supporters, the government's General Accounting Office confirmed.

The GAO report on the impact of employer unfair labor practices was prepared at the request of the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations. Its findings, Subcommittee Chairman Phillip Burton (D-Calif.) said, clearly bear out the need for labor law reform.

BURTON CITED evidence of increasing delays in NLRB processing of unfair labor practice cases and the "chilling effect" both on workers illegally fired and those who remain.

The National Labor Relations Act guarantees a worker's "right to organize," Burton said. But "the law is not working."

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, said the GAO findings are "no surprise to union organizers." They know from experience that illegally firing workers is a "vicious" but effective tactic of anti-union employers.

"A particularly distressing feature of the report," he said, is the "meager cost to employers" for breaking the law.

Computations for back pay, which allow employers to deduct other earnings of fired workers from back pay owed, "ensure that most workers will get little pay" when they are ordered reinstated. "Unscrupulous employers and their labor-management consultants conclude that it pays to break the law," Kistler stressed.

The GAO report dealt with a large sampling of NLRB unfair discharge cases and representation elections, mostly during 1979, which was the year after a Senate filibuster killed labor law reform legislation. The study had been requested by the previous chairman of the subcommittee, Frank Thompson, Jr. (D-N.J.).

It found that most firings for union activities and other illegal punishments of union supporters took place during organizing campaigns, not after a union had achieved recognition.

IN A STUDY of 368 union representation elections held during 1979, the union won bargaining rights 45 percent of the time when there were no illegal actions by employers but only in 38 percent of the elections in which union supporters were discriminated against.

The GAO report quoted both the members of the National Labor Relations Board and the NLRB general counsel as verifying from their own experience that employer unfair labor practices have a "chilling effect on the free exercise of employee rights to select the union" and that illegal firings "weaken the union campaign."

A GAO questionnaire to workers who had been fired for union activities found that most never returned to their jobs, in many cases because they chose to stay with alternate employment they had found after their illegal dismissals. But most went through long periods of joblessness and had to tap savings, apply for food stamps or borrow money to get by.

DESPITE ALL this, 57 percent told the GAO they would probably participate in some future union organizing campaign, 17.7 percent were unsure, and more than 25 percent said they would not participate with most of this group expressing concern that they would again lose their jobs if they did.

The GAO report also found that the median time required to process an unfair labor practice case from the filing of the charge through an NLRB decision was 483 days in 1979.

It noted that the number of unfair labor practice charges filed increased 49 percent between 1974 and 1979—from 27,726 to 41,259 cases annually. And it cited the belief of union representatives that employers more frequently violate the National Labor Relations Act "because they can get away with it."

Reagan Order Blocks Strike By Rail Union

President Reagan invoked provisions of the Railway Labor Act to block a scheduled July 11 strike against major railroads by the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers who have been working without a contract for more than a year.

In ordering the 60-day cooling-off period, Reagan appointed a three-member emergency board to investigate the dispute between BLE and National Railway Labor Conference, the bargaining agent for more than 50 railroads.

THE PANEL will be headed by Arnold Weber, president of the University of Colorado, who has held several government posts. The other members are Daniel Quinn Mills, a Harvard University professor, and Jacob Seidenberg, a lawyer from Falls Church, Va.

Meanwhile, President Fred A. Hardin of the United Transportation Union announced that the UTU would initiate selective strikes against the carriers beginning July 30.

Hardin said selective strikes would not justify imposition of the national emergency board procedures Reagan used in the Engineers dispute.

But the dispute could be broadened if UTU members are locked out by railroads that are not struck by the union.

REAGAN ISSUED the executive order against the BLE strike at his vacation retreat in Santa Barbara, Calif., after chairman Robert O. Harris of the National Mediation Board informed the White House that the year-old negotiations had hit an impasse.

Except for the 125,000-member UTU and the 35,000-member BLE, 14 railroad unions have negotiated new agreements with the freight carriers to replace contracts that expired Apr. 1, 1981.

A major issue in the dispute between the railroads and the two unions is management's demand to change work rules, which would reduce wages of the railroad workers.

REAGAN'S executive order went into effect July 10. During the first 30 days, the three-member board will conduct fact-finding studies and report to the President. The second 30-day period is for review and implementation of the board's recommendations. If no agreement is reached after 60 days, the BLE would be free to strike.

A national strike would not involve Conrail or the Boston & Maine Railroad, which have already signed agreements with the two unions.

Railroad Union Task Force Explores Conrail Purchase

The Railway Labor Executives Association has set up a task force to determine what role Conrail workers should have in the sale of the federally owned railroad, including the possibility of employee acquisition.

RLEA Chairman Fred A. Hardin said in announcing the formation of the panel that another option would be for a large degree of employee participation in the acquisition of Conrail by other investors.

UNDER PROVISIONS of the 1981 Northeast Rail Service Act, the federal government is required to sell its holdings in the carrier within a period of years. The federal government owns 85 percent of the railroad; the other 15 percent is controlled by Conrail's Employee Stock Ownership Plan (ESOP).

The task force members in addition to Hardin, who also is president of the United Transportation Union, are President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks, President O. M. Berge of the Maintenance of Way Employes, Vice President Andrew M. Ripp of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Vice President Albert A. Terriego of the Transport Workers.

The 1981 law states that the Dept. of Transportation has until June 1, 1983, to sell Conrail as a single entity, or in more than one piece after that date.

CONRAIL WAS formed in 1976 when the government took over operations of several bankrupt Northeast railroads. It currently has nearly 60,000 employees represented by 19 unions.

Hardin said the task force's options would include union-represented workers as well as supervisory and management employees not under union contract.

"An active approach by Conrail's employees will assure productivity improvement and operating cost cushions necessary for the company's long-term viability," Hardin said. "It will also help maximize continued rail service and the level and stability of employment and wages."

IN AN EFFORT to streamline operations and to make Conrail more attractive to buyers, most of the railroad's workers have agreed to nearly $600 million in wage deferrals over a three-year period ending in 1984.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Railway Association in its annual report to Congress praised Conrail's performance for 1981.

"Dramatic growth in operating profits, achieved despite significant traffic declines, allowed Conrail to earn its first annual net income," the report by the federal agency said.

The government has invested $3.3 billion in plant and equipment improvements since 1976.

HARDIN NOTED that Conrail employees have the greatest long-term interest in the railroad's operations and in continuing rail service while opposing the diversion of Conrail's resources to non-rail uses.

Such diversions, he pointed out, were a major factor in the bankruptcies of the Northeast railroads which resulted in the formation of Conrail.

The RLEA wants safeguards against the recurrence of the problem, he said.

Unions Welcome Proposal For Grain Dust Standard

A study panel's findings that spell out corrective procedures for the prevention of grain dust explosions were welcomed by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. as needed steps to curb the mounting incidence of injury and death at grain elevators and mills.

If the recommendations are properly implemented, the National Research Council-National Academy of Sciences panel said, 90 percent of grain dust explosions could be eliminated.

FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant applauded the panel's call for a standard to limit the accumulation of grain dust in elevators through the required use of mechanical ventilation systems.

"This standard is the single most important thing we can do to prevent the loss of life and property in the grain industry," Harbrant said in urging the Occupation Safety & Health Administration to follow through on the recommendations by developing an effective federal regulation.

SINCE 1960, more than 400 grain dust explosions have been recorded across the country, causing 200 deaths and millions of dollars in damage.

No federal regulation currently applies specifically to grain elevators and mills. The NRC-NAS study was requested by OSHA, the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health and the Agriculture Dept.

While welcoming the thrust of the panel's findings in addressing the causes of grain dust explosions, Harbrant questioned the Agriculture Dept.'s regulations that he said encourage the accumulation of dust in order to increase the weight and price of grain deliveries.

He also questioned the report's lack of documentation on health hazards posed by grain dust.

John Gibson Retires from Hotel-Restaurant Post

Cincinnati—John F. Gibson has retired after serving eight years as secretary-treasurer of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees.

Gibson was first elected to the post by the union's executive board in 1974 following the retirement of Robert L. Diefenbach. He was elected to his first full term at the HERE convention in 1976 and reelected in 1981.

Before his election as secretary-treasurer, Gibson was president of the union's Local 430 in St. Louis and in 1973 he became a vice president of the international. He had been an organizer for the union since 1954.

HERE President Edward T. Hanley will act as secretary-treasurer until the union's executive board meets later this year to name a successor to Gibson.

NFL Players Reject Offer, File Charges

A salary package proposed by the National Foodball League owners only two days before the July 15 contract expiration was branded "totally ridiculous" by the NFL Players Association.

Management's offer to the players union was the first since negotiations opened in mid-February and came six days after the NFLPA filed an unfair labor practice charge against the NFL Management Council for failure to bargain.

WHILE PROPOSING an increase in minimum salaries, the owners' offer did not respond to the union's bargaining goal of assuring players a percentage of receipts which the NFLPA spelled out in early June.

"If that's their opening shot, it missed," NFLPA President Gene Upshaw said. "It's not even in the ballpark."

Scoring the lack of substance in the offer, NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey said, "In six months of bargaining, we have not heard one concession on anything. All they want to do is perpetuate the system they have now and keep players' salaries down."

IN FILING charges with the National Labor Relations Board, the NFLPA also accused team owners of designating bargaining representatives who lack sufficient authority to negotiate with the union.

The complaint further charged that management was engaging in a campaign to undermine the union and its leadership and that it refused to furnish bargaining information that it had agreed to provide.

Meanwhile, Garvey announced that with expiration of the contract, unsigned rookie players would not be allowed to negotiate with team owners under provisions of federal labor law.

HE ALSO noted that veteran players under free agent status would have no obligation to report to training camp and may sign with another league.

"If they do report," Garvey said, "they will receive either 110 percent of their 1981 salary or the club's last written offer—whichever is greater."

Congress Rebuffs Reagan's Veto of Copyright Clause

The original legislation had strong bipartisan support despite the Administration's opposition, and the vote changes didn't come close to blocking the two-thirds needed for the override.

IN THE HOUSE, 213 Democrats and 111 Republicans voted to override. Seventy-three Republicans and 13 Democrats supported the President. When the House first passed the bill, on June 15, only 40 Republicans and 7 Democrats voted against it.

The Senate had originally passed the bill by voice vote, and the Republican leadership had to drop far down on the seniority list—to New Hampshire's Sen. Gordon J. Humphrey—to find a floor leader willing to support the President's position.

Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.) voted to override the veto, and Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) was a co-sponsor of the bill. All nine votes to sustain the veto came from Republicans.

WITH A Republican majority in the Senate and a strong conservative coalition in the House, Reagan has seldom had to veto legislation the Administration opposed in order to keep it from becoming law.

Of eight other vetoes, most were allowed to stand without an attempt to override. The House three times sought but failed to muster the needed two-thirds majority for an override.

Labor Dept. Purge Makes Room for Union Foes

Career Labor Dept. employees have been shifted out of the department's policy planning office to make way for economists more attuned to the Reagan Administration's anti-union positions.

One new Labor Dept. policy consultant is Carl Dahlman, a Swedish citizen who has been on the faculty of the University of Wisconsin.

THE MAN who recruited him, Assistant Sec. of Labor John Cogan, insists that Dahlman was just joking when he wrote of coming to Washington to work on "busting unions." It was just a quip referring to the firing of striking air traffic controllers, Cogan told the Associated Press.

But the AP story also quoted a memo by Dahlman to Cogan sharply criticizing a maritime policy paper prepared by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of International Affairs. Dahlman said the memo, which proposed the theme that "government, industry and labor join hands to rebuild the merchant marine," was filled with "pro-union" positions.

Another newcomer to the department, designated as deputy assistant secretary for policy evaluation and research, is a University of Washington professor who has crusaded against some of the laws the Labor Dept. is supposed to enforce.

THE NEW appointee, Daniel Benjamin, told the Seattle Times that "for a number of years, I have been explaining how government regulations impede the economy. This is my opportunity to go out and do something about it."

Benjamin spoke of what he termed "the disastrous effect" of the minimum wage on teen-agers. And he said he will be reviewing rules affecting the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, unions and other areas.

The new policy official also advanced the theory that unemployment compensation adds to unemployment by encouraging layoffs "rather than lowered wages" in a recession.

THE NEWSPAPER quoted him as saying that it would be relatively easy to design a system in which people kept their own unemployment fund to be used only when they were out of work.

Meanwhile, newspapers covering federal employee issues have reported the shunting aside of 19 high-level career employees in the policy planning office. The action was described by an aide to Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.), who heads the House Civil Service subcommittee, as part of an ideologically motivated purge.

ONE OF THOSE reassigned is the newly elected president of Local 12 of the Government Employees, Jay Edelson. He said Cogan told him that career people who had served in earlier administrations "could not be trusted to do an objective job."

The local has filed grievances objecting to a number of the transfers.

Senate Opens Heated Debate Over Balanced Budget Plank

AFSCME had Data Resources Inc. prepare an economic "simulation" of the effect of a balanced budget and revenue ceiling if it were to take effect in fiscal 1985 and continue at least through the 1987 fiscal year.

THE STUDY'S conclusion was that it would increase unemployment by some 2.65 million more than would otherwise occur by 1987, slash the total output of goods and services by $519 billion between 1985 and 1987, and reduce state and local government revenue by $49 billion in 1987.

In the Senate, most of the action was behind the scenes as various senators with doubts about the proposed constitutional change sought to drum up support for modifications or substitutes to make it more palatable.

Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.), however, used sarcasm and ridicule to point up some of the fallacies of the whole approach.

THE MOST uncontrollable item in the budget, he reminded his colleagues, has been the interest the government pays. Perhaps, he suggested, Congress could write the interest rate into its budget and throw bankers in jail if they raised it.

Or, if unemployment insurance payments had to stop to avoid running a budget deficit, Congress could "simply make it a crime for any employer to lay off any employees."

And since the amendment allows an exception to the balanced budget requirement in time of war, "everytime we saw a deficit coming, we declare war on Iceland" with the understanding that "we would not actually go to war."

THE ACTUAL amendment would require a three-fifths vote of the House and Senate to allow an unbalanced budget. It would also guard against the "danger" of balancing the budget by high tax revenues by prohibiting any revenue increase greater than the rate of growth of national income.

The Senate put aside its constitutional debate to join the House in voting emergency funds to carry a number of government programs until the new fiscal year in October.

The $5.5 billion appropriations bill includes major funding for food stamps, sewer construction and guaranteed student loans.

It also includes language that will restore the jurisdiction of the Mine Safety & Health Administration over non-coal surface mines—at least for the balance of this fiscal year. Congress last year excluded them from coverage, and the unions representing workers involved have lobbied hard to regain lost protection.

REAGAN VETOED two previous funding bills because they included money for housing and other programs he opposed. The House failed to override the vetoes, and a number of government workers faced payless furloughs as a result.

The latest version, which the House passed 389-13 and the Senate approved 91-6, added some money for summer jobs for youth, highway programs and $42 million for postal subsidies—but trimmed back other programs to bring the dollar total closer to the White House figures.

Court Upholds Puerto Rico In Suit Over Harvest Jobs

The Supreme Court upheld the right of Puerto Rico to sue Virginia apple growers for refusing to hire the island's farm workers for the annual harvest.

The high court's 8 to 0 decision affirmed a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit that Puerto Rico has the right to take 51 Virginia growers to court on behalf of its workers. The commonwealth wants to sue the employers for illegally refusing to hire many available Puerto Rican workers, who are U.S. citizens, for the 1978 harvest and for wrongfully discharging most of those that were hired.

IT BASED its case on federal laws giving U.S. citizens preference over temporary foreign workers in filling jobs and that prohibit employment discrimination against citizens in favor of foreign nationals.

Puerto Rico charges that the growers hired Jamaicans to fill most of the 787 jobs that came open in the Virginia apple harvest even though Puerto Rican workers were available. Of 420 Puerto Rican workers who arrived for the jobs, all but 30 were discharged within three weeks.

The growers claimed that the Puerto Rican workers were "unproductive" and could not meet the standard of 110 bushels a day.

THE HIGH COURT'S opinion, written by Justice Byron J. White, was joined by all members of the court except Justice Lewis F. Powell who did not participate in the vote. A concurring opinion was filed by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., with Justices Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens.

White pointed out that the decision was grounded in the principle of "parens patriae" which means literally "parent of the country." The concept gives a state the right to represent and defend the interests of the "health and well-being" of its citizens in general.

Puerto Rico, suffering a 30 percent unemployment rate, claimed the right to sue in this case as part of its responsibility to its citizens.

THE COURT agreed that Puerto Rico has not only a right to defend its citizens against ethnic discrimination in employment, but also to defend its status and benefits within the federal system.

Puerto Rico cited provisions of the Wagner-Peyser Act, which established the U.S. Employment Service and its interstate clearinghouse that helps recruit workers from one state for jobs available in another, and the Immigration & Nationality Act of 1952, which regulates the admission of temporary workers and requires employers first to seek domestic agricultural workers without discrimination through the interstate referral system.

Justice White's opinion said that protecting its residents from "the harmful effects of discrimination" is especially important to Puerto Rico "simply because of the unfortunate fact that invidious discrimination frequently occurs along ethnic lines."

THE JUSTICES agreed with the appeals court that the commonwealth has a legitimate interest on behalf of all its citizens because "deliberate efforts to stigmatize the labor force as inferior carry a universal sting." Puerto Rico also has full rights to sue, the justices said, to make sure the federal job referral program fully benefits its residents since unemployment "is surely a legitimate object" of its concern.

New Pamphlet Explores Papal Letters on Labor

A new AFL-CIO pamphlet contains the text of an address by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at Notre Dame University in May relating the goals and principles of the trade union movement to religious teachings about the role and rights of workers in society.

The 28-page pamphlet, "A Trade Union Perspective of Laborem Exercens," traces the support for social justice and the "essential" role of unions and collective bargaining in a series of papal encyclicals, including the statement issued by Pope John Paul II last September.

The paper was presented at Notre Dame's symposium on "Co-Creation: A Religious Vision of Corporate Power." It encompasses a similar presentation by Donahue at the International Symposium sponsored by the Pontifical Commission on Justice and Peace in Rome, Apr. 3-5, 1982.

Copies are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006 at $1 per single copy; 75 cents each for 10 to 99 copies; and 65 cents each for 100 or more.

Unions Set Votes on Two Mergers

Merger proposals that would combine four AFL-CIO affiliates into two unions will be brought before delegates at special conventions the week of July 26.

One merger would bring together the Pottery Workers and the Glass Bottle Blowers. The other would unite the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers and the Glass & Ceramic Workers.

The merger proposals have been approved by officials of all four unions following discussions ranging from several months to almost two years. Members of the Glass & Ceramic Workers have already approved the proposed merger with the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers in a referendum.

The Glass & Ceramic and the Aluminum, Brick & Clay unions will meet separately in Jacksonville, Fla., on July 26 and will then meet in joint session pending approval of the merger by delegates.

The Pottery Workers will also hold a special convention opening on July 26 at Hollywood, Fla., to consider the merger plan with the GBBA.

Under the GBBA's constitution, approval of the merger is not required by a special convention, the union said.

A Two-Faced Promise

WHEN AN ADMINISTRATION or political party has a hard time writing a good record for itself, one alternative is to invent one. The Republican National Committee, which is rich in dollars but destitute in ideas, thinks it has come up with a winner, finally.

The Reagan Administration and the GOP took a blistering during the past year because they could not keep their budget knives away from social security.

First off, the Reaganites stopped calling the system by the name it was given a half-century ago by Franklin D. Roosevelt and its New Deal creators. With the deathly touch of modern propaganda efforts, good old social security was renamed an "entitlement program."

Then, during the 1981 congressional session, the conservatives started taking little bites out of the system, a nip here and a nip there, hoping that the sensitive millions who depend on social security would not notice.

THE RESULT was that benefits for dependent children in college and post-secondary schools were eliminated along with minimum benefits for new applicants and burial benefits for some clients.

When the new Administration attempted a general assault on the basic benefit system, however, a massive national reaction was generated, and substantial majorities in both houses of Congress swore new fealty to social security.

Then came the 1982 budget negotiations in which President Reagan himself took part. In those sessions, according to participants, Reagan renewed one of his discredited 1981 ideas: a delay in the automatic cost-of-living benefit increase scheduled for July 1.

Once again, the Reaganites had to beat a hasty retreat when their cruel idea became general knowledge. The men and women who expected to face the electorate in November told the White House, in plain words: "hands off social security."

The White House retreated as far as naming a commission with a conservative majority that was directed to recommend changes in social security, but not until after Election Day. Anyone old enough to vote knows that is a signal that the conservatives once again will attempt an assault on the system.

MEANTIME, with the economy in a shambles and public opinion running strongly against the GOP, the Republican National Committee threw some of its money at Madison Avenue and got in return what its chairman called "a nice little commercial."

This number shows a folksy pseudo letter carrier who announces that he is delivering one of the President's promises, that mid-year cost-of-living social security increase.

Happily, there are too many tough-minded protectors of the system around to let the GOP get away with that lemon. Rep. Claude Pepper, one of the most diligent, said the television ad "lowers the art of deception to depths not explored since the Nixon Administration."

Some losers never seem to learn.

New Plan Ordered

Court Slaps Agriculture Dept. On Cuts in Child Care Meals

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE AGRICULTURE DEPT. under the Reagan Administration seems to have trouble following instructions.

In the 1981 budget act, Congress told USDA to figure a way to spend less for the school lunch program, but not at the expense of good nutrition. USDA came up with its now infamous—and abandoned—set of revised regulations that included permitting ketchup to count as a vegetable and meal portions so scanty they were inadequate for growing children.

Congress also told the agency to cut 10 percent from the Child Care Food Program (CCFP), an entitlement program established in 1968 which subsidizes USDA-approved meals for primarily low-income children in family day care homes and other child care centers. Congress told USDA that any changes should "avoid disruption of the programs and insure adequate meal service for children."

USDA'S RESPONSE last January was to cut meal subsidies for many child care providers by 20-30 percent, saving at most an estimated $1.8 million, according to the Food Research & Action Center, a non-profit nutrition advocacy organization.

On behalf of 18 individuals and organizations from six states, FRAC filed suit in federal court in June, charging that the USDA had violated the intent of Congress in the budget act and also had neglected to follow proper rulemaking procedures. Six members of Congress joined FRAC by filing "friends of the court" briefs.

FRAC said the government's cuts were so drastic that they were having a "ripple effect" on low-income child care. It cites the statements of two plaintiffs in the case:

● Joanna Petry receives some welfare to supplement her $340 a month wages. Her child is in a day care program from 11:30 a.m. to 8 p.m., seven days a week.

"I KNOW THAT my child is receiving nutritional meals during the hours she is in child care with my present provider. . . . With my limited income I would not be able to replace these meals if my present child care no longer provided them. . . . I have been informed that because of actions taken by USDA, my child care provider may be forced to stop serving meals to my child . . . or may be forced to stop providing child care altogether. There is no other child care I know in my area that I can afford that will serve my child the nutritional meals she now receives. . . . Without adequate child care, I cannot keep my job."

● Bethany Lee is a day care provider for six children in Ohio. Their mothers are welfare or former welfare recipients, now working.

"I receive reimbursement for meals I serve these children through the Child Care Food Program . . . which . . . enables me to provide the children with nutritious meals. . . . Because of actions taken by USDA, reimbursement funds will no longer be available to me.

"I cannot continue to provide family day care by charging the parents more. These mothers . . . cannot afford to pay for the food. . . . If I lose the reimbursement for meals, my income will be so reduced that I will be forced to quit, leaving these families without day care and good nutrition.

"I LIVE IN a small town. Decent, inexpensive day care is not available. These mothers whose children I will be forced to drop will have the choice of quitting their jobs and going back on welfare or finding cheap, poor, unsupervised day care that not only jeopardizes their children's nutrition, but their entire well-being."

In 1981, the Child Care Food Program provided meals to some 843,000 children daily in 8,591 child care institutions, 60,032 child care centers and 43,030 family day care homes.

About 75 percent of the children participating in the program come from low-income families, according to FRAC.

The USDA claims that the program serves primarily middle-income families and that the cuts do not really hurt low-income working mothers.

Fortunately for the low-income parents and children who participate in the program, a federal judge agreed with FRAC's evidence. He told USDA administrators to come up with other plans that are consistent with Congress's directions.

Congress Beats Reagan Veto, Saves Publishing Jobs

President Reagan, callously rejecting pleas to save 400,000 U.S. jobs, vetoed H.R. 6198, a measure designed to maintain a healthy U.S. printing industry. Fortunately, the House and Senate voted overwhelmingly to override the President's veto. (See story, page 1 of this issue). Representatives and Senators who voted wrong (against overriding the veto) are listed below.

Balanced Budget Amendment: Floor Action Begins

The Senate began consideration of S.J. Res. 58, the Constitutional amendment to force balanced federal budgets; and even though many consider the measure a fraud, approval seemed likely (see page 1 story).

On the House side, H.J. Res. 350 has stalled in the Judiciary Committee, but its backers have introduced a motion to discharge the committee from consideration of the amendment. They hope to "end-run" the usual committee process and bring H.J. Res. 350 straight to the floor.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose S.J. Res. 58, the Constitutional amendment to force balanced budgets. And urge your Representative to oppose H.J. Res. 350 or any discharge motion to bring it directly to the floor.

Now Congress Searches for More Federal Taxes

The Reagan tax cut is causing enormous budget deficits, so Congress passed a FY 1983 budget calling for $21 billion in new taxes to narrow the deficit. The Senate Finance Committee's package calls for $3 billion in tax hikes on working Americans.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Focus grassroots lobbying on the House, especially the House Ways and Means Committee. Urge members to place the $21 billion in new taxes where they belong: on the wealthy individuals and corporations that benefited from the 1981 tax cut. Ask them to cosponsor H.R. 6257, the Equity Tax Act.

Reagan Vetoes Zap Jobs—And He Threatens More

Last year President Reagan pushed his economic program through Congress on the promise that it would restore vigor to the nation's economy. Instead, it has brought recession, high unemployment, choking interest rates, business failures, bankruptcies, more hardship for the poor, increasing numbers of "new poor," and now-- bank failures.

Congress finally is saying "enough" and is passing bills to stimulate the economy. But Reagan keeps using his veto power to thwart Congress.

REAGAN VETOES HOUSING STIMULUS BILL: 250,000 HOMES, 500,000 CONSTRUCTION JOBS LOST

First President Reagan vetoed an appropriations bill that included a program designed to cut mortgage interest rates by 4 percentage points for certain buyers of new homes. The government was to bear only the administrative costs of the program, because home buyers would have been required to pay back the subsidy. Nevertheless, the President vetoed the bill, and with a single stroke of his pen prevented the construction of 250,000 homes and creation of a half-million construction-related jobs.

REAGAN VETOES COPYRIGHT BILL, RISKS PUBLISHING JOBS

More recently, the President vetoed H.R. 6198, the extension of a law requiring that most books published by U.S. companies and written by Americans be printed here in order to gain copyright protections. Fortunately, the House and Senate overrode this veto.

REAGAN ALLOWS LOSS OF TRANSPORT CONSTRUCTION JOBS

The Reagan Administration decided not to match the Canadian government in providing subsidized financing for the sale of subway cars to New York City. Thus the contract will go to a Canadian-based company under license by a Japanese firm. This decision is a signal that in the future the Administration will do nothing to prevent foreign countries from using unfair trade practices to penetrate U.S. markets.

REAGAN BUDGET OFFICE PLANS FOR MORE VETOES

The Reagan Office of Management and Budget has prepared a series of nearly a dozen documents to be used in rationalizing future vetoes of anti-recession bills. An OMB official reportedly said that even worthwhile anti-recession bills that cost the government nothing would be vetoed. Like Herbert Hoover, President Reagan apparently will take no action to help the jobless.

Update on Key Jobs Issues

DEFENSE JOBS: H.R. 5540, the Defense Industrial Base Revitalization Act, would build a reservoir of skilled workers to expand and modernize the nation's defense industry. It would provide training for machinists, millwrights, tool and die makers, mechanics, construction workers and others involved in defense industries while maintaining "buy American" and Davis-Bacon protections.

Urge your Representative to support the job-creating H.R. 5540.

JOBS AND TRAINING: H.J. Res. 514, an urgent supplemental appropriations bill for the current year, would provide $1 billion for jobs and training. It would give some relief to laid-off workers and distressed communities by creating jobs in such areas as maintenance and repair of public buildings and roads. Urge your Representative to support H.J. Res. 514.

DOMESTIC CONTENT: Domestic content legislation would create 800,000 jobs in autos, steel, rubber, glass, electronics and other supplier industries.

In the House, H.R. 5133 is pending before the Energy and Commerce Committee; send letters and postcards to Chairman John Dingell (D-MI) urging quick action. In the Senate, S. 2000 is before the Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee; send postcards to Chairman Bob Packwood (R-OR).

TARIFFS: Urge your Senators to oppose S. 1902, which would extend for two years President Reagan's authority to cut U.S. tariffs on foreign products. The United States has given more than it has received in most tariff negotiations over the past three decades, so there is no reason to cut U.S. tariffs even further.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION: Rep. Harold Ford's (D-TN) bill to provide an extra 13 weeks of unemployment compensation for those who have exhausted other benefits may be passed as a part of budget reconciliation or separately. Urge your Representative to support H.R. 6369, and your Senator to support the companion S. 2550 by Sen. John Heinz (R-PA).

Labor Dept. Seeks to Junk Child Work Curbs

By Susan Dunlop

New rules floated by the Labor Dept. would undermine child labor protections and are "an attempt to amend labor law through the administrative process," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged.

The proposed changes outlined by Labor Sec. Raymond L. Donovan would take away some work-hour protections for 14- and 15-year-old children and let them hold some jobs previously restricted as hazardous.

"I would not have thought that even this Administration would do this," Kirkland said.

"THE MOVE would be a social outrage if we had full employment," he stressed, "but we have record unemployment with disastrously high rates for those between 16 and 18.

"At a time when their older brothers and sisters cannot find work, it is preposterous to lower the working rules for school age youngsters," Kirkland said.

The AFL-CIO statement stressed that the Administration's move on the 44-year-old protective measure "follows a pattern we have observed in other areas of well-established laws and regulations protecting workers from employer abuses."

THE FEDERATION also branded another Labor Dept. proposal a "back-door attempt" to achieve a youth subminimum wage which it could not get through Congress.

The new rule would exempt employers from having to reapply annually for certification to pay full-time students less than the $3.35 an hour minimum wage.

The overall objective is to cut wages, Kirkland said, calling the Labor Dept.'s actions "a blatant violation of the trust and statutory responsibilities of that department."

The Labor Dept. said it was proposing the changes in the regulations established under the Fair Labor Standards Act in response to requests primarily from retail and service industry employers such as fast food chains and amusement parks.

Under the proposed new rules, children

Kirkland Prods Congress on Jobs

AT A CAPITOL HILL news conference, union and congressional critics of the attempt to write a balanced budget requirement into the Constitution respond to President Reagan's endorsement of the amendment at a right-wing rally on the other side of the Capitol. The news conference was called by the National Council of Senior Citizens, which views the push for the amendment as an attack on social security benefits and other entitlement programs.

Hits Reagan's 'Class War' On Workers

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland pressed Congress to act independently of the Reagan Administration to get America back on the road to full employment.

Labor sees no sign of a change in course "from an Administration still engaged in destroying jobs," he told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress.

KIRKLAND SPOKE of the human misery that accompanies the economic devastation of the Reagan recession, of "the desperate and fruitless search for work" in the wake of plant closings and layoffs.

The Administration's "supply-side" economics amount to "a massive transfer of income" from workers and those with moderate incomes "into the pockets of the wealthy," Kirkland charged. He termed Reagan's policies "class warfare" against workers and the disadvantaged.

Last year's budget cuts, dictated by the White House, "tore deeply into the safety net," Kirkland reminded the House-Senate panel. This year, he noted, "Congress has moved, feebly and haltingly, to repair that damage, only to be thwarted by the President's recurring vetoes."

REAGAN'S VETO of $3 billion in housing funds last month, which Congress failed to override, "stopped 250,000 houses from being built and 500,000 jobs from being created," Kirkland charged.

One of every five American workers was unemployed at some point during 1981, a total of some 23.4-million workers, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

BLS also reported separately that unemployment rose sharply in 47 states and the District of Columbia over the year ended in May, with jobless rates of 10 percent or higher recorded in 13 states.

Budget Amendment Bid Keyed to GOP Politics

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's call for a constitutional amendment to compel a balanced budget is a backdoor attack on social security and an attempt to draw attention away from the Administration's economic failures, union and congressional critics charged.

Reagan embraced the amendment, which is now before the Senate, in a speech from the steps of the Capitol to a rally staged by the Republican National Committee in cooperation with right-wing organizations pushing to inject their economic theories into the Constitution.

Vice President Bush, Cabinet members and several hundred congressional cosponsors were on hand to applaud.

ON THE OTHER side of the Capitol, the National Council of Senior Citizens held an outdoor news conference to provide an immediate response to Reagan's speech—and a translation of the euphemisms used by the President.

Thus, Reagan's claim that a constitutional amendment is necessary to compel Congress to cut back the "uncontrollables" in the federal budget—the entitlements provided by law—was quickly identified as an attack on social security benefits, which are by far the largest of the entitlements.

National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman said the cuts that would have been compelled if such an amendment were presently part of the Constitution would make the Administration's proposal last year for social security cutbacks "seem almost benign."

If the budget amendment were in place today, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at the news conference, America's deep recession would be plunging into "un-

Judge Bars Labor Dept. From Gutting Davis-Bacon

A federal court has blocked the Labor Dept. from putting into effect on July 27 new Davis-Bacon Act regulations that unions charge would destroy the law's prevailing wage protections.

The preliminary injunction was issued by U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene on July 22 at the request of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the AFL-CIO and building trades unions whose members are directly affected. Judge Greene said the labor organizations had shown a "strong likelihood" they will prevail in gaining a permanent injunction against the regulations.

The Davis-Bacon Act requires contractors on federally funded construction to pay prevailing wages and benefits. The Labor Dept. tried to lower pay scales by changing the method of determining area wages and letting employers hire low-paid "helpers" instead of journeymen and apprentices.

WARM WELCOME was extended by the 3,500 delegates attending the Communciations Workers annual convention in Detroit to former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, at the podium with CWA President Glenn E. Watts, and Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht, right. Mondale scored the reward-the-rich policies of the Reagan Administration.

CWA Delegates Call Special Convention On Committee's Blueprint for the Future

Detroit—Delegates to the Communications Workers convention got a preliminary look at a blueprint for the future and voted overwhelmingly to hold a special convention next year to act on it.

The 3,500 delegates reviewed the interim report of the CWA Committee on the Future, which explores the outlook for the communications industry as well as the problems and opportunities that face the union.

Some important issues remain to be resolved before the final report can be made, delegates were told.

CWA PRESIDENT Glenn Watts and other committee members representing each of the union's 12 geographical districts noted that these issues include questions on funding new programs and how far the CWA should go toward providing training and retraining programs, and placement services.

While the committee placed heavy emphasis on the need for training, it also proposed the possibility of CWA developing a "hiring hall" concept.

"We are striving for employment security, rather than job security," Watts said.

Under the "employment security" concept, workers would be able to change jobs or careers but retain full pension rights and other benefits.

IN HIS KEYNOTE address, Watts took sharp issue with the Reagan Administration's economic policies and the members of Congress who blindly embrace them—calling on union members to get out the vote in the November congressional elections and "turn out the rascals."

Watts pointed to the decisions to slash the budget of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, to appoint a known union-buster as head of the National Labor Relations Board, and to staff key posts in the Labor Dept. with political appointees hostile to labor as evidence that the White House has embarked on a callous campaign of undermining long-established worker protections. He cited Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne Auchter, head of OSHA, as an example of a "hostile" Reagan appointee.

Administration policies fostering high unemployment came in for additional criticism from other convention speakers, including former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, Democratic Senators John Glenn and Donald Riegle, Screen Actors Guild President Ed Asner, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks, President Joyce Miller of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and Michigan AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall.

Among the major resolutions adopted at the four-day convention, the CWA delegates:

- Called on all trade unionists to participate in "Solidarity Day II," which will be Nov. 2, the date of the general election. This time, delegates said, voters should march together to the polls in every community in America to bring about the "wholesale replacement of hundreds of high public officials who do not believe in serving their constituents."
- Opposed adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to require a balanced federal budget. "Such an amendment," delegates said, "would mean an impossible rigidity despite the grave dangers to the economy."
- Urged the CWA to "demonstrate its solid support of the renewal of efforts to achieve passage of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.
- Voiced "emphatic support for attainment of pay equity as a key personal rights issue of the 1980s, with our position kept before each President, each Secretary of Labor and each Congress until wage discrimination and related issues have been removed from our society."
- Offered a three-point alternative program for relief of the nation's social security program from the crisis that it faces.

The convention also pinned an "unfair" label on Time, Inc. CWA members employed by Time-owned Austin Cablevision in Austin, Tex., had been on strike since last October until returning to work on June 14 under the terms of an agreement reached through a federal mediator. The company later broke its commitment to the agreement, CWA negotiators reported.

Mediation Agency Outlines Plan for Service Charges

The Federal Mediation & Concilation Service will impose user fees for arbitration services beginning in October to meet a requirement under the Reagan Administration's budget for the coming fiscal year.

In announcing the proposed rulemaking, FMCS said that a $25 charge would be required for furnishing panels of arbitrators and $30 for direct appointment of an arbitrator.

SERVICES PROVIDED by the National Mediation Board would also be affected by the user fee schedule.

Payment of fees would be required when services are requested, the FMCS said. The agency estimated that the user fees would bring savings of almost $490,000 a year.

Last year, the FMCS furnished 33,194 panels and appointed 13,219 arbitrators.

It said that with the imposition of the fee schedule, requests for services would probably decline about 25 percent.

AFL-CIO Economist John Zalusky noted that the fees would undoubtedly increase union costs in the administration of contracts, and could impede services to union members.

The FMCS announced that it will accept written comments on the proposed rule until Sept. 7.

Fuel Sparks Wholesale Price Surge

Wholesale prices surged a full 1 percent in June, the equivalent of an annual rate of 12 percent, after remaining unchanged in May.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which reported the increase, said that the resurgence of its producer price index for finished goods was triggered by a 4.1-percent rise in energy prices. Also helping to push up the finished-goods index was a large 1.9-percent jump in car prices as auto makers ended buyer-incentive programs.

THE RISE in energy prices followed five months of declines, and accounted for about one-half the increase in June producer prices.

Prices for capital equipment and for finished consumer goods other than foods and energy both increased about twice as much as in May. Prices for finished consumer foods also rose, although not so much as in either April or May.

The June increase was the largest since a 1.1-percent increase rise in March 1981. The rise of 1 percent lifted the producer price index for finished goods to a level 3.5 percent higher than in June 1981. Finished goods are goods ready for sale by retailers.

Prices for gasoline and home heating oil rose sharply in June, following several months of substantial declines. BLS noted that because prices for refined petroleum products come in a month late, the prices used in the June index were for May, when a curtailment of crude oil production by Saudi Arabia and other exporters reversed some of the price declines of preceding months.

WITHOUT THE big 4.1-percent energy price increase, BLS said, the producer price index for finished goods would have risen seven-tenths of 1 percent rather than 1 percent.

The index for foods ready for sale to consumers rose by five-tenths of 1 percent, a bit less than in May. Prices fell in June more rapidly than a month earlier for roasted coffee, fresh fruits, and eggs. Prices for pork and poultry also moved down, following big increases in May.

The biggest food price increases were for beef, veal, fish, vegetables, and sugar, BLS said.

Among other consumer goods, prices rose for boats, lawnmowers, tobacco products, leather footwear, toilet paper, household flatware, and floor coverings.

Prices for intermediate goods rose three-tenths of 1 percent, after increasing by one-tenth of 1 percent in May.

The producer price index for crude goods fell one-tenth of 1 percent after rising 2.2 percent in May, the result of lower prices for crude foodstuffs and feedstuffs.

Labor Dept. Would Drop Child Work Bans

14 and 15 years old would be allowed to work up to four hours a day on school days, up from the current three-hour limit. The maximum hours allowed in a week would go from 18 to 24 when school is in session and up to 36 hours in a week that includes a holiday.

THE RULE protecting the youngsters from having to work past 7 p.m. on school nights would change the deadline to 9 p.m. and from 9 to 10 p.m. on non-school nights or during the summer.

Young teenagers would still be limited to an eight-hour day or a 40-hour week when school is not in session.

Currently the regulations prohibit the employment of 14- and 15-year-old children in manufacturing, mining or processing operations.

The proposed changes would permit the children to work in some laundry and dry cleaning operations. Most restrictions would be lifted in cooking and baking jobs if the work does not involve handling hot grease, working over an open flame or using pressurized cookers without safety valves.

Children would also be allowed to hold jobs washing the exteriors of trucks and buses and the interior of passenger cars, and they would be permitted to pump gas, check oil and wash windshields in gas stations.

The provision against using young teenagers in warehousing and storage jobs would be gutted, permitting them to be used in jobs such as tag and ticket work in tobacco warehouses, order-filling, marking, packaging and shelving.

ALSO SLATED to go is a prohibition against employing children in communications and public utility industries. The new rules would let the young teenagers be hired to operate switchboards and teletype machines, to read meters and to clean up offices and salesrooms in these industries.

Most construction jobs would continue to be off limits except for a proposal made by the Labor Dept. to allow the use of 14- and 15-year-olds in surveying operations before construction begins.

Current regulations prohibit the youngsters from being used in jobs involving the operation of power-driven machinery, but the new rules would lift that ban for retail and food service establishments. Children would also be allowed to operate machines such as automatic data processing equipment, key cutting machines, window shade cutters and self-service washing machines and dryers.

A new proposal would allow individuals to apply for a waiver from restrictions on occupations or hours worked.

AFL-CIO labor standards consultant Clara Schloss warned that such a provision "could in effect gut all child labor regulations."

Schloss pointed out that the Secretary of Labor may not have legal authority to grant such waivers in the first place since many child labor restrictions are part of the labor standards law which can only be changed by Congress.

Default a Prerequisite

Congress Asked to Bar Bailout on Polish Loans

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to act to ensure that no further payment of taxpayers' money is made to banks owed money by Poland unless that communist country is declared in default.

"The arguments against default, advanced by banking and commercial interests, are not persuasive," Legislative Rep. Peggy Taylor told the House Appropriations subcommittee on Foreign Operations chaired by Rep. Clarence Long (D-Md.).

"WE ARE TOLD that a declaration of default would relieve Poland of the burden of repayment. But no serious observer of Poland's deteriorating economy believes that there is any prospect of repayment," she said.

"We are told that default would endanger the international banking system. Felix Rohatyn, senior partner of Lazard Freres & Co., no enemy of bankers, has effectively demonstrated that default would pose no real threat to the liquidity of Western banks. Default would simply require that the banks list as liabilities loans which they now carry as assets."

Some bankers argue that there has already been a sharp curtailment of credit to Eastern Europe, and that default is therefore unnecessary, Taylor observed, but this argument ignores the pressures that are already being felt to provide new credits to protect the old ones.

"IF SUCH NEW credits are forthcoming, what will be their effect on the workers of Poland? We can expect new austerity measures by the Jaruzelski junta," she said, "and this time the workers will not have Solidarity to shield them from this economic onslaught or to guarantee that they have a voice in determining how the sacrifice should be distributed."

Solidarity, the free trade union movement that emerged in the aftermath of nationwide strikes in Poland two summers ago, was suspended and its leaders imprisoned last December when the Jaruzelski junta seized power. The Administration announced a set of limited sanctions against the Polish government, but they did not go as far as the AFL-CIO wished. Among the steps the AFL-CIO urged were calling in the Polish debt, and restricting trade with the Soviet bloc to cash transactions.

There has been no substantive change in the repressive policies of the Polish government since the Reagan sanctions

Declaring Poland in default would be an effective step toward a disengagement from policies the United States has pursued in the past decade that have made it overly vulnerable to the Soviet bloc, Taylor said.

"It would also send a message to the thousands of Solidarity members now in detention camps—those we cheered yesterday but today seem willing to forget—that we will use every peaceful weapon at our disposal in support of their cause."

Letter Carriers Score Republican TV Commercial

The Letter Carriers expressed "outrage" and demanded the withdrawal of a television commercial which shows a letter carrier praising President Reagan for the cost-of-living hike in social security benefits.

NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto told a press conference the Republican National Committee TV spot misrepresents the policy position of his union's 250,000 members toward the Administration. And, he added, it "completely distorts the facts concerning the President's position on social security benefits."

Sombrotto released copies of protests he sent to RNC Chairman Richard Richards, Federal Communications Commission Chairman Mark Fowler and the presidents of the NBC, ABC and CBS networks.

THE TV COMMERCIAL has been aired around the nation since the July increase in social security took effect. In the spot, a letter carrier delivers a benefit check, turns to the camera and says:

"I'm probably one of the most popular people in town.

"I'm delivering social security checks with the 7.4 percent cost-of-living raise that President Reagan promised. He promised that raise and he kept his promise in spite of the sticks-in-the-mud who tried to keep him from doing what we elected him to do. . . ."

AFL-CIO SOCIAL Security Director Bert Seidman called the Republican commercial "an exercise in deception."

Senior citizens won't be fooled because they have been getting yearly increases since 1975 as provided by law, Seidman said, adding:

"And they won't forget that only a huge public outcry stopped Mr. Reagan from delaying this year's payment or drastically cutting it. The President's actions speak louder than the Republicans' words. President Reagan is no friend of social security and he has no right to claim that he is."

Sombrotto was particularly disturbed that the use of a uniformed letter carrier might lead the public to believe that all carriers support the President's policies.

Labor Panel Studies Israel-Lebanon Issues

An AFL-CIO delegation is in the Middle East on a fact-finding tour of Israel and Lebanon. It will report its findings at the Executive Council meeting in New York, Aug. 3-5.

Members of the delegation are Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Service Employees President John Sweeney, and Tom Kahn, an assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

The delegates were invited to Israel by Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation, with which the AFL-CIO maintains close relations.

JUBILANT MEMBERS of District 1199, National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, react to the announcement of a contract agreement with the New York League of Voluntary Hospitals. The two-year pact, which was overwhelmingly ratified, provides a 15-percent wage boost and other benefits.

46,000 Hospital Workers Win Raises, Protect Gains

New York — Hospital workers in the New York metropolitain area fought off management proposals for givebacks, and approved a new two-year contract providing for 7.5-percent annual wage hikes.

The pact, covering some 46,000 members of District 1199, the National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees, was ratified by a vote of 12,737 to 618. The agreement with the League of Voluntary Hospitals embraces 69 nonprofit hospitals and nursing homes in New York City and on Long Island.

The National Union of Hospital & Health Care Employees is affiliated with the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

DISTRICT 1199 President Doris Turner called the agreement an important step forward in the fight to protect the hospital workers' hard-won gains.

"Workers all over are being asked to give back a lot of things," she said. "While we didn't get everything we wanted in this contract, because of our members' unity and determination we were able to stand firm on givebacks, and make important progress."

The contract was the first to be negotiated under Turner, who was elected in May to succeed Leon Davis, the union's first president. The union represents workers ranging from $13,000-a-year laundry workers and nursing attendants to senior social workers, who earn $29,389.

UNDER THE pact, all District 1199 members will receive a 7.5-percent wage increase retroactive to July 1, and an identical raise on July 1, 1983. All minimum hiring rates will rise by the same amount as the wage increase.

Starting on Jan. 1, 1984, management will contribute an additional one-half percent of payroll to a fund that will be used to increase the number of members who have every other weekend off. A committee will study how many weekends off the money will provide. Many of the District 1199 members now work every weekend.

Also beginning Jan. 1, 1984, management will contribute another one-half percent of payroll to the workers' pension fund, raising the rate to 8.5 percent.

UNION NEGOTIATORS fought back management attempts for broad subcontracting rights. The two sides agreed to set up a panel to look into the issue.

The agreement followed two months of negotiations in which the league made no proposals other than 23 contract giveback requests. The union had set a strike deadline of July 15, two weeks after the old contract expired.

1 in 5 Americans Jobless During Some Period in 1981

countered some unemployment in 1981 represented 19.5 percent of all persons in the labor force for at least one week. The level was higher than the 18.1 percent who experienced some unemployment in 1980 but lower than the 20.2-percent peak level in 1975 during another severe recession.

For men and all blacks, however, the proportion of unemployed equaled or exceeded previous highs. Twenty percent of all male workers encountered joblessness in 1981, the same as in 1975. Among women, the proportion was 19 percent, still below its 1975 peak of 20.5 percent.

"Men were not only more likely to become unemployed," said BLS. "They generally remained unemployed longer than women."

Among blacks, the 30.5 percent who became unemployed at some point was higher than both the 1980 level of 28 percent and the previous peak of 29.5 percent reached in 1975. Unemployment touched 18.3 percent of all white workers in 1981 and 24 percent of Hispanic workers.

In its report on state jobless rates, BLS said that Michigan continued to have the highest unemployment level at 14.3 percent.

Other states with rates of 10 percent or higher were Alabama, Alaska, Illinois, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Ohio, Oregon, South Carolina, Tennessee, West Virginia and Wisconsin, as well as the District of Columbia.

The BLS noted that unemployment increased over the year in 203 of the 221 metropolitan areas covered in the study. The highest metropolitan jobless rate in May was in Flint, Mich., 19.8 percent, followed closely by Rockford, Ill., 19.3 percent. Eleven other metropolitan areas across the country suffered a jobless rate of 15 percent or higher in May.

Overall, 78 metropolitan areas reported jobless rates of 10 percent or higher, compared with only 28 in May 1981, the report said.

IN THE 35 states that experienced over-the-year declines in employment, the majority of job losses came in manufacturing industries although decreases were also recorded in construction, transportation and public utilities.

Michigan recorded the sharpest decline in employment since May 1981 with a loss of 170,000 jobs—100,000 in manufacturing.

Employment decreases ranging from 90,000 to 150,000 jobs were also reported for Illinois, Indiana, Ohio and Pennsylvania, with most of the losses coming in manufacturing.

THE BLS report said employment increased by 180,000 jobs in Texas and 65,000 jobs in Florida, with the gains coming largely in trade and services.

In the 15 states where employment rose over the year, gains in trade and services more than offset losses in other sectors, the BLS reported.

Reagan Bars UTU Selective Strikes On 9 Railroads

President Reagan used his emergency powers under the Railway Labor Act to block a strike against nine major carriers by the United Transportation Union.

The UTU had notified the carriers it planned selective walkouts if a new agreement was not reached by July 30, but Reagan stepped in July 21 and notified both parties he was naming an emergency board to look into the dispute.

He took similar action earlier this month to stop a nationwide strike by the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, and the same panel members have been named to explore the UTU's impasse.

The President's action starts the clock on a 30-day hearing period. If either side rejects the recommendations the board brings in after that period, another 30 days must pass before the union could strike or the carriers institute a lockout.

The panel members are Arnold Weber, president of the University of Colorado; Daniel Quinn Mills, a Harvard University professor, and Jacob Seidenberg, a Falls Church, Va. attorney.

Looking to Congress

Kirkland Scores Reagan For 'War on Workers'

But the recent successful override of Reagan's veto of the job-saving manufacturing clause of the Copyright Act "offers some hope," Kirkland suggested. It indicates that Congress may be turning "more sensitive" to "the disappearance of job opportunities."

Kirkland termed the "tax giveaway of more than $700 billion" last year "the most irresponsible fiscal act" of his lifetime. He welcomed signs that Congress "has begun to come to its senses" on matters such as the leasing of corporate tax breaks. And he urged the revenue-raising tax package proposed by the AFL-CIO.

In his testimony and in reply to questions, Kirkland stressed that the federal tax structure must remain progressive, based on ability to pay.

"IT MUST NOT include such schemes as value-added taxes or one flat rate for everybody," he insisted. There's no reason why tax laws can't be simplified and loopholes narrowed while retaining a progressive tax structure, Kirkland said in a discussion with Committee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.).

He told another questioner that renewal of the Credit Control Act and use by the President of its standby authority to regulate credit would be "the quickest, most direct way to bring down interest rates."

The Credit Control Act expired at the end of June but a House Banking subcommittee on July 20 approved a bill that would reinstate the 1969 statute.

"WE MUST END the rule of tight money as the chief instrument of national policy," Kirkland insisted.

He urged the need for a pending House bill to provide jobs for those long unemployed. And he renewed labor's call for establishment of "a new Reconstruction Finance Corp. to rebuild the nation's industrial base and limit job-destroying imports."

Congress should extend unemployment benefit duration to the levels of past recessions and repair damage to the program inflicted last year, Kirkland urged.

And now that Congress is "no longer blinded" by the dazzle of a new Administration, Kirkland suggested, it should "take a clear look" at the issue of government regulations from the viewpoint of protecting job safety and health, and with the view to enforcing, not weakening, prevailing wage and child labor laws.

The AFL-CIO has gone to court to fight some of the deregulation excesses of the Executive Branch, Kirkland said. And labor "will continue to ask the Legislative Branch for safeguards in the marketplace and in the community as well as on the job site."

In response to questions, Kirkland angrily termed the Labor Dept.'s proposed retreat on child labor rules a "blatant violation" of the department's statutory responsibilities, and "a social and economic outrage."

MILLIONS OF JOBLESS Americans and their families are the victims of the Reagan Administration's economic program and it is up to Congress to get the nation back on course, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland testified before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress. With him are Henry Schechter, left, associate research director, and Legislative Director Ray Denison.

250 in Congress Join to Sponsor New ERA Effort

A new Equal Rights Amendment was proposed in Congress with the backing of more than 250 sponsors in the House and Senate.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, at a rally on the Capitol steps following introduction of the measure, called the labor-backed amendment "a bread-and-butter issue."

WOMEN ARE in the labor force because they "need to work to support their families," O'Neill said, charging President Reagan with failing to understand the participation of women in the labor market.

Although Reagan and the Republican Party repudiated support of ERA in the party's 1980 platform, the new ERA measure has bipartisan support.

House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino (D-N.J.) led a list of 205 members of the House who signed on as sponsors of ERA including 164 Democrats and 41 Republicans.

In the Senate, 31 Democrats and 20 Republicans joined as co-sponsors led by Sen. Paul Tsongas (D-Mass.) and Sen. Robert Packwood (R-Ore.).

A TWO-THIRDS majority in both the House and Senate will be necessary to pass the amendment and send it to the states for the ratification process.

The reintroduction of ERA came two weeks after the June 30 deadline expired on the first ratification campaign. In that effort only 35 of the needed 38 states had voted for ratification of the measure approved by Congress in 1972 with a seven-year deadline. In 1979, Congress voted to extend the expiration date by three years.

Tuition Tax Credit Termed Menace to Public Schools

The tuition tax credit plan pushed by the Reagan Administration would cause "irreparable harm" to the nation's system of free public education, the American Federation of Teachers warned in Senate testimony.

AFT Legislative Director Gordon A. Humphrey told the Senate Finance Committee that special tax breaks to families whose children attend private schools would lead to a system of financing education that would undermine the financial base of the public school system.

Humphrey said the program would pave the way for private schools to unfairly attract only those students that are easiest to educate.

THE PUBLIC school system would be left serving more and more students with "the most difficult and expensive educational and behavioral problems," Humphrey said, adding that the public schools would be seen as a "dumping ground" to be avoided.

Tuition tax credits could benefit "divisive forces" in our society, Humphrey told the committee, because they can be used to create or support "schools run by extremists."

The credit plan proposed by President Reagan would let individual taxpayers take a credit on their income tax for 50 percent of the cost of tuition for each child in private elementary or secondary schools.

The maximum tax credit per child would be $100 in 1983, $300 in 1984 and $500 in 1985. Families with adjusted incomes of up to $50,000 a year could take the full credit with benefits declining for those with higher incomes. No credits would go to taxpayers with incomes over $75,000.

Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan told the committee the Administration plan would cost the national treasury $3.95 billion in lost revenues over the next five years.

Humphrey warned that "no one should be lulled" by the fact that the first year's credit appears small. If the bill becomes law, he said, "it will represent only the first installment of a massive, open-ended entitlement program of the type the President otherwise finds so objectionable."

He told the committee the proposal "to gouge public education to pay for private education" was particularly unfair at a time when the Reagan Administration was slashing many other programs that were intended to aid children with the greatest economic or educational needs, such as assistance to poor and handicapped students, children needing bilingual education and aid to college students.

The Teachers began a petition campaign in June and have gathered more than 100,000 signatures in opposition to the Reagan proposals, the union said.

AFT President Albert Shanker said the union intends to collect one million signatures before election day, Nov. 2.

Budget Amendment Branded Recipe for Disaster

controlled depression," with the federal government "helpless to meet its responsibility to protect and assist the jobless and the poor."

Kirkland pointed to the irony of Reagan espousing a balanced budget amendment after having turned in a record deficit for his first fiscal year in office and having proposed a $100-billion deficit for next year. It's as hypocritical as "a temperance lecture by W. C. Fields," Kirkland suggested.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) charged Reagan and the Administration with an election-year attempt to divert attention from unemployment and recession.

THE DEFICIT the President wants to stop with a constitutional amendment, Wright noted, stems directly from the "excessive tax cut for the wealthy" enacted last year at the President's urging and "the Reagan Recession."

Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) said many of his colleagues who co-sponsored the amendment because polls show a balanced budget to be a popular slogan privately consider it nonsense. "In a secret ballot, I'm convinced it would go down to defeat," Cranston said.

State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee cited his union's research study on the impact of a balanced budget amendment—throwing nearly 2.7 million people out of work in its first two years and slashing the total output of goods and services by $519 billion over the same period.

THE "BENEFIT" would be an estimated drop in inflation of three-tenths of 1 percent, McEntee said. That's close to one million jobs lost for each one-tenth of 1 percent less inflation, he noted.

Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.), a veteran of 34 years in the House and Senate, said America's elderly "suffered through one Hoover Administration. They recognize another when they see it." The constitutional amendment ploy is "a sneaky way to try to cut social security," he charged.

Delegate Walter E. Fauntroy (D-D.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, pointed out that the amendment supported by the President would limit the ability of the federal government to raise sufficient revenues to meet its commitments.

A LITTLE KNOWN feature of the proposed constitutional amendment would prohibit any revenue increase greater than the rate of growth of national income.

This, Reagan told the pro-amendment rally, means that Congress couldn't achieve a balanced budget by raising taxes.

The amendment would allow an exception to the balanced budget requirement only in time of war or if three-fifths of both the House and Senate voted to waive the requirement.

ITS ADOPTION, Reagan said, would be a way of "bringing to heel a federal establishment which has taken too much power from the states."

Kirkland, at the senior citizens news conference, put it somewhat differently:

"In times of domestic hardship, the federal government could be helpless to meet its responsibility to protect and assist the jobless and the poor.

"In times of international crisis, the nation could be denied the opportunity to defend itself or to fulfill its worldwide commitments."

A RIGHT-WING "taxpayers" group started pushing for a balanced budget amendment about 1975, and initially their proposal was given about as much serious attention as the "flat-earth" theory.

Obliging state legislatures almost routinely approved resolutions seeking to compel Congress to convene a constitutional convention in order to adopt a balanced budget amendment and submit it for ratification. Thirty-one states have done so—Alaska last January was the most recent—and 34 petitions would trigger the never-before-used provision for a constitutional convention.

More than 60 senators signed on as sponsors of the amendment, close to the two-thirds-majority of 67 needed for approval of a constitutional amendment.

IN THE HOUSE, a companion measure has been before the House Judiciary Committee and supporters of the amendment have initiated a discharge petition to bypass the committee and bring the measure directly to the House floor.

As in the Senate, there are House members of both parties who have endorsed the proposal solely to placate single-issue groups pressing for its adoption. But there have been some signs of slippage among the amendment's supporters. Cranston, the Democratic whip in the Senate, said he now counts only 63 firm supporters of the amendment, with a handful of undecided senators holding the balance. Earlier in the debate, the assumption was that the amendment would easily clear the Senate, leaving it up to the House to decide the outcome.

Housing, Auto, Factory Slump Dulls GNP Gain

By James M. Shevis

The nation's economy turned up in the April-June quarter, the government reported, but a series of gloomy figures on June economic performance raised doubts whether recovery from the Reagan Recession would long be sustained.

New housing starts, auto sales, and factory output all dropped sharply in June.

Real, or inflation-adjusted, gross national product rose at an annual rate of 1.7 percent in the second quarter, the Commerce Dept. said. The increase was the first growth in the economy since mid-1981. Real GNP fell sharply in the two previous quarters.

AT THE SAME TIME, Commerce said that inflation as measured by a GNP-based index rose at a 5.3-percent annual rate in the just-ended quarter, up from a rate of 4.3-percent in the January-March period.

Meanwhile, the Federal Reserve Board lowered its discount rate—the fee it charges banks and savings institutions to borrow from it—to 11.5 percent from 12 percent, where it had stood since Dec. 4. The action came only hours after two major banks—Manufacturers Hanover of New York and First National Trust Co. of Chicago—cut their prime, or basic, lending rates from 16.5 to 16 percent.

The Fed said that the discount-rate cut was taken "in the context of recent declines in short-term market rates and the relatively restrained growth of money and credit in recent months."

High interest rates, which the Fed's tight-money policies have fostered, have severely depressed the housing and auto industries. While the central bank's lowering of its discount rate is not likely by itself to produce the kind of large reductions in interest rates needed to revive the economy, the move may prompt further declines in short-term rates by the big banks.

Earlier government reports on such important economic indicators as industrial output, housing and retail sales underscored the ambiguity of the current economic situation, and served to check optimism about future growth.

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION in June fell a seasonally adjusted seven-tenths of 1 percent, the tenth monthly decline in the past 11 months. In announcing the continuing slide in the output of the nation's factories and mines, the Federal Reserve Board also widened its earlier estimates of the declines in May and April. Originally estimated at two-tenths of 1 percent in May and eight-tenths of 1 percent in April, the declines were revised to six-tenths of 1 percent and 1.1 percent, respectively.

Housing starts plunged 15.3 percent in June to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 911,000 units, the Commerce Dept. reported. The biggest factor in the June decline was a sharp 31.5-percent drop in multifamily dwelling starts.

THE HOUSING industry, which is having its worst year in three decades, is being held down by high mortgage interest rates. Home loans now generally cost 16 to 17 percent. "There's no way to overcome the interest rates," said Mark J. Riedy, executive vice president of the Mortgage Bankers Association of America.

Other adverse economic reports:

- Retail sales plunged 1.5 percent in June, erasing much of the May gain and clouding hopes for recovery. Contributing most to the decline was a 6.9-percent drop in autos. Excluding autos, retail sales were down three-tenths of 1 percent over the month. The Commerce Dept. said that sales of durable goods fell 4.2 percent while sales of nondurables rose a bare two-tenths of 1 percent.
- U.S. car sales fell 16 percent in early July, prompting General Motors Corp., the largest auto maker, to revive its sales incentive program for dealers. The 107,218 cars sold in the first 10 days of July by all domestic producers compared with 127,817 in the year-earlier period.
- Personal income rose a slight three-tenths of 1 percent in June while consumer spending — reflecting high unemployment and continued economic weakness — declined. The Commerce Dept. also said that Americans saved $144.7 billion at an annual rate last month, up from a $128.8 billion pace in the previous month.
- The nation's factories operated at only 69.8 percent of their capacity in June, the second lowest rate on record, the Federal Reserve Board reported. The only major improvements in capacity utilization were in the auto and oil industries. Factory products generate almost a third of the nation's sales volume.

WHILE THE government reported a 1.7-percent rise in real GNP in the April-June period, it should be noted that the figure is a preliminary one. Initial estimates frequently are revised. For example, declines of 3.7-percent in the first quarter of 1982 and 4.5-percent in the final quarter of 1981 were revised just this week to decreases of 5.1 and 5.3 percent, respectively.

The 1.7-percent figure was higher than most analysts, including those in the Commerce Dept., had anticipated. Late last month, the department said in an unofficial calculation it expected second-quarter real GNP to rise six-tenths of 1 percent.

Income Drops For Families, Poverty Rises

Median family income for the nation declined by 3.5 percent from 1980 to 1981 after adjustment for inflation, the Census Bureau reported.

At the same time, the bureau reported that the number of Americans officially classified as poor increased by about 2.2 million to 31.8 million in 1981. Approximately one out of seven persons was living below the poverty level last year.

THE MEDIAN family income for 1981 was $22,388, the agency said. This means that as many families were above that level as below it. Between 1979 and 1980, again adjusted for inflation, the median fell 5.5 percent.

In 1981, the median income actually grew 6.5 percent but adjusted for a 10.4 percent increase in consumer prices as measured by the consumer price index, there was a 3.5 percent decrease in purchasing power, or real income. In 1980, the annual average CPI was up 13.5 percent.

Last year's 3.5-percent decline occurred basically in three regions of the country. The Northeast was the only area where real median family income—$23,706 in 1981—was about the same as in 1980. The figures for the North Central states, the South, and the West all represented declines.

MEDIAN INCOME for white families was $23,520 in 1981, for black families $13,270, and for those of Spanish origin $16,400. For whites and blacks, the figures represented declines in purchasing power while the figure for families of Spanish origin was about unchanged from 1981.

The median income for families with a householder 65 years of age or more showed no real change, while real median family income for all other age groups declined.

THE THRESHOLD of poverty last year was an income of $9,287 a year for a family of four, up from $8,414 in 1980 because of the impact of inflation.

"Among the factors contributing to the increase in poverty were the recession that began in mid-1981 and the associated rise in the unemployment rate," the Census Bureau observed.

Increases in the poverty population occurred in all geographic areas. The overall poverty rate for metropolitan areas was 12.6 percent, but central areas had an 18 percent rate while the rate outside central cities was 8.9 percent.

JOB-FINDING WORKSHOP for workers displaced by the closing of a U.S. Steel plant near Birmingham, Ala., is conducted by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute and the Steelworkers. At this session, Ralph Johnson of the University of Alabama's Center for Labor Education gives some practical advice. HRDI, in cooperation with local unions, is launching a new program of direct help to workers made jobless by plant closings.

HRDI-Steelworker Workshop in Birmingham Provides First Aid to Plant-Closing Victims

Birmingham, Ala.—Some 10,000 steelworkers are victims of layoffs and plant closings in the Birmingham area, and the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute has been working with their union to help them get back on their feet—in a new job, if possible.

The first of a series of special workshops was a three-day program held at the Steelworkers Local 1013 hall in nearby Fairfield. U.S. Steel's Fairfield plant closed down, at least temporarily, after wave after wave of layoffs caused by subsidized imports as well as the recession.

HRDI EXECUTIVE Director Michael M. Arnold told the 425 workers at the opening session that helping laid-off workers is HRDI's highest priority. HRDI Field Coordinator Glen Cole worked with USWA District Director Thermon Phillips and local union officers in setting up the workshops. National staff experts from HRDI were on hand to develop a blueprint for the workshops and take part in the sessions.

HRDI is also developing a joint program with the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers that will provide services to OCAW members facing layoff. Two pilot HRDI/OCAW worker assistance workshops are scheduled in Kansas City, next month.

The first sessions, serving 120 workers being laid off from an Amoco facility in Sugar Creek, Mo., will be conducted Aug. 3-4. The second will be for some 350 workers at Phillips Petroleum Co. in Kansas City on Aug. 10111.

OCAW HAS negotiated benefit packages with both Amoco and Phillips that enable union members to participate in worker assistance activities while still on the payroll. Each workshop will be followed by a week of concentrated job search assistance.

At Birmingham, AFL-CIO Community Services Rep. Homer Harper presided at a session on coping with unemployment, dealing with matters such as mortgage payments, debts, health care, emergency assistance and unemployment compensation claims.

USWA Director Phillips spoke of the events leading up to the plant closings and stressed that the plant will reopen when there is a demand for its output, not because of union concessions. U.S. Steel is building a pipe plant at Fairfield, scheduled to open in 1984. But it will only employ a small portion of the displaced workers.

OTHER WORKSHOP sessions dealt with job preparation and job seeking suggestions, with the workshop staff including two former Steelworkers now associated with the University of Alabama who started new careers after having been laid off from Gary, Ind., steel mills.

Local union officials briefed participants on their recall and pension rights under the union contract. Some of the more senior workers will be able to draw supplementary unemployment benefits for up to two years. But among the area's unemployed are victims of earlier layoffs who have exhausted their SUB and unemployment insurance benefits and are still unemployed.

For these workers especially, a representative of the Birmingham-Jefferson County Manpower Consortium discussed opportunities provided by the local Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA) program.

HRDI IS ALSO working with the Steelworkers district office on an additional series of workshops next month for USWA members previously laid off from the Pullman-Standard plant in the Birmingham area.

As a prelude to individual follow-ups on the Fairfield workshops, participants were invited to complete a form listing their work history, occupational skills, education and interest in retraining.

Participants also received HRDI packets including a guide to job finding, information on local social services, college course and career assistance.

CONVENTION DELEGATES to the Maintenance of Way Employes 39th meeting in Vancouver, B.C., set policies for the union over the next four years. Ole M. Berge, at podium, was re-elected to his second four-year term by the 450 delegates representing the union's 120,000 active and retired members.

Rail Waymen Re-Elect Berge, Approve Canadian Autonomy

Vancouver, B.C. — Delegates to the Maintenance of Way Employes convention re-elected President Ole M. Berge to his second term and approved the preparation of a new autonomous organizational structure for Canadian members.

The 450 delegates, representing about 120,000 active and retired workers in the United States and Canada, elected Berge to a new four-year term over Sam E. Fleming, of Denver, a BMWE vice president. Geoffrey N. Zeh, the union's general counsel and research director was elected secretary-treasurer over incumbent B. L. Sorah.

Zeh, 39, joined the union's staff in 1975. He had formerly been an attorney with a Washington, D.C., firm representing rail labor unions.

THE DELEGATES approved the preparation and implementation of a plan that could lead either to the creation of an autonomous Canadian division of the union or to a separate Canadian union. The measure was approved by a voice vote with no opposition.

The union's constitution was amended to raise dues paid to the grand lodge from $5.25 to $6.25 a month or from $63 to $75 a year, effective in January 1983. Local dues are assessed separately.

In January 1984, and each year after that, grand lodge dues will be adjusted to reflect two-thirds of the average straight-time hourly rate for maintenance of way workers, based on Interstate Commerce Commission figures for the previous year.

THE CONVENTION also voted to increase the amount of grand lodge dues set aside for state and provincial legislative activities from 20 cents to 40 cents and increase the set aside for the strike fund from 25 cents to 50 cents.

Other measures called for:

- Stepped-up safety measures by federal and state agencies responsible for controlling the rail transport of hazardous materials.
- Low-interest government loans to railroads to finance track rehabilitation.
- Support of requests for additional funds by Amtrak and Conrail, the nation's passenger and freight rail carriers, to expand operations and improve services.

The union's constitution was also amended to provide for election of U.S. vice presidents and executive board members by delegates from their regions rather than by all U.S. delegates. Canadian vice presidents and board members are already elected by Canadian delegates only.

IN OTHER elections, Sam Fleming was re-elected as a vice president as were M. A. Christie, Kansas City; Frank H. Funk, Mineapolis, William E. LaRue, Downingtown, Pa.; and A. Passaretti and F. L. Stoppler, both of Ottawa, Ont.

B. L. Hall, of Barboursville, W.Va., was elected to succeed retiring vice president A. D. Arnett of Jacksonville, Fla.

Mrs. Lloyd R. Ernst of St. Johns, Mich. was re-elected president of the union's women's auxiliary which also held its convention in Vancouver.

Speakers at the convention included James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; Fred A. Hardin, president of the United Transportation Union and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association; William A. Dempsey, president of the Association of American Railroads; C. J. Chamberlain, labor member of the U.S. Railroad Retirement Board and Richard Calistri, the editor of Labor newspaper.

Auto Workers Add To Chrysler Holdings

Detroit—Some 65,000 members of the Auto Workers are among 91,000 Chrysler Corp. employees who will receive a total of 6,237,200 shares of Chrysler stock under an Employee Stock Ownership Plan.

Added to the 5,987,400 shares received under the plan a year ago, Chrysler workers now will own over 15 percent of the company's outstanding shares.

In 54-45 Vote

Senate Rejects Efforts To Ease Tax Inequities

The Senate turned down a labor-supported proposal to put a ceiling on next year's income tax cut and moved towards approval of a revenue bill that closes some business tax loopholes but imposes new burdens on the elderly and on consumers.

On the plus side, the Senate bill would curb some of the more outrageous giveaways of last year's tax bill, such as the leasing of tax credits which allows hugely profitable corporations to avoid paying taxes.

BUT IN A LETTER to senators, the AFL-CIO strongly protested features that add new inequities. These include higher out-of-pocket payments for elderly persons using health services covered by Medicare, cutbacks in funding for medicaid, family assistance and other income support programs, limitations on medical expense deductions, a new Medicare tax on federal employees, and higher excise taxes on cigarettes and on telephone use.

It also would take more money from workers who depend on tips and would widen the tax definition of independent contractors in a way that would deny workers protection of employment rights and federal wage, safety and civil rights standards, Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote senators before the vote.

The amendment that the Senate rejected by a 54-45 vote was sponsored by Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) and had been endorsed by the Senate Democratic caucus.

IT WOULD have restored the Medicare cuts and dropped the additional excise taxes, while still raising more revenue than the Finance Committee bill. This would have been done through a varient of the tax cut ceiling originally proposed by the AFL-CIO.

Under the Democratic plan, persons with incomes up to $46,500 would receive their full scheduled tax increase next year. For persons above that level, a gradually increasing portion of the increase would be "deferred" until such time as a balanced budget is achieved. Persons with incomes over $78,000 would have their entire tax cut deferred.

IN THE SENATE debate, Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.) conceded merit to the Democratic alternative but warned that any attempt to back down on income tax cuts scheduled for next year would surely draw a presidential veto. After defeating several Democratic amendments, the Senate then adopted a Republican "compromise" lessening the cutbacks in Medicare.

The House Ways & Means Committee, meanwhile, has begun work on a counterpart bill. Congressional action is required in order to raise approximately $21 billion in new revenue to meet budget targets set earlier this year.

In a related area, House and Senate committees split on whether to put a 4 percent cap on cost-of-living increases of retired federal and postal workers in order to meet budget targets.

The ceiling, which also applies to military personnel, was approved by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee but was rejected by the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee. The Democratic majority on the House panel balked at what Chairman William D. Ford (D-Mich.) described as a "further squeeze on civil service retirees and surviving widows and children."

Republicans are expected to make another attempt to reimpose the ceiling when the budget reconciliation bill reaches the House floor.

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. meanwhile called on Congress to reject the Medicare tax proposal, which would amount to a 1.3 percent reduction in federal and postal paychecks. At a PED news conference, Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto stressed that government workers, covered by the Civil Service Retirement System, have their own comprehensive health insurance programs.

5 Youngsters Honored For Labor History Play

College Park, Md.—A drama performance on the 1911 Triangle Shirtwaist fire at the National History Day contest won five students from St. Peter's Junior High School in Joplin, Mo., a special labor history prize. They were among 1,100 finalists in national competition at the University of Maryland.

Winners of the award—Kelli Williams, Wendy Mall, Douglas Bower, Stacey Perkins and Adrienne McConigle—were presented a $250 cash prize by James Auerbach of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. Auerbach serves on the National History Day board of directors.

The National History Day project is designed to encourage students in grades 6 to 12 to explore historical subjects. This year's theme was trade and industry. The program is funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities and other groups, including the AFL-CIO.

Jobless Rise Roils Indiana Labor

Indianapolis—Political action and legislative goals were the keynotes of the Indiana AFL-CIO's biennial convention as delegates voted to increase per capita tax to bolster the state federation's programs.

The two-step increase totaling 10 cents will bring monthly per capita payments to 20 cents next Oct. 1 and to 25 cents effective Jan. 1, 1984.

THE DELEGATES approved resolutions condemning the economic policies of the Reagan Administration which have led to the nation's deep recession and they pointed to Indiana's high jobless rate, one of the worst in the country, as an example of the damage.

Delegates also scored the failure of Congress to extend unemployment benefits, noting that in the same week of the convention some 40,000 Indiana workers were cut off from unemployment benefits as a result.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the convention that the Administration's economic program, which Reagan promised would "touch off great waves of business confidence, investment and economic growth," has generated "nothing but disaster."

While unemployment is the highest since the Depression of the 1930s, the nation is not looking ahead as it was then under President Franklin Roosevelt, Kirkland noted.

President Reagan's message is "that he intends to move this country back to the 1920s when the sole preoccupation of government was to enhance the fortunes of property owners and increase private wealth," Kirkland charged.

The Administration has set out to "destroy" vital programs such as social security, unemployment compensation, the minimum wage, the National Labor Relations Act and other "machinery put in place to protect ordinary people from the power of concentrated wealth," he said.

LIKE HERBERT HOOVER, President Reagan "tells us prosperity is just around the corner, if only we stop wasting money on public health, public education, public housing, and jobs and job training and all the other programs that foster a decent quality of life for plain people," he said.

The "giant leap backward" will not work, Kirkland said, because "we have one thing that we didn't have in the Hoover days: a strong and united labor movement."

The delegates endorsed Floyd Fithian who will oppose incumbent Republican Sen. Richard Lugar.

In his speech to the delegates, Fithian stressed that Lugar had voted for the elimination of the national trigger that would have continued extended benefits for the state jobless workers.

THE NOTICES of cancellation of benefits workers are receiving, Fithian said, "are really a message from Senator Lugar that says he does not care about their unemployment."

The delegates also endorsed incumbent Democratic Representatives Adam Benjamin, Philip Sharp, Lee Hamilton and Andrew Jacobs, Jr., and Democratic challengers for the state's six districts including Richard Bodine, Roger Miller, Allen Maxwell, Stephen Booney, Frances X. McCloskey and George Grabianowski.

Grabianowski is a former coordinator for the Clothing & Textile Workers successful boycott against the J. P. Stevens & Co.

Other speakers at the convention included AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William Pollard, Community Services Director Walter C. Davis, COPE Director John Perkins and COPE Eastern VIP Director Ruth Colombo, as well as John E. Mara, the secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Reagan's Class Warfare

REAGAN ADMINISTRATION policies add up to class warfare against the disadvantaged, the poor and the working people of America. They put people out of work and aggravate inflation. They add to inequity, unfairness and divisiveness. These policies must be exposed, the damage minimized and the course reversed.

The Reagan economic program requires more sacrifice from those who have little, to give to those who already have much. It substitutes unrestrained market power for social responsibility and human concerns. It shortchanges sound economic growth by cutting back programs to achieve energy independence, rebuild the nation's transportation system, revitalize urban areas, and safeguard the environment.

Last year's indiscriminate budget cuts tore deeply into the safety net Americans have a right to expect. This year, the Congress has moved, feebly and haltingly, to repair that damage, only to be thwarted by the President's recurrent vetoes.

Among the most glaring examples was the President's veto of the $3 billion housing bill last month that stopped 250,000 houses from being built and 500,000 jobs from being created.

FULL EMPLOYMENT—a good job at decent pay for every American willing and able to work—remains a distant but persisting dream in 1982. In a sad commentary on the commitment of the nation expressed in the Humphrey-Hawkins Act to reduce unemployment to 4 percent by 1983, unemployment at 9.5 percent is more than double that promised goal.

The AFL-CIO calls on Congress to reverse the Reagan Administration's economic policies and to set the nation on a road to full employment and balanced economic growth.

We can hope for no remedy from an Administration still engaged in destroying jobs. The congressional override of the veto of the extension of the manufacturing clause in the copyright law offers some hope that the Congress may be becoming more sensitive to the human consequences of the loss of skills, the collapse of enterprises and the disappearance of job opportunities.

A tax program along the lines recommended by the AFL-CIO will raise $150 billion in revenue over a three-year period and will move the nation's tax structure closer to fairness and tax justice. And at all costs our federal tax must retain the essential progressive principle of ability to pay. It must not include such schemes as value-added taxes or one flat rate for everybody, regardless of income level.

THERE IS A ROLE for government in our lives—and indeed government is essential to a just and humane society.

We ask that Congress, now no longer blinded by the purported mandate of a new Administration, take a clear look at the protections essential to workers' lives as regards job safety and health, and to their standards through prevailing wage and child labor laws. We have sought judicial relief from some of the excess of executive fiat of recent days, and will continue to ask for safeguards in the marketplace and in the community as well as on the job site.

—From AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's testimony to the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, July 20, 1982.

New Federalism 'Baloney'

Reagan Scorns Federal Role While Hailing Its Achievements

By Press Associates, Inc.

SOMETIMES IT IS hard to know which Ronald Reagan is President.

Is it the Reagan who welcomed the Columbia space shuttle back to earth in July 1982? Or is it the Reagan who wants to take the nation back to the 18th Century—back to the Constitution, as he says, through his "New Federalism?"

The President recently left the White House and traveled 33 miles to the port city of Baltimore to unveil his latest pared-down version of New Federalism.

While the President's basic purpose was to address the National Association of Counties on New Federalism, he was taken on a tour by an exuberant Mayor Donald Schaefer.

Schaefer had good reason to show off the revitalized Inner Harbor area and other accomplishments of the downtown renewal area.

BUT IF REAGAN was impressed in his whirlwind tour of the downtown area, it was not in the way he expected. Wherever Reagan went, the federal presence was evident.

The President visited a bindery in the Park Circle Industrial Park, where 40 low-income people are trained.

Reagan mentioned to reporters that the bindery was an example of what could be done without federal help.

But then the President was informed that the federal Economic Development Administration helped create the industrial park in cooperation with state and local government and groups.

THE JOB TRAINING program also was set up with Labor Dept. funds through CETA. The Reagan Administration tried to abolish EDA and CETA dies in September.

From an observation deck in the renewed Inner Harbor, the mayor called Reagan's attention to the many new government and private office buildings built with the stimulus of federal funds.

All of this should have been healthy reality therapy for Reagan. However, in his speech to the convention Reagan persisted in denouncing the federal government.

There seems to be a problem because Reagan has a wrongheaded notion of how the United States developed.

When Reagan first floated his "New Federalism" idea in his inaugural address, he asserted that "the federal government did not create the states; the states created the federal government."

Historians quickly corrected him. The Constitution, they noted, clearly says "We, the People of the United States" created the nation, not the states.

EVEN A MEMBER of Reagan's own party couldn't stomach the President's view of history and his exaggerations.

Sen. David Durenberger (R-Minn.) also addressed the NACO convention and alluded to Reagan's basic premise this way: "That the national government usurped its powers from its creators in the states is, of course, baloney."

The fact is, Durenberger related, state and local officials looked to Washington for help because they lacked the resources to deal with economic growth and decay in the postwar boom. Since then, he said, state legislatures have been reapportioned, constitutions updated, tax sources broadened and administrative competency improved. Counties and cities, however, still lack the resources to meet their needs, Durenberger said, and that is why they will not be able to handle the federal programs Reagan wants to turn over.

The latest version of New Federalism would turn over 35 programs to the states, chief among them the basic welfare program, Aid to Families with Dependent Children.

THAT'S WHAT may have bothered Durenberger. He said Reagan's proposal raises a major issue: "Does this Administration—does my party—care about the poor? Is the New Federalism a smokescreen for a repeal of the New Deal? Is private sector initiatives a fig leaf to cover a lack of compassion?"

The Reagan Recession is proof enough that national policies and paralysis have created national problems. Unemployment has soared to 12 million. The federal budget cuts—which Durenberger voted for—have fallen most heavily on the poor and working poor. The economic and social misery are now reaching deeply into the middle class.

Yet the President is trying to escape responsibility and abdicate the federal role in favor of states' rights which never existed.

MEMO FROM COPE

The Senate in '82: Dems Run Afoul of Arithmetic; Economy Imperils Republicans

Both political parties—and thousands of non-party political action committees, including labor PACs—seeking prophecy on 1982 U.S. Senate elections, are reading tea leaves . . . with one eye.

The other eye is scanning horizons beyond 1982 to 1984, and even to 1986 Senate races. (See accompanying story.)

Neither party really expects a substantial Senate shift as a result of November 2 balloting. Both parties speak of a possible swing of two or three seats, each claiming the swing is heading in its direction. Big changes either way are unlikely.

Democrats hedge their bets by pointing out that it doesn't take an Einstein to figure their chances for any significant gains are slight. The arithmetic of 1982 stands in their way. There are 33 Senate seats up for election. Democrats hold 19 of them, Republicans 13. (One is Virginia Sen. Harry Byrd's, an independent who does not seek re-election.)

The GOP controls the Senate, 54-45 (plus Byrd). For Democrats to take control as of next January, they'd have to win 25 out of 33 contests. Now and then, a good ball club hits a hot streak like that. Seldom does a political party.

On the other hand, only Republicans wearing the rosiest of rose-colored glasses expect, in their heart of hearts, much to cheer about November 2. If there is continued gloomy economic news and a further disillusion among voters with the Reagan program that is already showing up strongly in the polls, GOP incumbents know they'll pay a price.

There are incumbents in both parties who face tough races for a variety of reasons—more Democrats than Republicans. Targeted for the full treatment by GOP committees and corporate and right wing PACs are such labor-backed incumbent Democrats as George Mitchell (Maine), Paul Sarbanes (Md.), Howard Metzenbaum (Ohio), Jim Sasser (Tenn.), Minority Leader Robert Byrd (W.Va.), Don Riegle (Mich.), Quentin Burdick (N.D.), and others.

A hard race is anticipated, too, for four incumbent, ultraconservative Republicans: Orrin Hatch (Utah), chairman of the Labor Committee; Richard Lugar (Ind.), former President Nixon's "Favorite Mayor" (of Indianapolis back then) and one of President Reagan's favorite senators; Harrison Schmitt (N.M.), and Malcolm Wallop (Wyo.)

On the official AFL-CIO scorecard, their voting records through 1981 are among the worst in the entire Senate—Hatch, 90 percent "wrong"; Lugar, 94 percent "wrong"; Schmitt, 83 percent "wrong"; Wallop, 89 percent "wrong."

Both parties are probably right—there's likely to be a swing in seats next November, but a small one. It's still anybody's guess in which direction.

The Reagan-Republican-Recession began in July 1981.

In its first 12 months—through June 1982—unemployment soared from 7.8 million to 10.4 million, an increase of 2.6 million jobless workers.

There are 8,760 hours in a year. Divide 8,760 (the hours) into 2.6 million (the newly-jobless in the first year of the Reagan-GOP-Recession).

Answer (rounded off): 297.

Around the clock, for every single hour of every single day in the first year of Reagan-GOP slump workers joined the ranks of unemployed

. . . but Beyond '82?

Beyond 1982 loom all kinds of interesting possibilities in 1984 and 1986 Senate races, and both parties are already looking that far ahead—counting, planning and praying.

To begin with, the arithmetic of 1982 that smiles broadly upon Republicans and favors them at least to retain control of the Senate, goes topsy-turvy on them in 1984 and again in 1986.

This year, 19 Democratic and 13 Republican seats are up. In 1984, it turns around, with 19 GOP and 14 Democratic seats at stake. In 1986, an even bigger spread: 22 GOP-held seats will be up, only 12 Democratic seats.

As important as the numbers is the nature of many of the GOP incumbents going before voters in 1984-86. The majority of first-term right-wingers, who've been collecting in the Senate will have to face the voters. These were the beneficiaries of—and in most cases the creatures of—the richly financed ultra-conservative PACs that sprouted in the past six years.

There are 19 of these in the Senate. Four seek re-election this year (see story above). A fifth, Sen. S. I. Hayakawa (Calif.), is retiring from office.

Five more come up in 1984, and the huge right-wing Class of 1980 goes to the well again in 1986.

This grouping (the Gang of 19, if you want to get dramatic about it) has formed a solid rock of support for the Reagan economic program. Under its uncrowned leader, Jesse Helms (N.C.), it holds ideological control of the Senate.

Most of its members are—or have been often in the past—push-overs for right-wing PACs that need a senator's signature on a fund-raising letter to the faithful. Many of these letters use unions as a whipping-boy.

They are the core support for stiffening the Hobbs Act to include strikers; for weakening or repeal of the Davis-Bacon provisions that protect building and construction workers' wages and standards; for a national compulsory open shop law; for depriving public employees of union rights; for a so-called "management rights" measure that would nullify the protections of the Wagner Act.

To get a notion of how damaging this "Gang of 19" ultra-right senators has been—and can be—their aggregate AFL-CIO voting record is 72 "right" votes, 961 "wrong" votes—an over-all 93 percent "wrong" record. Following is the year each faces re-election and the official AFL-CIO voting record of each through 1981.

MEGA-BUCKS for Republicans, mini-bucks for Democrats (by comparison) revealed in figures recently released by Federal Election Commission. Covering period Jan. 1, 1981 through March 31, 1982, FEC report shows three GOP committees—national committee, senatorial and congressional campaign committees—raking in $120 mllion, while their three Democratic counterparts raised little more than one-tenth as much, $13 million. It won't translate out that way in every House and Senate election—but imagine the impact of a 10-1 money margin for one candidate over another. Scary!

JOBLESSNESS IN INDUSTRY and services has its equivalent among farmers and small business people. Dun and Bradstreet reports that business failures in first six months of this year exceeded total of entire year 1981. In all, 11,948 businesses went broke January through June. In rural America, today's economic figures could have been taken right out of the history of the Great Depression. Farm parity, at 91 percent 10 years ago, now at 58 percent, same as in 1932. Net farm income measured in 1967 dollars is projected at $11 billion for 1982. It was $12 billion (again in '67 dollars) in 1929. The number of farmers forced off the land is more than 1,000 per week for 1982, similar to the exodus of the 1930s. It's Reaganomics at work.

CHINATOWN GARMENT WORKERS in New York turned out more than 15,000 strong for a march and rally protesting attempts by employers to force workers to accept contracts inferior to the 1982 industry-wide agreement signed by the Ladies' Garment Workers and employer associations. Within hours after the march that had been called by ILGWU Local 23-25 in response to a two-day lockout by the employers, all Chinatown contractors had signed agreements with the union. (Story on Page 13.)

Union-Busting Fund Given Eligibility for U.S. Charity Drive

By David L. Perlman

Unions whose members give generously to the federal government's once-a-year charity drive are outraged at the inclusion of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund in this year's Combined Federal Campaign and will meet to shape labor's response.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed the Reagan Administration's designation of the anti-union organization as an eligible charity "unconscionable." It "mocks the humanitarian mission" of the federal campaign, he charged.

KIRKLAND INVITED leaders of 32 AFL-CIO and five unaffiliated unions representing a total of 1.3 million federal and postal workers to meet with him Aug. 2 in New York, prior to the AFL-CIO Executive Council session.

The Combined Federal Campaign raised nearly $100 million last year in payroll deductions and cash contributions from federal and postal employees and the military. National organizations seeking to qualify for locally conducted fund drives in federal agencies and installations must first be approved by the director of the President's Office of Personnel Management.

OPM Director Donald J. Devine, who is a former consultant to the right-to-work group's legal foundation, gave a warm public welcome to the National Right to Work Legal Fund and a group of other right-wing organizations accepted for federal fund raising at the same time.

GOVERNMENT employees will be encouraged to earmark their contributions to the charities of their choice, he said, and the widened participation in the solicitation of funds shows the "spirit of voluntarism" espoused by President Reagan "is alive and well."

The administration had clear warning that making a union-fighting group eligible to share in proceeds of a charity collection could endanger the government fund drive which includes community United Way agencies, national health organizations and international service groups.

AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis wrote to the chairman of the advisory board screening applications for participation in the Combined Federal Campaign of labor's strong objections to the Right to Work legal fund.

Davis expressed the AFL-CIO's concern that inclusion of such a "highly controversial and political group" would be detrimental to the goals of the campaign.

THE TWO employee representatives on the advisory panel—President Moe Biller of the Postal Workers and Erie Doyle of the unaffiliated National Alliance of Postal & Federal Employees——were outvoted by the four Administration management officials. Devine, who had the final say, issued a statement that he was "pleased to welcome into the Combined Federal Campaign such conservative organizations."

The newly eligible national organizations have until Aug. 9 to apply to par-

Child Labor Rules Seek Cheap 'Kiddy Workers'

By Susan Dunlop

The Reagan Administration's scheme to cut back child labor protections will create a pool of cheap "kiddy" labor for the benefit of the most notorious violators of fair labor standards and wipe out jobs for older workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told Congress.

The Labor Dept.'s proposals to relax longstanding age and work standards for 14- and 15-year-old children "marks a sad moment in our nation's history and a stain on the record of the agency that was created to protect workers, not exploit workers' children," Donahue told the House Labor Standards subcommittee.

THE PROPOSED revisions to Fair Labor Standards Act regulations, include provisions to let 14- and 15-year-olds work as late as 9 p.m. on school nights and to 10 p.m. on other nights, up from current curfews of 7 and 9 p.m., respectively. The number of hours these children would be allowed to work during school weeks would rise from 18 to 24, and the maximum hours in any one school day would go from three to four.

Young teenagers would also be permitted to take jobs in industries previously decreed too hazardous for them, including cooking and baking, laundry and dry cleaning and some processing operations.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan is also seeking authority to grant individual exemptions from the standards. And the department wants to drop the requirement that employers reapply annually for certification to pay full-time students subminimum wages.

IF DONOVAN succeeds in these efforts, Donahue asserted, the labor market will be flooded with young workers who "will not only displace their older brothers and sisters, but also their mothers and fathers."

Donahue pointed to June jobless figures showing 10.4 million Americans out of work, including 1.8 million in the 16- to 19-year-old category with the figures for black teenagers even worse.

Westinghouse Unions Score Breakthrough

Pittsburgh—Unions representing some 30,000 workers at the Westinghouse Electric Corp. reached tentative agreement on new three-year contracts just before a company-wide strike was to start.

The 11th-hour settlement, which in several respects closely tracks the unions' settlement earlier this summer with General Electric Co., came on July 25, a half hour before a midnight strike deadline.

THE ACCORD between Westinghouse and three unions—the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers—provides for wage increases, a new contributory pension plan, job-security improvements, and increased insurance benefits.

The three unions bargained as part of a 13-union Coordinated Bargaining Committee, which approved the settlement. IUE represents the largest number of Westinghouse employees, about 15,000

Real Earnings Decline 1.2% in June

By James M. Shevis

The purchasing power of American workers shrunk by 1.2 percent in June as consumer prices rose at a double-digit annual rate for the second month in a row, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The real, or inflation-adjusted, earnings of the typical nonfarm production worker averaged $167.44 a week in June, even though gross earnings were $266.57. The respective figures in May were $168.41 and $266.99.

BLS SAID that a one-tenth of 1 percent increase in average hourly earnings was offset by a three-tenths of 1 percent drop in the length of the average workweek and a full 1 percent rise in consumer prices. Real earnings, which declined two-tenths of 1 percent in May, last month were 2.1 percent below the year-earlier level.

Almost two-thirds of the June rise in the goverment's consumer price index was caused by higher prices for gasoline and house prices. Gasoline prices rose a seasonally adjusted 5.4 percent over the month while house prices increased an adjusted 2.3 percent.

The 1-percent June rise in the CPI compared with an increase of nine-tenths of 1 percent in May, and translates to a 13.3-percent compounded annual rate of inflation.

Rising homeownership costs accounted for about three-fourths of the 1-percent increase in the CPI's housing component last month, with prices for houses rising sharply. Some economists speculated that buyers are paying more for houses in exchange for more favorable financing terms, a view supported by a 1-percent decline in mortgage interest rates in June.

THE SPURT IN gasoline prices over the last two months was caused by the evaporation of the oil glut earlier in the year. Recent gasoline price reports indicate the July CPI will not be driven up by energy costs as in May and June. Several major oil refiners in recent weeks have cut slightly the price they charge gasoline dealers and middlemen who distribute the fuel.

New and used cars rose six-tenths of 1 percent and two-tenths of 1 percent, respectively, over the month. BLS said that

Move to Weaken Health Facility Rules Assailed

The AFL-CIO lodged a strong protest to Reagan Administration attempts to weaken inspection and certification standards that health care facilities must now meet to get Medicare and Medicaid funds.

Federation President Lane Kirkland called the proposals "inadequate, unworkable and unacceptable alternatives to public enforcement of health and safety standards" in a letter to Carolyne Davis, administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration.

THE MAIN changes sought by the Administration would reduce the frequency of inspections for long-term facilities such as nursing homes and eliminate the current requirement that state inspectors personally follow up investigations of facilities that have been found deficient.

The Administration wants to drop the clause that calls for automatic cancellation of a facility's right to participate in Medicare and Medicaid if deficiences are not corrected in a certain time.

The rule changes would also permit certification decisions to be based solely on evaluations by private agencies, such as the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Hospitals, and drop the requirement that state agencies conduct examinations.

IF THE CHANGES are adopted, Kirkland warned, "they would turn back the clock on years of progress we have made in reducing fraud and abuse of elderly and disabled patients."

Kirkland pointed out that the proposals could also "ruin the entire state compliance system" if they are piled on top of budget cuts local certification agencies have suffered, some as much as 40 percent.

Similar changes in the administration of the Occupational Safety & Health Act already have shown that weakening "system-wide" monitoring has not been effective in finding and reducing safety hazards, Kirkland said.

STATES SHOULD continue to closely monitor the quality of patient care in long-term facilities, Kirkland said, stressing that such an important function should not be delegated to private groups "that are not accountable to the public at large," and have little experience in monitoring long-term facilities.

Kirkland pointed to a nationwide study of nursing homes done by the AFL-CIO in the 1970s which found cases of gross negligence, inadequate staffing and serious health and safety violations.

Conditions have improved in some facilities, he said, but "if the proposed rules are adopted our most vulnerable citizens could again be victims of lax or unscrupulous nursing home operators."

HE POINTED out that the federation was joining with the Coalition for Nursing Home Reform in opposing the changes.

In expanded comments on the changes sent with Kirkland's letter, the AFL-CIO took issue with HCFA's statement that current regulations are "cumbersome and expensive to administer" and objected that the rule changes "are designed to achieve budgetary savings at the expense of program beneficiaries."

In a separate letter to Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said the federation objects to changes HHS wants to make in requirements hospitals must meet to be eligible for federal funds for construction projects.

CURRENT regulations obligate health care facilities that want money under the Hill-Burton Act to agree to provide certain amounts of free or low cost care to the medically indigent, Seidman noted.

The Administration's proposals, he said, would drop the rule requiring hospitals to carry over any "unmet obligations" to the next year. The requirement that hospitals must publicly post the availability of the services or provide individual written notice to potential beneficiaries would also be scuttled.

Seidman stressed that these proposed changes would result in less care delivered to people who need it and at a time when rising unemployment is taking away health care protection from many workers and their families.

"For the most part," Seidman said, "these workers have never been without health insurance and would not know of the availability of free care and their entitlement to it unless they are personally notified."

Unions Score Breakthrough For 30,000 at Westinghouse

nationwide. IBEW represents some 12,000 workers, UE another 3,700. The settlement is expected to set the pattern for an additional 9,000 workers represented by the other unions in the CBC.

Union officials, including IUE President David J. Fitzmaurice, termed the agreement "outstanding."

"DESPITE THE concession fever sweeping the country," Fitzmaurice said, "we have won a progressive contract, with solid gains for the people we represent and no concessions."

The unions credited the talks' success to the cooperation achieved through CBC cooperation. "None of us could have done this alone," said Fitzmaurice.

"The solidarity and cooperation of the different unions, in the face of heavy deadline pressures, was the key," he said.

IBEW President Charles H. Pillard said, "We are pleased that in today's economic environment the Westinghouse negotiations have resulted in a good, positive agreement without concessions. It lays to rest the difficult questions of pension plan funding and benefits which caused a strike three years ago."

Members of the three unions will begin voting on ratification of the pact with an Aug. 1 deadline for the IUE, Aug. 9 for the IBEW, and Aug. 26 for the UE.

IN WAGES and job security protection, the Westinghouse agreement generally matches last month's GE settlement. An initial wage hike of 7 percent retroactive to July 12 would be followed by 3-percent increases in the second and third years.

Cost-of-living increases are 1 cent an hour for each two-tenths of 1-percent rise in the consumer price index effective Jan. 10, 1983, and 1 cent an hour for each 0.175-percent increase in the CPI effective July 11, 1983, Jan. 9, 1984, July 9, 1984, and Jan. 7, 1985.

Over the life of the contracts, wage increases and cost-of-living adjustments are expected to boost average hourly earnings $2.10. In addition, special increments for hourly employees earning more than $8.35 will be applied immediately.

THE MAJOR stumbling block in the negotiations had been pensions. The unions struck Westinghouse for seven weeks in 1979 to keep a pension plan under which the company paid the entire bill for retirement benefits.

Under the new contracts, employees participating in the contributory plan would chip in 3 percent of their earnings above $14,700 a year. Basic monthly benefits would rise immediately to a range of $14 to $17.50 per year of service, and to $14 to $19.50 in 1984. The formula for benefits would be based on earnings for the final three years of employment.

On job security, the parties already had negotiated in the previous contracts some of the gains made at GE this year, such as advance notice of plant shutdowns, early retirement for those affected by plant closings, and additional severance pay in the event of a plant shutdown. The Westinghouse contracts now match the GE agreements in job security, and extend the protections to those workers adversely affected by product line relocations and job movement.

OTHER CONTRACT improvements increase catastrophic medical insurance from $350,000 to $500,000, add psychotherapist expenses to the list of covered medical expenses, increase benefits under prescription drug plans for retirees, and add to dental coverage.

Members of the Coordinated Bargaining Committee are the IUE, UE, IBEW, Flint Glass Workers, Plumbers & Pipefitters, Steelworkers, Machinists, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Carpenters, Auto Workers and the unaffiliated Teamsters.

Rate Hike Sought On Insurance for Pension Benefits

The Pension Benefit Guaranty Corp. has asked Congress to increase the annual premium for termination insurance on single-employer pension plans to $6 per participant.

The present rate is $2.60 a year, and the program is running a deficit that could rise substantially if the bankruptcy of Braniff Airways forces a termination of its pension plan.

Edwin Jones, the agency's executive director, said the higher premium amounts to only one-tenth of 1 percent of all employee benefits and less than 1 percent of pension costs. The agency insures some 90,000 single-employer plans, covering about 28 million participants.

At recent Senate hearings, Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan supported the agency's position and the increase in the premium rates. But he warned strongly against employer efforts to use the need for a rise in the insurance premium as a "bargaining chip" to cut back worker protections under the pension guaranty program.

Sheehan said an immediate rate increase is needed because of "the dire state of the economy," which has resulted in heavy drains on private pension plans.

The agency's last previous increase in premiums was in 1977. Its proposed rate increase would not affect multi-employer pension funds.

Newspaper Ads Fail Test As Tally of Job Openings

Cambridge, Mass.—Contrary to President Reagan's off-the-cuff pronouncements, the want ads are no way to tell how many jobs are available, according to an economist at Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Based on studies of the relationship between the unemployment rate and data on the known number of job vacancies since 1964, economist Katherine G. Abraham has concluded that there are only about one million jobs open today stacked up against well over 10 million Americans who are jobless and seeking work.

The ratio could range from seven workers available for every vacancy to as high as 15 workers for each slot, Abraham says.

She said the figures contradict "those who asserted that the number of vacant jobs was large relative to the number of persons seeking work."

Abraham pointed in her study to a March 1981 comment by Reagan on "many pages of want ads" suggesting that the unemployment problem "may reflect programs which encourage people to delay taking jobs rather than a scarcity of employment opportunities."

She also noted that the Conference Board Help Wanted Index, based on a monthly compilation from 51 newspapers, indicates that the number of classified ads is also dropping.

Hard-Rock Miners Win Bid To Regain Safety Coverage

Federal protections for hard-rock miners are back with the Mine Safety & Health Administration after a rider tacked to an appropriations measure ended seven months of confusion over enforcement jurisdiction.

The labor-backed amendment to the urgent supplemental appropriations bill cancelled an earlier rider and made it clear that inspection and enforcement of standards at sand, stone, gravel and other non-coal mines and at surface construction projects at mine sites is the job of MSHA —not the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

THE EARLIER measure, attached to the Dec. 1981 continuing resolution, had barred MSHA from using any of its funds to inspect the non-coal operations.

OSHA reluctantly stepped in since its authorizing law includes a general requirement to inspect any workplace in private industry not covered by other federal law.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor applauded the amendment, noting that MSHA regulations and enforcement are more thorough than most OSHA standards. He pointed out that surface mining is "one of the deadliest areas" of the industry with a high rate of fatalities.

THE MOVE is particularly welcome, Taylor said, since the number of inspections of surface mines had dropped to only 17 during the period OSHA had the jurisdiction from some 1,700 inspected annually under the mine safety jurisdiction.

Taylor pointed out that the crippling amendment passed in 1981 was part of an ongoing attempt pressed by the industry to completely shift surface mining jurisdiction to OSHA.

Steelworkers Legislative Director John Sheehan, whose union represents the largest number of hard rock mine workers, said that inspections dropped dramatically when MSHA was excluded from making its inspections because OSHA was unsure of its jurisdiction.

THE AGENCY, he said, did not have the standards, the expertise or the personnel to handle the surface mining job, and as a result only came on the scene to investigate after a fatality.

Sheehan praised Rep. William Natcher (D-Ky.) for leading the fight to get the clarifying amendment through the legislative process despite strong opposition.

Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers President Thomas F. Miechur said he was pleased "that Congress at least momentarily has stopped the yo-yo effect" and made it clear that his union's members in the industry had all the protections under the stronger act.

Two previous versions of the MSHA-OSHA provision had failed when President Reagan twice vetoed urgent supplemental resolutions needed to provide funds to keep the government operating. Finally, Reagan signed a third bill and MSHA's authority was restored.

'You Are Not Alone'

Rally by Senior Citizens Stresses Link with Labor

Detroit—Thousands of older Americans, many of them retired union members, demonstrated against Reaganomics at a Kennedy Square rally here that highlighted the 16th convention of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

The rally was organized with the help of the Auto Workers Retired Workers Dept., and the strong link between the goals of the trade union movement and the NCSC was a central theme.

"YOU ARE NOT alone," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the 5,000 protesters in words that recalled last year's massive Solidarity Day march in Washington, D.C.

"Our unions care as much about their members who are retired or unemployed as they do about their working members," he stressed. "Our goal is to make life more secure and more rewarding for all, at every stage of the human journey."

Kirkland spoke of America's debt to the "Depression generation" that elected a Franklin D. Roosevelt and Congresses that established social security, the minimum wage, the National Labor Relations Board and "all the rest of the machinery that was put in place to protect ordinary people from the power of concentrated wealth and ensure that no future generation would suffer the same ordeal."

AND HE SPOKE of the threat to these achievements posed by the Reagan Administration, urging:

"As we marched last September on Solidarity Day to protest the Reagan program, let us march again on Election Day to change that program—and to restore human concerns to the councils of government."

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, who spoke at both the rally and the convention banquet, asked for, and enthusiastically got, the support of the seniors for the auto content law the UAW is seeking to require that vehicles sold in large quantities in the United States be primarily built in this country with U.S. parts.

"We are all hurt by unemployment," Fraser stressed. "Both the workers who suffer the loss of wages and the retirees whose social security benefits are threatened when payroll tax receipts drop and the trust funds get dangerously low."

IN CONVENTION action, delegates took a strong stand against the proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. They termed the drive for its enactment "a clearcut attempt to tamper with the Constitution for purposes of political gain."

Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz, whose union represents many of the staffs of hospitals, nursing homes and clinics, expressed concern at the retrenchment in medical and health services.

The "dramatic improvements" in health care delivery of the past 20 years are threatened by cutbacks, he warned.

NCSC PRESIDENT Jacob Clayman, who was re-elected to a new two-year term, said the "human heart" of government has been replaced by an Administration that shows "a hard frozen face to the elderly, to the poor, to the sick, to the workers, to the unions . . . indeed, to everybody but the rich."

Evelyn Dubrow, vice president and legislative director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, received a special award from the NCSC as "an effective and eloquent spokesperson on our side." Also honored at the convention were Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) and Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.)

TWO SENIOR citizen champions in Congress were among the speakers at the Kennedy Square rally, Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.) and Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio).

Pepper, chairman of the House Committee on Aging, recalled that Franklin Roosevelt "gave the people food and help" when he came into office. But "the first thing Reagan did was give his rich cronies $750 billion in tax reductions over the next five years."

And NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton said the rise in Medicare deductibles and premium costs means that many elderly people "just won't be able to afford to visit a doctor."

AT THE RALLY, many of the elderly participants carried placards challenging the Administration's cutbacks in social progress and services.

Six soup kitchens were set up at the rally site, and "Depression-era bean soup" was served by members of the UAW Retired Workers Dept.

In addition to convention delegates and local retirees, some 60 busloads of seniors came in chartered buses from other locations in the Midwest.

SENIOR CITIZENS protesting the Reagan Administration's attacks on social security, Medicare, Medicaid and other vital programs rallied in Detroit's Kennedy Square. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the demonstrators that unions are deeply concerned about retired and unemployed workers. The demonstration was organized by the National Council of Senior Citizens during its convention in Detroit and the Auto Workers Retired Workers Dept.

Two Affiliates Merge to Form Aluminum, Brick, Glass Union

Jacksonville, Fla.—A merger agreement creating the 70,000-member Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers International Union was ratified here by convention delegates representing two AFL-CIO affiliated international unions.

Meanwhile, the Pottery Workers were holding a special convention in Hollywood, Fla. to consider merging the 11,000-member union with the 80,000-member Glass Bottle Blowers.

The new union is a consolidation of the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers and the Glass & Ceramic Workers. The ABC was formed in September 1981 by the merger of the Aluminum Workers and the Brick & Clay Workers.

THE MERGER was overwhelmingly approved in a referendum vote of the UGCW membership in late June and by the unanimous vote of delegates to an ABC special convention July 27. The consolidation is effective Sept. 1.

Under the agreement, former ABC President Lawrence A. Holley and Sec.-Treas. H. Max Webster will be the principal officers of the merged union. Former UGCW President Joseph Roman will be the executive assistant to the president and former UGCW Sec.-Treas. Joseph Stanzione will be assistant secretary-treasurer. Roman and Stanzione, along with former UGCW executive vice president Wayne Yarman, also were appointed vice presidents of the newly formed organization and seven other vice presidents were elected by the UGCW delegation.

The executive board of the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers will consist of 31 members, and will remain at that number until the 1985 convention, when it will revert back to 17 members.

IN ADDRESSES to the merger convention, Holley and Roman pledged the support of all local unions and expressed their aims to provide better membership service and more participation in the labor movement. They also reaffirmed the dedication of their staff to organize the unorganized.

"This merger and the previous merger of the Brick & Clay Workers with the Aluminum Workers will allow us to reestablish programs that are vital to the membership of the three former organizations," President Holley said. "We will immediately start working on these programs."

The Aluminum Brick & Glass Workers will be headquartered in Bridgeton, Mo., near St. Louis. The union is planning a constitutional convention for next summer.

Telegraph Workers Win 31% Wage Hike

Denver—Negotiators for Western Union employees represented by the Telegraph Workers hammered out a tentative, contract which would increase wages and benefits of some 9,000 members by 31 percent over the next three years.

The settlement came 90 minutes after the UTW called a strike against Western Union, the principal subsidiary of Western Union Corp. The walkout gained workers an extra 1 percent pay hike, UTW reported.

Telegraphers President Richard C. Brockert, the union's chief negotiator, termed the agreement "a very good contract, and we're recommending that members ratify it."

Results of a mail ballot are expected to be known within 30 days, he said.

Twenty-two percent of the package is earmarked for across-the-board wage increases, 8 percent the first year, 7 percent the second, and 7.1 percent in the final year.

Gerald Kent, the company's chief negotiator, called the agreement "equitable and reasonable." The company's profits totaled $69.6 million in 1981, its best year ever.

AGREEMENT HAD not yet been reached with the Communications Workers, which represents 900 Western Union employees in the New York City area. Their contract was scheduled to expire at midnight July 27 as did the UTW's. The CWA contract was extended for 24 hours, however, while the two sides continued to negotiate.

The UTW agreement covers technical workers, repairmen and operators of video display terminals.

The package provides a variety of fringe benefit improvements, including a 30-percent increase in benefits payable under the company's pension plan. A $20,000-a-year employee with 30 years' service would receive benefits equal to 1.3 percent of his or her highest five years of earnings, rather than 1 percent under the old contract.

The new agreement, which both sides agree will cost the company $59 million over the life of the pact, also provides higher rates for some job classifications, health coverage improvements including a new optical plan, an increase in major medical insurance from $150,000 to $200,000, and improvements in company-paid life insurance.

Unions Study Use of New Technology

Organized labor's ability to use the new communications technology to compete against the heavily financed business interests to get its message across was the theme of a panel at the World Future Society's annual assembly in Washington.

Communications specialists from four AFL-CIO affiliates took part in a panel discussion on "Labor Telecommunications and the Future." They emphasized that the greatest challenge of the Eighties will be to convey to the public the fact that human services goals cannot be achieved without the involvement of labor, since labor has the capacity to mobilize the greatest number of people in the political sector.

Panelists include David Mitchell, public relations director of the Auto Workers; Russell Gibbons, Steelworkers public relations director; Jerry Rollings, assistant director of communications for the Machinists, and Phil Sparks, public relations director of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

Drexel University Prof. Arthur Shostak chaired the panel. Prof. Greg Giebel of the University of the District of Columbia's industrial management faculty and Tom O'Brien, a specialist at the Labor Dept., summed up the panel's discussion.

Panelists reviewed telecommunications projects under way among the unions they represent, including the media attitude survey conducted recently by the Machinists, plans by the Steelworkers and AFSCME to use satellite broadcasts, and projected low-power television station networking by the Auto Workers.

Cruise Ships Boost U.S.-Flag Service

Honolulu, Ha.—Two U.S.-flag cruise ships now in service here with union crews trained by the Seafarers signal a much needed "renaissance" in the U.S. passenger fleet SIU President Frank Drozak said.

The ships—the 800-passenger Constitution, reflagged in June, and the 750-passenger Independence, in U.S.-flag service since 1980—make weekly trips around Hawaii for American Hawaii Cruises of San Francisco. The Independence will also make two mainland-to-Hawaii cruises this summer.

Drozak said the ships' crews were trained at the Harry Lundeberg School in Piney Point, Md., where the union offers both basic and advanced seamanship courses.

The two ships, the only U.S. flag passenger vessels now in service, provide more than 650 jobs for SIU members as well as increased federal and state revenues and substantial shoreside employment, he stressed. Members of the Marine Engineers also man the ships.

PENSION INVESTMENTS that help create jobs are the prime topic at a series of conferences for union and management pension fund trustees sponsored by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. In addressing the first of the conferences in Chicago, BCTD President Robert A. Georgine stressed that most financial institutions manage funds for profit rather than in the interests of workers or a more productive economy.

Building Trades Conference Presses Pension Fund Goals

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. opened a series of pension investment conferences here for labor and management pension fund trustees focusing on job-creating investments. Additional sessions will be held in Great Gorge, N.J., Sept. 2 and 3, Portland, Ore. Sept. 30 and Oct. 1 and Lake Buena Vista, Fla. Nov. 18 and 19.

The BCTD goal is to place more than $500 million of union pension money in job-creating construction industry ventures.

PRESIDENT Robert A. Georgine told representatives of 75 union pension funds that "pension capital must be invested where it does the most good for those who generate this income and who have a right to its benefit — the American worker."

Georgine charged that most banks and other financial institutions are managing union pension funds to make profits and not for the interest of workers or a more productive economy. He added:

"They invest the vast majority of our members' deferred wages in corporations whose management is anti-union."

"THEY INVEST billions of pension dollars in Europe, Japan, the Middle East and the Third World—not in America."

Georgine pointed out that the BCTD only endorses pension fund investments which are financially sound and secure and only those investments which can be expected to produce a reasonable rate of return.

AFL-CIO Associate Research Director Henry Schechter discussed the federation's new housing investment trust, noting that its goal is to match union pension funds seeking solid investments with developers looking for long-term financing.

Schechter explained that the federation's Mortgage Investment Trust was developed in 1964 to spark construction loans which are repaid on completion of the project. The new housing investment trust is for long-term loans, which are harder for developers to secure. These loans are paid off in 25 or 30 years.

ALL INVESTMENTS in the AFL-CIO program will be FHA-insured. The loans will be for apartment buildings, single family homes and nursing homes. All must be 100 percent union built.

Gerald M. Fader, BCTD legal counsel, urged pension fund trustees to consult their attorneys and investment advisers before drafting any new pension investment program to insure compliance with federal laws guarding workers' pension rights. He praised the $12 million mortgage investment program of the Chicago District Council of Carpenters as an example of a home-grown plan that helps to create jobs.

Other sponsors presenting pension investment programs at the exposition included banks, insurance firms, investor groups and the Federal National Mortgage Association (FNMA).

Two Unions Sign Disputes Accord

The Laborers and the Bricklayers have signed an agreement with the Mason Contractors Association of America that will help resolve local disputes and reduce the need for work stoppages.

The disputes settlement plan was signed by Laborers President Angelo Fosco, Bricklayers President John T. Joyce and George A. Miller, executive vice president of MCAA.

The three-step program includes joint monitoring by the national organizations of local bargaining agreements, a structured mediation and conciliation system aided by the unions and the association and an agreement by the national parties to use final, binding arbitration procedures in a limited number of cases when the disputes cannot be resolved by other means. An impartial umpire may also be used in some instances.

The plan is an expansion of an agreement already in use between the Bricklayers and the MCAA since February. It was developed with the help of former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop as part of the Labor/Management Relations program of the International Masonry Institute.

Recovery Hopes Linked to Drop In Interest Rates

Lower interest rates are needed to fuel America's economic recovery, the AFL-CIO told a task force of the Senate's Democratic Policy Committee.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, stressed the link between the high interest rates that have marked the Reagan Administration and the surge in unemployment and business bankruptcies.

HE REITERATED the AFL-CIO's call for renewal of federal credit control authority that expired at the end of June. A House Banking subcommittee has approved a bill to revive the President's standby authority to invoke credit controls and Schechter urged Senate Democrats to support the effort. Interest and mortgage rates dropped when credit controls were invoked during a three-month period in 1970, Schechter noted.

One of the byproducts of high interest rates, Schechter noted, has been to widen the gap between those in the top income brackets and the large majority of Americans who spend most of what they make and are often in debt. Thus, interest payments have helped increase the share of total income received by the wealthiest 20 percent of Americans, he stressed.

Senate Votes Stiff Curb on Racketeering

The Senate passed by voice vote a bill supported by the AFL-CIO that toughens criminal penalties for union officials who take employer payoffs and for employers who bribe them.

It also requires immediate removal from office of union and pension fund officials convicted of serious crimes, even if appeals from the conviction are still pending. If a conviction should be overturned on appeal, the official would be reinstated with full back pay.

THE BILL, which now goes to the House, also provides for a 10-year period of disbarment from union or pension office, up from the present five years. However, with mitigating circumstances, a judge could reduce the disqualification to five years.

Other tightening of existing law includes closing of a possible loophole under which a person disbarred from office might continue to exercise control in some lesser office or as a "consultant." And the legislation gives the Labor Dept. a strengthened mandate to investigate misconduct.

At Senate hearings last October, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said such legislation would be both good for the nation and in the "best interests" of the trade union movement.

RACKETEERS who prey on unions "are our natural enemies," Kirkland testified. The entire trade union movement is tarnished, he said, by a union officer who "takes an employer payoff for a substandard contract" or "pilfers from the union treasury."

Such penalties as disqualification from union office for abuse of trust have no counterpart in the business world and could be considered as one-sided against labor, Kirkland noted in his testimony. But the labor movement "can only be strengthened" by getting rid of crooks, he said. And "the morals of the marketplace will not suffice for the trade union movement."

The AFL-CIO worked with bipartisan sponsors of the legislation and their staffs to help shape a bill that would focus clearly on wrongdoing and would not become a vehicle for harassment of unions and pension trustees.

Tariff Cut Authority Threat to Jobs

The AFL-CIO asked Congress not to give the Administration a new blank check to negotiate tariff cuts that could throw additional Americans out of work.

The President's authority to reduce tariffs without seeking the approval of Congress expired last January and the Administration is seeking a two-year revival.

Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan told a Senate Finance subcommittee that the Administration has not made a convincing case for renewal of tariff-cutting authority under the expired Section 124 of the Trade Act.

SOME 1,500 products are on the Administration's agenda for potential tariff reductions, and Koplan urged that Congress study the potential impact on employment in U.S. industries now making these products before taking any action on the legislation.

Employment in every manufacturing industry is down, Koplan stressed. "American industries are suffering from the combined impact of recession and high imports. Renewal of this authority will only aggravate the serious erosion of the nation's industrial base," he warned.

Koplan noted the impact of a reduction in the U.S. tariff on semiconductors that had been negotiated with Japan in an effort to expand the U.S. market in that country. But the extension of the tariff cut to the European Economic Community has led to new inroads in the U.S. market, even though U.S. exports are stifled by a 17 percent European tariff that remains in place.

"What American workers are experiencing in the U.S. semiconductor industry is typical of what other U.S. industries will have in store for them if this legislation is passed," Koplan testified.

Especially in line with that experience, Koplan said, the AFL-CIO also opposes a section of another bill that has been considered by the subcommittee, to grant the President for five years authority to reduce or eliminate U.S. tariffs on seven high technology items relating to computers and semiconductors.

Such a move, Koplan warned, would encourage U.S. companies to move abroad and "the result will be the U.S. export of highly skilled jobs."

KOPLAN ALSO testified before a House Ways & Means subcommittee on a "reciprocity" bill similar to the measure approved by the Senate Finance Committee in mid-June.

Despite good intentions, Koplan said, the legislation amounts to mere "window-dressing" since the President has adequate powers under existing laws to act against nations that impose non-tariff barriers to American products.

He said the AFL-CIO concurs with a minority report on the Senate Finance Committee bill that warned that additional and unneeded authority to negotiate on "reciprocity" could result in giving away more in job-destroying reciprocal concessions than would have been the case without the legislation.

U.S. TRADE policy continues to encourage the erosion of American industries and jobs, Koplan said. "Enforcement of existing law and change in trade policy are long overdue," he said.

Instead of dealing with unneeded legislation, Koplan urged, Congress should press forward with domestic content legislation "to take automobiles and related parts off the list of endangered U.S. industries."

Such a law, he stressed, would strengthen the entire U.S. economy.

Credit Charge Rollback Petitioned to State Ballot

Seattle—A successful petition drive by the Washington State AFL-CIO will give the public a chance to vote in November on a measure to roll back consumer credit rates in the state.

The campaign for Initiative 412 garnered 180,000 petitions—50,000 more signatures than were needed—State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams reported.

If it passes, the measure would reduce the interest rate allowable on all forms of retail credit, including bank and store charge cards and installment contracts, to 12 percent or one percent above the federal discount rate, whichever is higher. Current rates range from 17 percent to over 20 percent.

The high rates are the result of action by the Republican-controlled state legislature last year overturning a 1968 initiative, also sponsored by the State AFL-CIO, that had put a 12-percent cap on retail interest rates.

1982 REGIONAL CONFERENCES

The 1982 AFL-CIO regional conferences were held in the same seven AFL-CIO regions as in 1981 and in the same time frame of mid-March to late May. Each conference used parts of three days and they were held in Dearborn, Mich., Louisville, Ky., Phoenix, Seattle, Birmingham, Ala., Houston and Hartford, Conn.

For the two AFL-CIO officers, President Lane Kirkland and Secretary-Treasurer Thomas R. Donahue, the workshops were an extension of the previous year—a chance to improve union activities through more effective, two-way communication.

As in 1981, the script for the officers' workshops was, "Hello, what's on your mind?" followed by an hour of questions on whatever topics the participants chose.

In most other aspects, the 1982 conferences were totally different from the previous year.

The 1982 conferences focused mainly on political action, with the work of the Committee on Political Education occupying more than half the workshops, affording the chance to go into detail on planning, budget, data processing, marginal districts, telephone banks, relationships with the political parties, candidate screening and the work of the support groups.

The other presentations were made by the AFL-CIO Departments of Legislation, Education, Economic Research, Information and Organization & Field Services. The conferences closed on the third morning with a political rally attended by labor's natural allies from the women's, seniors, minority, consumer, and youth groups as well as the support organizations made up of trade unionists among those same groups.

The rallies included such labor friends as Senators Donald Riegle of Michigan, Paul Sarbanes of Maryland, Spark Matsunaga of Hawaii and Henry M. Jackson of Washington.

At some conferences, Kirkland and Donahue were joined in spreading the message of solidarity by Executive Council members John DeConcini of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Robert F. Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers. Numerous legislative or COPE directors from international unions also attended.

In Louisville, Phoenix and Hartford, Kirkland carried the solidarity message of "you are not alone" to union members on picket lines.

From Louisville, he visited the picket line of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers at nearby Kosmos Cement, the site of a new AFL-CIO boycott.

In Phoenix, it was a Laborers' line, mostly women, at the Carter-Glogau Laboratories and at Hartford it was a strike at Triangle Wire & Plastic by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, whose bargaining committee reached agreement, and the strike ended, later the same day. In Seattle, Kirkland issued a statement on behalf of the OCAW organizing drive among security officers at the Satsop and Hanford nuclear sites, where a representation election was later won among 220 workers.

But those workers still didn't have a contract by mid-1982, and the lines were still up at Kosmos and Carter-Glogau, emphasizing the need for perseverance as well as solidarity in the quest for workers' rights.

Perseverance was also the topic in Houston, where Kirkland and Donahue spent an entire day touring major locations of the Houston Organizing Project, encouraging in-plant committee members and organizers and stressing the importance of the Houston coordinated project as a harbinger of the future for all of the U.S. labor movement.

"From this solid foundation," Kirkland told an organizing rally of 1,000 trade unionists in Houston, "we mean to build a force even more vigorous, united and dedicated. We are here, now, in good strength for the long haul."

"It will be the unions that will protect their members when the economic wheel turns again and prosperity returns; when the callbacks replace layoffs; when the so-called givebacks are turned into new gains for workers. That is the special message for the unorganized, for it is they who are the most severely and cruelly hurt by this recession."

After that speech, Kirkland spent the afternoon touring the 63rd floor of an all-union construction site in downtown Houston and visiting a Steelworkers organizing site. Donahue spent the afternoon with a variety of health and school workers in another segment of the Houston Organizing Project.

They, and other audiences in the other regional conferences, were given the same message from Kirkland:

"To the brothers and sisters who are building this bigger, stronger trade union community, we bring the historic message of solidarity from the rest of the trade union family."

Material in this section is taken from a report to the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the 1982 Regional Conferences.

Officers' Workshops

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Secretary-Treasurer Thomas Donahue attended all seven of the 1982 regional conferences. Each participant was given the opportunity to attend a workshop conducted by one of the federation's two top officers.

While the other conference workshops sharpened skills in political activity, grass roots lobbying, communications, and economic policies, the two officers used their session to listen to the views and respond to the questions of the delegates. The officers' workshops were similar to those conducted during the 1981 conferences—with the emphasis on a give-and-take of ideas.

Once again, both officers found the workshops extremely beneficial. Participants demonstrated that they are proud of their unions, concerned about their members and their communities, and more than willing to suggest new ways to strengthen the labor movement—with no hint that labor leadership at any level is "out of touch" with the members.

The local leadership represented at the conferences had little or no criticism of positions taken by the AFL-CIO or its affiliated national and international unions. This local leadership seeks better ways to implement policies, not ways to reverse these policies. The major concerns, voiced repeatedly, were to develop programs that would strengthen labor by improving communications with the rank and file, building internal unity, and organizing the organized as well as the unorganized. Conference participants used the officers' workshops to discuss these issues and offer constructive suggestions for consideration by the officers and the Executive Council.

Kirkland and Donahue opened workshops with brief descriptions of the steps taken by the federation to implement ideas proposed during the 1981 regional conferences. Delegates were reminded that early plans for Solidarity Day came from the enthusiastic response at the 1981 regional conferences.

Other new programs now under way following ideas expressed at the earlier conferences include: the Labor Institute of Public Affairs, the grass roots legislative action committees, the formation of new coalitions with non-labor allies, increased emphasis on coordinated organizing, assisting support groups through per capita payments, an action taken by the 1981 convention, and increased efforts to encourage affiliation with state and local central bodies.

As at the previous conferences, the officers' workshops covered a wide range of issues. With all sections of the country suffering from Reaganomics, repeated discussion was focused on the need to turn the political climate around, restore full employment, defend domestic programs and lower interest rates. Most of the delegate proposals were directed toward helping the labor movement lead the way in solving these problems.

In a majority of the workshops, there was a strong call for the increased participation of rank-and-file members in new Solidarity Day demonstrations, state and local mass rallies and Labor Day activities. Many of the participants expressed the opinion that the membership was growing more militant and looked to leadership for methods to voice their views. Recognizing that massive rallies require careful planning to be successful, suggestions were made to train staff in advance preparation techniques for such demonstrations.

Delegates strongly supported the labor movement's efforts to build better political unity at the federal, state and community levels. While actions taken by union leadership to achieve this goal were applauded, the need to give rank-and-file members a feeling of participation was stressed. Attitude surveys, year-round telephone bank questioning and other polling methods were suggested.

Such activities were seen as helping to increase "get out the vote" efforts among union members and their families as well as developing grass roots programs to improve political accountability for those elected to public office. At the Seattle conference, delegates from the Missoula, Mont., central labor body described their successful project which combines letter writing to the state legislature with an amplified phone conversation with union representatives and elected officials during legislative sessions. Another suggestion called for the AFL-CIO and its affiliates to train potential candidates and provide them with material explaining labor's viewpoint.

As in 1981, many comments and questions stressed the need to strengthen state and local central bodies. While it is recognized that mandatory affiliation requirements are unworkable, there was a continued call for increased efforts by the federation, its staff and its affiliates. There also was renewed interest in exploring methods that would lead to financing state and local activities through a national per capita tax, using some variant of the system adopted for support groups. Also suggested was development of an AFL-CIO leaflet explaining the benefits of state and local affiliation.

One problem raised in a number of the sessions involved the occasional endorsement of candidates by local trade and industrial department councils that conflict with endorsements by AFL-CIO state and local central bodies.

Numerous delegates recognized that increased service by the state and local central bodies, themselves, plays a major role in obtaining affiliations. To help in these efforts, requests were made for training programs to assist central labor body officers who are either volunteers or part-time workers. A similar suggestion called for training in the use of the media for local leaders.

Other proposals included: holding meetings for central labor body leaders, bringing together CLC and state federation delegates at AFL-CIO conventions, using retired union members to assist central labor bodies, and examining the possibility of a "matching grant" pilot project for central bodies that are willing to fund increased service programs.

The importance of AFL-CIO officers attending state federation conventions was discussed. Recognizing the scheduling problems involved, proposals were made to schedule conventions in neighboring states during the same time span and to consider the use of videotapes as well as two-way telephone hook-ups.

Increased educational programs for union members received considerable attention. Among the suggestions: material for the children of members striving to elect union members to school boards to improve curricula and text books; making sure the new AFL-CIO television programs appeal to youth and younger union members; using labor music on radio, especially during daytime when many members listen to their radios on the jobs; enlisting such trade union celebrities as athletes and actors to carry labor's message; and placing subtitles on current labor films for use in Hispanic communities.

There also was an expressed need to develop better relations with like-minded community groups. Requests were made for material explaining how to form coalitions and how to make such coalitions work effectively. Other delegates called for increased assistance and guidance in learning how to better involve their members in their hometown communities.

The officers' workshops produced a wide range of other questions and discussions. These issues included: foreign policy ranging from Poland to El Salvador and South Africa; problems involving international trade; the possibility of organizing the unemployed; potential mergers of affiliated unions; the chances for affiliation with the AFL-CIO of currently unaffiliated unions; and information on tentative plans to secure early united labor involvement in the presidential primaries.

Finally, while the delegates applauded the issuing of the 1981 conference report to the Executive Council and action on many of the conference recommendations, they urged that the 1982 conference report also be given wide distribution. This proposal will be carried out through publishing a summary of the conference report in the AFL-CIO News.

COPE

Political action was the major focus throughout the 1982 regional meetings, looking to the 1982 elections as Solidarity Day II with the slogan "Let's Turn It Around."

The first day—in meetings with leadership — workshop sessions were devoted to the political situation in the various states and work with support groups during the coming elections. Smaller, limited sessions with state federation officers and COPE directors reviewed budgets and plans in specific terms.

The larger meeting, starting the second day, featured a variety of optional workshops on four aspects of political action:

- Labor and political party relationships.
- Telephone banks.
- Candidate screening and interviewing.
- Marginal congressional district campaigns.

A special, assigned workshop dealt with reporting and accounting required of unions by the Federal Election Commission. More intricate legal problems in this area were referred to an end-of-the-day legal workshop conducted by AFL-CIO counsel Larry Gold.

Similarly, those responsible for the technical aspects of computer file maintenance were also offered a further, more specialized workshop by AFL-CIO data processing director Richard Drennan. In the three first-day sessions, the two specialized workshops and the four major second-day discussions, COPE activities occupied nine of the conference total of 17 workshop topics.

POLITICAL SITUATION MEETINGS

Like other workshops on the first day, participants attended the political situation sessions with the delegation from their state. Each state federation president was asked to report on the impact of redistricting and the outlook in each federal and state-wide race. Lastly, a reading was requested on the impact of Reagan Administration policies on our members' lives and attitudes.

As the state federation president reported on each congressional or state contest, COPE Director John Perkins asked others to comment—to evaluate from the standpoint of their union or region about the election in question.

Delegates showed a sense of optimism—especially when contrasted with the 1981 regional conferences, which came in the wake of 1980 election results—about labor's chances of electing pro-labor candidates or protecting those who only a few months earlier had been in real trouble. Delegates tended to agree on which districts in their state offered the best chances for victory by COPE-endorsed candidates.

But in some states there were serious differences, and there the workshop contribution was to alert each side as well as national COPE to these differences.

The emphasis of these political situation meetings was for national COPE to listen especially to the state and local leadership appraise the political situation. Their analysis was in turn carried back to the COPE Operating Committee members on the Marginal House and Senate Committees. Many of these same COPE directors of international unions—the members of the operating committee—came to one or more regional conferences to hear first hand.

SUPPORT GROUPS AND ELECTIONS

The support group workshops took the general political analysis one step further: exploring the resources and programs that various support groups might bring to specific congressional political contests in which labor is involved, particularly marginal Senate and House races.

The support groups are units established with the assistance of, and primarily funded by, the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions. They work in labor's non-partisan registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns among their respective constituencies, and they rely on volunteers from within the union movement and their own ranks to conduct their programs. Support group membership is made up totally of trade unionists.

At the regional meetings, plans were formulated for maximum emphasis on support group activities in swing districts where their constiuencies represent a significant portion of the electorate. For the first time, representatives of the Coalition of Labor Union Women (CLUW) were invited to the COPE workshops and participated in the sessions.

The other support groups are:

- The A. Philip Randolph Institute, which conducts its non-partisan registration and get-out-the-vote programs within the black community.
- The Labor Council for Latin-American Advancement, which works in districts with large concentrations of Hispanic-Americans.
- Concerned Seniors for Better Government, which provides large numbers of volunteers from among union retirees for the COPE program at the community level and seeks to organize retirees into an effective political force.
- Frontlash, which recruits young volunteers to work with the COPE program and which strives particularly to involve young people in the election process.

BUDGET AND PLANNING

The smaller meetings with state federation officials reviewed planned COPE activities and budget. Because of considerable preliminary work prior to the regional meetings, most plans and corresponding budget amounts were in good order. Also work was done toward getting financial accountings from the local central bodies as well as the state AFL-CIOs.

Mailing list maintenance activities were reviewed and agreement reached on using data supplied by affiliated unions. COPE urged that future mailings to members be varied to reflect different occupational groups, and technique be developed for separate mailings to at least seven different broad employment categories, such as construction, public employees, and others. The aim was to make COPE mailings attract more attention via topics the recipient would more readily recognize and respond to.

As part of the work in computerizing targeted data, state federation officials were asked to help obtain precinct voter returns, information more readily available and necessary because of the new lines drawn for congressional districts after the 1980 census.

RELATIONS WITH POLITICAL PARTIES

The emphasis of this report was on developments during the past year as labor became more involved nationally with the political party process. Most of the session was devoted to the relationship between the labor movement and the parties on the state, county and even precinct level.

This topic surfaced repeatedly at the previous year's regional conferences, when Kirkland said that every trade unionist should participate fully in the democratic process in this country, and "fully" must include the affairs of the two national parties because of their impact on the process.

The 1982 delegates had numerous complaints about the political parties, particularly the Democrats: "They want our work but don't want to give us a say. . . . The party has collapsed in our area—there is no party. . . . They run as Democrats but once elected, they pay no attention to the party. . . . We are shut out of the party."

But pursuit of the discussion revealed considerable change since 1980. Labor was more involved, in almost every case, then two years ago. More labor representatives had been attending state and caucus meetings, had increased representation on state and county central committees, and had the feeling Democratic Party leaders were at least beginning to listen. In a few situations, the lack of party structure resulted in labor carrying much or nearly all the burden of seeing that the party functioned. Clearly the solid, neighborhood party organizations that once dominated politics have largely disappeared. In some cases the only organization around was the labor movement.

However, there's a residue of the not so distant past when labor people felt they were ignored or pushed out of the party.

TELEPHONE BANKS

The telephone is one of the most versatile tools in labor's political programs. Telephone banks are relied upon heavily for registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns, for recruiting volunteers, canvassing union members and polling member attitudes on issues and candidates.

The phone banks are staffed by volunteers—men and women of the labor movement who contribute their time and effort to the COPE program. In an election year, more than 10 million calls nationally are placed from phone banks to union members.

The procedures for establishing a successful phone bank were thoroughly outlined, dealing with the variety of technical and human problems involved and how the role of the phone bank changes at different stages of the campaign. New written materials on phone banks were part of the program.

Here the emphasis was on doing the necessary homework well before the screening.

That includes research on the district, its history, the issues, background of the candidate and responses to the candidate questionnaire. Moreover, the interview was seen not only as a chance to get the candidate's views on issues but as an opportunity to educate the candidate on labor concerns not well known, especially to the non-incumbents.

Interviewing of incumbents requires the added dimensions of potential quibbling over a "right" vote on the final passage of a bill after a "wrong" vote on a crippling amendment. How an interview committee can arm itself with the necessary legislative know-how was one of the topics of the workshop.

MARGINAL DISTRICT CAMPAIGNS

Participants from marginal congressional districts and marginal Senate states were identified at registration time and given an overview of their district and how it fits into labor's overall marginal district and state campaigns—with an eye to participants who might want to get involved in anything from recruiting volunteers to polling and direct mail.

Concepts about polling and targeting were introduced, giving participants some "feel" for the total planning and process and how the pace of such activities is quickened in a district identified as marginal. Major emphasis was placed on how computerized membership files can be used in each facet of the campaign.

It is in the marginal House districts and states where most of the "swing" occurs in strength of party representation in the House or Senate. These are districts or states where, for various reasons, the outcome can be discerned as a toss-up or near toss-up.

COPE attempts to identify such situations as early as possible in the campaign year so that extra effort can be put into them—in registration and education—well before the campaign peaks in intensity.

This year, there are 80 to 100 marginal House contests and 12 to 15 marginal Senate races on a list that changes regularly with the ebb and flow of the various candidacies and campaigns.

SPECIALIZED SESSIONS

Data Processing

The data processing session was usually devoted to detailed discussion of specific problems raised by the delegates. The questions ranged from basic usage to high computer technology.

In dealing with usage, delegates were mostly concerned about the cooperation of international unions in submitting accurate and timely information for the COPE files. On the technical matters, many union organizations expressed interest in new computer technology, especially micro-computer systems.

Also discussed at all seven conferences was the assistance offered by the federation's Department of Information Systems & Data Processing in automation consulting, sharing of software and actual processing of data, as well as the variety of computer classes offered at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The sessions usually resulted in lively participation and communication of needed information. In fact, some delegates expressed appreciation because of a previous feeling of "nowhere to turn" for answers to their data processing problems.

Since the 1982 area conferences, the AFL-CIO has been contacted by many union organizations requesting automation assistance.

Legal

The purpose of legal presentation has been to assure that AFL-CIO affiliates engage in the full range of political activity permitted by law in a manner that complies with the limitations on permissible activity. When union officers know their political rights, they are more effective because they are less likely to be deterred by false concerns or to waste time and effort in extricating themselves from needless legal controversies.

The experience gained during the first year's regional seminars showed that the sessions on the election laws are of principal value to the delegates who are the officers of their organization with the responsibility for COPE activity or for financial affairs. Therefore during this year's seminars the legal sessions were set up as an optional technical workshop and scheduled in the evening on the second day.

The sessions were not devoted to a set agenda but rather were based on a brief opening statement reviewing major legal developments during the past year and a discussion of specific legal problems raised by the delegates.

In light of the format, the discussion was devoted to detailed consideration of specific problems — many of them highly technical.

Legislation

The legislative workshops explained the one-year experience with the AFL-CIO's grass roots pilot program, described the direct mail campaign, outlined various legislative tools available to the unions and their membership and explained major legislation covered or pending in the 97th Congress.

After a one-year trial of the grass roots legislative program in 11 congressional districts, it has been decided to expand the program throughout the entire United States in selected congressional districts. A review was made of the first-year trial of the grass roots program's activities by legislative coordinators—who are full-time staff members of the Department of Organization & Field Services and COPE—and the utilization of the telefax machines for immediate contact with legislative action committees. The success of the committees' impact on members of Congress was outlined, with emphasis on the experiences of persons in the workshops who had participated in these programs.

The reasoning behind expanding these programs was reported as a desire to enlarge the pilot program's 10-state area, primarily on the East Coast. The expansion would go to the West Coast and would focus particularly on congressional districts with strong union membership, a legislator in office whose voting record shows some sympathy, and the availability of AFL-CIO staff to establish the program.

The operation of the direct mail program coordinated by the AFL-CIO was also explained. In the example utilized, the AFL-CIO provided material for developing a direct mail program opposing changes in the Hobbs Act. The writing, preparing and ready-for-camera brochures, envelopes and letters in behalf of the program were prepared and offered to AFL-CIO affiliates as a joint venture.

In this operation, the AFL-CIO enlisted 27 affiliated unions which concentrated first on seven House and five Senate members involved in the Senate and House Judiciary Committees' handling of the legislation. In this instance, up to 1.5 million pieces of mail were sent to the members of these unions in these localities. An average of 8,000 cards—a 10 percent response—were sent to the offices of senators and congressmen in each of the targeted cases. A follow-up mailing to senators had equally dramatic results—a return of four times the normal average for direct mail.

This mail campaign is credited with a direct impact on slowing down and countering support for Hobbs Act legislation. It was explained that the same method of approach could be used on issues like taxes, imports, social security or energy, and under certain circumstances, the procedure could be used for fund-raising to finance future mailing programs.

Tools available to union leadership and their members for lobbying on federal issues were listed, as was the Legislative Alert, the quarterly status report of legislation in Congress, various legislative fact sheets and the voting record of individual congressional members.

Profile sheets on each member of Congress were distributed, showing voting patterns, percentage of victory in the previous election, the 10 top unions in the district, and campaign contributions received from unions, business and the right wing. The profile sheets also provide names and addresses of key labor people in each congressional district.

The presentation updated congressional issues — including holding actions against heavy conservative assault and progress on new legislation. Specific reference was made to the budget, the Hobbs Act, voting rights, immigration, and the quest for domestic content requirements in autos. Discussion of the content legislation was enthusiastically received, with support pledged for the legislation because of a solid understanding of its impact not only on auto workers but on steel, glass, rubber, electronics, textile and other sectors of the economy.

OVERALL RESPONSE

The presentation took 25 minutes; the response was diverse. The grass roots program and its proposed expansion received strong support as did unified mailing projects to bring issues directly to members on key labor concerns. The direct mail discussion involved questioning the value of postcards and petitions vs. sending letters and other handwritten communications to members of Congress.

The lack of communication to the membership on issues of importance was mentioned, as was outreach to counter the anti-union bias of the media and the right-wing direct mail operations.

Mailing list accuracy and update was often mentioned, as were questions about the cost of direct mail, how the direct mail targets are chosen and how funds can be sought by the direct mail process. Those with experience in fund-raising by direct mail described their successes and suggested the AFL-CIO give more guidance in terms of selecting the right issues and the proper packaging.

The delegates addressed a wide variety of topics, including:

- The voting records of members of Congress and the relative importance of the votes chosen in the AFL-CIO's package.
- Legislators who vacillate on labor issues, particularly moderate Republicans; concern and frustration in dealing with Democrats who side with the Reagan Administration on certain issues and attempt to retain their ties to labor.
- Recession-related legislation on plant closings, unemployment compensation, immigration, job training and public service jobs, the Longshore Act rewriting and the attempt in Congress to undermine the eight-hour day.
- The potential expansion of content legislation to other industries with heavy job loss. Related discussion of U.S. automakers' opposition to the content legislation, the need for tariffs and quotas to protect U.S. industries, the inroads on U.S. jobs that can come from the Caribbean Basin Initiative and the impact resulting from utilization of Item 807 of the Tariff Code whereby pieces of a final product are sent abroad where the labor is performed and then returned to the United States.

Economic Research

The economic workshops opened with a summary presentation of the four main elements of Reaganomics: budget cuts, tax giveaways, tight money and deregulation. Also presented were the effects of these economic policies: high unemployment, high interest rates, loss of workers' protective health and wage standards, and increased imports.

QUESTIONS AND OBSERVATIONS BY DELEGATES

On unemployment compensation:

- Extended benefits must be restored.
- Jobs programs are needed.

On imports:

- What can be done to

stop imports that deplete U.S. employment?

- Educate members to "buy American."
- Need to stop imports—other countries will not accept goods from United States.
- Is the steel import trigger mechanism working?
- What is happening on the Caribbean Basin initiative?
- What is being done to organize the unorganized in foreign countries?
- What is AFL-CIO policy on trade restrictions with the USSR?
- Why does the government entice foreign manufacturing to United States?
- Companies going overseas hurt U.S. workers.
- The AFL-CIO should apply more pressure to stop transactions such as municipal subway systems purchasing cars from Japan and Canada.

On taxes:

- Is anyone in Congress interested in the AFL-CIO proposal?
- What about all-savers certificates, IRAs, proposed exemption of interest income?
- Can corporations be forced to use their tax break gains for investment in the United States?
- How can we best enlist our members to get behind the AFL-CIO's $700 "cap" on the amount per family from the Reagan tax cuts?
- How much support is there for tax reform?
- Why not have a single flat tax?

On defense:

- How many times do we have to blow up the earth?
- Do we need all those missiles?

On social security:

- What is the AFL-CIO response to allegations of shortfalls in required funds?
- Will Reagan be successful in pitting the old against the young with respect to social security benefits?

On interest rates:

- When will high interest rates come down?
- How can credit controls be used to bring them down?
- What can we do to get the Federal Reserve to loosen up?
- The AFL-CIO doesn't take a strong position against high interest rates.
- Introduce legislation to control interest rates.
- If we are getting higher interest rates on savings, how can rates on loans come down?
- Would a 10 percent limit on interest rates work?
- Who benefits from high rates?

On Reagan policies:

- Are we making any progress on overcoming them?
- People are worried about budget deficits.
- What about the New Federalism?
- The Reagan Administration is trying to bring wages down.

OTHER CONCERNS

There were exhortations for jobs programs, but questions were raised about how labor can become more effective in getting its economic alternatives accepted in Congress.

Two items that evoked interest were the student loan program and the increasing numbers of plant closings. Another item was possible use of union pension funds for job creation and questions about where such funds were being invested.

In general, delegates reported that members were beginning to feel and understand the adverse impact of Reaganomics, but some members continue to support giving the Reagan program more time.

There were repeated comments that the information and data received at the local level from the AFL-CIO and from international unions were often too complex to pass on or explain to members. The plea was for brief, simple materials.

Organization & Field Services

FIRST-DAY SESSION

The workshops focused on conditions faced by state and local central bodies as a result of the intentions of the Reagan Administration to shift certain programs from the responsibilities of the federal government to state or local governments as outlined under New Federalism.

The presentations traced the development of the federal government's role in providing assistance and protection to workers and their families as well as the absence of involvement by state governments in such activities.

Emphasis was placed on the role of the legislative branch of state and local governments in responding to shifts in program responsibilities and the corresponding obligations to provide adequate funding for newly acquired responsibilities.

Efforts were made to raise the level of awareness of the potential effects of New Federalism and to stimulate responsible programs at the state and local central body levels to encourage state legislation that would preserve social and health programs now threatened by the cutbacks in the federal budget.

OVERALL RESPONSE

Since attendance in these workshops was in most cases limited to state body leaders and officers of major city central bodies, the response generally amounted to agreement about the dimension of the problem—but substantial differences in opinions about their ability to react to New Federalism.

These differences were a reflection of the unequal political strengths or weaknesses existing among the states. Frustration was evident from state body officers quick to admit that their state legislative bodies are strongly influenced by business and conservative groups.

In some discussions, delegates said business organizations, such as the Chamber of Commerce, are more successful than labor in supplying their local groups with detailed information about state legislation.

Delegates also cited the difficulties in organizing as a result of high unemployment and a depressed economy. It was pointed out, however, that the current economic conditions could be expected to cause many unorganized workers to eventually recognize the need for unions in order to provide job protection. This recognition is looked upon as a real likelihood for increased organizing activities.

Because of the small number of delegates in many of the first day workshops, it was easy to establish informal discussions on several topics. In some cases, the workshops were actually "meetings" with central body officers. These "meetings" provided a valuable opportunity for the headquarters staff as well as central body officers.

Suggestions:

- Find a way for central bodies to increase their revenue through better affiliation so they can do the things that are required of them.
- Increase the flow of information on state legislation.
- While the amount of information on national legislation has improved considerably, more information and more advance notice is needed in the conference announcements, especially about who is the appropriate delegate for which day or which session.
- The AFL-CIO should continue its regional conferences annually.
- The international unions need to do more organizing.

SECOND-DAY SESSION

The presentation traced some of the factors that account for organized labor's share of the organizable workforce in the 1980s compared with that of the 1940s or 1950s:

- Shifts in the labor force with reductions in blue-collar, manufacturing and construction jobs that were highly organized and increases in the private white-collar sector, including professional and technical trades and service jobs which were less well organized.
- Shifts in location of jobs from large urban centers in the East, Midwest and Far West to the Sunbelt and also to small town areas in which union penetration and experience was less pervasive or even non-existent.
- Loss of union jobs because of foreign imports.
- Increased management resistance and sophistication in thwarting union representation elections, including the development of labor management consultants in industry.
- The deterioration of the protections of the Wagner Act and its enforcement by the National Labor Relations Board to guarantee the right of workers to choose collective bargaining without interference, harassment or intimidation by management.
- The impact of recession and high unemployment levels.

Discussions followed on what the AFL-CIO was doing to reverse this trend.

This included training and retraining of organizers, more careful selection of organizing targets, better preparation and planning of organizing campaigns, preparation to deal with labor-management consultants and various forms of union cooperation, rather than competition, including cooperative organizing projects, both by geographic area and by national cooperation.

Finally, there was a presentation on the Houston Organizing Project including up-to-date developments.

OVERALL RESPONSE

The response in every one of the seven area conferences ranged from very good to enthusiastic, and it was difficult to conclude most of the hour-long workshops. There was a great deal of interest in all aspects of organizing problems. The question was raised in almost every workshop as to whether the Houston formula would be repeated in other areas. There were also many requests for material on labor management consultants, and a good deal of information was volunteered about experiences with such consultants in most parts of the country.

Participants were pleased with the amount of interest and response that AFL-CIO leadership has exhibited in the area of organizing activity. Many indicated that they were not aware either of the degree of activity or interest and response in the leadership.

Suggestions:

- There should be more sites selected for cooperative campaigns.
- There should be more knowledge of training seminars and institutes that are available for organizing training.
- Area conferences and workshop sessions should be continued.
- Central bodies should encourage their local affiliates to have their members turn in organizing leads to the central body.

Education

Education workshops covered the Reagan budget and its impact on:

- Public education funding with particular emphasis on states.
- Student assistance for post-secondary, higher education.
- State funding of university labor education and extension programs.

In addition, the workshop presentation reviewed legislation and regulations with which the Administration seeks to shift federal priorities from strengthening public education toward increasing tax expenditures and relief for private schools. Increasing corporate involvement in schools and universities was discussed.

Materials produced and available from the AFL-CIO and its departments were reviewed.

Programs of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies were presented and the catalogue publicized and distributed.

Delegates requested additional information on:

1. Student financial aid cuts. They expressed repeatedly the fear that workers and their families would be shut out of colleges by escalating tuition and reduced grants and loans. They requested technical assistance on how to refute the charges of massive fraud and abuse in the student loan program.

2. The AFL-CIO position on education issues, specifically on higher education and tuition tax credits. Delegates were interested in the relationship between AFT and NEA on the national and local level.

At every regional conference, union members expressed interest in continuing to promote the introduction of labor studies into the classrooms. Several delegates questioned the acceptance of classes on the "free enterprise system" and the refusal of school systems to teach about labor. Questioners sought information and assistance on gaining acceptance for labor materials, and motivating union members to work on school committees.

In labor education programs the delegates requested:

- Additional seminars from the education department devoted to state issues.
- Funding for attendance at institutes of the George Meany Center (the cost of travel from the West and Southwest was often mentioned as prohibitive).
- Technical assistance in writing grant proposals for local funding of education projects.
- National and state AFL-CIO legislative support for continued funding of programs that serve workers in the universities.

Participants expressed interest in educational materials such as brochures, pamphlets, manuals and films. They suggested that:

- Funding should be made available to central labor councils to purchase more material.
- Printed material, specifically on "right to work" and union security, should be updated with new graphics.
- Increased publicity and improved methods of dissemination for new materials are needed.
- Special packets of materials should be developed and mailed automatically to new state and local central body officers.

They also requested:

- A compilation of films and media material for use on public or cable television for labor education classes on TV.
- More frequent updating of pamphlet lists.
- Coordinated lists which enumerate all material available from AFL-CIO departments rather than a piecemeal approach.
- More pamphlets translated into foreign languages, Spanish and Asian dialects in particular.

Communications

The 1982 regional conferences coincided with major AFL-CIO Department of Information undertakings in three areas:

Publications. The weekly AFL-CIO News was described as the indispensable basic communications piece, essential to labor nationally. Thus "beefing up" of the News, incorporating some material from the Federationist, COPE Memo and Legislative Alert, was described as fundamental to the overall task of getting out labor's story.

Radio & TV. During the regional conferences, the AFL-CIO's new radio news service was put in place and could be heard by dialing 1-800-368-5744. Similarly, the Labor Institute of Public Affairs had been given a shape by February 1982 Executive Council action and could be described in terms of function, its three-member staff and its mission to "get organized labor on TV."

Public relations. "Success breeds success," conference participants were told, and the willingness of the press to listen to the union story had improved measurably in a year because organized labor had been right, and President Reagan had been wrong, on jobs and the national economy, the nation's No. 1 news story since inaugural day 1981.

Consequently, those areas defined the union communications workshops and made the discussions quite different from 1981. A year earlier, there was a near "bunker mentality" as delegates worried about how to get a fair chance to respond to the poison of the message voiced by some local commentator whose simplistic economic slogans dominated local thinking in the same way President Reagan's supply-side panacea dominated national economic discussion. In 1982, delegates had a much clearer idea of how they were going to respond and tended to pick and sort their favorites from among the many projects under way.

There was a rich lode to be mined in terms of a contribution from delegates on what they heard and what they had missed from the AFL-CIO message. Much of the presentation and the discussion centered on the thinking behind the three major developments:

- Labor publications of all types are affected by the increase in postal rates. The doubling, or $250,000 increase, in AFL-CIO mailing costs helped dictate the consolidation of federation publications. The role of the AFL-CIO News was also sharply defined: it not only provides the labor point of view on topics like unemployment compensation or prevailing wage laws, but in vast regions of the country — especially outside major metropolitan areas — it is the only word trade unionists get on congressional or other action on labor/economic issues. Those issues simply aren't covered by the local press or radio and TV. The AFL-CIO News is the essential for internal communications but also can provide unpublished information in which the commercial press might become interested.
- In the electronic media, cable television and other emerging modes in the communications explosion have a seemingly insatiable appetite for material. Repeatedly, conference delegates reported they already had requests from new cable stations for labor films and generally verified the existence of an adequate market for material by the Labor Institute of Public Affairs. Delegates also had a wide experience with radio commentators on the talk and call-in shows and verified the high percentage of union members who get their information primarily—if not exclusively—from radio.

- On public relations, AFL-CIO Information Director Murray Seeger said the federation would never veer from its historic authenticity as an information providing service. But that doesn't dictate any one method of packaging, and the outreach to the press can be aggressive. It is widely understood that Solidarity Day 1981 played an indispensable role in focusing attention on labor's message about the mistakes of Reaganomics. Events like Solidarity Day get reporters accustomed to looking to organized labor for reaction to the news of the day. Delegates recited numerous local experiences with improved local press relations after marches and informational picket lines.

The 1982 participants also showed a decided awareness of public relations staples like:

Access. Unless there's one identifiable labor person available to reporters who have a strike or other story they have to cover, you can't blame the press for being inaccessible to labor.

Cost. However labor's message is presented, it's clear that one major corporation will probably continue to be able to outspend all 101 AFL-CIO unions combined when it comes to buying air time, especially network TV. Maximum use must therefore be made of the potential newsworthiness inherent in the thinking, attitudes, etc. of workers and their unions. To the union public relations person, that translates into forgetting about buying advertising time until you know you've taken advantage of everything that's free.

Bias. No amount of honesty, sophistication or even "media event" gimmickry will crack some of the hard-core conservative publishers who will continue to impose a blackout on union news. The trick is to determine whether that bias is born of malice or ignorance—because ignorance can be dealt with.

FCC accountability. Unlike newspaper publishers, the electronic media have a responsibility—in exchange for using the airwaves that belong to everybody—to represent a balanced picture of the community in the course of their overall programming. Overall balance certainly doesn't mean free air time for every response labor wants to make, but the FCC fairness doctrine does demand that labor, among other community sources, be regularly consulted. At the least, each central labor council can make sure that bona fide trade unionists are being consulted.

PRESS COVERAGE

Press coverage of the 1982 regional conferences was highly successful. In four of the seven cities, the coverage was a "clean sweep," including stories with pictures in both daily newspapers and mention, at least, on all three network-affiliated local television stations.

In addition, the press coverage often reached beyond the city where the regional conference was held. CBS and ABC network reporters covered the opening conference in

Dearborn and other conferences were covered by the Washington Post, Public Broadcasting System, Los Angeles Times, Wall Street Journal, NBC-TV, Business Week and BNA Reports.

The increased coverage of the 1982 regional conferences over 1981 was undoubtedly due to the AFL-CIO's efforts to prove that President Reagan was wrong on the revolutionary economic policies he put in place a year earlier. But Kirkland's appearance on picket lines in Louisville, Phoenix and Hartford also helped, especially since the bus rides invariably gave reporters a chance to sit with him as much as an hour.

In contrast to 1981, when access to Kirkland was limited to a speech and press conference on the same evening, the 1982 schedule made Secretary-Treasurer Donahue and Kirkland available for press conferences at noon on separate days in addition to a closing rally open to the press.

The difference between the cities visited in 1981 and 1982 also contributed to better press exposure. Media interest was far more extensive, for instance, in slightly smaller metropolitan areas. Other factors included the fact that the Houston Organizing Project acclimated the entire state of Texas to labor issues.

The stories about the 1982 regional conference contained expected errors by reporters who don't cover AFL-CIO officers regularly, but the reports were by and large honest, straightforward and factual. Criticisms, if any, qualified as fair comment—and that could not be said of the coverage the previous year.

Evaluation by Participants

Delegates to the last three conferences (Birmingham, Houston and Hartford) were requested to complete evaluation sheets on the conference sessions. Participants were asked to list their union affiliation, state and whether they had attended AFL-CIO conventions and/or the 1981 regional conferences. They were not asked to give their names.

Although the evaluations were distributed at only three of the seven conferences, 342 sheets were collected—or approximately 10 percent of the total 1982 participation. Of those who responded, roughly half had not attended the 1981 regional conferences or any AFL-CIO convention.

The responses indicated almost unanimous support for the conferences with criticism limited in most cases to the size of meeting rooms and the lack of sufficient advance notice on topics to be covered.

Unlike 1981, most of this year's conference dealt with specific tools to use in political campaigns. As a result, there was more "teaching" and less two-way dialogue than in the previous year. The participants seem to divide evenly between those who desire more "sharing of views" and those who seek more detailed explanations of AFL-CIO programs. While a substantial number of participants suggested fewer—and larger— workshops, there was no agreement on what workshops should be eliminated since opinions reflected individual interest.

Of the 11 workshops listed on the evaluation sheet, the request for additional emphasis on specific subjects covered the range of issues. Some 14 percent of the participants suggested that "more time" be spent on COPE programs. Organizing, economics, communications, and legislation each was listed by at least 10 percent of the respondents as needing more time.

What they would want "less time" spent on was unanswered by most of the participants. Those who did respond mentioned specific parts of the COPE program. Others reported "everything was O.K." One delegate answered: "lunch."

Material prepared for the delegates received high marks with the congressional profiles receiving the greatest mention, followed by the analysis of "Reaganomics" and the AFL-CIO's alternative program. Many of the delegates commented that they planned to reproduce specific parts of the material and distribute it to local union and central labor council members. A Food & Commercial Workers delegate from Texas remarked: "The conference was great, however, I am suggesting that each representative carry a hand stapler."

Comments on the individual workshops were almost all favorable. Most participants gave "good" ratings to the sessions they attended, although some suggested that there be fewer mandatory sessions and more workshop selection by the individual participants. Again, many of the delegates ranked the workshops by the degree of group discussion with some urging more participation and some less. A number of those attending the "economic issues" workshops commented that some delegates required more emphasis on basic issues while others sought more technical information. The workshop on communications received special praise indicating continued high interest in developing programs that will reach the rank-and-file membership.

In general, the evaluation sheets urged continuing the regional conferences on an annual basis, but moving the location to smaller states so different participants could attend. A number of comments called for more motivation to go with the "how to" sessions. Other emphasized the need to reach out for rank-and-file opinions, develop better political unity within the labor movement, increase the effectiveness of central labor councils, and educate younger union members.

Three points were made repeatedly at the end of the survey sheets: a determination to take conference material back to the membership; a new pride in the labor movement; and the importance of the leadership listening to the views of the membership. A few quotes serve as examples.

"I will be able to go back to my local with a lot of very good material that we can work with."

"This is my first conference. I met a lot of labor leaders and gained ideas to take back to my local."

". . . Renewed my hopes and views on helping my community and state get a better outlook on the political process."

"Well hurray. I believe you people are making the AFL-CIO what it should be—the activist, leading organization we must have . . . keep it up and keep listening to our field people."

"The labor movement is beginning to come alive because of the current economic crisis."

"Excellent training, learned a lot and feel a little prouder to be a union member."

"I think the idea of bringing national leaders in direct contact with the rank and file is one of the better ideas of the decade. It gives the membership a sense of being in the true mainstream of things and it makes the national not seem like a foreign entity. Keep it up."

"Eyeball to eyeball with Lane and Tom is encouraging to us because they listen and respond."

"Continuing the regional meetings, supported by genuine interest on the 'highest level' is so reassuring to the grass roots activists."

"Having our leaders lead the programs gives them class. It helps us all."

The suggestions made in the evaluation sheets will be used in planning the 1983 regional conferences.

Donahue Tells Congress

ate a kiddy work force, it should be prepared to consider what 7.5 million potential part-time workers — full time during vacations — would do to the current employment-unemployment situation," Donahue said.

THE PRIME activity of 14- and 15-year-olds should be education, he told the committee, disputing Administration claims that the new longer hourly standards would not interfere with study or homework or that relaxed entry into hazardous jobs would not hurt their health and well-being.

The Labor Dept. has no factual evidence to support those claims, Donahue said, adding that the new rules are "designed to please" the fast-food chains, amusement parks and other industry groups, including laundry and dry cleaning, computer and data processing services and messenger services.

"It is not surprising that the first attempts to weaken the Fair Labor Standards Act are directed at supplying cheap labor for the retail and service industries," Donahue said.

He cited data from the Minimum Wage Study Commission which reported to Congress in 1981 that more than half the minimum wage violators and two-thirds of the overtime violators in 1979 were from those industries.

DONAHUE SAID the proposed regulation that would allow waivers of all restrictions amounted to "an 'open door' to child labor abuse." The action is likely to be illegal under the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act, he suggested.

Dropping the annual certification requirement for subminimum wage employers would gut the system used to provide data that determines the allowable number of student hours and would throw enforcement of that provision "on faith, not fact," Donahue told the committee.

He pointed out that the law covering full-time student workers limits them to 20 hours a week, while the Labor Dept.'s new scheme would let 14- and 15-year-olds work 24 hours in a school week. The department "is attempting to amend the law through regulations."

THE SAME principle is at work for business groups that have been pressing for a general subminimum youth wage. Donahue said.

He noted that industry representatives "were conspicious by their absence" at 1981 Senate hearings on the subminimum wage.

"They had apparently decided," he said, "that they could achieve what they wanted through the back door of the Labor Dept. instead of through a public airing of their views before a committee of the Congress."

IF THE ADMINISTRATION wants to "rewrite labor legislation without input from Congress," Donahue said, it should look at the July 22 decision in a federal court which barred attempts to gut the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law because the Labor Dept. had failed to show that the long-term understanding of the law was wrong or that its regulations were ineffective. In addition, the court said the new regulations should be held up because they would hurt workers' income and legal rights.

In other testimony, AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. President Robert Harbrant scored the Labor Dept.'s stated reasons for the changes which amounted to making "life a little easier for employers and to make jobs more available to children" while nothing is being done to create more jobs or reduce massive unemployment.

HARBRANT criticized the vague language of the proposed new rules permitting children to work in hazardous jobs such as cooking, baking, laundry and dry cleaning.

He stressed that federal statistics show those industries remain dangerous. The number of lost workdays due to occupational illness or injury in baking, he pointed out, is higher than mining, construction or manufacturing.

No protection is provided, Harbrant said, for children in a hazardous workplace from being coerced into doing other prohibited work.

The retail and service trades, contrary to popular opinion, "are not safe and pristine workplaces," but are "among the hardest hit by crime in our nation," Harbrant pointed out. Death by gunshot is the second leading cause of fatality in these trades, he said.

The hearings were chaired by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) who branded the Administration proposal a switch from Reaganomics to "Faginomics," referring to the child labor exploiter in "Oliver Twist."

CHILD LABOR REGULATION changes sought by the Labor Dept. are an "open door" to abuses, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue warned in testimony before a House Labor Standards subcommittee. With Donahue are AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison and Clara Schloss, the federation's labor standards consultant.

N.Y. Chinatown Workers Squelch Employer Holdouts

New York—More than 15,000 members of the Ladies' Garment Workers joined a march led by a traditional dragon through the streets of Chinatown here and helped the district's garment workers win an improved contract over stiff employer opposition.

The mid-July rally for the area's garment workers was organized by ILGWU Local 23-25, the second protest in three weeks, in response to a two-day lockout staged by a group of Chinatown employers who were trying to force employees to agree to a contract substantially weaker than the industry-wide agreement approved by the union and employer associations in May.

CHINATOWN garment employers had twice voted down the industry agreement which covers 150,000 workers in four Mid-Atlantic states, but the majority later signed interim agreements with the union, Local 23-25 Manager Jay Mazur said.

Within hours after the 10-block march, he said, all the contractors had signed agreements, including the holdouts.

At the rally, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin pledged strong union-wide support, assuring the workers "your struggle is every worker's struggle."

MAZUR TOLD the rally that the union would not accept an inferior contract for any group of workers, and that the holdout employers were wrong in thinking that Chinatown's workers "will accept less, that these workers deserve less."

The new agreement provides an hourly wage hike of $1.10 over three years, an improved cost-of-living adjustment, Chinese New Year as a paid holiday, increases in holiday pay and establishment of a health and safety fund.

Oregon Labor Federation Backs Candidates, Sets Goals

North Bend, Ore.—Delegates to the Oregon AFL-CIO's 27th annual convention voted to raise the monthly per capita tax by 5 cents, renewed a 1-cent organizing assessment and spelled out labor's position on state economic development, taxation and workers' compensation.

Effective Aug. 1, affiliates will pay 51 cents per member to the state labor federation with 45 cents going into the general fund, 5 cents into a political action fund to assist endorsed candidates and 1 cent into the organizing fund.

THE 326 DELEGATES endorsed the election of State Sen. Ted Kulongoski for governor—over incumbent Republican Gov. Victor Atiyeh—and five other Democrats for Congress.

But in seeking labor's endorsement, Atiyeh pointed out in an address to the convention his differences with Reagan Administration economic policies which have depressed Oregon's timber-base economy.

Three incumbent congressmen were endorsed for re-election—Les AuCoin, Ronald L. Wyden, and Jim Weaver—along with State Sen. Ruth McFarland and rancher Larryann Willis.

Fifty-four Democrats and three Republicans were endorsed for the state legislature.

TWO MEASURES put on the Nov. 2 ballot by initiative petitions—self-service gasoline and a 1.5-percent property tax limitation—were opposed by the convention. Endorsed was an initiative-spawned ballot measure which calls for a verifiable freeze on nuclear weapons.

Delegates adopted a detailed economic development policy paper which among other things calls for use of public employee retirement funds to stimulate the state's economy through investment in construction mortgages. The report also advocates legislation requiring advance notice on plant closings, worker retraining and tax penalties.

In adopting a taxation policy, delegates opposed a state sales tax that has been proposed by business leaders, called for re-shifting the burden of taxes "onto those best able to pay" and urged closing tax loopholes for corporations and wealthy individuals.

One-fourth of the convention's 80-some resolutions urged improvements in job safety and health procedures and in the administration of the worker compensation system, including the elimination of private insurance carriers.

Sam Dominy of the Woodworkers was elected to the executive board to succeed Douglas Dinsmore, who had been appointed by the governor to the state parole board. State AFL-CIO President Irvin H. Fletcher. Sec.-Treas. Robert C. Baugh and other officials were not up for election this year.

August Calendar Listed By Labor Studies Center

An institute on preparing and presenting grievance arbitration cases and a workshop on newswriting and editing for union publications highlight August activities at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Nine AFL-CIO affiliates and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) will use the center's facilities for their own training programs during the month. The schedule:

Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, Aug. 15-20—A program concentrating on the presentation of mock cases before professional arbitrators who share their knowledge with the participants. The exercises are videotaped so participants can see themselves in action.

Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications, Aug. 15-20—An opportunity for labor editors seeking to make their publications more readable, more credible and more useful to their readers. Separate sessions are devoted to editors' legal problems and to postal costs.

James M. Shevis, an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News, has won first prize for non-daily labor reporting in the annual "Front Page" competition of the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild.

The award was based on work written in 1981, including articles on Pope John Paul II's encyclical in defense of workers' rights and the American labor movement's protest of the communist crackdown on Poland's free trade union, Solidarity.

Shevis, 52, has been on the staff of the News since 1972.

Industrial Homework Ruling Seen Turning Calendar Back

A federal district judge's decision that the Labor Dept. acted within its authority in lifting a 40-year-old ban on industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry is "very disappointing," President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers declared.

Chaikin said that the department's 1981 regulatory change "turns the calendar back to the darkest days of garment sweatshops," and added:

"IT TAKES advantage of the most deprived members of our society—undocumented aliens, the poor, and the unprotected—and deprives thousands of factory workers of decent jobs and conditions of employment."

Chaikin's comments came after U.S. Judge Louis Oberdorfer in Washington, D.C., upheld the Labor Dept. ruling to allow commercial knitting of sweaters, scarves, and other items at home. ILGWU and the Clothing & Textile Workers, along with two employers' associations and the states of New York and California, had filed a suit against the department seeking to halt the regulatory change. Oberdorfer's decision could be appealed.

The knitted outerwear industry was one of seven industries deemed by a tripartite board representing workers, employers, and the public in 1942 to have suffered chronically and inherently from industrial homework in those industries. In finding cases of employers failing to pay minimum wage and overtime, and child labor law violations, the panel concluded there was no way to effectively enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act in the home in those industries. It imposed a ban on industrial homework in the seven industries, six of which were in the apparel field.

WHEN PRESIDENT Reagan assumed office, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan proposed a regulatory change to lift the ban. After receiving comments opposing the move, the Labor Dept. kept the ban in place on all but knitted outerwear.

ILGWU and the other plaintiffs based their objections to the regulatory change on the grounds that Donovan had acted arbitrarily and without a sufficient record to justify the lifting of the ban. They also cited a 1949 amendment to the FLSA barring removal of the ban, and said that Donovan should have requested the change of Congress rather than through departmental administrative action.

New Regulations 'Deferred'

Davis-Bacon Decision Scorches Labor Dept.

The Labor Dept. has complied with a federal court order and postponed "until further notice" its controversial changes in Davis-Bacon Act regulations for setting prevailing wage rates on federally-funded construction.

A reading of the stinging 17-page decision issued by U.S. District Judge Harold H. Greene strongly indicates that the Labor Dept. will have to go back to the drawing board if it wants to weaken prevailing wage protections that have been in effect since the 1930s.

CHANGES THAT would have pushed down wage rates, allowed employers to substitute low-paid "helpers" for journeymen and abolish record-keeping requirements needed to enforce the law were to have gone into effect on July 27. But Judge Greene granted the request by the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the AFL-CIO and unions whose members are directly affected for a temporary injunction barring the change.

Such an order is appropriate, the judge said, because there is a strong likelihood that the union objections to the regulations will be upheld after a full hearing on the merits.

The Labor Dept. had attempted to justify its changes as a means of saving the government money on construction costs. But Judge Greene pointed out that Congress passed the law to protect wages, not cut costs.

President Hoover was in office at the time the law was passed and the judge noted that Congress then ignored his objections that a prevailing wage requirement would burden taxpayers. And in succeeding congresses, he observed, the Davis-Bacon Act was "further strengthened . . . never repealed, modified or weakened in any way."

THE POLICIES the regulations would change have been in effect for some 47 years, he noted, and the Secretary of Labor hasn't met the burden of justifying rewriting them. "Under our constitutional system, policy decisions are not made by government administrators; they are made by the Congress," the court stressed.

In another area, on the free use of helpers, the court's decision quoted from an affidavit submitted in support of the unions' position by former Sec. of Labor John T. Dunlop.

Dunlop, an authority on the construction trades, said the proposal to allow contractors to substitute low-paid helpers crossing craft lines gives employers who take advantage of the option a competitive advantage and "has the consequence of undermining prevailing recognized local practices and wage rates."

AS FOR THE elimination of weekly payroll records now required of Davis-Bacon Act contractors, the court said: "It appears, contrary to the Secretary's position, that actual payroll information is essential to the achievement of the Act's purposes."

The Labor Dept.'s protest that a delay in the regulations would be costly to the government brought the court's rejoinder that workers would be the losers if the regulations were allowed to go into effect, and subsequently invalidated. And it is the workers that Congress sought to protect, Judge Greene reminded the Labor Dept.

New Price Hikes Erode Workers' Take-Home Pay

auto finance charges rose sharply in June following declines earlier this year. Charges for auto insurance and auto maintenance and repair costs also climbed more sharply than in recent months.

Transportation costs overall rose 2 percent in June, compared to a rise of five-tenths of 1 percent in May. Clothing prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent after falling four-tenths of 1 percent the month before. Entertainment costs increased seven-tenths of 1 percent, after rising only two-tenths of 1 percent in May.

Medical care costs rose nine-tenths of 1 percent in June, about the same as in recent months. Charges for medical care are the only major component of the CPI not to fall in the last 18 months. Costs have risen 11.4 percent in the last 12 months.

Grocery store food prices increased seven-tenths of 1 percent in June, reflecting sharp price increases for meat, fresh fruits and vegetables, poultry, eggs, and bakery products. Dairy prices fell slightly and non-alcoholic beverage prices declined seven-tenths of 1 percent.

In the 12 months ended in June, the CPI rose 6.9 percent. Over the three-month period ended in June, the index had risen at a compound annual rate of 8.9 percent.

Union-Busters 'Welcomed' to Federal Charity Drive

ticipate in any or all of more than 500 separate fund drives in communities with concentrations of federal workers. A supervisory board of agency representatives, which may include local union officials, rules on the applications. Acceptance is supposed to depend on a presence in the community, either through a local office or in services easily available to those in need.

Once accepted, an organization is entitled to a listing in the brochure distributed to federal employees along with a self-written short summary of its program. An employee may designate any or all of a contribution to go to one or more of the listed organizations.

THE SUPERVISORY board also chooses one umbrella organization, usually the United Way, to allocate the undesignated contributions, which last year amounted to about half the total. The local organization uses a formula based on past allocations to distribute funds that aren't earmarked to the traditional charitable health and service organizations. This leaves the more controversial groups dependent on earmarked contributions.

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO's initial review of the government's own regulations "indicates that the right-to-work fund does not meet the requirement that participating agencies be of use to federal workers and their families."

The R-T-W fund's stated purpose is to oppose what it calls "compulsory unionism," Kirkland noted. "But no form of union security—the closed shop, the union shop or the agency shop—is permitted in the federal sector. Union membership for federal workers by law is voluntary," Kirkland stressed. And thus the fund "is an irrelevancy" in terms of service to federal employees.

KIRKLAND NOTED the irony of the right-to-work group's participation in the federal charity drive at a time when the Administration is cutting back government services to the needy.

The AFL-CIO News inspected the documents submitted by four conservative groups in support of their successful applications for inclusion in the Combined Federal Campaign.

These are some of the gleanings:

- The National Right to Work Legal Defense & Education Fund included its 1981 annual report proclaiming its "ultimate goal" as the day when all workers will be "free from harassment, coercion and violence by corrupt agents of Big Labor."
- The Pacific Legal Foundation said it was set up in 1973 to preserve "traditional American concepts of free enterprise and private property rights." It engaged in litigation supporting California's Proposition 13 limits on taxes, in suits against agency shop "representation fees" for teachers and against the United Farm Workers. It opposes "over-regulation and excessive government regulation."
- The Capital Legal Foundation is a conservative-oriented outfit that calls itself "a public interest law firm concerned with a fair, free market approach to federal regulation." Its newsletter pushes heavily for legislation that would require suits against the United States to be heard in a federal court located in the area most directly affected instead of in Washington.
- The Conservative Legal Defense & Education Fund says it was set up "to receive contributions for the support of organizations which advance, support and promote the goals of limited government and family values." But it hasn't any track record because it was only incorporated a few weeks ago and, the application states, "was not operational prior to that date."

Devine also welcomed to the fund drive the National Right to Life Education Foundation, which he said would offset the "detestable" role of the Planned Parenthood organization, which he regretted not being able to drop from eligibility.

Unions Give $51,000 to Vietnam Vets Memorial

AFL-CIO unions have contributed $51,000 to the Vietnam Veterans Memorial and sponsors of the labor-endorsed project report all construction on schedule in the nation's capital.

Sandie Fauriol, director of the National Salute to Vietnam Veterans, said in a letter of thanks to AFL-CIO President Kirkland that union members "can be very proud of this remarkable show of support for those who served their country in Vietnam."

The National Salute, another project of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Fund, will be a series of events in Washington, D.C., starting Nov. 10, the eve of Veterans Day, and running through Sunday, Nov. 14.

Charity Begins at Home

THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION'S favorite charities, we now discover, include the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund and other far-out advocacy groups.

They were given a "special welcome" by the director of the federal Office of Personnel Management, who approved their applications to participate in the Combined Federal Campaign. This is the annual charitable fund drive that raises close to $100 million a year in voluntary contributions.

Thus, federal workers next October will be invited to make payroll deduction contributions to further the Right to Work fund's proclaimed goal of liberating America's workers from "harassment, coercion and violence by corrupt agents of Big Labor."

OTHER NEW GROUPS that will be seeking the federal employee dollar have as their declared intent slashing government programs and ending government regulations.

OPM Director Donald Devine, who had ties with the Right to Work Committee before he joined the Reagan Administration, said this exemplifies "the spirit of voluntarism."

More apt is Lane Kirkland's rejoinder that welcoming in such groups "mocks the humanitarian mission of the Combined Federal Campaign."

Lesson in Union-Busting

THE RIGHT TO WORK Committee would surely applaud the manner in which Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., is seeking to free its employees from "harassment" by a union.

Iowa Beef forced the workers in its big Dakota City, Neb., plant out on strike by its brazen insistence on a four-year wage freeze. The two-year pay freeze the union had reluctantly agreed to accept was not sufficient, management said.

NOW THIS IS NOT a company that was losing money and in need of union concessions to survive. Iowa Beef posted a $58 million profit last year, and management's only complaint was that the profit margin wasn't high enough.

Nor is this a company that had become uncompetitive. Its equipment is modern and it has broken down its jobs so that its pay scales are lower than its meatpacking industry competitors.

But this is a company that has repeatedly shown its hostility to unions, that has compelled its workers to strike for every single contract gain in a 20-year bargaining relationship.

Now, with the Reagan Recession having spread unemployment through the surrounding area, Iowa Beef has set out to crush once and for all the Food & Commercial Workers local that represents its employees.

YOU MAY HAVE SEEN on television news programs scenes of supposed "violence" involving some angry pickets pelting cars of scabs and being arrested by helmeted state police.

Inside cars speeding through the picket lines have been strikebreakers the company recruited from the unemployment lines with the promise of permanent jobs—at wages $2-an-hour less than the starting rate in the expired union contract.

That's "right to work" in action, shorn of any pretense.

Sharp Rise in Poverty Rolls Traced to Reagan Recession

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMERICA IS LOSING its war against poverty. It's difficult to escape this conclusion in reading the findings of a Census Bureau survey.

The bureau reported that the number of Americans whom the government classifies as poor has been on the rise since 1979.

During 1981, the report said, the number of poor grew by about 2.2 million over 1980—a 7.4 percent increase. Last year 14 percent of the population, or almost one American in seven had an income below the federal government's poverty threshold.

THE RISE in poverty has reversed the pattern during the 1960s and 1970s when fairly strong economic growth and an array of federal anti-poverty programs combined to enable millions to escape the ravages of poverty.

In 1960, the year John F. Kennedy was elected president, about 22 percent of the population was classified as poor. By 1967, three years after Congress enacted the first of Lyndon Johnson's Great Society programs as well as landmark civil rights legislation, the poverty rate had dropped to 14.2 percent, just above the 1981 level.

By 1973, the year Richard Nixon resigned the presidency, the poverty rate had fallen to 11.1 percent. It appeared to many that the nation was winning the battle to abolish poverty.

But with the 1973-75 recession and the leveling off or trimming of programs to help the poor and boost the economy, the poverty rate held steady while the absolute number of poor inched upward.

RISING INFLATION, led by soaring energy prices during the 1970s, lifted the cost of living and the official poverty threshold. In 1980, the poverty rate climbed to 13 percent of the population partly because of a brief but sharp recession during the first half of the year. Double-digit inflation, which began in 1979, was also to blame.

A brisk recovery from the 1980 recession beginning that summer was aborted by yet another recession which took hold in July 1981. The first back-to-back economic downturn in over 60 years has been branded the Reagan Recession because it resulted more from Administration policies than from the usual business cycle.

The Reagan tight money policy, combined with huge deficits caused by tax giveaways to the rich and increased defense spending, has depressed the economy by keeping interest rates high.

The jobless rate moved steadily upward. The term "new poor" entered common usage as mass unemployment spread among stable workers in the construction, auto, steel, trucking and other industries.

A MAJORITY OF THOSE slipping into poverty last year were children, so that almost one child in five in the United States was classified as poor. Those under age 18 below the poverty level rose from 18.3 percent to 19.8 percent in 1981, or from 11.5 million to 12.3 million children.

The bureau reported that last year nearly half of all families below the poverty line were maintained by women with no husband present. The number of female-headed households rose from 11 percent to 14 percent of all households between 1970 and 1980.

The elderly were the only group whose poverty rate was lower in 1981 than in 1980. The age 65-and-over poor declined from 15.9 percent to 15.3 percent. The elderly's ability to stay above poverty can be attributed mainly to social security benefits, which are indexed to inflation.

While the rise in poverty in 1981 resulted largely from the Reagan Recession, these poverty figures just begin to reflect the loss of income caused directly by large-scale social program cutbacks, such as the CETA public jobs program. This is because these cuts didn't take effect until Oct. 1, 1981, at the earliest.

THUS WE MAY expect to find a further increase in poverty in 1982 when the Census Bureau issues its next report.

Also, the poverty numbers won't say anything about the loss of such vital in-kind benefits as Medicaid, food stamps and housing assistance under this Administration. The Census Bureau estimates that in 1982, only two-fifths of the nation's poor will receive any of these benefits, down from three-fifths in 1980.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Weakening on Balanced Budget Amendment

Ignoring the warnings of the vast majority of top economists, including several Nobel Prize winners, the Senate appears likely to buckle under political pressure and approve S.J. Res. 58, the Constitutional amendment to force balanced federal budgets. Unless the amendment is stopped in the House, Reaganomics could be written into the Constitution.

Supporters of the amendment are trying to grease the skids for passage in the House. The House Judiciary Committee has not approved the measure, so backers are trying to thwart traditional procedure and bring H.J. Res. 350 to the House floor through a "discharge" petition. The discharge petition would prevent attempts to amend H.J. Res. 350 on the floor.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to refuse to sign the petition to "discharge" H.J. Res. 350, the balanced budget Constitutional amendment, from the Judiciary Committee. And urge opposition to the Constitutional amendment if it should reach the floor.

GOP May Try To Force Van de Water Nomination

The Senate Republican leadership reportedly may soon try to bring to the floor the nomination of union-busting management consultant John Van de Water for chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. Last year the Senate Labor Committee rejected the Reagan nomination after the AFL-CIO produced evidence showing him to be an anti-union partisan. Such biased views are clearly inappropriate in the NLRB.

Experts in Congressional procedure believe that if Van de Water is not confirmed this year by the 97th Congress, his nomination cannot be resubmitted next year. So any move to push through the nomination now must be stopped.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose the nomination of John Van de Water for NLRB chairman, and to oppose any discharge motion to bypass the Labor Committee and bring the nomination to the floor.

Act Now on Maritime Jobs, UI Compensation Bills

MARITIME INDUSTRY: The FY 1983 maritime authorization may be taken up as early as next week. The House bill, H.R. 5723, is superior to the Senate version. It would provide necessary construction and operating subsidies while ending the "build foreign" provision. It is a first step toward restoring jobs in maritime and supplier industries. But it faces a tough fight, with the Reagan Administration seeking changes.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to support H.R. 5723, the maritime authorization bill, and to reject weakening amendments, especially any "build foreign" amendment.

13 EXTRA WEEKS OF UNEMPLOYMENT COMP.: Bills to provide emergency UI benefits for those who have exhausted all other benefits are moving in the House and Senate. Urge your Senators to support S. 2550, your Representative, H.R. 6369.

ANTI-RACKETEERING BILL: The Senate passed by voice vote S. 1785, Sen. Sam Nunn's (D-GA) bill to provide strict sanctions against union representatives or employers who abuse the trust placed in them by union members. The AFL-CIO had testified in general support of the bill.

LONGSHORE COMPENSATION: S. 1182, amending the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act, recently passed in the Senate. This legislation will be the subject of upcoming hearings in the House.

GOP Senators Toe Reagan Line, Raise Your Taxes

With only two exceptions, Senate Republicans again toed the Reagan line, this time voting to save huge tax cuts for the wealthy while raising your taxes and cutting Medicare.

The key vote came as the Senate considered tax hikes called for by the GOP budget resolution. The Senate Finance Committee had recommended a package, below, that included some unfair tax increases as well as some worthwhile loophole-closers. Sen. Bill Bradley (D-NJ) offered an amendment to remove the harmful tax increases, and to make up the revenue by limiting next year's tax cuts for the wealthy--while maintaining full tax cuts for those who earn less than $46,500 per year.

In a party-line vote, Republicans showed that they prefer to dump higher tax burdens on you. The Bradley amendment failed, 45-54.

WRONG VOTES ON THE BRADLEY AMENDMENT:
Every Republican except Weicker (CT) and Hatfield (OR)
CORRECT VOTES ON THE BRADLEY AMENDMENT:
Every Democrat except Zorinsky (NE) and H. Byrd (Ind.-VA)

SENATE PACKAGE OF TAX INCREASES, MEDICARE CUTS

- Telephone use: Doubling, and later tripling the federal tax on telephone rates
- Tobacco: Doubling the federal tax on cigarettes to 16 cents per pack
- Medicare: Higher premiums and out-of-pocket costs
- Medical expenses: Reduced deductibility
- Unemployment taxes: Higher employer contributions

- Tax "leasing": Reform of Reagan provision that allowed profitable corporations to pay no tax
- Interest, dividend income: Automatic 10-percent withholding to ensure greater compliance
- Minimum tax: To prevent cases of high-income individuals paying no tax
- Corporate taxes: To limit last year's "accelerated depreciation" tax break
- Capital gains: Eased rules for taxes on income such as stock market profits

AFL-CIO BACKED BRADLEY AMENDMENT

- Tax increases on working Americans removed: The first 5 provisions of the Senate package, above, would have been removed.
- Tax cuts for the wealthy "capped": The Bradley amendment would have added the following variation of the AFL-CIO proposal for a "cap" on personal tax cuts for the wealthy:
  Incomes above $78,000: Third phase of Reagan tax cut (July 1, 1983) postponed until federal budget achieved balance
  Incomes between $46,500 and $78,000: A portion of the 1983 tax cut would be postponed
  Incomes below $46,500: Full tax cuts maintained
- Other tax hikes unchanged: The provisions of the Senate package to reform tax "leasing," etc., would have been unchanged by the Bradley amendment.

House Democrats Rubber-Stamp Unfair GOP Tax Bill

It came as no surprise that the package of tax increases approved by the Republican-controlled Senate included tax increases for average working families. But it was a great disappointment when the Democratic-controlled House failed to try to repair the damage done by the Senate.

In another display of politics over principle, Ways and Means Committee Democrats agreed to accept the Senate tax bill as is, seeking no amendments or votes on it. The Republicans, of course, are happy.

Democrats wanted to avoid any association with a tax increase in an election year, so they played dead--at the expense of the low- and middle-income taxpayers who will be hit with excise taxes and cuts in deductions in the Senate bill. Thus, in conference, only minor changes can be made and an AFL-CIO type tax cap cannot be offered for a vote by the Committee or in the House.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Little can be done to improve the bill. Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee--except for Cong. Jim Shannon (D-MA)--should be asked why they refused to write their own bill and allow a Bradley-type amendment to be voted upon.

Council Assails Reagan Policies As Cause of 'Domestic Tragedy'

First Anniversary of Reaganomics

"Wake up, Mr. President. Your economic program's not working. We need jobs."

That's the message these steel and auto workers from Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania brought to the gates of the White House at 4 a.m. on Aug. 4. The date marked the first anniversary of the enactment of the President's Economic Recovery Tax Act, which brought huge windfalls to the rich but unemployment and high interest rates to the rest of America.

After their wake-up call at the White House, the union members moved on to the Capitol for early-morning coffee and donuts with congressmen.

Asks Emergency Aid For Recession Victims

By John M. Barry

New York—The AFL-CIO sharpened its attack on the Reagan Administration's economic policies for creating a "huge domestic tragedy of unemployment" while transferring income from workers and the poor into the pockets of rich individuals and corporations.

The Executive Council renewed organized labor's call to Congress to reverse the course set by President Reagan and pledged an unrelenting fight for economic and social policies that will halt the recession and ease the suffering of its victims.

Just three days after the council spoke out on the human toll of rising joblessness, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the nation's unemployment rate continued to mount in July, reaching 9.8 percent, with 10.8 million Americans officially classified as jobless. (Story this page.)

THE COUNCIL accused the Administration of "empty slogans and hollow promises of better days ahead" that fail to conceal the devastating effects of the recession on American families.

"The lowest-paid workers have been hurled into a frightening abyss of subpoverty," the council said in a statement at its summer meeting here. "They are being joined increasingly by workers with valuable, hard-won skills who previously had a respected place in the community.

"For all groups, the damage is magnified by the deep budget cuts in social programs at the exact moment the recession makes them so needed. These are the very programs workers have paid for throughout their lives."

THE STATEMENT on the "Reagan Recession and Its Victims" was one of 16 on domestic and international concerns adopted by the council. It also received committee and staff reports and took action on trade union matters as detailed in stories elsewhere in this issue.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, at daily news conferences during the three-

Jobless Rate Hits 9.8% as Layoffs Soar

The nation's jobless rate climbed to 9.8 percent in July as 10.8 million Americans hunted for work in an economy ravaged by layoffs and plant closings.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the number of unemployed was up 360,000 from the previous month, when the rate was 9.5 percent. Unemployment was 2.9 million more than a year ago, when the rate was 7.2 percent.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland termed the "shocking" rise in unemployment a call for Congress "to reverse the devastating, discredited policies of the Reagan Administration."

July's unemployment rate, the highest since the depression 41 years ago, translates in human terms to "a line of jobless men and women 4,000 miles long, stretching from coast to coast and from Canada to Mexico," Kirkland said.

"Even that is incomplete," he noted. "To the 10.8 million officially reported as un-

General Board to Weigh Early Endorsement Plan

New York—The question of a pre-primary endorsement by the AFL-CIO in the 1984 presidential election will be put to the federation's General Board, expanded to include state and local central body officers, at a meeting early in December 1983, the Executive Council voted.

The council unanimously approved the scheduling of the General Board meeting along with other recommendations of its Political Works Committee and will draft a resolution for the federation's October 1983 convention calling the meeting and setting a specific date and place.

THE BOARD, under the AFL-CIO constitution, consists of members of the Executive Council and the principal executive officers of national and international union affiliates. The council voted to expand this body for the endorsement meeting to include the chief officers of state and local central labor bodies, each of whom will be entitled to a single vote as at AFL-CIO conventions.

Voting by affiliated unions will be weighted according to membership per capita payments to the federation. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will cast the votes of Directly Affiliated Local Unions on the same weighted basis.

A two-thirds vote will be required for an endorsement, as is the case in all COPE endorsements.

KIRKLAND stressed at a news conference, however, that the proposition before the General Board meeting will be whether a pre-primary endorsement is desirable and feasible.

"All the options are open" he said.

Senate Backs Budget Plank, Labor Asks House Rejection

By David L. Perlman

It's up to the House now to block a balanced budget constitutional amendment that the AFL-CIO charged would leave the nation helpless against recession and hamstrung in its ability to respond to military threats.

The Senate approved the amendment by a 69-31 vote, which AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assailed as "political cowardice" and "a flight from responsibility." It still must get a two-thirds approval in the House before it can be sent to the states for ratification.

ON THE DAY the Senate acted, AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald W. McEntee urged the House Judiciary Committee to show the courage the Senate lacked and kill the amendment.

McEntee, who is president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, took time out from the Executive Council meeting in New York to testify on behalf of the AFL-CIO at the House hearings. The Senate-passed amendment would "lock our country into a course of social and economic disaster," he warned.

In New York, the Executive Council followed up a resolution strongly critical of the proposed amendment with telegrams to senators before the vote warning of the "massive damage" that would be caused by such a defacing of the Constitution.

ON THE AIR with the labor movement's first nationwide satellite news broadcast is President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees in AFSCME's headquarters studio. McEntee outlined the devastating effects of the Reagan Administration's programs and policies not only on public workers but on the nation. AFSCME beamed its Labor News Network broadcast to commercial, cable and public television stations via its rooftop satellite signal "dish," demonstrated here by the program's manager, Jim Dunn.

Structure, Program Outlined

Public Affairs Institute Director, Board Named

New York—The AFL-CIO's new Labor Institute of Public Affairs has begun operations with the appointment of Larry Kirkman as executive director and the approval by the Executive Council of a 22-member board of directors.

Accepting a report of its Committee on Public Relations, the council noted that papers incorporating the institute have been filed with the District of Columbia, where the institute will be based at AFL-CIO headquarters.

THE EXECUTIVE board, with Federation President Lane Kirkland serving as chairman, includes 17 vice presidents who are members of the public relations committee and five persons drawn from outside the labor movement, who have already agreed to serve. They are:

- Robben Fleming, a law professor at the University of Michigan and former president of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.
- Alexis Herman, former director of the Women's Bureau in the Labor Dept. and currently vice president of a Washington consulting firm, Green-Herman & Associates, which specializes in personnel and training issues.
- Caryl Rivers, former Washington newspaper correspondent who is now an associate professor of journalism at Boston University's School of Public Communications.
- Richard Scammon, director of the Elections Research Center in Washington and a former director of the U.S. Census Bureau.
- Kurt Villadsen, director of creative services for CRM-McGraw Hill Productions and partner in Constant C. Productions, Malibu, Calif.

AFL-CIO INFORMATION Director Murray Seeger will be president of the institute and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue its secretary-treasurer. There will also be an advisory committee made up of public relations directors of the AFL-CIO's affiliated unions.

Kirkman, the institute's new director, is 36 years old and was educated as a teacher. He holds a master's degree from Harvard and taught school in the District of Columbia where he was a member of the American Federation of Teachers.

He is an experienced producer of television programs and a former professor of media studies and television production at American University. Most recently, he was television and video director of the American Film Institute where he organized the annual National Video Festival held in both Washington and Los Angeles.

He has many television production credits, including a 1980 program, "None of the Above," about non-voters done for the Public Broadcasting System, and "On the Line," a magazine-type show on labor issues, sponsored by six AFL-CIO affiliates.

Kirkman, who has been working as a consultant to the federation's Dept. of Information pending formal establishment of the institute, has proposed for its first television production venture a series of four-minute programs dealing with the crucial issues facing the nation, starting with the many facets of unemployment. These would be distributed for a national audience this fall and again in January.

THE EXECUTIVE Council also reviewed the recent changes in the AFL-CIO News, including the incorporation of Memo from COPE, Legislative Alert, and the Federationist, as well as the new system of free distribution to affiliated unions on the basis of per capita payments.

The report also took note of the federation's audio news service which makes available to radio stations short versions of AFL-CIO statements. These messages are also distributed by communications satellite to nearly 1,200 radio stations.

Charity Concept 'Perverted' By Inclusion of 'R-T-W' Fund

New York—The Reagan Administration's decision to allow the National Right to Work Committee's Legal Defense Fund to participate in the annual charity drive among federal employees "totally perverts the concept of charity," the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council statement stressed that "union members are willing to do their share" for the genuinely humanitarian groups soliciting funds for the Combined Federal Campaign. But it termed inclusion of notoriously anti-labor groups "an affront to all union members."

FEDERATION President Lane Kirkland met before the council meeting with leaders of both affiliated and unaffiliated unions of federal and postal workers, and the council statement reflected their outrage at the Administration's action.

Kirkland and union leaders participating in the meeting told reporters that every effort will be made to assure that the "right to work" group doesn't inadvertently get money intended for a legitimate charity.

"We're not conducting a boycott because to do so would damage a great many very worthy organizations," Kirkland said.

The council statement welcomed the assurance of the United Way that its local affiliates, which normally distribute undesignated contributions from federal workers, will see that such money goes "only to those agencies that have historically received such funds and not to groups such as the Right to Work Foundation."

The council urged government workers to earmark their contributions in this fall's campaign to "the agency or agencies that meet their definition of a true charity."

Meanwhile, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates will explore whether the current structure "best serves the needs of the nation's voluntary agencies and the desire of federal and postal employees to support deserving charities."

The council statement noted that Reaganomics has added to unemployment and poverty. "Resources of agencies that minister to those who cannot provide for themselves are strained to the limit," it stressed. These groups are "in desperate need" of the funds raised through the Combined Federal Campaign.

Time Subsidiary Hit for Reneging On CWA Accord

New York—Capital Cable Co. of Austin, Tex., was denounced by the AFL-CIO Executive Council for scrapping ten years of stable collective bargaining relations and bringing in a union-busting consultant after it was bought by Time Inc.

Time Inc. took over the cable television system in the midst of a contract with workers represented by the Communications Workers. While trying to negotiate a new contract, the 79 union members struck the company in October 1981, but returned to work this June under the terms of an agreement worked out through the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

The back-to-work agreement included a commitment from the company to resume good faith bargaining with a new committee, but the workers still do not have a contract, the council noted.

The introduction of an Atlanta-based union-busting consultant and other management tactics have made it clear, the council said, that "the intention is to destroy the existing contract and decertify the union."

The council urged affiliates to inform their members of the activities of Time, Inc. and Capital Cable.

Fight on Balanced Budget Plank Shifts to House

If the balanced budget amendment were now in the Constitution, the council warned, social security benefits would have to be drastically slashed and the national economy would sink from recession "into a disastrous depression."

AS PASSED by the Senate, a cumbersome seven-section, 337-word addition to the Constitution would require that federal spending each year not exceed anticipated tax revenues, except in time of war. A three–fifths vote of the House and Senate would be required to allow an exception.

Further, tax receipts would not be allowed to rise "by a rate greater than the rate of increase in national income in the last calendar year ending before such fiscal year, unless a majority of the whole number of both houses of Congress shall have passed a bill directed solely to approving specific additional receipts and such bill has become law."

It's that type of statutory language that constitutional scholars almost unanimously protest has no place in the Constitution.

THE SENATE also voted to include in the amendment a requirement for a three-fifths vote to raise the national debt limit—a provision that could periodically immobilize the federal government until tax collections come due.

Seven Republicans broke with President Reagan to vote against the amendment, as did 24 Democrats. But 22 Democrats voted with 47 Republicans to pass the amendment with a two-thirds majority and two votes to spare.

Except among the Senate's right-wing contingent, there was little obvious enthusiasm for the amendment. And Sen. Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.) contended in the debate that "if this were a secret ballot, it wouldn't get 15 votes." Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), the Democratic whip, has said many of the senators who gave lip service to the amendment were counting on the House to block it.

At a news conference during the Executive Council meeting, Kirkland expressed labor's outrage at the "cowardice and chicanery" of senators who know how damaging such an amendment would be but nevertheless vote for it.

Kirkland termed Reagan's embrace of the amendment "pure, raw and naked hypocrisy." If the President considers a balanced budget so inexcusable "that it warrants trifling and degrading the Constitution," what's to stop him from submitting a balanced budget, Kirkland asked. "He's giving these sermons against sin while he's molesting the choir girls."

The Executive Council resolution and McEntee's testimony at the House hearings made clear that the labor movement does not advocate continuous unbalanced budgets.

But "the AFL-CIO firmly believes that the only way to balance the budget is to first balance the economy," the council said. "That means overturning the policies of this Administration and reaffirming the goal and the programs to achieve full employment."

It charged that Reagan is using the balanced budget amendment to divert attention from the huge deficits brought on by his Administration's economic policies and that members of Congress who support it see it as a means of avoiding responsibility for their actions.

The 24 Senate Democrats who voted against the balanced budget amendment are: Baucus (Mont.), Biden (Del.), Bradley (N.J.), Bumpers (Ark.), Cranston (Calif.), Dodd (Conn.), Eagleton (Mo.), Ford (Ky.), Glenn (Ohio), Hart (Colo.), Inouye (Hawaii), Jackson (Wash.), Kennedy (Mass.), Leahy (Vt.), Levin (Mich.), Matsunaga (Hawaii), Metzenbaum (Ohio), Mitchell (Me.), Moynihan (N.Y.), Pell (R.I.), Randolph (W.Va.), Riegle (Mich.), Sarbanes (Md.) and Tsongas (Mass.).

Republicans who opposed the amendment are: Chafee (R.I.), Cohen (Me.), Gorton (Wash.), Heinz (Pa.), Kassebaum (Kan.), Mathias (Md.) and Weicker (Conn.)

All other senators voted for the amendment.

Council Asks Aid to Recession Victims

day council meeting, responded to questions on a broad range of issues:

- On Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan, the federation's concern is with the way he is running the Labor Dept. Instead of enforcing laws to protect the well-being of workers, women, children, old people and the handicapped, the department is "wrecking" those laws by stripping the budget of enforcement machinery and writing new regulations that "clearly and flatly contradict the declared purposes of the law."
- On the first anniversary of the Air Traffic Controllers' strike, the continued denial of re-employment by the Administration is still hampering airline service and, together with the training of strikebreakers, imposes extraordinary costs and burdens on the public and the taxpayers and "serves only one purpose at this stage —sheer vindictiveness."
- On the coming congressional elections, the shift in the public mood heightens the prospect of "a substantial improvement in the complexion of Congress," but he has no predictions. The federation's appeal to make November 2 the next Solidarity Day "has caught on" at all levels of the trade union movement and will "spur us on to a more effective effort" in registration, education and getting union members and families to vote.
- Administration proposals for further cuts in social programs to compensate for increased defense spending underscore the importance of the November elections "so that we can enlarge the number of people in the Congress who have a balanced view of the obligations of government to provide for the common defense and promote the general welfare."
- On El Salvador, the federation is "far from being satisfied with the degree of progress" toward the restoration of civil rights and is continuing to press for more action. "We intend to use every means at our disposal to press for the fulfillment of the land reform program and the enhancement of the rights of free trade unionists in that country."

THE COUNCIL'S statement on the Reagan recession was accompanied by an analysis of the economic decline under the current Administration presented by Research Director Rudy Oswald.

The statement reiterated labor's program to pull the nation out of recession through public service employment programs, job training programs, housing assistance, domestic content legislation to curb job-destroying imports, creation of a new Reconstruction Finance Corp. to rebuild the nation's industrial base, and a reversal of the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policies.

But the central focus of the council's outrage was the plight of the poor and the jobless, especially the long-term jobless whose unemployment benefits are being chopped off in state after state.

"TENS OF millions of Americans are suffering with little or no help from the government or private sources," the council observed.

It charged that "the Reagan policies are creating a generation of grievously injured families, without funds for schooling, health care or adequate food or housing, without respected family role models of breadwinners with the pride of a steady well-paying job, and without hope for the further advancement of their children.

"The resulting family stress and instability could injure the entire social fabric, perhaps for decades."

AT EXECUTIVE COUNCIL session, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland discusses labor's response to Administration policies that have destroyed jobs, widened tax inequities and pushed more families below the poverty line.

THE SOCIAL costs of the recession, it pointed out, are chronicled in the rise in heart attacks, alcohol abuse, suicides, divorce, child abuse, mental illness and crime.

"The soup kitchens of the Depression are reappearing and the haunting despair of joblessness is undermining the very spirit of the nation."

To alleviate the suffering of the unemployed and the poor, the council called on Congress to extend maximum unemployment benefits to 65 weeks and restore Trade Adjustment Assistance for workers who lose their jobs because of imports; reject any further cuts in Medicare and Medicaid; enact a program of health insurance for the unemployed and restore health care coverage for the working poor; strengthen the fragile system of welfare by restoring Aid to Families with Dependent Children to pre-Reagan benefit levels and maintain food stamp benefits for all those those in need.

IN OTHER actions, the council heard reports from Kirkland on this year's regional conferences, Donahue on internal disputes matters and the federation's finances, Vice Presidents John H. Lyons on defense and on pension investment, Glenn E. Watts on public relations, Charles H. Pillard on housing, J. C. Turner on the COPE checkoff drive, and John J. O'Donnell on the creation of a labor advisory committee to the Republican National Committee.

Congressional developments were reviewed by Legislative Director Ray Denison, and Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler gave a progress report on the Houston Organizing Project. International Affairs Director Irving Brown recounted developments at the June conference of the International Labor Organization in Geneva, and COPE Director John Perkins reported on the recent mid-term conference of the Democratic Party.

Under a new schedule adopted at the 1981 convention, reports also were presented by the federation's constitutional departments—Building & Construction Trades, Industrial Union, Maritime Trades, Food & Beverage Trades, Public Employee, Professional Employees, Metal Trades, and Union Label & Service Trades.

KIRKLAND designated three new council committees. One, chaired by Donahue, will examine the changing nature of the workforce and the organizing outlook. Its members will include Vice Presidents John J. Sweeney, Lloyd McBride, Barbara Hutchinson, William H. Wynn, Albert Shanker, Richard I. Kilroy, Watts and Pillard.

A new committee to promote and develop more effective means of involving retired union members in the pursuit of labor's objectives is headed by Vice President Douglas A. Fraser and includes Vice Presidents Sol C. Chaikin, Joyce Miller, John DeConcini, Wayne E. Glenn, Sweeney and Pillard.

A committee to coordinate labor's continuing fight to defeat the proposed constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget includes Vice Presidents Gerald W. McEntee as chairman, Vincent R. Sombrotto, Watts, Shanker, Turner and McBride.

TWO MERGERS and the titles of the resulting organizations were approved. The Pottery Workers and the Glass Bottle Blowers are merging to become the Glass, Pottery, Plastics & Allied Workers International Union, while the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers and the Glass & Ceramic Workers are now united as the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers International Union.

The council approved the administrative budget and Impact Projects fund of the African-American Labor Center, as well as contributions from the Special Purposes Fund to the following organizations: Jewish Labor Committee, Center for the Study of Welfare Policy, Citizens for Tax Justice, League for Industrial Democracy, National Planning Association, United Negro College Fund, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, United Way of the National Capital Area, and the American Political Foundation.

The next council meeting will be held Feb. 21-28, 1983, in Bal Harbour, Fla.

General Board to Consider Pre-Primary Endorsement

As alternatives to an immediate collective endorsement, the board could decide to delay action until some later date or to make no endorsement at all until after the party conventions.

IF THE LAST course is chosen, the AFL-CIO and its state federations would not involve themselves in the primaries, and the national union affiliates would take whatever position they saw fit, as has been the case in recent elections, Kirkland said.

He explained that the timing of the General Board meeting is dictated by the various state filing deadlines for candidates' delegate slates. If the meeting were held in mid-February 1984, for example, the deadlines already would have passed in 13 key states. If the meeting were delayed until after the first primary in March, five more state filing deadlines would have come and gone.

As a practical matter, to assure an opportunity for full participation by the AFL-CIO and its member unions in the candidate selection process, the endorsement session of the board must be held no later than mid-December 1983, Kirkland said.

THE COUNCIL'S action flowed from a decision at its May meeting in Washington to explore the possibility of a pre-primary endorsement of a presidential candidate rather than wait until after the parties choose their nominees. The goal is to strengthen labor's role in the selection of candidates and to avoid the splintering of labor support during the primaries.

The May council meeting urged affiliates to withhold their individual endorsements of candidates pending a decision on a collective pre-primary endorsement, and the council's Political Works Committee was directed to draw up appropriate procedures.

At its summer meeting here, the council met with two potential Democratic presidential candidates, Senators Gary Hart (Colo.) and John Glenn (Ohio), for an exchange of views on issues that concern the trade union movement.

A THIRD potential candidate, Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.) was forced to cancel his scheduled visit by the timing of the Senate vote on the constitutional amendment requiring a balanced federal budget.

Kirkland said that as other candidates emerge, they too would be given the opportunity to appear before the council "in a manner and in a setting that gives them the best opportunity to give a serious exposition of their views."

He noted that the two front runners for the Democratic nomination—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and former Vice President Walter Mondale—spoke at the last AFL-CIO convention in 1981 and had met frequently over the years with the Executive Council.

Similar invitations would be extended to Republican candidates should that party's nomination open up, Kirkland said, and he would not rule out the possibility that labor might endorse candidates in both the Democratic and Republican primaries.

Congress Pressed to Halt Cutoff of Jobless Aid

New York—America's unions pressed Congress to salvage the extended unemployment compensation program and lengthen its duration.

An Executive Council statement and Senate testimony by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman stressed the plight of recession victims who have already used up all available unemployment benefits or will do so in the weeks ahead.

THE COUNCIL statement spotlighted the paradox of state after state "triggering-off" the extended benefit program at a time when unemployment has risen to near-record levels. Only 26 states still have extended benefit programs and 300,000 workers a month are running out of benefits, the council noted.

But unless Congress acts, worse is still to come. The cutbacks already felt are from the first phase of changes in the program that Congress adopted last year at the prodding of the Reagan Administration. A second phase of the cutbacks is scheduled for Sept. 25—and will come close to wiping out the program unless Congress intervenes.

The council called on Congress to repair the damage done to the program, and to restore the national trigger which at present levels of unemployment would make extended benefits available in every state.

IT ALSO URGED a lengthening of the present 13-week extended period, preferably to the levels established by Congress during the last major recession. That provided up to 65 weeks of combined state and federal benefits.

A move is under way in Congress to write an emergency extension of unemployment benefits into the tax bill now being considered by a House-Senate conference committee.

The Senate on Aug. 5 voted 84-13 for a non-binding resolution urging the conferees to postpone the Sept. 25 changes in the extended benefits program and to approve an additional 10 to 13 weeks of unemployment benefits.

Earlier, at Senate Finance Committee hearings, Seidman termed a bill introduced by Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.) "a step in the right direction," although short of the AFL-CIO's goal. It would provide an additional 13 weeks of supplemental benefits fully financed from general revenues and restore the original formula for triggering extended benefits programs.

As an example of the inequity of the new trigger formula imposed by Congress, Seidman noted that Michigan was forced to stop paying extended benefits for a 13-week period during the height of the current recession even though it had Depression levels of unemployment.

"Supplemental benefits should be available to all unemployed workers who have exhausted benefits, whether or not their state is in an extended benefit period," he urged.

THE REAGAN Administration has waffled on the issue. On the same day that Seidman testified for the AFL-CIO, Assistant Sec. of Labor John Cogan testified that the Administration "strongly opposes any of the currently proposed extensions of unemployment insurance benefits at this time."

The Administration's position came under strong fire from Republicans as well as Democrats from states facing the cutoff of benefits to their unemployed.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes then said the President would be willing to accept "some form of extension," but there would be no promise of presidential support until the legislation is in final shape.

ELECTION STRATEGY is mapped by the AFL-CIO COPE Operating Committee at its meeting in conjunction with the Executive Council sessions in New York. COPE Director John Perkins and the committee members discussed progress and goals for the November congressional and many state elections where the labor movement's aim is to elect responsive candidates, particularly in districts held by anti-union representatives who have been insensitive to concerns such as the Reagan Administration's recession, unemployment and the needs of the poor and elderly.

State, Local Slashes Seen Self-Defeating

New York — The AFL-CIO voiced strong support of public employee unions in their efforts to convince state and local governments that it is a "false economy" to respond to the Reagan budget squeeze and recession by dismantling services and destroying public sector jobs.

State and local government activities, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in a statement, require adequate funding and experienced workers who can meet the "qualifications and demands of public service" in areas such as fire and police protection, health and hospital services and education.

MANY STATE and local governments, faced with the Administration's budget slashes, its recession, falling revenues and skyrocketing interest rates are turning to cost-cutting measures that are undermining "the health, safety and education of citizens and the jobs, wages, protections and standards of public employees," the council said.

President Reagan's so-called New Federalism proposal is another threat to these services, the council statement declared.

THE COUNCIL pointed out that a number of local governments are reducing the "quality as well as the quantity" of public services by looking for ways to cut public employees' jobs.

Some governments are "flirting" with contracting out services traditionally performed by public workers to non-union, low-wage companies, the council noted.

Such tactics "inevitably cost the taxpayer more for reduced levels of service," the statement said.

Built-In Security Measure Urged On Airline Jobs

New York—The Airline Deregulation Act of 1978 should be repealed and a "sound regulatory system" that includes employee protections should be put in its place, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

The council also urged the Reagan Administration to act now to issue rules to protect all airline industry employees who have felt the adverse effects of the deregulation law.

DEREGULATION has caused "turmoil" in the industry, including widespread unemployment and reductions in wages and working conditions, as well as hurting consumers, the council said.

Tied in with the elimination of the Civil Aeronautics Board in 1985, the statement pointed out, is the expiration of current "adjustment mechanisms" that protect airline jobs, seniority and bargained working conditions from the adverse effects of decontrol, mergers and acquisitions.

The federation statement pressed Congress and the Administration on pending legislation that would require the long-term, continued use of adjustment mechanisms.

These safeguards, the council said, have successfully prevented labor-management strife, layoffs, lost revenues and widespread disruption of the air transportation system that could come as a result of decontrol and the effects of mergers and acquisitions among passenger and cargo air carriers.

WITH THE mechanisms, changes can be made "with an orderly integration of work forces and the preservation of seniority rights" and without forcing workers to compete against other workers for jobs while the companies "reap considerable profits" at the expense of their employees, the council said.

Although Congress promised protections of job rights when deregulation was passed, "to date, not a single employee whose job was lost as a result of that legislation has received the promised protections and compensation," the statement pointed out.

NFL Players Contract Goal Backed as 'Fair, Equitable'

New York—The National Football League Players Association has the support of the AFL-CIO in its efforts to negotiate a "fair and equitable contract" with team owners.

An Executive Council statement stressed that the NFLPA, an affiliate of the Professional Athletes, wants to win for its members a share "of the enormous revenues generated each year by the National Football League from ticket sales and television revenues," funds which are shared by the NFL owners.

THE UNION, the council noted, is asking that 55 percent of this money be used for players' salaries and benefits.

The players "are the game in professional football," the statement emphasized. "It is their skill and courage which attracts the immense audiences from which the owners derive their income."

But the owners have repeatedly refused to bargain in good faith with NFLPA. They have tried to break the union and have harassed and pressured its leaders, the council said.

BEHIND THE glamour of professional football, the statement said, are players whose lives are "marred by frequent injuries," whose average playing careers are only 4.2 years and who average the lowest pay in professional team sports.

The players are asking for improved pension benefits and medical, life and disability insurance, a speedy grievance procedure and the right to get medical treatment from doctors other than those chosen by the teams.

Israel's Invasion 'Justified' by PLO Threat

New York—Israel's invasion of Lebanon is "entirely justified" by the military threat to its security posed by the Palestine Liberation Organization, the Executive Council said.

The unanimous council statement in support of Israel called for immediate withdrawal of the PLO and Syrian forces from Lebanon.

FOR SEVEN years, the statement said, the people of Lebanon have endured a "reign of terror at the hands of the PLO and Syria, which together occupied 60 percent of the country."

Over that time, nearly 100,000 people were killed, some 250,000 were wounded and 800,000 Christians and 500,000 Moslems were left homeless, the council said. Lebanon's political structure and institutions of authority were "shattered."

In Lebanon, the council emphasized, "the world could see what a PLO state would look like."

The statement stressed that the AFL-CIO "deeply regrets" the loss of civilian lives in the current fighting and pointed to the PLO's tactic of "deliberately locating its forces in residential areas and storing its ammunition in schools, hospitals and other public facilities."

The PLO, in effect, "is holding the civilian population of West Beirut hostage," the council charged.

The council said the United States should continue withholding recognition from the PLO and steer clear "of any actions which would encourage the PLO to believe it can snatch a political victory from military defeat."

Before adopting the statement, the council heard a report by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue who led a factfinding mission to Israel and Lebanon in July.

WITH DONAHUE were Service Employees President John J. Sweeney and Tom Kahn, assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. The four-day trip included meetings with government officials and with representatives of Israel's Labor Party and Histadrut, the Israeli trade union center. It included talks with U.S. embassy staffs, journalists and Lebanese from both the military and civilian populations.

Donahue said Lebanese who had felt the brunt of PLO occupation welcomed the Israelis as "liberators."

The council in its statement called for worldwide pressure to demand that the PLO and Syria leave Lebanon immediately "and allow the Lebanese to proceed with the task of reconstruction and the creation of an independent central government."

When those forces are gone, the statement said, the Israeli's "must also withdraw, as they have committed themselves to do."

The Executive Council urged the U.S. government to assist the Lebanese "in every way possible" and to make humanitarian aid available to the Lebanese and the Palestinian people.

Weakening of PLO and Soviet influence in the Middle East may set the stage for fruitful discussions with moderate Arab forces for a solution to the Palestinian problem, the council suggested in its statement.

To Benefit Rich

Flat-Tax Scheme Seen Creating New Inequities

New York—America needs tax justice, but the flat-rate tax schemes the Reagan Administration is flirting with are not the answer, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

"The cornerstone of tax justice is a progressive tax based on the principle of ability to pay," the council said in a statement.

It reaffirmed the federation's support for tax simplification with tax equity while maintaining a progressive tax structure.

BUT THE flat-tax proposals would abandon the basic principle of equity and instead apply a single percentage rate for all, regardless of income level or ability to pay, the council noted.

"The Reagan Administration that stacked the 1981 tax changes to benefit the wealthy now flirts with the flat tax as another scheme to further shift the tax burden to low and middle-income Americans," the statement said. "The wealthy are saying indirectly that they might give up a few of their preferences in exchange for a drastic reduction in the top rate and the destruction of a progressive tax system."

The council cited an analysis by the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation which compared the effect of flat tax rates ranging from 12 percent to 18 percent on taxpayers at various income levels. In every case, the council noted, the low- and middle-income groups would pay more in taxes while the upper-income groups would enjoy substantial tax cuts.

THE RATIONALE put forth by the flat-tax proponents is that it would enable Congress to end many deductions, credits and exclusions and eliminate many long-standing loopholes and preferences.

But if Congress were inclined to close existing loopholes—like foreign tax credits, oil depletion allowances and the preferential treatment of capital gains—it could do so now while maintaining a progressive tax structure, the council stressed.

"Loophole closing is the key to tax justice, but that has nothing to do with flat rates," the statement pointed out. "Even if the income that currently slips through the loopholes and escape hatches were included, a flat tax would still be far more inequitable than the present system despite its many flaws."

DECLARING the AFL-CIO's unalterable opposition to flat-rate tax schemes, the council called for steps to achieve tax justice by "undoing the damage done to the tax structure by the Reagan Administration" and enacting measures to:

- End the double standard under which wages are taxed at far higher rates than unearned income from capital gains.
- Reinstate the corporate income tax as a source of federal revenue and equity and eliminate so-called incentives "that subsidize mergers, takeovers, plant shutdowns, overseas investments and other business activities that conflict with the national interest.
- Provide a basic structure of graduated rates that fully reflect the principle of ability to pay.

Federal Reserve Action Pressed On Interest Rates

New York—High interest rates are devastating the American economy and the Federal Reserve Board should act immediately to lower them, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

The council also called on Congress to re-establish the credit control authority that expired June 30 and said the President and the Fed should then use it "to assure the availability of credit at much lower interest rates for housing, agriculture, and productive industrial investment."

A STATEMENT by the council stressed that continued high interest rates are a major cause of the current high rates of unemployment and high levels of bankruptcies, causing shutdowns of productive facilities in many basic industries, removing any incentive for new investment, and creating a barrier to sustained recovery.

"Repeated financial and industrial failures could spread throughout the economy and produce a depression reminiscent of the 1930s," the statement warned.

Despite President Reagan's repeated professions of faith in his program, the evidence is clear that "it is not working," the council observed. It noted that long-term bond rates and home mortgage interest rates are higher than when Reagan took office. The recent declines in short-term interest rates, the council said, reflect the greatly weakened demand for business loans in the current recession.

AND THE Administration's touted "victory" over inflation "has proven to be more faith than fact," the council statement said. It noted that oil and food prices are heading up again now that oversupplies are disappearing, and prices in two other major sectors—housing and medical care—continue to fuel inflation.

The statement stressed that high interest rates themselves are a major contributor to inflation. It pointed out that interest payments on the federal debt are the fastest growing part of the federal budget, and the high cost of borrowing by builders, industry and merchants is passed on in higher prices that escalate inflation.

And by raising the value of the dollar in relation to foreign currencies, high interest rates raise the price of American goods, acting as a drag on exports while encouraging more imports at relatively lower prices, the statement noted.

This has led to the loss of American jobs as the U.S. trade deficit mounted to a record $40 billion in 1981 and to more than $18 billion in the first half of 1982, the council noted.

Potters Union Okays Merger With Glass Bottle Blowers

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to a special convention of the Pottery Workers voted 159-17 approval of merger with the Glass Bottle Blowers, clearing the way for final action by the executive boards of the two unions.

Under the merger agreement, the new Glass, Pottery, Plastics & Allied Workers will unite 80,000 members of the GBBA and 11,000 members of the pottery workers.

BOTH UNIONS have their roots deep in America's labor history, going back to the 19th Century, and have faced problems of imports and mechanizations over the years.

GBBA President James E. Hatfield, speaking to the Pottery Workers convention, said labor must have "unity and strength" and the planned merger "makes good sense."

Potters President Lester H. Null told the delegates that the merger will enable the union to deal with its employers from strength.

Null, who has been president of the Pottery Workers since 1969, will serve in the merged union as assistant to Hatfield. The union's veteran secretary-treasurer, George H. Barbaree, will be international auditor following completion of the merger.

THE ENLARGED union will have its headquarters in Media, Pa., where the GBBA offices are located. The Pottery Workers headquarters in East Liverpool, Ohio, will be used as offices for international representatives of the union, serving the Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania areas.

The Pottery Workers were briefly part of the Seafarers, as an autonomous affiliate from 1976 to 1978, but the arrangement was dissolved by mutual agreement.

A week earlier, another union merger was completed by the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers—itself the product of a recent merger—and the Glass & Ceramic Workers. That new 70,000-member organization is the Aluminum, Brick & Glass Workers International Union.

Pension Investment Progress Cited

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council called for a continuation and expansion of efforts to assure that union-negotiated pension funds are invested to serve the interests of plan participants by creating jobs and meeting social needs.

The council reviewed programs in this area since its August 1980 policy statement setting forth broad guidelines for the investment of pension funds, which it found in many cases were being invested in ways inimical to workers' interests.

AMONG THE notable recent developments, the council cited:

- A new AFL-CIO Housing Investment Trust now awaiting approval by the Securities & Exchange Commission, which will provide long-term government insured mortgages to finance union-built housing and other construction.
- A program by the Building & Construction Trades Dept. to acquaint pension fund trustees and other plan fiduciaries with opportunities for investment in job-creating projects.
- Creation of financing foundations or pooling arrangements by a number of construction union pension funds to promote union-built construction.
- Increasing pressure from unions to gain a greater voice in the control of their pension funds and investment policy where traditionally such decisions have been left solely to management.
- The growing support of public officials for the use of public employee retirement funds to strengthen state and local economies through appropriate investments.
- Establishment of the Industrial Union Dept. publication, Labor and Investments, as a valuable source of information on pension fund investment.
- A computer tracking project being undertaken by the AFL-CIO to better enable union-influenced pension funds to exercise shareholder rights associated with their equity holdings, and the work of the Food & Beverage Trades Dept. in encouraging the exercise of such rights.

"THESE KINDS of activities provide new opportunities and should be continued and expanded," the council statement said. "The pooling of funds can provide greater financial strength and effectiveness and, at the same time, greater safety through diversification and the spreading of risk. Worthwhile social objectives can be achieved and jobs created through such efforts as union-built affordable housing for workers," the statement noted.

"Political leaders and public employee funds can work with union leaders and private pension funds to support economic development and industrial reinvestment. The exercise of shareholder rights . . . can be an effective investment tool, but maximum and effective results will be achieved only if all elements of the labor movement work together and support these efforts."

The council warned that the desire to target negotiated pension funds more effectively in the interest of workers should not outweigh the need to avoid high-risk investments, and it urged extra care in the selection of outside investment advisers.

It warned, too, that a number of large corporations have manipulated pension plan provisions to gain access to pension fund assets for corporate use, in several instances using unrealistic actuarial assumptions to create artificial surpluses and to minimize benefit payments.

It called for action by federal agencies or Congress to prevent this sort of manipulation and assure that pension fund assets are used solely for the payment and funding of pension benefits.

Oil Workers Supported in Petrofina Strike

New York—Striking members of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 4-23 in Port Arthur, Tex., got a strong vote of support from the AFL-CIO Executive Council in their dispute with American Petrofina.

More than 400 members of the union have been on strike against the company and its subsidiary, Amdel Pipeline, since their contract expired Jan. 8.

American Petrofina forced the strike when it refused to accept a number of contract provisions already agreed to by most of the industry, the council said, adding that Texaco has adopted a similar attitude. OCAW workers also struck Texaco's Port Arthur plant in January.

The council noted that American Petrofina rebuffed a request by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to extend the contract while negotiations went on.

The key issues, in addition to wages, are the company's challenges to longstanding work practices that have for years been part of the contracts.

The council urged affiliates to inform their members on Petrofina's tactics against its workers. Company products are sold under the brand name Fina.

House, Senate Disagree On Cost-of-Living Slash For Government Retirees

The House balked at cutting pensions of retired government workers in order to meet congressional budget targets, but a slim 51-48 majority of the Senate voted to impose a 4 percent limit on cost-of-living adjustments for retirees in each of the next three years.

That's one of the conflicts the Democratic-controlled House and the Republican Senate will have to settle before agreeing on legislation that is supposed to provide spending cuts and revenue increases mandated by the budget Congress adopted last month.

REPUBLICANS ducked a direct confrontation of the issue in the House after losing a key procedural vote. The Democratic majority on the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee flatly refused to approve a COLA cutback, and brought to the floor a bill carrying substantially less "savings" than called for in the congressional budget resolutions.

The committee majority's reasoning was simple and blunt: they had not supported the budget resolution. If the Republicans and their conservative Democratic allies who adopted it wanted to penalize retired federal and postal workers and military retirees, let them vote to do so.

RETIREMENT benefits for government employees are the equivalent of social security benefits in the private sector, they noted, funded by payments from worker paychecks and from the government in its role as employer. Congress had declared the social security system's COLA immune from budget-cutting, and there was no just reason to single out federal workers.

House Republicans fumed at the "unfair" tactics of forcing them to vote on the effects of their budget actions and sought to get around the issue with a motion to send the bill back to committee with instructions to cut an additional $344 million in fiscal 1983 budget savings. But the recommittal motion was beaten, 236-180, and the House then approved the committee bill without the cost-of-living ceiling by a 268-128 vote.

The Senate, however, went along with a Governmental Affairs Committee recommendation for a 4 percent annual ceiling, but by a surprisingly slim majority.

The Senate calculated the "savings" on the retirement cut at $5 billion over three years. In the same bill, it made more modest trims in veterans' benefits by rounding off cost-of-living adjustments to the next lower dollar. Food stamp entitlements were cut more vigorously, for an estimated $2.5 billion reduction over three years.

IN ANOTHER area, the AFL-CIO urged a House-Senate conference committee to remedy some of the inequities in the tax increase bill passed by the Senate last month.

Many of the Senate provisions are desirable, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote the conferees. But there are provisions that add to "the tax burdens of low- and middle-income Americans who were shortchanged last year" and further penalize the needy and elderly.

He cited higher excise taxes on consumers, a new hospital insurance tax on federal workers, curtailment of medical deductions and casualty losses, among others.

House Approves Job Training Bill To Replace CETA

The House voted 356-52 approval of a labor-supported job training program to replace the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA), which expires on Sept. 30.

CETA was decimated by last year's budget cuts and its anti-recession public service jobs program was abolished early in the Reagan Administration.

THE HOUSE bill, like an earlier Senate-passed version, emphasizes job training for disadvantaged youth and authorizes special help for laid-off workers.

Differences between the two bills were somewhat narrowed by compromise amendments adopted by the House. But generally, the Senate bill gives greater control over training programs to governors while the House version has more local involvement, somewhat stronger labor standards and lesser employer domination of the training programs. One amendment adopted by the House earmarks funds to continue Job Corps programs.

Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), who steered the House bill to passage, has also sponsored a labor-supported public service bill which the House leadership has promised to schedule for floor action. But its prospects in the Senate are dimmer because of Administration opposition.

Before passing the job training bill, the House defeated by a 308-87 vote an amendment that sought to bar any training funds from going to farm worker organizations and rejected, 218-189, a Republican-sponsored amendment to bring the House version closer in line with the Senate bill.

Differences between the two measures will now be dealt with by a House-Senate conference committee.

'82 Human Rights Award Cites Two South Africans

New York—The Executive Council voted the George Meany International Human Rights Award for 1982 to two champions of black rights in South Africa, Neal Aggett and Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi.

Dr. Aggett, a white officer of the African Food & Canning Workers, a union of black workers, was honored posthumously. He was only 28 years old when found dead in Johannesburg jail. He was held by police without being charged.

Buthelezi is head of the largest black liberation movement in South Africa and is chief minister of the Zulu tribe.

Aggett and Buthelezi are the second recipients of the Meany award. Last year, the inaugural award was presented collectively to Solidarnosc, the Polish labor federation. Lech Walesa was scheduled to accept it at the November 1981 AFL-CIO Convention, but was unable to attend. Martial law was imposed in Poland a few weeks later.

An AFL-CIO delegation will visit South Africa in September.

Layoffs, Plant Closings Push Jobless Rate to 9.8 Percent

employed must be added 1.5 million more who have given up searching for jobs that do not exist, along with half of the 5.5 million who are working only part time because full time jobs are unavailable." Thus an unemployment rate of 13.6 percent, with 15.2 million persons jobless, is "nearer the truth."

Manufacturing jobs continued to decline, with cutbacks in the machinery industry accounting for nearly half the 90,000 job loss over the month. Manufacturing jobs are down by 1.5 million from a year ago.

FOR ADULTS, unemployment continued to rise—to 8.8 percent for men and 8.4 percent for women. A year ago, the corresponding rates were 5.8 percent for adult men and 6.7 percent for adult women.

Teenage unemployment rose over the month from 22.3 to a record 24.1 percent and Kirkland noted the irony that the increase "came in the month in which the Reagan Administration proposed to increase the teen-age labor pool by offering 14- and 15-year-olds to the job market at a subminimum wage."

BLS Commissioner Janet Norwood told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that employment of women is up from a year ago, when the current recession began, while employment among men is down. A major reason, she suggested, is that "women are far more likely than men to work in the service-producing sector of the economy. Since July 1981, employment in the service-producing sector increased by 280,000. Jobs in the goods-producing sector, however, declined by 1.8 million," she noted.

AND DESPITE repeated Administration predictions of an upturn in the economy, Norwood told the congressional panel that the employment data for July show "little labor market strength."

She told the committee that job losses during the first portion of the recession were concentrated in the construction and consumer durable goods industry — along with their "feeder" industries.

But since April, the big job declines were in mining and machinery. Especially hard hit were oil and gas field services and oil field machinery.

FROM JUNE to July, unemployment among whites rose from 8.4 to 8.8 percent. For blacks, it was unchanged at 18.5 percent. For Hispanics, unemployment rose from 13.5 to 13.9 percent.

By industry, construction unemployment rose over the year from 15.2 to 20.3 percent, manufacturing unemployment from 7.3 to 12 percent, retail and wholesale trade from 7.9 to 10.5 percent.

Child Labor Policy 'Rewriting Law'

New York — The Reagan Administration's move to gut child labor regulations is an attempt to rewrite the law "in complete disregard of the intent of Congress," the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

A council statement stressed that if the Labor Dept. is permitted to issue new regulations that would substantially extend the hours 14- and 15-year-old children can be required to work and permit them to hold some jobs deemed hazardous, the result will be a new pool of cheap, part-time labor that could be hired "to replace not only their older brothers and sisters but also their mothers and fathers."

THE LABOR DEPT. had planned to roll back protections for 14- and 15-year-olds on Aug. 16. But after a blast of public protest — including critical testimony by the AFL-CIO and others at congressional hearings and plans for introduction of a joint resolution to block the cuts by Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) and Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.)—the Administration put the changes on hold and extended the original 30-day comment period to 180 days, after the November elections.

The delay also applies to a companion proposal that would have removed the requirement that employers reapply annually for certification to pay full-time students less than the minimum wage.

At a press conference, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said he welcomed the Labor Dept.'s postponements. He hoped it indicated "that they are now prepared to do what they should have done before they put out this idiotic proposition, that is, talk to the people who have some concern and experience and interest in these matters—other than the fry kitchens and junk food joints of this land."

THE COUNCIL asserted that the real motive of the Administration's rule changes was not to open jobs for youth but to put more children to work at 50¢ less than minimum wage.

"This is an Administration attempt to roll back the clock on child labor at a time when it refuses to offer job-creating programs for adults and vetoes those proposed by Congress," the statement emphasized.

The council pointed to a Government Accounting Office study that links teenage unemployment to poor reading, writing and math skills. The work of school age children "is their school work," the statement said, warning that the Labor Dept.'s plans to gut labor standards will have a "long-term, devastating effect."

BY THE LABOR Dept.'s own admission, the council said, it is the fast-food and amusement park industries that are pressing for the new rules.

It is no surprise, the council pointed out, that the first attempts to weaken the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act "are directed at supplying cheap labor for the retail and service industries which the statement cited as "the worst violators" of the FLSA according to records of the Minimum Wage Study Commission.

The council accused the Labor Dept. of attempting to put in place a youth subminimum wage by manipulating the certification regulations and "flooding the market" with younger children.

IT WARNED that drastic cuts in the department's enforcement staff undermine safeguards against exploitation and assure that violations will go undetected.

Again, the statement said, the Reagan Administration Labor Dept. is acting as a "law-wrecker and not a law-enforcer." It sees its role "as reducing worker protections rather than maintaining them" and as a cheap labor recruiter for employers.

Economic 'Summit' Criticized for Platitudes

New York—Leaders of the world's leading industrial nations came up with platitudes instead of solutions to unemployment at last June's summit meeting of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development (OECD).

That was the evaluation of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, and of the OECD's Trade Union Advisory Committee, which had urged international cooperation in developing policies on full employment and job creation.

THE COUNCIL found one virtue in the OECD's economic analysis—a more realistic look at the weaknesses of the U.S. economy than the Reagan Administration has taken. But it said the AFL-CIO was "dismayed" by the failure of the seven heads of state who met at Versailles, France, last June to come to grips with basic issues.

From the heads of Britain, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States came "only platitudes" and continued reliance "on unsuccessful monetarist policies," the council said.

The AFL-CIO will "intensify its participation" in the Trade Union Advisory Committee to the OECD, the Executive Council said, "and continue to press for a greater voice for the trade union movement in the deliberations of the OECD."

Flat Out Inequitable

THE AFL-CIO HAS LONG supported reforms in the tax structure that would lead to tax justice. The cornerstone of tax justice is a progressive tax based on the principle of ability to pay. A variety of new tax proposals has been put forth, some as flat taxes, some as hybrids, each offering to bring simplification to the tax structure. The AFL-CIO supports tax simplification with tax equity and the maintenance of a progressive tax structure.

The flat-rate tax schemes would abandon the basic principle of equity, and instead apply a single percentage rate for all regardless of income level or ability to pay. The Reagan Administration that stacked the 1981 tax changes to benefit the wealthy now flirts with the flat tax as yet another scheme to further shift the tax burden to low- and middle-income Americans.

THE WEALTHY are saying indirectly that they might have to give up a few of their preferences in exchange for a drastic reduction in the top rate and the destruction of a progressive tax system.

In spite of the general impression that the current system is not equitable, the greater inequity of a flat-rate tax is borne out in an analysis prepared by the Congressional Joint Committee on Taxation. The analysis compares the effect of flat tax rates, ranging from 12 percent to 18 percent, on taxpayers of various income levels. In every case, low- and middle-income taxpayers suffer tax increases while those with higher incomes enjoy substantial tax cuts.

THE FLAT-TAX schemes are based on the theory that Congress would end many deductions, credits, and exclusions and eliminate many longstanding loopholes and preferences. However, if Congress were inclined to eliminate longstanding and clearly identifiable loopholes and preferences, like capital gains, foreign tax credits and oil depletion allowances, it could do so now—and could do so while maintaining a progressive tax structure.

This it has not done. Loophole closing is the key to tax justice, but that has nothing to do with flat rates. Even if the income that currently slips through the loopholes and escape hatches were included, a flat tax would still be far more inequitable than the present system despite its many flaws.

The AFL-CIO is unalterably opposed to flat-rate tax schemes.

TAX JUSTICE must begin with undoing the damage done to the tax structure by the Reagan Administration and enacting the full range of measures necessary to:

- End the double standard which taxes workers' wages and salaries at far higher rates than "unearned income" from capital gains and estates of the wealthy.
- Reinstate the corporate income tax as a source of federal revenue and equity and eliminate the so-called "incentives" that subsidize mergers, takeovers, plant shutdowns, overseas investments and other activities that conflict with the national interest.
- Provide a basic structure of graduated rates which fully reflect the principle of ability to pay.

Top Economists Expose Folly Of Balanced Budget Scheme

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN PEOPLE are overwhelmed by frustration in a situation they can't do anything about, it often feels good to say, "There oughta be a law."

That's one explanation of the movement in Congress for a constitutional amendment to balance the federal budget.

But when President Reagan went to Capitol Hill to lead a pro-amendment rally, it inspired speculation that he might have twin motives. He may have sensed that deep frustration; then, too, he also may want to blame his own historic deficit on the Democratic-controlled House if it blocks the amendment.

THE VERY simplicity of the balanced budget amendment holds great appeal for hardline conservatives who finally have one of their own in the White House. And it probably also makes sense for many Americans who view the federal budget as a hodgepodge of bewildering numbers.

It was in this atmosphere that a group of leading economists held a press conference in Washington to inject some reason into the debate.

Gardner Ackley, a former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and now teaching at the University of Michigan, took responsibility for promoting an open letter in opposition to the balanced budget amendment.

THE LETTER of opposition was signed by 181 leading economists including Nobel Laureates Kenneth Arrow, Lawrence Klein, Wassily Leontief, Paul Samuelson, Herbert Simon and James Tobin. Eleven former presidents of the American Economics Association also signed the letter.

Ackley, current president of the AEA, told the press that the professional economists of America regard the proposed amendment as "bad public policy."

Hendrik Houthakker, who teaches at Harvard and served on the Council of Economic Advisers under President Nixon, said the amendment is "as phoney as a three-dollar bill."

Houthakker, a Republican, said there are better ways to pursue it, as through the Employment Act or the Humphrey-Hawkins Act. A budget by nature is an estimate, he said, and can be biased.

Economist and lawyer Robert R. Nathan said the amendment would "degrade" the Constitution and he called it "purely political." Charles Schultze, President Carter's economic adviser, said it would "wreck or trivialize" the budget process.

James Tobin, the 1981 Nobel Prize winner, said the theory behind the amendment is "unsubstantiated and dubious." Andrew Brimmer, former governor of the Federal Reserve Board, tied the deficit to the recession and huge 1981 tax cut.

IN AN EARLIER analysis of Senate Joint Resolution 58, which embodies the amendment, Ackley said the amendment rests on the theory that most of the nation's economic problems are attributable to federal deficits and fiscal policies. He said such a theory has no support in either professional opinion or analysis.

Ackley also noted that the amendment's provision enables 40 percent of either the House or Senate to block actions backed by a substantial majority. This has serious implications in a representative system, he said, for issues involving education, foreign affairs and civil rights, which are related to spending decisions.

Taking on other myths behind the amendment, Ackley's analysis dealt with the belief that government has an insatiable appetite for tax revenues. It may be true, he said, that total government spending rose over the past quarter century from 24.8 percent of GNP to 33.5 percent. But a closer look reveals, he said, that nearly the entire increase was in federal transfer payments as social security matured. This drew no net resources from the private sector to public use, he added.

ACKLEY ALSO disposed of the belief that the federal payroll has swollen out of control. He noted the small and stable size of the federal workforce as a proportion of the labor force; it has actually shrunk to 2.8 percent now from 3.5 percent in 1956.

He also noted that national deficits in most years are the lowest of any of six other leading industrial nations. Over a five-year period, he said both Japan and West Germany—often pointed to for their economic performances—in each year have had much larger deficits than the United States.

MEMO FROM COPE

Risks of Prophecy: Troughs, Transitions And Bottoming Out

"Our economic plan is to begin with the 1982 fiscal year on October 1 (1981). I am as convinced today as I was when we introduced the package that this economic plan is as good as money in the bank —and if I were a betting man, I would wager the rent money on it." —President Reagan 9/18/81

"I think this is a light, and I hope short, recession." —President Reagan 10/18/81

"Forces already are in motion" that will reverse the recession.
—Murray Wiedenbaum, then chairman of Council of Economic Advisers 10/18/81

"1982 and subsequent years will show vigorous, perhaps unprecedented, economic growth."
—Treasury Secretary Donald Regan 10/31/81

"We have laid a firm foundation for economic recovery in 1982. . . . Our plan for economic recovery is sound." —President Reagan 11/10/81

He (President Reagan) believes that the tax cuts already in place will contain the recession and produce a sustained recovery by next spring or early summer. —Business Week 11/23/81

"At the time this report was prepared . . . it appeared that the recession . . . will be over by the second quarter of 1982. . . . Output and employment are expected to increase slightly in the second quarter and at a brisk pace through the rest of the year."
—President Reagan, Report to Congress 2/10/82

"Obviously, we are not out of the woods yet. There will still be some difficult days ahead. But at least we're heading in the right direction."
—President Reagan 2/18/82

"We all agree the second quarter will be the turning point." —Murray Wiedenbaum 2/18/82

President Reagan urged Republican faithful today (May 14) to stick with his economic program, saying that, despite continued high interest rates and record levels of unemployment, there are signs that "We've been in the trough; we've been at the bottom." —Washington Post 5/15/82

"We believe economic recovery is imminent."
—President Reagan 6/3/82

"The economy is at a very delicate stage. It's in a turning zone from low growth and high inflation to high growth and low inflation."
—Budget Director David Stockman 6/30/82

"You can't turn it around in a hundred days," said a senior (Reagan Administration) official.
—NY Times 7/10/82

"Clearly, we have bottomed out of the recession. Things are beginning to turn up."
—Murray Wiedenbaum 7/21/82

"Our current economic troubles are the direct result of the mistakes of the past—mistakes we've begun to correct. We've begun to rescue this economy, and the first evidence of recovery has been sighted. . . . Slowly and surely, we're working our way back to prosperity. . . .

"It is going to be slow, and it's slow now. But . . . we are in a transition period . . . and I think we're going to see an improvement in the second half of this year. . . ." —President Reagan 7/28/82

New Right Zap Losing Zip

Are "new right" political committees losing their knockout punch? It's not too early in the political year to ask the question, though it's too soon to provide a definitive answer.

The fact is, there is evidence that the haymakers they connected with in 1980 in helping defeat a platoon of progressive U.S. Senators so far are not scoring this year. In 1980, their "negative" independent expenditures campaigns caught their targeted candidates off guard. They had a field day.

But this year, targets of new right PACs have their fists up and are counter-punching. The new right took off after Maryland Sen. Paul Sarbanes a year age, shelled out $500,000 for TV ads to discredit him, earmarked another $500,000 through election day.

Unlike the incumbents so treated in 1980, Sarbanes was ready. He threw his own flurry against "the politics of fear and smear." The public seemed ready, too, and polls showed little decrease in Sarbanes' standing with voters, despite constant new right negative ads on TV and radio.

New right PACs are pulling the same stunt against Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.), Robert Byrd (W.Va.), Quentin Burdick (N.D.), George Mitchell (Maine), John Melcher (Mont.), and other Senate and House incumbents—without the impact of their 1980 campaigns. The zip is going out of their zap.

Their problem is not lack of money. Funding for major new right PACs runs well ahead of the 1979-1980 election cycle. For example, right-wing Sen. Jesse Helms's personal political toy, the Congressional Club, already has hauled in more than $7 million; the National Conservative PAC (NCPAC) more than $6 million.

Part of their problem could be some of their own troops—while continuing to kick in cash—just don't believe the promises with the same blind faith of two years ago, when the election of Reagan and a GOP-controlled Senate was hailed as the advent of a new Eden, right-wing style. Some of this stems from the peppering many right-wing leaders have been giving President Reagan, whom they spent years worshipping and trying to elect.

They're mad at him for all the wrong reasons, but their complaints are widely broadcast among the faithful. They crab about some of his key appointments as if he recruited from the Red Army. They beef endlessly about his "palace guard" of advisers who, they contend, don't put their social issues on the front burner.

Yet, here is the President pushing all their pet constitutional amendments, and his basic economic program is exactly what rightists have been clamoring for for years, but it isn't working—and they can neither understand nor excuse the Reagan deficits.

Actually, one right-wing PAC leader—Terry Dolan of NCPAC—pins the blame on Reagan for what he (Dolan) predicts will be a low-yield year for his gang politically.

Even if the notion that the right-wing PACs will swing roundhouse rights and hit mostly air this year turns out to be wrong, it will simply have been two, or perhaps four, years premature. What's happening to the right is what happens to most rabidly ideological, uncompromising movements. They find they're at their best as the "out" group, when they can carp from ringside.

When they're in the ring and don't score a quick KO, their followers—without stomach for the long haul—leave the arena and go on to other things.

Odds 'n Ends

MILLIONS OF CHILDREN victimized by Reagan-GOP budget cuts, Children's Defense Fund reports. Group's estimate: 661,000 children lose Medicaid protections; 900,000 poor and near-poor youngsters lose free and reduced-cost school lunches; 280,000 lose free or reduced-price breakfasts. In addition: 150,000 poor working families on verge of losing eligibility for government-supported day care for their children; 200,000 fewer pregnant women, new mothers, infants and children are receiving special federal coupons for milk, juice and other diet supplements; one million persons—many of them children—are dumped from food stamp rolls.

FROM CONSERVATIVE commentator Kevin Phillips comes this observation: "Over the 60 years prior to January 1981, six out of seven GOP administrations managed to 'squeeze' liberal economics enough to help trigger a recession by their second year, just in time for the congressional elections. Inasmuch as Reaganite planners took office either unaware of or determined to ignore this electoral-economic history, the record now stands at seven out of eight. . . ."

STILL ZOOMING on upward spiral is cost of medical care, which soared by 15.1 percent in 1981, soaking up 9.8 percent of the gross national product. Total health care tab for the year: $287 billion—or $1,225 per person in U.S.

5 Races ... 33,191 Votes ... Poof, There Goes the Senate!

It's conceded from the top that you can play a lot of games with numbers. But a case can be made that Republicans now hold numerical control of the U.S. Senate on the strength of only 33,191 votes out of 4,556,211 votes cast in five Senate elections—three in 1980, two in 1978.

Had those figures occurred in one election, the winner's edge would have been seven-tenths of one percent of the total vote.

That aggregate seven-tenths retained one incumbent and installed four newcomers into the Senate, clinching a lock on that body by the GOP and solidifying right-wing ideological control. The following chart lists the five close races.

STATE/YEAR	WINNER/LOSER	VOTE MARGIN	TOTAL VOTES CAST
Idaho 1980	Steve Symms/ Frank Church	4,262	433,140
North Carolina 1980	John East/ Robert Morgan	10,411	1,785,717
Arizona 1980	Barry Goldwater/ Bill Schulz	9,389	855,343
New Hamp. 1978	Gordon Humphrey/ Tom McIntyre	4,408	260,268
Virginia 1978	John Warner/ Andrew Miller	4,721	1,221,743

Labor Blasts Doctoring Of Cancer Risk Report

Average Pay Increases Cut By Recession

Average wage gains in major collective bargaining settlements during the first half of 1982 dropped sharply from the level of a year earlier, largely because of union concessions in the troubled auto and trucking industries.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the average first-year increase in settlements covering 1,000 or more workers in the first six months was 3 percent, compared with 7.7 percent in the first half of 1981. Measured over the life of the contracts, the average annual wage adjustment was 2.7 percent, against 6 percent a year earlier.

NEARLY THREE-FIFTHS of the 1.9 million workers covered by the settlements are employed under contracts that specify no wage increase, and more than 90 percent of this group is in the automobile and trucking industries where the unions renegotiated their contracts, granting wage concessions to preserve jobs and minimize layoffs in the face of depressed business.

For workers scheduled to receive pay boosts under major first-half settlements, the average increase is 7 percent in the first contract year and 6.2 percent annually over the life of the contract. Settlements in construction and apparel manufacturing account for about half the workers in this group. The rest are in a variety of industries, including airlines and railroads, retail trade, and finance, insurance and real estate.

Nearly all the workers not scheduled for specified pay increases could receive cost-of-living adjustments under contract COLA clauses keyed to the consumer price index. But COLAs are not included in average settlement calculations because they depend on unknown future changes in the CPI, the report noted.

ABOUT 73 PERCENT of the workers covered by first-half settlements have COLA clause protection, but about three-fourths of these workers are in the group not scheduled for specified pay raises. For that reason, the average wage gain in settlements with COLA clauses was much lower than usual—1.4 percent in the first year compared with 7.2 percent in contract settlements without COLA clauses.

Settlements with COLA clauses had an average term of 33 months compared with 25 months for those without such clauses.

COLA clauses were introduced or reestablished in contract settlements covering 130,000 workers, primarily in the apparel industry, while COLA clauses were dropped in settlements covering 42,000 workers.

THE BUREAU reported that the application of COLA clauses under reviews scheduled in the first half of 1982 recovered about three-fourths of the rise in the consumer price index for some 2.4 million workers, with increases averaging 1.8 percent.

In another section of the report, the BLS said effective wage adjustments during the first six months—current settlements, deferred increases and COLAs—resulted in an average increase of 4.9 percent for the 5.1 million workers under

CARRIER ALERT program to serve elderly or handicapped postal customers is expanding under the joint endorsement of the Letter Carriers and the U.S. Postal Service. Carriers like Ray Byers of NALC Branch 3520, chatting with customers in Bailey's Crossroads, Va., [illegible] marked mailboxes of older, disabled or homebound people on their routes. An unusual build-up of mail that could be a sign of trouble will be reported to a local social service agency which will check out the residence. (Story on Page 2.)

NLRB Revokes Its Ban On Election Deception

False and deceptive last-minute statements by management or unions will no longer be grounds for setting aside the results of a representation election, the National Labor Relations Board ruled.

Its 3-2 decision marked the NLRB's third flip-flop on the issue in five years, and reflects the changed membership on the labor board.

IN THE MAJORITY this time are the NLRB's three newest members — Chairman John Van de Water, Robert Hunter and Don Zimmerman.

Dissenting were former Chairman John Fanning and Howard Jenkins. The last time the NLRB dealt with the issue—in 1978—they were part of a 3-2 majority.

The new Van de Water majority ruled that deception won't invalidate an election unless it involves forgery of a document that isn't likely to be recognized as propaganda. Otherwise, anything goes—even if the other side doesn't have a chance to set the record straight.

AFL-CIO Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler said the practical effect of the new policy favors employers.

WHILE UNIONS have sometimes had election victories overturned, most cases of unfair last-minute tactics involve employer misconduct, Kistler noted. He expressed concern that some employers might see the board policy as a green light for last-minute "dirty tricks."

The case that led to the NLRB's change of policy involved the Midland National Life Insurance Co. of Sioux Falls, S.D.—a firm with a record of labor law violations. The company had enclosed in the pay envelopes that workers received just before the NLRB vote a packet of false attacks on Food & Commercial Workers local that was seeking representation rights.

Typical was a picture of a closed factory with a text claiming that the plant was shut down by a UFCW strike, and "Now, all the workers are gone."

In fact, there had been no strike for

Urges Probe Of Chemical Industry Role

The AFL-CIO has urged a thorough congressional investigation of the role of a federal agency and the chemical industry in altering a scientific report on the risks of cancer from exposure to benzene at currently accepted levels.

George H. R. Taylor, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, expressed labor's concern over the incident in a letter to Rep. David R. Obey (D-Wis.). Taylor cited the action of the International Agency for Research on Cancer in altering an assessment of the cancer risk from benzene without the consent of the scientific panel that prepared the report.

THE MONOGRAPH issued by the IARC, a subsidiary of the World Health Organization, contained in draft form a paragraph estimating a minimum of 140 to 170 workers exposed to 100 parts of benzene per million parts of air (100 ppm) over a working lifetime of 35 years. It also estimated that exposure at a level of 10 ppm would result in at least 14 to 17 excess deaths per 1,000 workers.

When the monograph was published, however, the reference to the cancer risk at the 10 ppm exposure level did not appear.

Benzene is a known cancer-causing agent, a fact that the IARC monograph specifically acknowledged. The chemical is widely used throughout industry, and upward of two million American workers are exposed to it daily on the job. Its presence in consumer products and in the environment as a result of pollution also affects the general public.

THE 10 PPM level is the current industry threshold exposure to benzene in the workplace. A standard of 1 ppm has been recommended by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health, but in 1980

House Backs Labor's Stand On Food Stamps, Pesticides

Labor's position prevailed in House votes on food stamp eligibility and health hazards for workers exposed to pesticides.

The food stamp issue came up in a bill that pushed spending levels for agricultural programs below the budget ceilings set by Congress.

Republicans wanted to make further cuts at the expense of the food stamp program, which was severely reduced in last year's budget cuts and faced further trims in the new bill cleared by the House Agriculture Committee.

THE GOP SUBSTITUTE would have made hungry families wait five days instead of two days for "emergency" issuance of food stamps and would have eliminated "expedited service" for families suddenly without income because of job loss or causes such as a wage-earner's desertion of a family. It also would have required states to impose stringent job search requirements on all food stamp recipients and set severe financial penalties for states that do not bring their "error rate" in processing food stamp eligibility below 5 percent.

Agriculture Committee Chairman E. Kika de la Garza (D-Tex.) protested that the Republican proposal would deny food to people "fully eligible" for the program "at a time when they need food desperately." To a migrant family with no money and no food, the extra days of delay under the GOP substitute "can be a very long time," he stressed.

The House defeated the food stamp cutbacks by a 210-181 vote.

OCAW Challenges NLRB's Ruling On Scrapping of Union Contracts

A National Labor Relations Board decision that would allow an employer to toss aside a union contract will be appealed by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

In the ruling, the NLRB dismissed OCAW's charges that Amoco Production Co. of Houston broke federal labor law when it informed employees it was voiding an agreement with their unaffiliated local union after they had voted overwhelmingly to affiliate with OCAW.

OCAW will appeal the ruling to the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals to review the board's ruling.

John Van de Water, currently serving as NLRB chairman, and members Howard Jenkins, Jr. and Robert P. Hunter signed the majority opinion which held that the non-members in the unit should have been allowed to participate in the vote just as all employees are permitted to vote in representation elections.

In a dissenting opinion, members John H. Fanning and Donald Zimmerman said the election met all requirements of the law and pointed out that the vote on whether to affiliate with OCAW was an internal union matter similar to votes on contract ratification, election of officers or [illegible]

If an employee is given fair opportunities to join a union and participate in its affairs, Fanning and Zimmerman said, and then chooses not to do so, "he is responsible for his own disenfranchisement."

The case dates to 1974 when the unaffiliated National Oil Workers Union mailed ballots to 382 members of Amoco Production's 480 employees for a vote on affiliation with the AFL-CIO union. The vote was 214 to 71 in favor of joining OCAW.

Prior to the balloting, NOWU had conducted a series of nine meetings on the question for which advance notices were posted on plant bulletin boards. Workers who attended the meetings were told that they had to become members of the union to participate in the vote and that they could do so by signing a dues authorization form.

When the union notified the company of the results and said it was going to continue its relationship with Amoco as OCAW Local 4-14, the company sent a letter to each employee saying its contract with the union was void.

IN 1975, the NLRB upheld OCAW's complaint that Amoco had violated provisions of the National Labor Relations Act by refusing to bargain and repudiating its agreement.

In continuing action the board reaffirmed its decision, but in 1980 the 5th Circuit Court remanded the case to the NLRB for more study of the facts, leading to the current decision.

Fanning and Zimmerman said in their dissent that the majority ruling deprives employees "of their freely chosen representative and denies to them the fruits of collective bargaining which the (National Labor Relations Act) was designed to guarantee."

NLRB Policy Shift Discards Ban on Election Deception

more than 18 months before the plant closing and no link between the two events. Other enclosures were equally deceptive.

THE NLRB majority agreed that the hearing officer had properly applied the labor board's standard in recommending that the election—which the union lost on a 107-107 tie vote—be rerun.

But it said the standard for invalidating an election should be changed since it involved subjective judgments as to what is deceptive and didn't give enough credit to the "natural skepticism" with which workers view election campaign claims.

"We rule today that we will no longer probe into the truth or falsity of the parties' campaign statements and that we will not set elections aside on the basis of misleading campaign statements," the Van de Water majority said.

IN A SHARP dissent, Fanning and Jenkins protested the decision of "a bare majority of the board" to scrap a "flexible and balanced standard" that has worked well and replace it with "an ultra-permissive standard that places a premium on the well-timed use of deception, trickery and fraud."

The policy the NLRB scrapped "did not attempt to sanitize elections completely but only to keep the campaign propaganda within reasonable bounds," the dissenters noted. But under the new rule, there will be no check on "unscrupulous . . . professional opinion molders who devise campaigns for many of our representation elections."

And while the majority said it will consider an exception in the event of a forged document, Fanning and Jenkins saw little distinction between a forgery and the action of the employer in the case before the board of taking entirely out of context data from the union's financial report. It gave the false impression that union dues "benefited only union officials . . . and ingeniously made the union itself appear to be the source of this misinformation."

The policy that the new NLRB majority overturned stems from a 1955 decision that was refined in a 1962 standard in which the board said "an election should be set aside only where there has been a misrepresentation or other similar campaign trickery, which involves a substantial departure from the truth, at a time which prevents the other party or parties from making an effective reply, so that the misrepresentation, whether deliberate or not, may reasonably be expected to have a significant impact on the election."

In 1977 — as happened this year — changed membership of the board led to a 3-2 decision dropping this standard and abandoning NLRB concern with last-minute misrepresentations. Then as now, Jenkins and Fanning were in the minority.

Twenty months later, in December 1978, a change in board membership put Jenkins and Fanning in a 3-2 majority that returned to the earlier standard, which then prevailed until the current reversal.

The immediate effect was to give the management of Midland National Life a victory in its long anti-union campaign since certification of the tie vote meant that the UFCW local "had not received a majority of valid votes cast."

Conservative Economist New Reagan Adviser

Harvard economist Martin Feldstein has been named by President Reagan to succeed Murray Weidenbaum as chairman of the President's Council of Emonomic Advisers. The Senate must confirm the appointment.

Feldstein, 42, also heads the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private group in Cambridge, Mass., known mostly for its pronouncements on the beginning and ending of recessions.

A conservative economist, Feldstein has supported much of the Administration's supply-side economic policy and the Federal Reserve Board's restrictive monetary policy.

Weidenbaum resigned from the CEA chairmanship to return to teaching at Washington University in St. Louis. Feldstein has taken a two-year leave of absence from Harvard.

Carrier Alert Plan Widened By Mail Union

An on-going Letter Carriers community service program for the elderly and disabled will be expanding as a result of a formal agreement between the union and the Postal Service.

NALC President Vincent R. Sombrotto and Postmaster General William F. Bolger signed a joint statement of support for the Carrier Alert program.

THE PROGRAM also has the approval of the American Red Cross, the United Way and the Health & Human Services Dept.'s Administration on Aging.

Under the Carrier Alert plan, elderly, disabled or homebound people will be able to register with a local community service agency to have their mailboxes specially marked. Local letter carriers will keep an eye on the boxes for unusual accumulations of mail that could be a signal of distress.

The carriers will report the situation to their postal station, which will alert the sponsoring agency responsible for quickly checking out the home.

PARTICIPATION IN the program by letter carriers, post offices and local agencies as well as the postal customers will be voluntary.

At the signing ceremony, Sombrotto pointed out that frequently the only regular contact elderly or handicapped people have is the daily visit from their local letter carrier.

"Having the carrier alerted to look for signs of distress provides an extra measure of security," he said, adding that the Carrier Alert program "is a joint effort by labor and management to create a permanent framework for the spontaneous acts of helpfulness letter carriers frequently perform in the course of their daily duties."

Sombrotto cited incidents in pilot carrier alert programs where letter carriers have spotted an unusual mail build-up and the agencies have entered the homes to find the elderly person lying injured from a fall or severe illness.

THE AFL-CIO Community Services Dept. participated in the planning of several of the experimental alert programs.

Bolger noted that concern of the carriers for their customers is not new, but the joint endorsement of union-management participation in the program at the local level is.

House Committee Votes to Revive Credit Controls

A labor-supported bill to revive the Credit Control Act won 24-18 approval from the House Banking Committee.

The measure, which the AFL-CIO considers an important tool for economic recovery, is sponsored by Committee Chairman Fernand J. St Germain (D-R.I.). It would reinstate, with some clarifications, standby authority for the government to regulate credit so that available funds will be channeled to the most productive uses.

President Carter used credit controls to help bring down interest rates in a previous recession, but the law expired June 30 and the Reagan Administration doesn't want it renewed.

THE LEGISLATION approved by the committee authorizes the President to trigger Federal Reserve Board authority to regulate credit in order to lower interest rates during recessions as well as to fight inflation. It also would give the Federal Reserve new authority to investigate any credit transaction for $100 million or more that involves a corporate takeover.

Committee voting generally followed party lines, but Rep. Stuart B. McKinney (R-Conn.) broke with the GOP to support the bill, while several conservative Democrats opposed it.

Convention Strengthens Programs

Bakery-Tobacco Union Seeks Cadre of Activists

Hollywood, Fla.—The 31st convention of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers acted to strengthen the union's education and organizing programs in keeping with the convention theme—"Braving Changing Times"—and adopted an increase in per capita payments to support the effort.

The more than 600 delegates overwhelmingly approved resolutions to finance an aggressive, regionalized education program and create a new full-time position of organizing director.

THE EXPANDED programs along with other costs will be financed by per capita increases of $1 per month effective Jan. 1, 1983, and Jan. 1, 1985. The current monthly per capita payment is $3.75.

Other constitutional changes approved by the convention provide for increases in the minimum dues rates for local unions, currently $8 a month, to $10 on Jan. 1, 1983, and $12 in 1985. The daily strike benefit, now $5, will rise to $6 and $7 on the same schedule.

President John DeConcini, in his keynote address to the delegates, said the goal of the regional education program is to develop "a cadre of 2,000 to 3,000 additional activists who will become politically active, who will assist in organizing, who will talk 'pro-union' in the locker room, on the shop floor, when they're out for a beer, who will take on the union's work wherever they go. . . . We need to unionize the organized."

On organizing, DeConcini noted the loss of 10,000 members over the past four years as a result of layoffs, plant closings and automation, but stressed, "We are not going to pull in our horns."

IN REVIEWING the union's progress, DeConcini expressed particular pride in the successful merger of the Bakery & Confectionery Workers and the Tobacco Workers which created the BC&T at the last convention in 1978.

In a major address to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland also cited the merger, observing that it has benefited both the unions involved and had taken place "smoothly and harmoniously, an indication of the sense of common purpose and brotherhood at all levels" of the organization.

Kirkland reviewed the harsh effects of the Reagan Administration's supply-side policies on the nation's workers, noting that "the billions taken from the people" in tax breaks for corporations and wealthy individuals "are not being plowed back into job-producing investments" as Reagan and his advisers had promised.

"INSTEAD," he said, "they are being spent on corporate cannibalism—takeovers and acquisitions that produce not one job, but rather destroy jobs and close factories."

Kirkland cited the spirit of determination arising among union members throughout the country "to march again on Solidarity Day 1982—Election Day—to change this country's direction."

"We have just three short months," he continued, "to support candidates for the Senate and the House who care about people and to see that all the people we can reach are registered to vote, that they know the candidates and their voting records and their positions on the issues, and that they thoroughly understand what is at stake in this election."

KIRKLAND'S theme was picked up by other speakers, including Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.).

"What is most appalling to me as a member of Congress," Sarbanes said, "is the attitude of the Reagan Administration—its lack of respect, sensitivity and understanding of working men and women and their families."

NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks reminded the delegates of the natural alliance between blacks, other minorities and the labor movement.

DeConcini was re-elected unanimously for another four-year term, along with Sec.-Treas. Rene Rondou and Executive Vice President Graydon E. Tetrick.

Other speakers included Richard Mercier, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress; Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randoph Institute; Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women; Henry Lacayo, chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement; Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and the retired former director of that department, William Kircher; Robert Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept.; John Mara, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and Al Barkan, who retired last year as COPE director for the AFL-CIO.

HARSH EFFECTS of the Reagan Administration's supply-side economics on America's workers could be reversed by a massive turn-out of union members at the election polls in November, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers delegates. At the head table are BCT President John DeConcini, left, and Sec.-Treas. Rene Rondou, who were re-elected.

McBride Says Steel Industry Sought Too Many Givebacks

Pittsburgh—Steel companies "went too far" in pressing for wage concessions by workers and some 400 local union presidents voted unanimously to reject a wage freeze and keep in effect the third and final year of the basic steel contract.

That's the course that was recommended by USWA leaders who had sought to reach an agreement with the unemployment-battered industry that would have traded contract concessions for strengthened job security.

USWA PRESIDENT Lloyd McBride told reporters that union and industry negotiators "spent a great deal of time trying to find answers to our mutual problems" but simply couldn't agree.

Thus, union members in the steel industry received their scheduled 23-cent average wage increases plus a 25-cent-an-hour cost-of-living adjustment on Aug. 1, along with other previously negotiated contract improvements.

Management had sought a freeze that would have eliminated both payments, reduced starting wages by $3-an-hour and a cap on future cost-of-living increases.

"We were prepared to recommend some sacrifice," McBride said. But the management proposal "went too far. The industry gave us a final proposal and said, 'if you can't accept that, then there's no deal.'"

THE RESULT was "no deal" as the local union presidents, who had been assembled to act on any proposed contract change concurred with the leadership's recommendation to reject management's proposal.

"The amount of sacrifice that our members were asked to take under this proposal were substantially larger than those given in auto or any major industry within the past year," McBride pointed out.

"We will uphold our part of the last year of the current agreement in the industry," he added. "We will always be ready to discuss new and reasonable proposals from the industry in anticipation of 1983 negotiations."

McBride said he expected negotiations with the industry for a new contract to begin next winter or spring. The existing three-year agreement expires in August 1983.

Western Summer Institute Draws 58 Union Women

Eugene, Ore.—The first Western Regional Summer Institute for Union Women was held at the University of Oregon here, and 58 women unionists completed the intensive six-day course.

The participants represented 22 unions in California, Colorado, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon and Washington.

Plenary sessions covered labor issues of special interest to women including the effect of the changing economy on women, comparable pay for work of comparable worth, sexual harassment, and technological change.

Afternoon workshops offered skill training in grievance handling, bargaining, newsletters and public relations, political action skills, community services, organizing and leadership skills.

The institute was one of four sponsored this summer by the University & College Labor Education Association with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

Speakers at the conference included Oregon AFL-CIO President Irvin H. Fletcher and AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, who also presented diplomas to the graduates.

The other institutes were held this summer in Austin, Tex., Storrs, Conn., and Bloomington, Ind. The women's summer institute program is six years old, but 1982 was the first year that a conference was held in the Northwest. The program was coordinated by Leila Wrathall, an instructor at the university's labor education and research center.

House Votes Support Labor Stands

Pesticide & Rodenticide bill, to renew the authority of a law that will expire this year, labor's concern was the safety and health of workers handling commercial pesticides.

The chemical industry lobbied hard to weaken access to health and safety data on the grounds of protecting trade secrets. And it especially sought to have the federal law supersede any state law that provided more stringent standards. That effort was aimed at nullifying California's labor-supported law, which is intended especially to protect farm workers.

Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote House members that the AFL-CIO supported the bill only if it were strengthened by amendments protecting the authority of stronger state laws, eliminating restrictions on public access to health and safety data and allowing private citizens access to federal courts to litigate violations of the registration and disclosure law.

A 250-154 VOTE for the state laws amendment and voice vote approval of the other provisions led to passage of the pesticide control measure with labor support. The Senate has not yet acted on the issue.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, House-Senate conference committees had not yet completed action on a number of labor concerns, including an additional period of extended unemployment benefits and a rollback of changes in the law imposed by Congress last year which threaten to virtually wipe out the extended benefits program despite the continued surge in unemployment. That was one of the issues before the conference dealing with the Senate-passed tax bill.

In other areas, the AFL-CIO expressed its views on pending issues in letters that:

- Reiterated the AFL-CIO's opposition to tax credits for tuition paid to private elementary and secondary schools. In a letter to Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.), the federation said the concept threatens public education and will reduce revenue "when Congress and the Administration are cutting mercilessly into federal programs, including federal aid to education."

Subsequently, Dole announced that the committee will stop marking up the Reagan-supported bill until the Administration can provide guarantees that it would not cover private schools that discriminate.

- Suggested in letters to senators a number of changes needed in an immigration reform bill scheduled to reach the Senate floor soon.

The key to effective controls, the federation stressed is "penalties on employers who knowingly hire" unauthorized aliens. "We believe this approach can be made to succeed without stimulating economic discrimination against any ethnic group," the AFL-CIO said.

- Strongly supported the National Development Investment Act, scheduled for early House action, which continues and strengthens both the Public Works & Economic Development Act and the Appalachian Regional Development Act.

The legislation provides 50 percent federal grants to states, economic development districts and local governments for economic development goals. It authorizes $500 million annually for three years for construction, repair and improvement of public facilities and for revolving loan funds for job-creating businesses.

Machinists Put USAir Terms To Members

The Machinists reached a tentative settlement with USAir just minutes before a strike deadline was to take effect. A walkout by nearly 2,000 mechanics and related workers would have been the first ever against the airline.

The union said the ratification process was to begin shortly with a mailing of the terms of the tentative agreement to members. Details will be made public after the process is underway.

CHIEF IAM NEGOTIATOR Vic Mazzocco, assistant general chairman of IAM District 141, said the sticking points in the bargaining were over wages and concessions sought by USAir, which the union called "inappropriate" because the company is doing well financially.

The company wanted "takebacks in pension and job protection areas," Mazzocco said.

Negotiations began last September, a month before the old contract expired. The dispute had been in mediation since March.

The Machinists would have been free to strike on Aug. 9 under the terms of the Railway Labor Act, which also applies to the airline industry.

THE IAM IS ALSO in negotiations with Eastern Airlines for a new contract for 13,600 employees whose agreement ran out in December.

A strike authorization vote got a 95 percent approval from the membership—which "certainly should have made a statement to Eastern Airlines that that's the membership speaking and not just the negotiators," District 100 President Charles E. Bryan said.

A key issue in the negotiations is the airline's "variable earnings program," Bryan reported. Eastern has been holding back 3.5 percent of employees' salaries to help pay for equipment and other items. The money will be returned with a share of profits when Eastern's earnings are favorable.

Although the five-year VEP program expired July 4, Bryan noted that Eastern is still deducting the money from paychecks. Settlement of that issue could remove the strike threat, he said.

Ratification Vote Near Completion At Westinghouse

Members of two major unions at Westinghouse Electric Corp. are well on their way toward ratifying new agreements with the company reached July 25.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers reported that results from their largest Westinghouse locals indicate 12-to-1 support for the contract and numbers large enough to assure ratification. IUE represents nearly 15,000 of the company's 30,000 organized employees.

Results from most of the 52 International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers local unions representing over 12,100 Westinghouse workers have also passed the simple majority needed for acceptance of the pact, the union said.

The IBEW completed voting Aug. 9; the IUE concludes Aug. 14, and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers—representing about 3,700 Westinghouse employees—will finish its vote Aug. 23.

All three unions are part of a 13-union coordinated bargaining committee which endorsed the terms of the tentative settlement.

The new contract calls for a 7-percent wage increase retroactive to July 12, a new cost-of-living adjustment formula and changes in the pension plan to retain the non-contributory plan with some modifications for contributions by some employees, as well as higher benefits.

'Say Aaagh!'

California Unions Demand Employment Commitment

Anaheim, Calif.—Delegates representing California's 1.7 million union members called for "a total commitment to full employment" and branded the Reagan Administration's economic program "a pathetic failure."

An economic policy statement adopted by the California AFL-CIO's 14th convention asserted the "duty" of the federal government to provide jobs when the private sector falters. It also urged close federal and state regulation of plant closings to minimize hardships on workers and their communities.

THE 640 DELEGATES termed improvement in California's unemployment insurance program "absolutely crucial," noting that as of the start of 1982, California ranked 35th among the 50 states in maximum unemployment benefits.

A keynote address by Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning urged that the "one commanding issue" for the state's labor movement is "to drive from political office the Reaganites in Washington and their allies in the state."

Delegates unanimously elected Henning and State AFL-CIO President Albin J. Gruhn to new two-year terms.

THE CONVENTION endorsed and gave enthusiastic welcomes to the Democratic candidates for Senate and the governorship.

Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr. is running for the Senate seat being vacated by Sen. S. I. Hayakawa (R-Calif.); Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley is running for governor.

James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, stressed the importance of labor's election effort this year.

"IF WE DO OUR job as it deserves to be done, we will put this country back on the road to equal rights and equal justice," Kennedy stressed.

The chief justice of California's Supreme Court, Rose E. Bird, warned that right-wing ideologies are attacking the judiciary to impose their own concept of law.

Among the ballot issues that will be before California's voters, delegates opposed Proposition 11, which would require a 5-cent deposit on all beverage containers, and opposed Proposition 14, which would take redistricting decisions from the legislature and leave authority to a nonelected commission. The convention voted "no recommendation" on Proposition 12, a nuclear freeze initiative.

Delegates recommended approval of various propositions involving construction bonds, including a plan to finance low-interest mortgages for moderate-income first-time homebuyers. The convention opposed providing state-financed textbooks for private schools and supported a proposition to encourage installation of fire sprinklers and alarm systems in locations where their installation is not compulsory.

Apparel Study Finds Buyers Shun Imports

Columbia, Mo. — By a wide margin, American consumers prefer U.S.-made apparel to imports, and a large majority register concern that foreign-made clothing is jeopardizing American jobs, according to a study released by the University of Missouri.

More than 59 percent of the consumers surveyed said it was important to them to buy American-made clothes, while nearly half rated imports inferior in quality to domestically produced apparel. Less than 6 percent considered imports superior in quality to U.S.-made items.

SEVENTY-THREE percent of the persons interviewed in the telephone survey agreed that the imports wipe out American jobs, and 57 percent said their concern for U.S. workers influences their decision on whether to buy imports.

More than 55 percent of the respondents said stronger federal laws are needed to curb apparel imports; less than one-third opposed stronger import limits.

The survey found that, by a margin of 59 percent to 18 percent, consumers feel that retailers mark up larger profits on imports than on domestic apparel.

Eighty-three percent of the respondents agreed that there is reason for public concern about the threat to U.S. clothing manufacturers from imports. More than 60 percent accurately perceived that the United States has a trade deficit in apparel, and a similar majority expressed distress at the trade imbalance.

The survey involved telephone interviews with 1,350 consumers, representing a cross section of the population in 32 areas across the country, including a mix of metropolitan, small town and rural communities. It was directed by Dr. Kitty Dickerson, chairman of the clothing and textiles department at the university's College of Home Economics.

Senate Vote on Amendment To Compel Balanced Budget

The AFL-CIO strongly opposes the attempt to write a balanced budget requirement into the Constitution. Therefore the 31 senators who voted against the proposed balanced budget amendment on Aug. 4 supported labor's position. The 69 senators who voted for the amendment were against labor's position.

Probe of Industry Role Urged

a 5-4 decision of the Supreme Court blocked OSHA from setting the 1 ppm limit. The majority ruling of the court invoked a "significant risk" dictum that requires OSHA to provide proof of the risks of excess incidence of leukemia at levels from 0 to 10 ppm before issuing a benzene exposure standard.

THE RISK assessment at 10 ppm in the IARC monograph would have given powerful support to the development of such a standard while meeting the Supreme Court's "significant risk" test. The absence of the assessment from the final version of the monograph lessens the incentive for OSHA to develop a tighter standard.

Obey first called attention to the issue last May when he released the text of an internal memorandum of the Chemical Manufacturers Association suggesting that at the industry's behest, officials of the National Cancer Institute would attempt to stop IARC from "engaging in risk assessment" because of "the regulatory impact."

He called the memorandum "most disturbing."

"While the desire of industry to avoid the potential costs which lowering benzene exposures might entail is understandable, if not laudable," he said, "action by the institute to suppress data that could result in the reduction of cancer constitutes both a violation of the public trust and a total disregard for the purpose of the Cancer Institute and the Public Health Service. It is, in a word, outrageous."

Obey is a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee with responsibility for funding the National Cancer Institute.

When the IARC monograph was released last week and the alteration discovered, Obey announced that an investigation by his office had confirmed that Cancer Institute officials, following a meeting with representatives of Exxon, Shell Chemical and the Chemical Manufacturers Association, did seek to discourage IARC from engaging in "quantitative risk assessment."

OFFICIALS OF both the institute and IARC denied that any pressure had been exerted to change the report on benzene, but Obey observed:

"It is difficult for me to believe that the sudden strong interest of the Cancer Institute in opposing quantitative risk assessment was not directly related to the preparation of the benzene document.

"I also find it difficult to believe that the extraordinary steps taken by IARC staff in altering the findings of a scientific panel without approval from that panel were not at least partially a result of pressure from the National Cancer Institute officials who control IARC funding." The institute contributes about $500,000 annually to the IARC budget.

ONE MEMBER of the scientific panel that prepared the IARC monograph, Dr. Phil Landrigan, said he was "surprised and chagrined to see that a critical portion of the benzene risk assessment had been altered."

Taylor, in his letter to Obey, called the incident a "discredit" to both the Cancer Institute and IARC "and a scandal of the highest order that both agencies allowed themselves to be used by management to alter and delete scientific findings of the panel without the consent of its members."

Taylor urged Obey to "do everything in your power to have this situation thoroughly investigated and the subject of a searching oversight hearing" by the appropriate House committee.

Obey announced that he would conclude his own investigation of the case within a week and would give a report to the full House Appropriations Committee.

In a separate letter to Dr. Vincent Devita, director of the National Cancer Institute, Taylor urged him to persuade IARC to restore the original findings of the working group and thereby contribute to the development of a benzene exposure rule "which will save the health and lives of American workers."

Unions Push for Safety Standard For Grain Dust

A grain elevator safety standard is economically feasible and urgently needed to protect the lives of workers in the industry, union witnesses told Congress.

Safety standards should be put in place to prevent further explosions in grain elevators, the panel said in testimony before a House Agriculture subcommittee. The labor representatives urged the government to follow the recommendations of the National Academy of Sciences (NAS), which stressed that a standard was necessary.

GRAIN MILLERS International Rep. Larry Barber told the committee the United States has had the knowledge and many of the techniques needed to prevent grain elevator explosions for over 60 years, "but the problem is they have not been implemented."

"How many lives must be lost," he asked the committee, "before the Administration and Congress are convinced that regulations are needed to assure implementation of already developed solutions?"

He said the NAS report estimates that 90 percent of all primary explosions in grain elevators could be prevented if the study's recommendations are put in place.

More than 100 elevators have exploded in the United States in the past five years, Barber noted.

Gene Erickson, safety director for the Grain Millers Local 118 in Superior, Wis., told the committee that many grain elevators, most built in the early part of the century, now handle twice as much grain as they were intended to "and many times the amount of dust, but with very little modification of the dust control system."

GRAIN IS EVEN dustier now than in the past, Erickson explained because of modern harvesting techniques and increased handling which drys the dust and makes it more likely to ignite.

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration issued a voluntary hazard alert on grain elevator safety, but because it does not have the force of law it has been largely ignored by the industry, Barber pointed out.

Tom Gilliam, safety chairman of Allied Industrial Workers Local 837, Decatur, Ill., told the committee that even though a safety standard could not provide guarantees against all accidents, "it can provide the means of insuring that worker safety does not take the back seat to production demands and the economic interests of elevator and mill owners."

SAMUEL GOMPERS MEMORIAL will be unveiled on Labor Day in San Antonio, Tex., the city where the AFL's first president died in 1924. Sculptor Betty Jean Alden touches up a model of the statue, which with its base will stand more than 20 feet tall on park land donated by the city. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will be the keynote speaker at the dedication, capping a two-day celebration of labor's past, present and future.

Unveiling of Gompers Statue Labor Day Highlight in Texas

San Antonio, Tex.—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will join Texas unions in a Labor Day tribute to Samuel Gompers, the founding father of the modern American labor movement and the first president of the American Federation of Labor.

Kirkland will deliver the keynote address at the unveiling of a statue of Gompers and will be grand marshal of the San Antonio AFL-CIO's Labor Day parade, climaxing a two-day celebration.

THE EVENT grew out of a proposal by Vice President Glen Peterson of the Government Employees to commemorate Gompers in the city where he died in December 1924 while returning from a trip to Mexico following an AFL convention in El Paso.

The proposal was taken up with enthusiasm by local and state labor organizations, and Joan Suarez, president of the city central labor body, and Harry Hubbard, president of the Texas AFL-CIO, are serving with Peterson as co-chairs of the project. Kirkland and AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock are honorary national co-chairs.

The statue of Gompers, by noted sculptor Betty Jean Alden, was commissioned by the San Antonio AFL-CIO after a local design competition. It stands 16 feet high on a six-foot slab of granite, and depicts Gompers surrounded by a group of working men and women. The memorial will be situated on park land donated by the city across from the convention center. It will be the first statue of a union leader to be erected in the state.

SUAREZ SAID the theme of the celebration—"Labor Is Alive"—will show the state and the nation that "the Texas labor movement has a past, a present and a future that we believe in.

"Samuel Gompers represents the past; our parade, picnics and other family activities represent the present, and the union leadership who'll be with us on Labor Day represents the future."

She said that besides Kirkland, a number of national labor officials will be on hand for the festivities. Local unions from all parts of Texas will enter floats in the parade.

The city is making preparations to receive as many as 100,000 visitors for the weekend celebration.

OTHER EVENTS will include a public reception for Kirkland, a reception sponsored by the Texas Labor Council for Latin American Advancement honoring Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez, the state banquet of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and numerous picnics and receptions to be held by individual unions.

The project is being financed by contributions from national and international unions, state and local central bodies, local unions and individuals, and major contributors will receive ceramic reproductions of the Gompers memorial and will have their names engraved at the base of the statute. At last report, the organizing committee had raised about $90,000 of the estimated total cost of $200,000.

Iowa Beef's New Offer? Same Old Call for Giveback

Dakota City, Neb. — Striking members of the Food & Commercial Workers didn't expect much when the union-busting management of Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., agreed at the governor's request to meet with the union.

They were absolutely right.

The company, which has been served with a National Labor Relations Board complaint of refusal to bargain in good faith, put on the table the contract "offer" it had made before the strike started more than two months ago.

It offered a four-year wage freeze to present employees. For new workers, according to Lewie Anderson, the director of the UFCW's Packinghouse Division, the company proposes to pay $2 below the present starting rate for the first two years, $1.50 below the starting rate in the third year and $1 under in the fourth year.

The company has reportedly "implemented" its starting rate proposal for more than 1,000 strikebreakers it hired from unemployment lines throughout the Midwest. The strikers' ranks are still solid, the union reports.

FIRE FIGHTERS delegates at the union's convention in Chicago vote approval of the formation of an ad hoc task force of IAFF officers and consultants to help local unions handle serious problems—such as attempts by local jurisdictions to contract out fire protection or to consolidate fire and police services.

Police Union Elects Baker New Secretary-Treasurer

Las Vegas, Nev. — Delegates to the Police Associations' convention elected Dave Baker as the union's new secretary-treasurer.

Baker had been elected to IUPA's executive board as first vice president in 1981 and was formerly president of the union's Memphis, Tenn., affiliate. He defeated incumbent Robert D. Gordon who had held the secretary-treasurer post since the union received its AFL-CIO charter in 1979.

The three-year term of President Edward J. Kiernan is not up until next year.

THE 167 DELEGATES representing some 16,500 law enforcement officers voted to revise the union's bylaws in an effort to bolster organizing efforts and expand services to affiliates.

The key change was a clarification of a provision governing convention voting strength. Under the new code, a local affiliate's votes will be weighted according to per capita taxes paid during the year preceding the convention. The old clause left unclear how votes were to be allotted to a local association affiliating with the parent body shortly before the union's annual meeting.

The convention reactivated the union's political action arm, the Law Enforcement Political Action Committee (LEPAC). Baker was charged with preparation of a formal structure, including constitution and bylaws, for approval by the board.

THE CONVENTION also endorsed a program to develop a wider range of services for affiliates, such as organizing and bargaining aids, group purchase of legal services and others linked to the widely differing needs of local associations.

The union was founded in 1978 and chartered a year later by the AFL-CIO. Its member associations range from newly formed local unions to formerly unaffiliated police and law enforcement organizations.

The executive board also was directed to study possible revision of the union's per capita structure.

The convention also endorsed resumption of the union's magazine, Law Officer, which had been temporarily discontinued. The first issue is planned for early fall.

IN OTHER elections, seven incumbent and nine new members were elected to the IUPA executive board. The new members are Wendell Phillips, Sacramento, Calif.; Terry Shreeve, Phoenix; Don Danneker of the union's Minnesota state affiliate; Pete Sovich, Omaha, Neb.; Dave Becher, Fort Wayne, Ind.; Dave Gray, Toledo, Ohio; Ray Maples, Memphis, Tenn.; Jerry Stewart, Cobb County, Ga.; Jack Moriarty, Connecticut.

Re-elected were Stan Nylan, Takoma, Wash.; O. C. Lee, Las Vegas; Tom Cardwell, Alexandria, La.; Robert Thomas, Houston; Robert Kliesmet, Milwaukee; Sid Grossman, Tri-State (New York, Pennsylvania and New Jersey) and Al Angele, representing retired members.

Caribbean Basin Plan Seen Threat To Industrial Base

Enactment of the Administration's Caribbean Basin Initiative legislation would "further weaken the U.S. industrial base," the AFL-CIO warned at Senate hearings.

Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan said the AFL-CIO supports direct economic assistance to Caribbean nations although Congress should "carefully scrutinize" the Administration's funding request.

THE AFL-CIO is strongly opposed to the trade and tax incentives contained in the bill, he stressed.

The "zero tariff" proposals will encourage "new runaways by U.S. industries to the Caribbean region," with a loss of American jobs.

In addition, Koplan charged, the loose local content standard will allow non-Caribbean countries "from the Soviet Union to the Far East" to funnel duty-free goods into the United States.

Koplan said the AFL-CIO has discussed the issues involved with Caribbean area unions and considers it important for trade unionists "to be consulted on the plans and programs being considered by our respective governments for the development of the Caribbean economies." But the Administration proposal, he told the Senate Finance Committee, "will simply assure continued swollen profits for multinationals at the expense of the U.S. economy."

'Nice Guy, Tough Guy'

Union, Community Role Of Fire Fighters Cited

Chicago—Fire Fighters must continue to play a leading role as "the essential bulwark of the fire service" in their cities and towns, IAFF President John A. Gannon stressed in his report to the union's 36th convention.

The 169,000-member union, Gannon told the convention "is the guardian not just of our jobs, pay scales and benefits, but it is the best organized force working to assure that Americans and Canadians have an efficient and effective fire service."

IN HIS KEYNOTE speech, Gannon said the IAFF has come through "probably the two most difficult years in our history." He pointed out that professional fire fighters have demonstrated that "the 'Mr. Nice Guy' who protects our communities can quickly become 'Mr. Tough Guy' when it comes to protecting the well-being of fire fighters and their wives and kids."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates in a telephone hook-up that the more than 10 million workers desperately searching for non-existent jobs constitute the largest number of unemployed Americans since 1935.

"But in 1935 we had a President—Franklin Roosevelt—and a Congress that believed it was the responsibility of government to stabilize the economy, create jobs and restore dignity to workers and their families," Kirkland stressed.

"TODAY, WE have a President who is determined to dismantle the very programs that were created to repair the damage of the Great Depression."

Kirkland, speaking from New York where the AFL-CIO Executive Council was meeting, observed that Reagan has long been dedicated to shrinking the role of government and have private investment "create new jobs and prosperity."

Citing the sharp increases in unemployment, bankruptcies and poverty, Kirkland pointed out, "It hasn't exactly turned out that way."

CUTBACKS IN government services are hurting the public and public workers as well, he said.

"When professionally trained and highly skilled public workers, like those you represent, are sent to the unemployment line while their work is farmed out to private, non-union outfits it is the people who will suffer."

Kirkland also warned that attempts to combine fire and police services into so-called consolidated departments would cause additional hardships on the public.

IN THE IAFF elections, Gannon was re-elected to a second two-year term as president over Vice President Clarence Perez of New Orleans. But Sec.-Treas. Martin Pierce, also seeking a second term, was defeated by a margin of 81,594 to 57,221 by Albert K. Whitehead, president of the IAFF local union in Los Angeles County, Calif.

Whitehead, 52, has been a member of the county fire department for 28 years. He is a vice president of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO as well as the California AFL-CIO.

Four new vice presidents were elected, two to fill vacancies, two in election contests. The new vice presidents are Khuron Huddleston of Memphis, Tenn.; Ernest Mass of San Antonio, Tex.; Donald E. Faughnan of Binghamton, N.Y., and Leroy H. Waite of Beloit, Wis. The newly elected officials will take office Sept. 4.

THE CONVENTION voted the title of "emeritus" to former Sec.-Treas. Frank A. Palumbo, and for the first time to a retiring vice president, Jack Bostick of Fort Worth, Tex., who has served the IAFF for 30 years.

Pierce noted in his report to delegates that the union's large financial deficit, which came to light after the 1980 convention, had been cut almost in half. He expressed hope that within the next two years it could be practically eliminated.

To help meet the union's financial needs, delegates approved a two-step, 49-cent increase in per capita payments, which are now $2.61 a month, and an additional 2.5 cents to pay for the computerization of financial and administrative records. The per capita tax will rise 39 cents on Sept. 1 and another 10 cents Sept. 1, 1983.

The convention approved the concept of an ad hoc task force of IAFF officials and consultants to help local unions concerned with special problems, such as consolidation of police and fire departments, contracting out of fire protection to private profit-making corporations, or major cuts in fire personnel and services.

Speakers at the five-day convention included Chicago Mayor Jane Byrne and Sec.-Treas. Robert Petersdorf of the Painters.

major contracts who received such increases. The average was 2.9 percent when prorated for all 8.7 million workers covered by major agreements.

Bargaining on major contracts in the third quarter affects 634,000 workers covered by major agreements expiring in the July-September period plus 750,000 under contracts that expired before July 1 for which new agreements had not been reached or ratified by the end of June.

In addition, about 2.4 million workers are scheduled to receive previously negotiated but deferred pay increases during the third quarter. These average 4.4 percent. About 2.4 million workers are scheduled for COLA reviews during the period.

Four More Get Degrees at Meany Center

Four more trade unionists have been graduated with degrees from the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Receiving bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies were Joann Barber of Phoenix, Ariz., former state president of the Postal Workers; Carl Dimengo of Akron, Ohio, assistant research director of the Rubber Workers; James Hull of Fairbanks, Alaska, former assistant business manager of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1547, and C. John Kleywegt of Des Moines, Iowa, former president of Communications Workers Local 7102, now labor studies coordinator for the Des Moines Area Community College.

In a commencement address, Prof. Wilbur J. Cohen of the University of Texas, who is a George Meany Center trustee, reminded the graduates that America's social reform movement was formulated by teachers of labor history.

Cohen offered 10 points he had found essential in trying, to change the system to meet workers' needs. The first of these is that most social legislation must be "incrementalized," the former secretary of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare stressed.

Fred F. Hoehler, executive director of the center presided at the ceremony.

SEVEN EARLIER graduates returned to the campus for the graduation and a two-day institute held at the request of the alumni group that is trying to promote scholarships for the center.

The center's college degree program is operated with Antioch University, a pioneer in non-traditional education. Thirty-four trade unionists have earned degrees since the program began in 1974.

Another 130 are now enrolled in the program. They come from 35 AFL-CIO unions in 43 states. Their median age is 37.

Most work in the college degree program is done by the students at home. Twice a year they are required to come to the campus for one week to attend classes, meet with instructors and plan their courses for the next six months.

The center's college degree program is open to all officers, representatives and full-time staff members of the AFL-CIO affiliates.

Prescription for Disaster

THE SENATE shamefully moved the balanced budget constitutional amendment a crucial step closer to adoption.

Too many senators who knew better showed what AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland properly called "political cowardice" and passed the buck to the House.

For the good of the country, for the Constitution to remain a charter of democratic government and not a hodge-podge of special interest restrictions, it must not go further.

THE PROPOSED amendment is a prescription for economic disaster. Honest conservatives as well as liberals have voiced their abhorrence.

If members of the House vote their honest convictions, there is no way it can muster the two-thirds vote to get it through Congress or even the simple majority required to bypass the Judiciary Committee and bring it to the House floor.

There can be no excuse for a vote that would be so destructive of American government and leave the nation so defenseless against unemployment at home and saber-rattling abroad.

Throwing Stones

THE PRESIDENT of the International Association of Machinists, William W. Winpisinger, is no slouch as a debater as his colleagues on the AFL-CIO Executive Council can readily attest.

But his skill wasn't put to much of a test on NBC's Today Show, where he was matched against Reed Larson, the president of the National Right to Work Committee.

THE SUBJECT WAS "union violence," which the Right to Work Committee says should be met by transforming the Hobbs Act from a law against racketeering into a weapon against unions in a lawful strike. The version originally proposed would subject a picket who throws a punch in anger or threatens to "get even" with a scab to 20 years in a federal prison.

The Right to Work Committee spokesman tried to make his point with a television news clip showing some of the strikers at Iowa Beef throwing rocks at cars of strikebreakers speeding through their picket line. But his example so backfired that it ended up proving just the opposite.

Now, people who throw stones at cars are subject to arrest under local law, even if the cars carry strikebreakers hired at $2-an-hour below the union starting rate. And, indeed, the police did arrest some strikers—but not on trumped-up felony charges that could send them to prison for 20 years.

IN CONGRESSIONAL testimony on the Hobbs Act amendments the National Right to Work Committee wants enacted, the Justice Dept. agreed that there is no dearth of local or state laws to deal with "violence" in the course of lawful labor disputes. Nor has it found local and state police unwilling to enforce the law.

If Mr. Larson should give in to irresistible impulse while walking past the AFL-CIO building and throw a stone at a window, he would face arrest and punishment as local ordinances provide.

That's as it should be. We see no cause for keeping him in prison for the next 20 years—or even for keeping him off television. At least on this issue, he makes labor's best witness.

Economic Setbacks Contradict Cheery White House Forecasts

By Gus Tyler

TREASURY SECRETARY Donald T. Regan said in late June: "We can begin to see the first vistas of recovery."

Then the June figures came in. The index of industrial production — covering manufacture, mining and energy — fell by seven-tenths of 1 percent, a figure that over a year adds up to about 9 percent.

THIS IS NOT the first and is not likely to be the last time that the Administration has played the Hooverian game of fiddling fanciful tunes while the economy burns. When the 1981 tax bill was in the making, President Reagan declared optimistically that it would have an immediate effect, psychologically stimulating the markets to leap forward.

When that did not happen, the Administration predicted that what did not happen the first year would happen the second year.

Came January of the second year and the economy went into a slump. But the Administration promised progress in the second month, a progress that actually materialized in February, only because January weather had depressed that opening month so badly that, by comparison, February looked good.

BUT BY THE END of the first quarter, it was clear that the economy was not in a state of recovery. So the Administration called upon the nation to wait for the second quarter—April to June—to see some real uplift. But now, it appears, that the second quarter showed no real recovery.

So now the Administration predicts in a July statement that the second half of the year will show a pickup of from 4 to 5 percent.

So goes it: wait for the second year, for the second month, for the second quarter, for the second half. There will be manna manana.

The reason that the Administration gives for expecting recovery is a pickup in consumer demand. White House deputy press secretary Larry Speakes says that we are going from "recession to consumer-led recovery." Robert Ortner, chief economist for the Commerce Dept., says that expecting recovery is a pickup in consumer de- the leader."

The evidence of such a consumer outpouring is missing, however. In June, retail sales fell; in the first ten days of July new car sales fell.

WHAT THE Administration is counting on is that increased social security payments and further lowering of income taxes will boost buying power. But the social security adjustment merely compensates for increases in the cost of living and the cut in income taxes is being offset by new taxes (both federal and local) and by increased social security taxes.

Ortner himself is quite dubious about his own prediction. In speaking about stronger consumer spending, he added, "if it's the only thing that goes up in the second half, the recovery will be on the weak side."

In other words, while consumers may be spending more money they may not be buying more things because prices will be up.

ALL THIS squirming by the Administration and its spokesmen amuses the economic analysts. Here is a conservative Administration counting on increased demand to stimulate the economy—a policy that is generally identified with the liberal policies of John Maynard Keynes, patron saint of the New Dealers. At the same time, the same Administration goes along with a Federal Reserve Board that favors high interest rates as a way to check demand in order to hold down inflation.

The end result is a totally self-contradictory program whose inconsistency and ineffectiveness is concealed in variations on the Hooverian theme that "recovery is just around the corner."

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Senate Bows to Program-Cutting Budget Amendment; AFL-CIO Mounts a Major Opposition Drive in House

The Senate approved the Constitutional amendment to force balanced budgets by a vote of 69-31. Because Constitutional amendments require a two-thirds vote for passage, S.J. Res. 58 would have failed if only three more Senators had voted against it. (See roll-call vote inside this issue of the News.)

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has assigned a top priority to defeating the balanced budget Constitutional amendment in the House. The council formed a special committee to coordinate the opposition campaign, which includes: AFSCME President Gerald McEntee, CWA President Glenn Watts, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, Letter Carriers President Vincent Sombrotto, AFT President Albert Shanker, and Operating Engineers President J.C. Turner.

WHAT YOU CAN DO:

In person: Contact your Representative's district office now to arrange a meeting during the Labor Day recess (Aug. 20-Sept. 8). Even if your Representative has a good voting record, do not assume he or she will oppose H.J. Res. 350.

Key points to make: Tell your Representative that you realize that the balanced budget amendment is a veiled attempt to force deeper cuts in all programs. Urge him or her (1) not to sign the petition to discharge H.J. Res. 350 from the Judiciary Committee, and (2) to oppose the balanced budget amendment if it should reach the House floor.

Is Social Security worth a 13¢ postcard? The balanced budget amendment would force deep cuts in all programs. If you value Social Security, OSHA, good schools, interstate highways, and other government programs, help stop H.J. Res. 350 now. Clip and mail the sample postcard below.

WRITE YOUR REPRESENTATIVE NOW

U.S. House of Representatives
Washington, DC 20515

Dear Representative _____:

I urge you to oppose H.J. Res. 350, the balanced budget Constitutional amendment, and I urge you not to sign the petition to discharge it from committee.

If adopted, this Constitutional amendment could worsen future recessions, force big cuts in programs like Social Security, and undermine national security. It would give the "power of the purse" to a minority in Congress. Please let me know whether you will oppose the balanced budget amendment.

Sincerely,

Supreme Court Clears Path for Bankruptcy Changes

The consumer credit industry has been pushing Congress for legislation to deny bankruptcy relief to virtually all hard-pressed Americans, and a recent ruling from the U.S. Supreme Court may have inadvertently greased the skids for passage of the industry-backed bill. The high court, ruling on an unrelated bankruptcy issue, ordered Congress to reform the bankruptcy court system by October 4, 1982. Senate Republicans say they intend to use the court-mandated legislation as a vehicle to pass the industry bill.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Senators to oppose S. 2000, the unfair bill to eliminate bankruptcy relief for hard-pressed Americans.

Workers Win on Pesticide Rules, Food Stamp Cuts

Pesticide Rules Protect Farm Workers

The House passed several improving amendments and then overwhelmingly approved a bill to extend the federal law that provides farm workers with health-related information about the pesticides they handle. By a 352-56 vote, the House reauthorized the 1978 Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act (FIFRA).

Struck from the bill was a harmful provision that would have prohibited states from developing additional protections beyond the federal law. The right of workers harmed by pesticide exposure to seek relief privately through the federal courts was restored. Another amendment assured scientists access to chemical manufacturers' information about the ingredients of pesticides, so that independent scientists can study health effects.

Cuts in Food Stamp Program Limited

During consideration of budget reconciliation for agriculture programs, the House rejected a bill by Rep. William Wampler (R-VA) which would have made food stamp program slashes even deeper than cuts already made.

The Wampler bill would have ended emergency food stamp service for families who have recently lost their source of income. Thus if a head of a household was laid off unexpectedly, the family would have been denied food stamps for up to 30 days, even if they had no money to buy food in the meantime.

The House wisely rejected the possibility of additional hardship for the growing numbers of laid-off workers.

...RECESS...The House and Senate will adjourn for the Labor Day recess on August 20, and will return to Washington on September 8. Contact your Representative and Senators now through your union or central labor council to arrange meetings while they are back home. It is especially important that Representatives be urged to oppose putting Reaganomics into the U.S. Constitution with a balanced budget amendment...

August Recess Status Report on Key Labor Issues

INTEREST RATES: The House Banking Committee approved H.R. 6124, to extend the Credit Control Act and grant Presidential authority to bring down interest rates. H.R. 6124 also would prevent loans to corporations for the purpose of buying other companies. Such corporate mergers absorb scarce investment funds but add nothing to the nation's productive capacity.

What You Can Do: To ensure quick action in the full House on the credit control extension bill, urge your Representative to cosponsor H.R. 6124. And urge your Senators to cosponsor the companion S. 2526.

NON-PROFIT POSTAL RATES: The House Appropriations Postal Service Subcommittee voted to continue at current levels funding for non-profit organizations' mail delivery, rejecting a Reagan demand for additional cuts in the program. If sustained in the final package, the funding could ease the pressure for continual increases in non-profit postal rates.

"FLAT" TAX RATES: So-called "flat" tax rates would give tax cuts to the wealthy, and shift the tax burden further toward low- and middle-income taxpayers. This unfair scheme has been introduced in the Senate as S. 2817 and in the House as H.R. 6944. A future Alert! will provide a complete analysis of this issue.

JOBS AND TRAINING: H.J. Res. 514, an urgent supplemental appropriations bill calling for approximately $1 billion for jobs and training, was rewritten and given a new bill number--H.J. Res. 562. It is pending before the full House Appropriations Committee. Urge your Representative to cosponsor H.J. Res. 562, to provide relief for laid-off workers and distressed communities suffering from high unemployment.

FOOTBALL: The National Football League, instead of negotiating in good faith with the NFL Players Association, is mounting a massive lobbying drive on Capitol Hill to gain a special exemption from anti-trust laws. Despite enormous profits and a reported $2 billion contract with television networks, the NFL wants more freedom to move teams without warning, to put games on pay TV, and to ignore the players' attempts to bargain.

What You Can Do: Hearings on the industry-backed legislation begin in the Senate Judiciary Committee this week. Urge your Senators to oppose S. 2784, your Representative to oppose H.R. 6467, the NFL anti-trust exemption bills.

NLRB UNION, in handbills distributed at the agency's headquarters in Washington, charged the National Labor Relations Board and Chairman John Van de Water with refusal to bargain and unfair labor practices against its clerical workforce. Coalition Presses Balanced Budget Amendment Fight

A right-wing drive to inflict a balanced budget amendment on the Constitution stalled in the House, and the trade union movement and its allies have mounted a national grassroots campaign to keep it from getting unstuck.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on state labor federations and city central bodies to take advantage of a two-week congressional recess for back-home lobbying of House members whose votes will decide the outcome.

THE SENATE has already approved the balanced budget amendment, 69-31, and a two-thirds vote in the House would send it to the states for ratification.

That must not happen, Kirkland wrote the AFL-CIO's state and local leaders. He warned that the amendment, which also limits the government's taxing powers, would turn recessions into depressions and "guarantee the destruction of federal programs that organized labor has fought to enact."

A coalition of equally concerned national organizations will work side by side with America's unions on the campaign.

Congress will be in recess through Labor Day, and an Executive Council committee headed by State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee is coordinating the AFL-CIO campaign.

IT WILL concentrate on some 100 key congressional districts and stress personal visits by delegations from unions and allied groups to House members who will be in their home states during the recess.

In many localities, radio and newspaper advertisements will help get labor's message across, and postcard mailings will help workers in factories, offices, hospitals, stores and construction sites send their representatives a message.

Early in the recess, on Aug. 24, a 13-state television conference will link local union leaders from some 42 targeted congressional districts with the national campaign in Washington. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, McEntee and other union presidents will be participating from teleconference facilities that are located at AFSCME's headquarters.

Meanwhile, representatives of some 50 concerned non-labor organizations meeting at the AFL-CIO's invitation applauded the news that the discharge petition campaign by House supporters of the amendment has missed a key deadline.

SUPPORTERS of a balanced budget constitutional amendment have tried to pry it out of the House Judiciary Committee through the seldom-used means of a petition signed by 218 members—a majority of the House of Representatives.

There are strict rules governing when a bill discharged from committee can be called up for a vote, and the 218 signatures had to be obtained by Aug. 18 to

House Approves Measure 226-207

Tax Bill Clears Hurdle Despite Republican Split

President Reagan had to look to House and Senate Democrats for the votes needed to pass a revenue-raising, deficit-cutting measure that will take back some of the over-generous tax reductions given to businesses last year.

The bill, which passed the House by a bipartisan 226-207 vote and was sent to the Senate, also increases excise taxes on consumers, imposes a new Medicare levy on paychecks of federal and postal workers, and trims back Medicare, Medicaid and welfare assistance—all steps opposed by the AFL-CIO.

IT ESTABLISHES a new but temporary program of federal supplemental benefits to unemployed workers who have exhausted their state unemployment compensation payments. And it taxes unemployment benefits for all but the lowest income brackets to pay for the program. (Story this page.)

But it was the tightening of various business loopholes and tax windfalls that split conservative ranks down the middle, compelling Reagan to take to television and unleash a full-court press by White House lobbyists on Republicans and "boll weevil" Democrats who have been his staunchest supporters.

They balked at a projected revenue increase estimated at $98.3 billion over a three-year period.

As Reagan pointed out, it wasn't all tax increases. A new withholding system on dividends and interest patterned after payroll tax withholding on wages and salaries would bring in revenue by reducing tax evasion.

Changes in leasing provisions that allow profitable corporations to avoid taxes by buying up tax credits accumulated by other companies would diminish some of the most publicized abuses resulting from last year's tax bill. Other provisions would curb tax avoidance tactics in mergers, and a new minimum tax would recapture additional lost income.

People in all income brackets would be affected by curtailment of medical deductions, higher cigarette, airport and telephone excise taxes, and tipped employees would be faced with higher withholding requirements.

DESPITE Reagan's strong personal appeal, the Chamber of Commerce continued to lobby against the bill. And the House

Tax Bill Package Contains Added Jobless Benefits

Persons who are still unemployed after their state unemployment compensation has run out would be entitled to additional weeks of federally-paid benefits under a section of the tax bill package

Here's how it would work:

THE FIRST benefits under the new federally-funded program would be paid the week of Sept. 12 and the program would end on Mar. 31, 1983. Individual eligibility for benefits would be the same as the requirements for extended unemployment benefits under present law.

Maximum duration of the new federal supplemental benefits would be either 10 weeks, eight weeks or six weeks, depending on the state.

If the state had paid extended unemployment benefits at any time since June 1, even if it has since triggered-off because of a drop in the insured unemployment rate, its residents would be entitled

UFCW Strikers Supported

Council Backs Iowa Beef Boycott

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has endorsed a consumer boycott against the products of Iowa Beef Processors, Inc. for the fourth time in the turbulent history of bargaining between the company and the Food & Commercial Workers.

In the current dispute, about 2,000 UFCW members struck IBP's Dakota City, Neb., plant June 8 after more than 25 fruitless bargaining sessions since March, including a meeting called at the request of the state governor.

IBP HAS REFUSED to bargain on its "final" contract offer which calls for a four-year wage and cost-of-living freeze, wage cuts for about 700 workers and an entry level wage scale drastically lower than current workers' pay, the UFCW said.

Iowa Beef has kept the Dakota City plant operating, according to a UFCW background report, by recruiting about 1,400 strikebreakers from among other unemployed workers in the Midwest, but daily production is less than half its level prior to the strike.

The National Labor Relations Board on Aug. 5 issued a complaint against the company on charges of refusal to bargain and other labor law violations. A hearing has been set for Oct. 13.

THE DISPUTE at the Dakota City plant has been marred by emotional confrontations between picketing union members and scabs, and the governor has assigned a large force of state police and National Guard troops to the plant.

Since its first attempt to gain a contract in 1969, the Food & Commercial Workers, at that time the Meat Cutters, have either been locked out or forced to strike to gain a settlement. The use of scabs has figured in each dispute.

In the seven-and-a-half-month strike from August 1969 to April 1970, the Meat Cutters charged Iowa Beef with placing scab recruitment ads on Spanish language radio stations reaching both California and Texas and over the U.S.-Mexico border.

IOWA BEEF locked out its employees in a 189-day dispute that lasted from July 1973 until January 1974, and in the longest action, the union struck the beef packer for 14 months from February 1978 to April 1979. That contract expired May 1, 1982, but the union asked for an extension until June 6.

On June 5, the Federal Mediation &

Market Surge No Boon for Workers

By James M. Shevis

The New York stock market chalked up a record rise on near-record volume in response to a slight downward movement in interest rates, but behind the Wall Street euphoria there remained nagging doubts about the health of the U.S. economy.

For American workers, the buying surge promised little if any relief from the unremitting rise in joblessness—at 9.8 percent nationally in July and at Depression-like levels in certain parts of the country.

"UNFORTUNATELY, good news for Wall Street does not help the millions of workers who don't have jobs," AFL-CIO Economist Markley Roberts observed. "America still needs decisive action to create jobs, and that includes action by Congress on the credit-control bill."

Much of the market action, which saw the Dow Jones Industrial Average soar a record 38.81 points Aug. 17, followed a turnabout on the part of Henry Kaufman, the chief economist at Salomon Brothers investment banking concern. The widely watched New York credit analyst reversed his view that short- and long-term interest rates would remain high, saying they would instead continue to drop over the next 12 months. But he based his reassessment on the persistent recession and the prospect of reduced demand for business loans, factors that bode ill for the millions of Americans unable to find jobs.

"The immediate threat that would have driven interest rates back to their 1981 peak yields—a smart business recovery in the second half of the year—is now much less likely to materialize than a few months ago," Kaufman said in a memorandum to Salomon clients.

EARLIER, on the strength of the Fed's third reduction in its discount rate in less than a month, to 10.5 percent, big banks around the country dropped their prime rates—the interest they charge their best corporate borrowers—first to 14.5 percent, and then to 14 percent. A year earlier, the key lending rate stood at 20.5 percent.

"Recent events in the economy and financial markets require a new look at the prospect for interest rates," Kaufman said in his memo. "On balance, these events suggest that the decline in interest rates now under way will continue, irregular to be sure, with perhaps dramatic interruptions."

Besides cutting the discount rate, the Fed has been pumping more reserves into the banking system over the past six weeks by buying U.S. government securities. Some bankers and economists say the central bank's easing of credit conditions reflects its growing worry over the soundness of the system and the continued weakness of the economy. They warn that the economy is anemic, and that any recovery may prove shortlived.

"THE BUSINESS outlook has deteriorated," observed Albert Wojnilower, chief economist at the First Boston Corp., who, like Kaufman, this week changed his earlier prediction of continued high interest rates to lower rates through the end of the year. Wojnilower said that the Administration-sponsored 10-percent federal income tax cut in July has proved "more like a life preserver thrown to a struggling swimmer than an additional stimulus to an economy already on the point of lift-off."

The weakness in the nation's economy was underscored by a series of reports indicating that the recovery, when it comes, may not be as robust as the Administration has forecast. The President's economists are predicting annual rates of growth of about 4.5 percent in each of the next six quarters. Private economists point to a rising tide of business failures, lower production levels in the nation's basic industries, the highest jobless rate in over 40 years, and lackluster consumer spending as deterrents to a strong rebound from the nation's eighth postwar recession.

Among the ominous signs:

- Industrial production fell again in July, the 11th monthly decline in the past 12 months, the Federal Reserve Board reported. The drop would have been greater if auto production had not picked up. The output of business equipment, reflecting continued weakness in capital spending, declined a seasonally adjusted 2.1 percent after falling 3.1 percent in June.
- Domestic auto makers reported a sales decline of 26.5 percent in the first 10 days of August, the sixth consecutive period in which sales were below comparable levels a year earlier. General Motors Corp., the nation's No. 1 auto maker, announced it would close its Framingham, Mass., and Lakewood, Ga., assembly plants and cut back operations in North Tarrytown, N.Y., and Leeds, Mo., because of the gloomy car sales outlook over the next several months. An estimated 9,100 employees face indefinite layoff.
- The nation's factories operated at only 69.5 percent of capacity in July, down from 69.7 percent in June and 70.2 percent in May, the Federal Reserve Board said. The July rate was the lowest since the 60-percent level in March 1975 at the end of another severe recession.
- While personal spending—a crucial factor in any recovery—climbed 1.1 percent in July, the rate of spending over the April-June quarter was revised sharply downward. The Commerce Dept.'s new estimate was an increase of 2 percent, rather than the 3.1 percent originally reported.

ABOUT THE only good economic news was a sharp 33.7-percent increase in new housing starts in July. The Commerce Dept. reported that work began on new housing units at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.2-million units last month, the highest rate since April 1981.

But all of the rise in housing starts represented a "bulge" of work begun on multi-family buildings subsidized by public funds. Single-family housing starts declined.

LABOR'S CAMPAIGN to prevent adoption of the balanced budget constitutional amendment is outlined by AFL-CIO Vice President Gerald W. McEntee to representatives of some 50 cooperating organizations at a strategy session at AFL-CIO headquarters. McEntee, who is president of the State, County & Municipal Employees, heads an Executive Council committee that is coordinating labor's efforts on the issue. The Administration supports the amendment.

Labor Pushes Fight to Block Budget Curbs

force the amendment to the floor during September. Congress would now have to change its adjournment plans or be called back into a post-election "lame duck session" for a discharge petition to be utilized.

THE AMENDMENT, or some variation of it, can still be brought to the House floor at any time under normal procedures if reported by the Judiciary Committee.

As passed by the Senate, the 337-word amendment would require that federal spending each year not exceed anticipated tax revenues except in time of war or when three-fifths of the House and Senate vote to allow an exception.

Further, tax revenues could not rise faster than national income in the previous calendar year, and a three-fifths vote would be required to raise the debt limit.

THE AUG. 24 teleconference linkup will allow union leaders in Washington to address strategy sessions being held in San Jose, Calif.; Denver, Colo.; New Britain, Conn.; Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Atlanta, Ga.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Des Moines, Iowa; Boston, Mass.; St. Louis, Mo.; Newark, N.J.; Rochester, N.Y.; Pittsburgh, Pa., and Milwaukee, Wis.

While few state legislatures are still in session, labor's campaign will also be concerned with heading off the attempt to compel a constitutional convention to act on the amendment through a petition of 34 states. Thirty-one states have passed resolutions to that effect, although the validity of some would be subject to challenge.

Stage Employees Examine Impact of New Technology

Winnipeg, Man.—Delegates to the 56th biennial convention of the Theatrical Stage Employees stressed the union's need to respond to technological change in their industry and the need for political action to preserve gains made for working people by organized labor.

The 895 delegates reviewed the wave of technological developments in the more than 30 theatrical, motion picture and entertainment crafts represented by IATSE.

THE UNION'S president, Walter F. Diehl, urged in his report to the convention that IATSE go on record with a strong endorsement of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution which was reintroduced in Congress on July 14. It replaces the measure which fell three states short of the necessary 38 before the June 30 ratification deadline.

He also pointed to the AFL-CIO's efforts to prevent the slashing of programs vital to workers, such as the Occupational Safety & Health Act. He urged the union's locals individually to support these efforts and stressed the need to work with other unions in political action.

IN THE KEYNOTE address to the delegates, Shirley Carr, an executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress, pointed out that the U.S. and Canadian economies are in their sharpest declines since the depression of the 1930s. She stressed that "it is not workers' wages that have caused the problems" in either country, and she accused employers who demand wage concessions of putting the money "back into the profit schedules" for shareholders rather than creating new jobs.

The convention adopted a resolution of support for 26 striking employees of Group W Cable Television of Santa Monica, Calif.

The broadcast and production technicians voted unanimously in August 1981 for representation by the IATSE. The National Labor Relations Board upheld the election and the full board certified the union as the bargaining agent in May of this year, overturning Group W's objections as invalid. The company is appealing the ruling to the courts and continues its refusal to bargain.

DIEHL WAS re-elected to a fifth two-year term and James J. Riley was re-elected to his third term as secretary-treasurer. Also re-elected were 10 vice presidents. The new Canadian vice president, elected by the union's Canadian caucus, is Alan Crowley of Ontario.

The delegates also selected Las Vegas, Nev., and Hollywood, Fla., as permanent alternating sites for the union's conventions.

Tax Measure Contains Added Aid for Jobless

to the maximum of 10 weeks. Some 36 states plus Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands are expected to qualify for the 10 weeks.

OF THE remaining states, those with an insured unemployment rate of 3.5 percent or higher for the 13 weeks preceding the start of the program would be entitled to eight weeks of federal benefits. Workers in states with insured rates below that level would be limited to six weeks.

Jobless workers in effect will be paying the full cost of the program through a lowering of the present threshold at which unemployment compensation is counted as taxable income.

Jobless benefits, once fully tax-exempt, have been subject to income tax for individuals with gross incomes over $20,000 in the calendar year in which the benefits were received and for couples with incomes over $25,000.

The new plan would permanently drop the tax-exempt threshold to $12,000 for an individual and $18,000 for a couple, retroactive to Jan. 1, 1982. The provision would stay in effect, even after the temporary federal benefits program expires next March. Tax gains from this provision over the next three years would equal the cost of the six-month program.

St. Louis Carpenter Picked For Pension Advisory Panel

Perry Joseph, business manager of Carpenters Local 1310 in St. Louis, has been selected for a presidential appointment to the advisory council to the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation as an employee representative.

Joseph is also administrator of the union's pension, health and welfare, vacation and training funds and has served on the executive board of the St. Louis Building & Construction Trades Council.

The PBGC is the federal agency that administers pension plan protection laws.

Refusal to Bargain Charged

Council Backs Boycott Of Iowa Beef Products

Conciliation Service urged another extension. The union agreed, Iowa Beef refused.

Wages have been a key issue in every contract negotiation with the company. UFCW points out that Iowa Beef has insisted on paying lower wages than any other packer in the industry, but the highly profitable company, founded in 1962, is the largest beef slaughterer, processor, packer and renderer in the world.

IN ITS background report, the UFCW notes that IBP in its 10 plants slaughters more than 24 percent of the nation's fat cattle and boxes 40 percent of all beef shipped in the United States.

The company's sales in 1981 topped $5 billion, its operating income was $85 million and its net profits were about $58 million, UFCW said. It noted that Iowa Beef alone supplies about 15 percent of the nation's beef market, and its production capacity is greater than its four nearest competitors combined. The firm was acquired by Occidental Petroleum last year.

The union has prepared information packets and instructions for its regional directors and other staff to urge markets and consumers not to stock or buy Iowa Beef products. Boycott plans include letters to market managers asking them to suspend Iowa Beef orders as well as informational picketing and handbilling at customer entrances to stores that sell Iowa Beef meat.

THE UFCW has charged that the company's contract demands are an attempt "to dismantle the labor agreement."

Besides the four-year pay freeze, Iowa Beef is calling for reclassifications that would mean lower pay for 700 workers and formation of an "extra gang" that would constitute about eight percent of the workforce employed at lower wages without contract benefits or seniority of any kind.

Other demands pressed by the company include elimination of the current weekly guarantee of 36 hours of pay Monday through Friday in favor of a 38-hour sliding scale computed twice a year that the UFCW says would gut overtime provisions and subject workers to an erratic pay scale and work schedule.

IBP WANTS to start new hires at $2 an hour less than current workers for the first two years, $1.50 less in the third year and $1 less in the fourth year.

With turnover already running at 100 percent a year in the Dakota City plant, this provision would make it extremely difficult for the union to maintain a membership, particularly in a right-to-work state, the UFCW said.

The UFCW charged that the company is already paying the strikebreakers the lower wage rates. Before the strike, workers in slaughtering were being paid $9.27 an hour and those in processing $8.97 an hour.

THE UNION offered to accept a two-year wage freeze with a wage re-opener in the third year of a three-year contract. COLA language would remain in the contract, but payments would be suspended for the term of the agreement. The union also offered to let the company adjust the weekly guarantee six times a year in slaughtering and processing.

The UFCW wants pay upgraded for five job classifications but would agree to a new-hire starting rate of $1 less than current rates for the first 60 days and 50 cents less for the next 30 days.

In addition, the union is seeking improvements in major medical coverage, expansion of dental care to dependents, improved sick leave coverage, an additional half-day holiday and a pension plan funded from profits.

UNION VOLUNTEERS made life a little easier for 11-year-old Bobby Walsh, a victim of cerebral palsy, when the Scranton, Pa., Building & Construction Trades Council built a special bathroom in the boy's home so that his parents could care for him properly. The council raised over $12,000 for the project and, thanks to volunteer labor and contributions of materials, there was enough left to buy Bobby an educational communications machine, one of only 15 in the country. With the youngster are, from left, Jack McNulty, Building Trades Council president, Fred Schimelfenig, Carpenters business manager who coordinated the volunteer workers, and Tom DeMatteo of Plumbers Local 90.

Staff Union Hits 'Unfair' Tactics of NLRB Chairman

A staff union which represents clerical employees of the National Labor Relations Board in Washington and both clerical and professional workers in NLRB field offices has charged the agency and its chairman, John R. Van de Water, with engaging in unfair labor tactics that would not be tolerated in the private sector.

The unaffiliated NLRB Union said it has been trying for more than a year to negotiate a Performance Appraisal System for headquarters employees as required by the Civil Service Reform Act.

It said in a handbill that Van de Water has refused to meet directly with the union representatives on the issue and last October unilaterally put into effect the agency's proposal "without having concluded good faith negotiations" with the union.

Meanwhile, the union said, the separately administered NLRB general counsel's office reached a satisfactory agreement with the union giving both clerical and professional field employees "equitable protections" against removal and downgradings.

It termed "discriminatory" the NLRB's refusal to extend comparable protections to headquarters workers, primarily lower-paid minorities and women.

Remedies Sought for Flaws In Immigration Reform Bill

The AFL-CIO will urge the House to [illegible] immigration reform bill that is intended to curb illegal border-crossing while giving legal residence to undocumented aliens who have established themselves in this country.

As passed by the Senate, the bill includes some features the AFL-CIO has long urged. These include penalties for employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens, although the sanctions are not as strong as the AFL-CIO had sought. And the bill takes at least a step toward an effective identification system that labor considers necessary to make the program work without risking economic discrimination against any ethnic group.

IT ALSO moves backward, in the AFL-CIO's judgment, by making it easier for agricultural employers to bring in foreign workers rather than provide the wages and conditions that would attract U.S. workers.

In a letter to senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison had warned [illegible] door bracero program." The reference was to the system that flourished in the 1950s under which growers near the Mexican border kept wages down by importing each year large numbers of Mexicans to work the fields.

"In 1962, Congress disbanded the bracero program as being inconsistent with American principles and the welfare of American workers," Denison reminded senators. "In 1982, during a period of enormous unemployment, it would be unconscionable to re-authorize in any way an enlarged bracero program," he protested.

THE SENATE, nevertheless, rejected by a 62-28 vote an amendment that would have held the temporary worker program to present levels.

The employer sanctions provision, which applies to establishments with four or more workers, sets a $1,000 civil fine for a first offense for each illegal alien employed. The fine would double for further violations. A "pattern or practice of violations" would subject an employer to criminal misdemeanor penalties, which could include up to six months in prison.

All new job hires would be required to show to their employers a birth certificate or social security card along with other means of identification such as a driver's license.

The Senate bill calls for development within three years of a reliable identification system.

ALIENS WHO came to the United States before Jan. 1, 1977, would be granted permanent resident status; those who came between that date and Jan. 1, 1980, would be given temporary resident status. Temporary residents, after three years, could obtain permanent resident status. Aliens would be permitted to seek citizenship after five years as permanent residents.

The bill sets an annual limit of 425,000 new immigrants, not counting persons admitted as refugees.

No more than 20,000 could come from any country except for Canada and Mexico, allowed 40,000 each. But any unused portion of Canada's allowance could be available to Mexico.

House Approves Community Jobs Plan

The House voted 281-95 for a labor-supported program of economic development grants to unemployment-ravaged communities and soundly defeated an amendment that would have mangled Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage protections.

The AFL-CIO welcomed the House action as a sign of growing awareness of the severity of the nation's unemployment crisis. But the measure, titled the National Development Investment Act, still faces an uphill road because of Administration opposition.

IT WOULD authorize up to $500 million a year for three years in 50-percent federal matching grants to communities that have severe unemployment problems and an economic development plan that includes private-sector commitment for job expansion.

Eligible localities would be able to use the funds for roads, water and sewer lines or other public facilities that further economic development.

The new program would be more sharply focused than the Public Works & Economic Development Act, which it would replace. That law, administered by the Commerce Dept.'s Economic Development Administration, is scheduled to expire on Sept. 30, and the Reagan Administration doesn't want it extended or replaced.

THE HOUSE-PASSED bill also authorizes substantially more funds than President Reagan sought for the Appalachian Regional Commission. The Administration wants to end all non-highway funding.

The Senate has passed a limited Appalachian assistance bill, and the House attached its broader measure to that bill in an effort to bring about a House-Senate conference.

One of the new features in the House bill is authorization for federal grants of up to $1 million each to help communities set up a revolving loan fund targeted to helping small businesses. It also authorizes technical assistance grants to help employees purchase plants that would otherwise shut down.

Rep. James L. Oberstar (D-Minn.) was the floor manager of the bill and Rep. William F. Clinger, Jr. (R-Pa.) gave it bipartisan co-sponsorship.

THE DAVIS-BACON battle came on an amendment proposed by Rep. Tom Hagedorn (R-Minn.).

Hagedorn proposed a complex system under which there would be two sets of bidders on contracts funded under the economic development legislation. One set would consist of firms willing to pay Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wages; the other of firms not bound by the requirement. A firm not paying prevailing wages would get the contract if it were 10 percent below the low Davis-Bacon Act bidder.

A hard-core of House conservatives spoke in support of the Hagedorn amendment, but it was beaten on a 237-140 vote. By party breakdown, 38 Democrats and 102 Republicans supported the attempt to lower wage standards; 174 Democrats and 63 Republicans voted against the amendment.

IN WARSAW'S Victory Square, police used water cannons to disperse a rally in support of Poland's suppressed free trade union movement, Solidarity. But Solidarity's supporters were out in even bigger numbers the next day.

Polish Rallies Show Support For Solidarity

Warsaw—Poland's communist regime used tear gas and water cannon to put down supporters of the suspended Solidarity free trade union here and elsewhere in the country as the underground labor movement opened a two-week drive to mark the second anniversary of its founding.

Riot police charged a crowd of 10,000 people in Gdansk on Aug. 13, and skirmished with Solidarity supporters gathered in Warsaw's Victory Square singing hymns and union songs. Other demonstrations were reported in Nowa Huta, near Krakow in southern Poland, and in Wroclaw.

THE INCIDENTS coincided with a visit by Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, the Polish government chief, with Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev. They also came eight months to the day after Jaruzelski clamped martial law on Poland and ordered the detention of thousands of Solidarity leaders and members.

Police also dispersed crowds earlier this week in Warsaw, as the regime warned it would crack down on demonstrations between now and Aug. 31. Two years ago on that date, the People's United Workers Party signed an agreement in Gdansk establishing the first free labor movement in any communist country.

Press reports from Warsaw cited bulletins from the now-banned Solidarity union calling on its members and supporters to be "extremely visible" this year on the second anniversary of the union's legalization.

"EVERYONE MUST demonstrate that Solidarity is operating and is fighting," the bulletin was quoted in reports.

The use of tear gas here was the first in Warsaw since the last major demonstrations May 1 and 3.

Meanwhile, in a sermon at Czestochowa, Poland's Roman Catholic primate called for new talks between the authorities and the suspended trade union. The primate, Archbishop Josef Glemp, declared that the right to organize into free unions was a "natural right" of all men and women.

Charity Drive Bars R-T-W in Fort Worth

Fort Worth, Tex.—Federal employees here won't be solicited by the National Right to Work Committee's Legal Defense Fund during this fall's Combined Federal Campaign.

The anti-union group had been rated eligible in a heavily-criticized ruling by the President's Office of Personnel Management. But federal agencies in the Fort Worth area ruled that it didn't provide any local services and thus didn't qualify for the Fort Worth charity solicitation of federal workers.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has urged government workers in cities where anti-labor groups are allowed to solicit to designate their contributions for genuine charities. The council did not advocate a boycott and asked union members to continue to "do their share" through contributions to the combined campaign because so many worthy organizations are "in desperate need" of the funds.

Fraser Raps 'Almost Useless' OSHA Chemical Label Rule

Detroit—The Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposed chemical labeling rule is so flawed it would be "almost useless to working men and women," Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser declared.

Testifying at an OSHA hearing here on the proposed "hazard communication standard," Fraser said the "so-called labeling standard has any number of fatal flaws which render it lifeless—almost useless to working men and women, including the 1.2 million members of our union."

FRASER OUTLINED the "worst five flaws" of the proposed standard for the panel:

- The real names of chemicals would not be required on containers, even if the chemicals are known to be hazardous.
- Companies would have too much freedom to decide which chemicals would be labeled.
- Trade secret protection would be so broad that the identity of almost any chemical could be concealed.
- Unions would not automatically be considered workers' representatives and would have to get written authorization from workers for access to chemical information.
- Many workplaces where workers are exposed to hazardous chemicals would not be covered by the standard.

Fraser said that there are more than 90,000 "nameless, potential chemical killers roaming the workplaces of our nation," but the proposal would do nothing to stop manufacturers from revealing only trade names while concealing the true chemical names from workers.

FRASER SAID THAT "without these names, our members don't have a fighting chance against chemicals they work with every day." Choosing personal protection equipment, seeking medical help for immediate or long-term health problems and monitoring other protection methods and practices all require actual chemical names, Fraser said.

He urged OSHA to adopt a one-line labeling rule saying: "Every employer shall label every chemical container with complete and precise names and amounts of such chemicals."

"We believe that labeling all chemicals is the most cost-effective approach to labeling," Fraser declared. Management would be able to "relate particularly well to a 100-percent labeling rule," he said, because it "won't require much thought on management's part and its success won't depend on their sophistication or administrative ability. We don't believe that managers should be entrusted to label some chemicals but not label others."

Senior Citizens Denounce Tilt of Report on Aging

The final report of the 1981 White House Conference on Aging is "a disgrace and an affront to the elderly of the nation," National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman declared.

Clayman registered his protest in a letter to Health & Human Services Sec. Richard Schweiker.

THE FINAL report of the conference, which was held last fall and cost the taxpayers $6 million, concluded that older Americans are "the wealthiest, best fed, best housed, healthiest, most self-reliant older population in our history."

That is not the way conference delegates saw it, Clayman recalled. He said the meeting "was fraught with difficulties and political manipulation." Nevertheless, it did recommend positive steps to strengthen the federal government's role in aiding the elderly, he said.

Clayman said the conference made recommendations to strengthen the Social Security system, including the use of general revenues for the trust funds. But these were omitted from the final report, he said. Also missing was a discussion of the needs of older women, Clayman observed.

The final report recommended the use of Medicare vouchers. Yet no committee involved in health care made such a recommendation, he noted.

OCAW Drops Boycott Of Faberge Products

The Executive Board of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers has voted to end the union's three-year-old boycott of Faberge, Inc.

The boycott was called in 1979 after the company closed its Ridgefield, N.J., plant and reopened it under non-union conditions in North Carolina.

OCAW President Robert Goss in a letter to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, said the boycott was being discontinued because of its impact on other OCAW workers at a Faberge facility in St. Paul, Minn.

Budget for Retired Couple Up 8.4 Percent over Year

Living costs for an older, retired couple maintaining a moderate standard of living last fall were 8.4 percent higher than a year earlier, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

To maintain an "intermediate" lifestyle as of last October, a husband and wife retired in an urban area needed an annual income of $10,226, BLS said. Increases of 8.8 and 8.3 percent were recorded for the "lower" and "higher" budgets, respectively.

THE INCREASES are approximately 2 percentage points less than those reported for the comparable 1979-80 period, BLS said. More moderate increases in food prices contributed to the smaller rises.

The government's consumer price index rose 3.7 percent between October 1981 and June 1982, which would bring the total budget costs as of this summer, to $10,604 at the intermediate level, $7,493 at the lower level, and $15,636 at the higher level.

The three budgets, drawn up for 24 urban areas, four non-metropolitan areas, and Anchorage, Alaska, are based on a hypothetical "market basket" of goods and services purchased by retired couples. A retired couple is defined as a husband, aged 65 or older, and a wife who are self-supporting, in reasonably good health and able to take care of themselves.

DIFFERENT qualities and quantities of goods and services are provided for each budget level, but none of the three levels includes income taxes.

BLS said the lower-level budget is not defined as a subsistence or poverty level, but only as a relatively lower level than the intermediate category.

In all three budgets, medical-care costs showed the largest increases over the year, climbing 14.8 percent at the intermediate level, and 14.9 percent at the two other levels.

TRANSPORTATION costs showed the second-highest jump with increases of 13.6, 12.9, and 12.1 percent in the lower, intermediate, and higher budgets.

Rental costs include contract rent, estimated costs of fuels and utilities where these are not part of the rent, and insurance on household contents. Homeowner costs are based on the assumption that retired couples own their homes, and have no payments for mortgage principal and interest.

Budget figures for retired couples living in non-metropolitan areas were slightly lower than for urban families, $6,841 at the lower level, $9,203 at the intermediate level, and $13,241 at the higher level.

THE AVERAGE social security payment for couples aged 62 and over in the fall of 1981 was $638 a month, or $7,656 a year. The current figure is $695 a month, or $8,340 a year, still well short of either of the two higher budgets.

BLS noted that it is discontinuing its series of budget data on retired couples with its latest release because of recent budget reductions by the Reagan Administration.

Convention Mandate

Printers Seek New Ways To Advance Bargaining

Seattle—Delegates to the Typographical Union's 124th convention heeded a call by President Joe Bingel to develop "new and alternative measures to strengthen" bargaining as they voted to expand use of the union's $6.7-million strike fund to include "activities in lieu of" strikes.

Addressing the convention's opening session, Bingel charged that more and more often bargaining is being "prolonged and frustrated by the professional bully boys with brief cases out to destroy good labor-management relationships" and that many times "their sole duty is to provoke a strike or lockout."

COUPLING THOSE tactics with the high level of automation and the tremendous financial resources of publishing industry conglomerates in many instances results in a strike no longer being "the ultimate weapon" in bargaining, Bingel said.

The convention-approved measure, which will go to referendum for ratification by the membership, also would permit use of the strike fund for "activities . . . necessary in the processing of a strike or lockout." Use of the fund's resources is now restricted to paying benefits of up to $250 a week to members on strike or locked out.

DELEGATES ALSO called upon the ITU committee that has been engaged in merger talks with The Newspaper Guild to permit "nothing . . . to interfere" with completion of a full proposal for merger of the two unions during meetings scheduled the second half of August.

"The urgency of bringing merger to a final conclusion for the benefit of our members cannot be overestimated," the convention stated. Formal talks between the unions, which broke off in April 1981 after more than three years, were resumed this spring.

A message to the convention from Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., said he was confident that merger is "firmly within our reach."

Delegates also heard Communications Workers' President Glenn E. Watts suggest that after the unions in the publishing industry unite—the Graphic Arts and the Printing & Graphic Communications unions also are holding merger talks—all the unions in the communications industry at-large do likewise. That would include the CWA, the Broadcast Engineers & Technicians and the Telegraph Workers.

THE CONVENTION also voted the ITU's thanks to its "many friends in Congress" who overrode President Reagan's veto of a four-year extension of the manufacturing clause in the U.S. copyright law.

The delegates said they were "appalled" by Reagan's veto "at a time of record high unemployment." The Labor Dept. estimated that failure to extend the provision, first enacted in 1891, could have cost as many as 172,000 jobs in the printing industry and up to 367,000 in related enterprises.

Convention resolutions attacked the Reagan administration's economic and labor policies in general and urged U.S. members and locals to "participate to a greater degree than ever before in this year's elections on behalf of candidates endorsed by labor" and to defeat candidates who have supported the Administration's economic and labor policies and programs.

THE UNION'S "vehement objection" to the Administration's "repeated threats" to balance the budget at the expense of the social security system also was voiced, and the delegates urged that social security be funded "by general revenues" as well as contributions from employers and employees. Delegates also:

- Called on all locals and members in the United States to participate in the new campaign for adoption of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.
- Protested CBS-TV's cancellation of the Lou Grant Show, which the convention said "brought to millions . . . a rational perspective of union workers in the newspaper industry."
- Condemned the effort in the Senate to amend the Hobbs Act to make it a federal crime for a striker to be involved in a picket-line altercation.

Merger Proposal By Yardmasters Loses by 2 Votes

Chicago—The 90 delegates to the Railroad Yardmasters convention rejected merger with the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers by a two-vote margin.

The merger had been under discussion for two years and had been approved by the Yardmasters' executive board. It had also been supported by a poll of the membership. The difficulty of financing a national organization for about 3,500 members and a further shrinkage of membership projected for the future had led the union to propose a merger with the Engineers.

ALONG WITH the vote to reject merger, delegates took action to raise dues and to cut expenses.

Dues were increased from $28.25 to $38.50 per month, effective Jan. 1, 1983. Out of the increase, and reduction of the dues portion set aside to finance the convention and meetings of the general chairmen, the grand lodge will get $6 more per month and local lodges will receive $6.50 more per month.

To reduce expenses, delegates voted to eliminate the union's monthly Journal and substitute a newsletter to top officers when possible. Also approved was a change in bylaws to require only one meeting of general chairmen instead of the two in the four years between conventions.

A. T. OTTO, JR. was re-elected president and chairman of the executive board without opposition. R. J. Culver was also elected without opposition as secretary-treasurer and secretary of the board. Other members of the board include Vice Presidents N. A. Erdody, J. C. Thomas, R. C. Arthur, D. R. Carver, R. R. Klinker, James L. Roy and A. J. Crosthait. Roy and Crosthait are new members. The board will be reduced by two members by not filling the next two vacancies that occur.

Delegates selected Denver as the site for the 1986 convention.

UNION WOMEN attending the first Western Regional Summer Institute for trade union women put theory into practice when they joined the picket line in support of striking cannery workers in Eugene, Ore., site of the conference. The six-day institute was one of four in 1982 sponsored by the University & College Labor Education Association and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education. Local 670 of the unaffiliated Teamsters won a new agreement shortly after the picket line demonstration.

'Runaway' Work Key Issue In Film Cartoonists' Strike

Hollywood, Calif.—The creators of animated feature movies and the Saturday morning television cartoons have walked away from their drawing boards in a strike to preserve key job security terms in their contract.

The 1,600 members of Motion Picture Screen Cartoonists Local 839 struck the major cartoon studios Aug. 5 after the studios mounted an effort to dump the "runaway" clauses from their contracts with the union.

THE PROVISION, negotiated in 1979 after a two-week walkout, requires the studios to guarantee full employment in their own shops before contracting out work to low-wage employers either in the area or overseas.

The five major studios struck by Local 839 of the Theatrical Stage Employees include Hanna-Barbera, Disney, Marvel Productions, Filmation Studios and Warner Brothers Cartoons.

The strike decision followed a rejection of a "final offer" from Hanna-Barbera. In a letter to the local's members, the negotiating committee pointed out that the offer would have allowed the studio to lay off as many as 75 percent of its employees in favor of outside contractors and would have given the company the right to pick and choose among contracts with the other studios if it preferred various clauses in those agreements to those in its own pact with the union.

Also at issue are wages, with the union seeking additional increases for some workers over those negotiated in the basic industry package.

THE UNION pointed out that three-fourths of its members work in television cartooning, which is becoming increasingly seasonal. Some television cartoonists work only about six months of the year, and because studio schedules are similar, there is little opportunity for other work.

Local 839 is organizing picketing and support rallies on a daily basis at the major studies, including a rally at Group W Cable Television in Santa Monica where 26 technicians have been on strike since July.

Least-Educated Workers Bear Brunt of Job Losses

The number of workers with college degrees is going up and unemployment is hitting hardest at those with the least education, a Labor Dept. survey shows.

A study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that since 1970 the proportion of workers 25 to 64 years old who have college degrees has risen to about one-fourth of the total workforce. The number of workers without high school diplomas is about one-fifth.

The postwar baby boom generation, the BLS said, accounts for one-third of the 25-64 labor force, and nearly half of those workers have completed at least one year of college compared to about 30 percent among workers 55 to 64.

The study also found the largest increase in joblessness between March 1981 and March 1982 occurred among workers with a high school education or less, or about 75 percent of the total increase in unemployment.

In a related study, the BLS said the number of families in which both husband and wife work remained steady in 1981-1982 compared to a year earlier. The department attributed this pause after nearly a decade of climbing to the limited number of jobs now available.

The BLS pointed out that median income for families with two wage earners is about 40 percent higher than for families in which only the husband is employed and about three times higher than for those families maintained by only a female wage-earner.

IUE Wins Vote at General Electric Cleveland Plant

Cleveland—Over 700 workers at a General Electric lamp-making plant here have voted for representation by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, turning out an unaffiliated union which had held bargaining rights since 1979.

Employees at GE's Euclid plant voted 369 to 224 for IUE over the National Production Workers with 54 votes for no union. The IUE began organizing at the facility earlier in 1982 when workers from the plant contacted the AFL-CIO affiliate that already represents about 70,000 GE workers nationally.

IUE President David J. Fitzmaurice and Sec.-Treas. William H. Bywater attributed the victory to a "superior effort" by the union's organizing staff. The unit has been chartered as IUE Local 715.

The Euclid workers had been represented by the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers and by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers before they chose representation by the NPW in 1979. The IBEW agreed to relinquish representation claims to IUE for one election.

Earlier this year, the IUE posted victories in six elections involving about 1,000 workers. These companies include Certech, Inc., Westwood, N.J.; Vicon, Pittsfield, Mass.; Hefco, Inc., Eatontown, N.J.; Hall & Son, Philadelphia, and Pepsi Cola, St. Mary's, Pa.

Meany Center Lists Courses For 1982-83

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies has published its 1982-83 catalogue offering 52 institutes, workshops and programs for union leaders.

Programs at the Meany Center—most of them running for one week—are open to full-time officers and staff of all AFL-CIO affiliates.

ALL BUT seven of this year's programs will be presented at the center's 47-acre campus in Silver Spring, Md. Six will be held at state universities in California, Oregon and Illinois. A seminar for secretary-treasurers will meet at Williamsburg, Va.

In addition, AFL-CIO affiliates have scheduled 48 staff training programs, many co-sponsored by the Meany Center.

In a foreword to the new catalogue, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who is chairman of the center's board of trustees, acknowledges the serious challenges union leaders face this year and points out: "Sometimes it helps to take a week to review and refresh our knowledge of a subject, sharpen our insight and find out how others are coping."

THE CENTER'S offerings this year include seven institutes on organizing, six on arbitration, five on collective bargaining, two on labor law, five on development of leadership skills, and seven on the application of computers to union needs.

Other special institutes and workshops will cover audio-visual techniques, civil rights, the economy, education techniques, how to deal with the news media, newswriting and editing for union publications, occupational health and safety, stress as a union issue, unions in the year 2000, the quality of work life, technological change, union skills for union women, and international affairs.

NO TUITION is charged for center-sponsored courses. The charge for room and board at the Silver Spring campus is $60 a day.

Copies of the 1982-83 catalogue are available on request to Fred K. Hoehler, director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Television, Radio Artists Set Goals for National Contracts

Portland, Ore. — Bargaining goals for radio, television and recording contracts and the need for stepped-up organizing were the key issues addressed by delegates to the 45th annual convention of the Television & Radio Artists here.

In his address to the 300 delegates representing the union's 40 local organizations, AFTRA President Bill Hillman said, "We are facing new and different challenges of a kind we have never faced before, but the important thing is that . . . for all the divisions that may exist between us, we . . . present a united front to those who would defeat us."

HILLMAN WAS re-elected by acclamation to his fourth term and New York's Jackson Beck was re-elected first vice president of the 55,000-member union, also by acclamation.

In a hard hitting invocation to "persist in the spirit and tradition of those who carried the fight" when the union was formed in 1938, Executive Sec. Sanford Wolff told the delegates that "we will prove to our enemies and our friends" in the coming days that "there is no place to hide from AFTRA. . . ."

Despite a verdict against the union in an antitrust suit brought by Tuesday Productions, which AFTRA is appealing, Wolff said AFTRA's case will ultimately be proven to be legally correct.

"There should be no doubt in anyone's mind that this union will survive; that the union will be strengthened and not weakened; that the resolve of the staff and members will be nourished by the litigation and not starved. . . .

"WE WILL protect the gains we have made. We will get our contracts signed. Employers will respect their agreements.

"But to achieve those ends and the protection afforded we have only one way to go—return to that old time religion . . . organize and organize and organize.

"There will be no easy way to get members in the anti-union areas of the country. There will be no granting of benefits or signing of agreements by employers without old-fashioned organizing and hard bargaining."

AFTRA will appeal a jury decision in U.S. District Court for Southern California that awarded nearly $9.4 million in damages to Tuesday Productions on the grounds that certain provisions in AFTRA's 1975 and 1979 contracts, which have been changed in subsequent agreements, violated anti-trust laws.

THE NON-UNION company contended that AFTRA's actions, including putting Tuesday Productions on its "unfair" list, constituted an unreasonable boycott or restraint of trade because other employers under AFTRA contracts were influenced not to do business with Tuesday.

In addition to Hillman and Beck, other national officers elected by the convention are Second Vice President Joe Slattery, Chicago; Vice Presidents Mike James, Seattle; Bill Steinbach, Pittsburgh; Shelby Scott, Boston; Peter Hackes, Washington; Brad Phillips, New York; Frank Maxwell, Los Angeles; Stan Farber, Los Angeles; Treas. Elizabeth Morgan, New York and Recording Sec. Peter Cleaveland, San Francisco.

The union's Equal Employment Opportunities Committee, in a preliminary report on a survey it is conducting, said the findings show that more than 95 percent of all principal contract performers on daytime series are white. The same preliminary tabulation indicates that in daytime series, 97 percent of all performances calling for the services of principal players were performed by whites.

ONE OF the mandates of the convention was to carry the study to completion and impress upon the industry the urgency with which the union views the issue.

The convention approved proposals on wages and working conditions for two major national contracts soon to be negotiated—the network radio and television codes, which expire Nov. 15, and the phonograph recording code expiring next Mar. 31.

While the major portion of the delegates' time was spent hammering out these proposals, the convention also asked:

- Continued support of the Equal Rights Amendment to the Constitution.
- Creation of a committee to investigate home testing evaluations of performers, the impact of pressure groups on programming, cancellation of programs whose scripts or cast members address political and social issues.
- A strong expression of concern over the First Amendment implications of the cancellation of the "Lou Grant" series.

Mortimer Becker, AFTRA's general counsel since 1957, was the recipient of the George Heller Memorial Gold Card, the union's highest honor, awarded annually for "distinguished service to AFTRA and its members."

Roy Wellborn Dies at 74, Headed Grain Millers

Oklahoma City—Services were held here Aug. 17 for Roy O. Wellborn, president-emeritus of the Grain Millers, who died Aug. 14 in Edina, Minn., at 74.

In a telegram to his widow, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue described Wellborn as "a good man, a good friend, and an inspiring trade union leader."

Wellborn, who had been ill the past two and a half years, joined the Grain Millers as a worker at General Mills here in 1937. He was president of the union's local before becoming vice president of its southwestern district in 1946. After serving as executive vice president, he acceded to the presidency in 1960, holding the post until leaving in 1979.

Besides his wife, he leaves two daughters, two sons, and several grandchildren.

Bipartisan Vote Puts Tax Bill Through House

architect of the Administration's "supply side" economic theory, Rep. Jack Kemp (R-N.Y.), was a leader of House Republicans planning to vote against the measure.

With their normal supporters in disarray, the White House had to turn to congressional Democrats.

The Democrat whip in the House, Rep. Thomas S. Foley (Wash.), set the tone when he was given network time for his party's official response to the President's speech.

Foley, speaking for the House Democratic leadership, said that in this case the President was right and he would vote for the bill as a necessary measure.

While the spotlight was on the tax bill controversy, Congress was following through on budget-dictated spending cuts in an array of federal programs.

One of the cuts adopted sliced in half the cost-of-living adjustments for civilian and military retirees under the age of 62 and delayed the COLA a month for all government retirees.

Shortage of NLRB Judges Drags Out Case Processing

A shortage of administrative law judges has produced a 300-percent increase in the time it takes to process unfair labor practice complaints before the National Labor Relations Board, the General Accounting Office reported.

GAO told the House subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations that 90 percent of all unfair labor practice cases filed with the NLRB are resolved informally within 40 days.

However, in those cases where formal complaints are issued, the median time between the issuance of the complaint and the conclusion of a final hearing by an administrative law judge has risen to 155 days in fiscal year 1980, compared with only 48 days in fiscal year 1974, GAO reported.

DURING THIS same period, the median time between the close of an administrative law judge's hearing and issuance of a final decision also climbed sharply, from 69 to 158 days. The median time required to process an unfair labor practice case from beginning to end was 484 days in 1980, compared to 327 days in 1974, GAO said.

NLRB officials interviewed by GAO attributed the increased processing time primarily to a shortage of administrative law judges which began during the mid-1970s when a government-wide ceiling on their number was imposed.

While the number of unfair labor practice cases scheduled for hearings between fiscal years 1974 and 1981 rose by about 85 percent, the average number of administrative law judges increased by only 20 percent to its current authorized level of 125 positions. As of last April, GAO said, only 112 of the authorized positions were filled.

GAO reported that the overall number of unfair labor practice charges filed with the NLRB rose by about 49 percent between fiscal years 1974 and 1979. NLRB officials attributed some of the caseload growth to increased public awareness of the agency.

Union representatives contacted by GAO took a different view, attributing the caseload increase during this period to an "anti-union climate" in the country.

Modern Management Comes to Washington

By the Administration's estimate, the 10 percent income tax cut that took effect July 1 should have pumped $33 billion into the economy the first month.

When the figures came out $8 billion short, the Commerce Dept. finally figured out the reason. It turns out that someone forgot to adjust withholding brackets, and taxpayers will have to wait for refunds next spring to get the difference.

Reagan's Choice

A LOT OF NONSENSE has been written about President Reagan's embrace of multibillion dollar tax increases, so perhaps a few facts are in order.

First, the admitted need for such a large revenue-raiser stems directly from the failure of the Administration's economic program.

Supply-side economics, typified by the enormously wasteful giveaways of last year's tax cuts, further enriched the wealthy but left the nation worse off. Unemployment rose while profitable corporations used tax windfalls to buy up other companies and shielded earnings from taxation by buying up tax credits.

The tax bill the President now praises was forced on him by a Congress unwilling to tolerate the huge deficits resulting from last year's excess and aware that there was a limit to the "savings" that could be achieved by further butchering government programs.

Now, there were and are better and more equitable ways of raising revenues, including the $700 ceiling on individual tax cuts that the AFL-CIO advocated and Senate Democrats supported. The higher consumer taxes included in the bill fall equally but inequitably on rich and poor alike.

NEVERTHELESS, there are in the legislation genuine reforms that mop up some of the drippings from past tax giveaways. And it is to the President's credit that he has defended these reforms—even to the point of angering the tunnel-vision ideologues who have been his staunchest supporters. He asked for, and got, the Democratic votes to make up for the GOP desertions.

It would be premature, however, to read too much into this one touch of presidential realism.

President Reagan can choose to leap back into the ideological fold where he for so long berated the government he heads. Or he can take a fresh look at the wreckage of a failed economic program, at the lengthened unemployment lines, the closed factories, the sharp growth in poverty. There's an old saying that "if it ain't broke, don't fix it." But the converse is equally true. This Administration's economic program isn't working. And it needs fixing—badly.

Solidarity Lives

WITH COURAGE, the people of Poland have told the world that Solidarity lives, that the free trade union movement has not been extinguished by the imprisonment of its leaders.

Tear gas and water cannon break up the daily demonstrations. But the people are back the next day, in ever greater numbers.

It is not just in the city squares that Poland's voice is heard. At one of the nation's holiest religious shrines, Archbishop Josef Glemp, the primate of Poland, spoke at a vast outdoor mass to 120,000 pilgrims.

The right to organize, he declared, is a "natural right" of all people, "nor can anyone deprive us of that right."

One does not usually applaud a sermon, but this vast audience did so.

We add our own applause.

Flat-Rate Tax Another Scheme To Help the Rich Grow Richer

By Press Associates, Inc.

PROPOSALS FOR a "flat-rate" tax on gross income to replace the basically "progressive" income tax system recently have moved into the foreground of public debate.

The flat-rate idea is often touted as a bold new way to simplify and "reform" a tax code laden with loopholes for special interests and the rich.

However, recent studies by tax experts conclude that the primary effect of a flat-rate tax would be to further shift the tax burden from high-income to middle- and low-income Americans.

THE FLAT-RATE idea really isn't new. It has long been espoused by conservative critics of the progressive income tax, which is based on the concept of ability to pay—those with higher incomes contributing greater shares of their income in taxes.

By contrast, flat-rate tax schemes would apply a single percentage rate—proposals range from 10 to 20 percent—regardless of income level or ability to pay.

The plan's strongest advocates include such well-financed groups as the Coalition for a Flat-Rate Tax and the National Conservation Political Action Committee.

But it also has been picking up support among some congressional moderates and liberals. Delegates to the Democratic Party's summer conference in Philadelphia said it merited consideration because "common sense dictates that this convoluted (income tax) system be dramatically simplified."

President Reagan and top Administration officials have been moving rapidly toward outright support of a flat-rate tax.

IT'S EASY to see why the idea may appeal to many taxpayers at first glance.

Its proponents correctly argue that the tax code is too complicated and has too many loopholes. Why not scrap the whole array of tax deductions, credits and exclusions and set a single low rate for everyone, they ask.

But one must remember that tax preferences benefit not only the wealthy but most middle- and low-income taxpayers. They include deductions for home mortage interest, for state and local taxes, for union dues, for medical bills, for consumer installment interest, for charitable and church donations, and for alimony and educational expenses.

Most flat-rate proposals would tax social security and other entitlement benefits in addition to such employer fringe benefits as health and life insurance and pension contributions.

A recent analysis by Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation shows that while high-income taxpayers would lose such lucrative tax breaks as the 60-percent exclusion of capital gains, they still would pay much less in taxes under flat-rate proposals. The lost revenue would be made up in higher taxes for low- and middle-income taxpayers.

THE COMMITTEE'S report said that under a 15.2-percent flat rate, families with incomes between $20,000 and $30,000 would pay about 13 percent more in taxes, or an additional $351 annually.

Those having incomes between $15,000 and $20,000 would pay 19 percent more, or an added $309. Those in the $10,000 to $15,000 income range would pay an additional 25 percent, or $244, more in taxes.

By comparison, high income taxpayers would reap big gains even with their capital gains fully taxed under a 15.2-percent flat rate and with all itemized deductions prohibited.

Those with incomes between $50,000 and $100,000 would pay about 15 percent, or $1,684, less in taxes. Those with incomes in the $100,000 to $200,000 range would pay 33 percent less, a yearly $9,822 windfall. And so on.

Thus one can see that a flat-rate tax is far less equitable than the present system, with all its faults.

Congressional committees plan to hold hearings on flat-rate proposals later this year. But Senate Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.) has already formed an opinion, 'If you're rich, you'll love it. If you're not rich, look out!"

If Congress is genuinely interested in restoring equity to the tax system while reducing deficits, it could begin by rescinding the Reagan tax giveaways and then move to close the traditional tax loopholes for the rich.

MEMO FROM COPE

The 'Unconnected President'—After 19 Months, He Claims His Programs Not Related to Events

Ronald Reagan has completed 19 months of his unconnected presidency—unconnected because he claims he and his programs have no connection to so much of what has happened in that period.

He does claim connection to huge tax cuts and enormous budget cuts, but he disclaims any connection to their consequences.

Therefore, he is not connected to the highest budget deficits in the nation's history.

He is not connected to the highest unemployment rates in more than 40 years.

He is not connected to the human suffering his cuts in needed social programs have created.

These and other sour notes on the current scene are the result of "40 years of fiscal irresponsibility," as the President describes the four decades that preceded his presidency (16 of which were under GOP Presidents).

Let's take him at his word. His programs have no connection with events. Following are some of the events of the first 19 months of his presidency with which he had no connection:

- Budget deficits—Deficits in final Carter budgets: $59.6 billion in Fiscal 1980, $57.9 billion in Fiscal 1981. Projected deficits under Reagan: Depending on whose you accept, four-year cumulative deficits ranging from $430 billion to $743 billion. Best-case projections of over $100 billion for Fiscal 1982, $115 billion for Fiscal 1983. Most projections far higher, for example $140 billion in Fiscal 1983.
- Unemployment rate—7.4 percent January 1981; 9.8 percent July 1982 (highest since 1941).
- Number jobless—8 million January 1981; 10.8 million July 1982, an increase of 35 percent (highest number of persons unemployed since 1934).
- Adult male jobless rate—6.1 percent January 1981; 8.8 percent July 1982 (highest since 1930s).
- Black jobless rate—14.3 percent January 1981; 18.5 percent July 1982 (highest since 1930s).
- Hispanic jobless rate—10.8 percent January 1981; 13.9 percent July 1982 (highest since 1930s).
- Teen-age jobless rate—18.9 percent January 1981; 24.1 percent July 1982 (highest since 1930s).
- Business failures—17,044 in 1981; up from 11,742 in 1980 (45 percent increase). First six months of 1982, 11,950 business failures—annual rate 23,900, by far the highest since 1932.
- Families in poverty—6.3 million families living below poverty level in 1980; 6.9 million families in 1981 representing 31.8 million individuals, highest number since 1965.
- Home foreclosures—From January 1981 to July 1982, foreclosure rate rose by nearly 25 percent; number of foreclosures running at 400,000 annual level.

In addition to all the above, millions of needy have lost or suffered reduced food stamp coverage and Medicaid protections; hundreds of thousands of school children have lost or taken reduced nutrition assistance; thousands of farmers have been forced from their land.

But none of this has any connection to the unconnected President.

... And the 'Prisoner President'—Paranoid Right Sees Reagan Captive Of Bush Mole; Issues 48-Page Blast

Ronald Reagan is imprisoned in the White House.

His jailer is James Baker, whose "cover" is as Reagan's Chief of Staff. In reality, Baker is a deep mole planted in the White House by the George Bush faction of the GOP, the "liberals." Baker was Bush's campaign manager in the latter's try for the presidency in 1980.

It was Bush, remember, who called Reagan's program "voodoo economics" when they were both campaigning for the GOP nomination. Bush only pretended to change his mind when he joined Reagan's ticket as vice presidential nominee.

He insinuated Baker into the White House to keep Reagan from being Reagan. What comes out of Reagan really are the words and proposals of ventriloquist Baker.

Does all this sound paranoid? It is. Yet, it's the picture that emerges of the Reagan presidency from the July issue of Conservative Digest, publication of "new right" El Maximo Richard Viguerie.

The entire 48-page magazine deals with the theme expressed on its cover, "Has Reagan Deserted the Conservatives?" A President who has embraced and promoted almost their entire program is lambasted by the right-wingers in a manner they had previously reserved for "liberals."

The magazine lists 40 (count 'em . . . 40) specific complaints, gives him the "words vs. actions" treatment on a dozen right-wing issues where they feel he's betrayed them. Whereas he's done almost everything to accommodate them, they make it appear he's done almost nothing.

All this comes just two years after the "new right" hailed the Reagan candidacy, worked hard to elect him and licked their chops over the prospects of his presidency.

Now they complain, among other things, Reagan "has failed to identify the opponent as the Liberal Establishment" (which never took 48 pages at one time to clout the President).

The publication says, "Disenchantment with the Reagan presidency is now real and widespread. It is felt by conservatives of every stripe. . . ."

Which raises the question: What are these birds up to? Maybe they're not that devious, but could it be they're preparing an "out?" They are positioning themselves to tell all the true believers they turned on to politics that our brand of conservatism (an extreme brand) has not failed because Ronald Reagan has not been a truly conservative President in our mold.

He didn't follow our blueprint. He's been Jim Baker's captive, and Jim Baker represents the wrong wing of the GOP.

Next time we'll make sure we run a guy for President who's a true conservative and nobody's captive but ours.

Jesse Helms for President in '84.

Mischief in Balanced Budget Proposal—Ripping Up Social Programs by Mandate

It's time for some do-it-yourself budget balancing. See how you make out.

The chart below right lists the major elements of the Fiscal 1983 federal budget (actual figures—small-amount categories omitted).

To understand the mischief potential of the Reagan-backed balanced-budget constitutional amendment, try to apply its requirements to the actual budget below. Remember, the proposed amendment will allow for no deficits. The Fiscal 1983 budget is already $115 billion to $140 billion in the red, depending on whose projections you accept.

Take the low figure, and try to whack $115 billion out of the budget so it will balance. What items are you going to cut, and how much? From the start, it's clear you can't nickel and dime your way to a balanced budget.

There are four really big-money categories—Defense, Income Security, Interest (on the national debt), Health. Since they're where the big money is, they're where you've got to look for most of that $115 billion the amendment mandates you cut.

What about Interest? You can't touch it. It's money owed and it's got to be paid. Defense? Maybe you can whittle out a few billion, but you won't find much support among your congressional colleagues for more.

It comes down to Income Security and Health, the two categories where you'll have to achieve the bulk of your savings. And the minute you start hacking away at them, you're hacking away at programs for workers, the elderly and the needy—which have already taken a pasting from this Administration.

If you're going to slash Health, you're going to slash Medicare and Medicaid and other health care and protection services that needy and elderly Americans rely on (also you're going to cut OSHA).

If you're going to slash Income Security, you'll have to put the ax to the federal portion of unemployment compensation. You'll have to extract further sacrifices from families on food stamps and from the needy on other nutrition aid programs. You'll have to cut federal employees' retirement and disability programs.

Still, if you're going to get really big money out of Income Security, you've got to go to the $175.5 billion portion of it that covers its largest program, Social Security.

So, suddenly, the balanced budget amendment sneaks through by mandate those cuts in Social Security the administration and its right-wing point men in Congress had in mind all along. That $40 billion cut they were talking about a few months ago? It'll be just for starters.

The balanced budget amendment, if it ever takes its place in the Constitution, is a clever way to rip up the social programs that protect workers, the elderly and the needy—a goal ultra-conservatives have had for years. It would enable them to say "we didn't want to do it, folks; we had to do it. The Constitution forced us to."

Union-Busting Payments Killed

LABOR'S CASE against the proposed balanced budget constitutional amendment was beamed to union leadership gatherings in 14 key cities in this satellite telecast during the congressional recess. Taking part from the Washington end were, from left: Vice President Antonia Cortese of the Teachers, Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), President Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers, President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. The program was produced at the AFSCME television studio.

HHS Policy Overturned By Congress

Congress overruled the Reagan Administration and barred hospitals and nursing homes from charging the cost of hiring union-busting consultants to the Medicare program.

The policy reversal, urged by the AFL-CIO and unions in the health care field, was accomplished by a three-paragraph item in the 400-page tax bill Congress passed before starting a two-week recess.

UNDER THE heading, "Prohibiting Payment for Anti-Unionization Activities," the provision specified that the "reasonable costs" that health care institutions may charge to Medicare may not include expenses "incurred for activities directly related to influencing employees respecting unionization."

That's the policy that had been set by the Dept. of Health & Human Services in the Carter Administration after congressional hearings spotlighted the increased use of management consultants to thwart union organizing efforts or to bring about the decertification of an already established union.

LAST MARCH, the department scrapped the regulation instead of defending it against a court challenge brought by the American Hospital Association.

The new Reagan Administration policy specified that reimbursement would be allowed for any consultant services that did not actually violate the National Labor Relations Act. The department further agreed to make the change retroactive so that hospitals could recoup expenses for past anti-union activities.

The labor movement protested vigorously.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed the policy changeover "outrageous" and scored the Administration claim that allowing reimbursement for management consultants in campaigns against unions

Community Role Sought to Close Health Care Gap

The AFL-CIO will work at the community level to see that unemployed workers and their families aren't cut off from essential health services, and at the national level "to vigorously oppose any further cutbacks" in health benefits for the needy, the disabled or the aged.

President Lane Kirkland said the AFL-CIO and other national organizations brought together earlier this year by former Labor Sec. John T. Dunlop will encourage community-level cooperation in meeting the needs of households deprived of health benefits because of unemployment or government cutbacks.

TAKING PART in the cooperative endeavor are, in addition to the AFL-CIO, the American Medical Association, the American Hospital Association, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Associations, the Health Insurance Association of America and the Business Roundtable.

Kirkland cited Labor Dept. statistics indicating that nearly half of all workers covered by job-related health insurance lose their entitlements within one month of layoff. Only 20 percent have continued coverage for three or more months.

"This intolerable situation would not

Stop-Amendment Fight Shifts to Home Districts

By David L. Perlman

A 14-state AFL-CIO television conference signalled the shifting of labor's campaign against the balanced budget constitutional amendment proposal from the halls of Congress to the home districts of House members whose votes will be crucial.

"The battle can be won or lost" before Congress returns from its recess on Sept. 8, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed.

DONAHUE AND other national leaders in the campaign used the labor news network of the State, County & Municipal Employees for the closed circuit telecast that was beamed by satellite to the targeted locations across the country.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee, who is chairman of an AFL-CIO Executive Council committee coordinating labor's campaign against the amendment, moderated the program and joined other participants in replying to questions phoned in from the local and state union leaders at the 14 locations.

Capacity gatherings, limited only by the size of the facilities equipped to receive the telecasts, were held in San Jose, Calif.; Denver, Colo.; New Britain, Conn.; Fort Lauderdale, Fla.; Atlanta, Ga.; Indianapolis, Ind.; Des Moines, Ia.; Boston, Mass.; Newark, N.J.; Rochester, N.Y.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; St. Louis, Mo.; Milwaukee, Wis., and Spokane, Wash.

LETTER CARRIERS' President Vincent R. Sombrotto, American Federation of Teachers Vice President Antonia Cortese and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) were the other participants from the Washington studio.

Lyndon LaRouche's Strange Cult

By Wesley McCune

Special to the AFL-CIO News

One of the strangest movements on the American scene the past few years has been repudiated by both those whom it would befriend and those it counts as enemies.

Now called the Democratic National Policy Committee, it is rejected by the Democratic National Committee, keeper of the Democratic Party's name and traditions. Until recently called the U.S. Labor Party, it is denounced by almost all of organized labor.

Still the strange movement rolls along, trying to infiltrate or harass all kinds of groups, working mysteriously to find a place of influence in the economic and political scene, driven mainly by the energy of its founder and leader, Lyndon H. LaRouche, a former Trotskyite who is now closer to radical-right fascism.

The movement—now usually referred to only by its leader's name—has borrowed from both left and right extremes. It uses fronts, deception, muscle, publications, authoritarian structure, international connections, hidden funds and party-line change to recruit the wary and the unwary alike. In addition, LaRouche uses modern computer technology, an intelligence network and single issues to run up-to-date campaigns.

First of three articles

Mostly, he confounds people in various circles, but he also works hard to gain respectability out in front of his shadowy empire. For instance, he ran for President of the United States in 1976 on the U.S. Labor Party ticket and in 1980 as a Democrat (against that party's wishes) and did better than the experts thought he would.

THE FIRST TIME, he was on the ballot in 26 states and drew 40,043 votes. Last time around, he ran in Democratic primaries in about 10 states, outpolling Republicans John Connally and Sen. Robert Dole in New Hampshire.

Until losing the primary, LaRouche qualified for $526,000 in federal campaign funds and took in a substantial amount of money from various other sources, finally spending four to five million dollars.

Campaigning chiefly in New Hampshire, he had offices in eight cities and spent lavishly by that state's standards on television and publications.

In other years before 1980, more than 250 LaRouche candidates ran locally or for Congress, some doing quite well.

BUT PARTY politics is only one of LaRouche's games. He is actively promoting nuclear development, fighting with some unions while trying to infiltrate others, attacking the "Rockefeller conspiracy," pushing the gold standard, selling unidentified magazines, peddling anti-Semitism, publishing a far-out newspaper and flailing out at establishments that offend his goal of domination.

Perhaps his boldest ambition was stated early as taking over the AFL-CIO and the American labor movement, along with radical leftist and "revolutionary" organizations, as steps toward taking power in the United States.

A long article about LaRouche in the Washington Post while he was in the

LYNDON H. LaROUCHE
Campaigning in New Hampshire

New Hampshire primary stated that two major questions about the movement baffle long-time observers: "How did he get from being a Marxist to a 'conservative Democrat' and where does their money come from?"

THIS WAS followed by a quotation from Prof. David DeLeon, a student of fringe groups: "There is no one as odd as LaRouche. There is no parallel. You can't talk about it rationally."

Who is Lyndon LaRouche?

We know a lot about him from the autobiography he published in his own newspaper, New Solidarity, for Aug. 17, 1974. At that time, he was using the name of "Lyn Marcus" as some sort of convenience, and his organization was called the National Caucus of Labor Committees, a name it used until it became better known as the U.S. Labor Party, its political arm.

LaROUCHE WAS born Sept. 8, 1922, in Rochester, N.H., in a Quaker home. Ten years later, his family moved to Lynn, Mass., where he claims he started having inner conflicts, described in third-person terms still typical of his language and/or thoughts:

"In 1932, his family moved to Lynn, Massachusetts. There, within a year or so, the intensifying inner conflict between his religious and rationalist commitments impelled him into philosophy, so that he had become a fanatical Kantian by sixteen—thus temporarily reconciling his own youthful pietist and rationalist commitments. His first quasi-political experience occurred shortly after that, as he violated his family's organic Republican traditions by joining the CIO shoeworkers' union in connection with a regular summertime job."

LaRouche says he then headed for Communist Party headquarters overseas, but broke with the International very soon and was "a sort of hardened Trotskyist," an allegiance he maintained for some years.

HE JOINED the Trotskyist Socialist Workers Party in 1949 and became involved in early ideological fights within the electrical workers while employed at General Electric. In the mid-Sixties he moved to New York City, became a consultant — whatever that means — and started doing personal research on what became the National Caucus of Labor Committees.

He says that Trotskyism was dying—and died—and that if a viable socialist movement was to exist it had to begin from scratch. The 1968 student strike and disorders at Columbia University gave him an opportunity to become active again by aligning himself with the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). A split developed in that group with the Maoists going one way and LaRouche organizing the National Caucus of SDS Labor Committees. He soon dropped the SDS and had his own organization.

Both his NCLC, now apparently defunct, and his U.S. Labor Party are part of an international complex of front groups and publications which are reported to spend some $3 million a year and have 2,000 to 3,000 members in this country and perhaps 2,000 more outside the United States. Among his old domestic fronts have been the National Unemployed and Welfare Rights Organization and the Committee for Fair Elections.

His most important front now is the tax-exempt Fusion Energy Foundation which supports atomic energy development, mostly through a very attractive magazine, Fusion, which his disciples sell at airports and elsewhere. He is also behind an ideological magazine, The Campaigner, and another slick publication, Executive Intelligence Review, but his main outlet is still the newspaper, New Solidarity, a title protested by the Auto Workers with whom he has had a long fight and who have long used the title Solidarity for the union's official journal.

ABOUT four years ago, New Solidarity—then a tabloid—started what the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith has described as an "anti-Jewish, anti-Zionist, anti-Israel propaganda campaign" which took the form of inflammatory headlines and special features on various aspects of Judaism.

A little earlier, LaRouche's apparatus entered into a loose relationship with Liberty Lobby, the Washington-based, radical-right organization of Willis Carto, which is also regarded as anti-Semitic.

MORE RECENTLY, as the movement began attracting national attention and curiosity, the New York Times began digging into what makes it tick and reported that LaRouche has some kind of financial liaison with three companies in New York City. They are Computron Technologies Corporation, a programming business that includes Mobil Oil, Citibank, Bristol-Myers and AT&T among its clients; World Composition Services, an advanced computer typesetting complex that does work for the Ford Foundation and major publishers; and PMR Associates, a printing plant.

All three denied such links, but refused repeated requests for interviews. The headlines on the Times stories are revealing about the organization: "U.S. Labor Party: Cult Surrounded by Controversy" and "One Man Leads U.S. Labor Party on Its Erratic Path."

A small town boy has truly been discovered, but no one is yet certain what he is doing or where he is going.

The Real Sara Fritz Seeks Damages for Impersonation

Sara Fritz is the White House correspondent for U.S. News and World Report, a 2-million circulation weekly news magazine. She's a prize-winning journalist who covered labor news for many years. Her reputation and the magazine's prestige usually get her quick access to news sources.

It also got quick access for persons writing for Lyndon LaRouche publications who impersonated her and other U.S. News reporters, according to affidavits filed with a federal district court.

U.S. NEWS and Fritz are jointly asking $1.5 million in damages from New Solidarity Press Service, Inc., and Campaigner Publications, Inc., which they say publish the American Labor Beacon and Executive Intelligence Review. The corporations, which share a suite of offices in New York, are described in the court papers as "affiliated with the U.S. Labor Party."

On at least two occasions, information obtained by persons claiming to be Sara Fritz appeared in what was described as highly distorted fashion under another byline in LaRouche-linked publications.

The person who used her name for an interview that showed up in the American Labor Beacon had left a phone number, so Fritz called and asked to speak to "Sara Fritz of U.S. News & World Report."

SHE WAS promptly connected, the woman who answered acknowledged being "Sara Fritz" and asked who was calling. At hearing it was the real Sara Fritz, she abruptly hung up.

The telephone number was that of Campaigner Publishers.

Later, Fritz testified, she found that her name had been falsely used to get information from an official of the National Association of Home Builders for an article that appeared in the Executive Intelligence Bulletin.

ON ANOTHER occasion, court papers show, a man falsely identifying himself as a reporter for U.S. News obtained information from the staff of the Senate Ethics Committee that appeared in distorted fashion in Executive Intelligence Review.

In addition to compensatory and punitive damages, the suit filed Aug. 18 in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia asks an injunction to bar future misrepresentation by the two publishing firms and their employees.

Auto Firms Hit on Blind Fealty to Reaganomics

Detroit—Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser blasted the leaders of industry for continuing to support Ronald Reagan's failing economic programs.

In a speech at the Automotive News World Congress here, Fraser said that "despite the disaster that is Reaganomics, corporate America, and the captains of the auto industry specifically, continue to support the actions of the Administration and its allies in Congress."

HE SAID the auto industry generally "has been unwilling to transcend rigid ideology" to seek government action to aid the industry, its workers and the U.S. economy.

"Simple self-interest dictates a break with the current economic programs and an effort to change our disastrous course," Fraser said. He pointed to the deterioration in the economy, citing:

- The increase in unemployment from 7.2 percent a year ago to 9.8 percent, the highest level of unemployment in 41 years.
- The mounting number of auto workers on indefinite layoffs, which now exceeds 216,000 at the five major companies.
- Declining car sales projected at 5.8 million units for 1982, compared with 6.3 million sold last year in an already depressed market.
- The growing share of the U.S. market being captured by foreign car makers, 32 percent last month compared with 29.6 percent in July 1981.
- The rising number of business failures, with filings this year at the astounding rate of 2,000 per month, a 43 percent increase over last year.

In the first six months of this year, Fraser noted, 556 auto dealers "went belly-up," a 71-percent increase over the first half of 1981.

"ADMITTEDLY inflation is down," Fraser said, "but at what a terrible cost to our economy and the people of the United States.

"Just last week, GM announced more plant closings due to the sluggish economy and a dead auto market. Eleven thousand more workers are going to be indefinitely laid off. . . . If you set sail for Miami from New York and your captain turns north, do you have to hit an iceberg before you suspect something is amiss?"

The UAW president also addressed the long-term erosion of America's industrial base and placed much of the blame on unfair trade with the Japanese. He said the domestic auto content legislation now pending in Congress would go far to stem the export of U.S. jobs and industrial strength.

He acknowledged that in recent weeks, several studies have been released aimed at discrediting the content legislation. The three most prominent were prepared by the consulting firm of Harbridge House, the Commerce Dept., and the Congressional Budget Office (CBO).

He dismissed the Harbridge study's forecast of extremely higher prices if content legislation is enacted, pointing out that the study "was bought and paid for" by the American International Automobile Dealers Association, the foreign car importers, "hardly an objective source."

Fraser pointed out that the Commerce Dept. report amounted to a cursory three-page analysis and that the CBO study rejected the Commerce Dept. conclusions.

The most credible of the recent studies comes from the CBO, Fraser observed, but he said it makes several assumptions that are highly questionable.

"First, it assumes a dollar-for-dollar reduction in average U.S. exports for the drop in U.S. auto imports," he said. "That assumption of massive trade retaliation by the Japanese simply doesn't hold up."

He pointed out that 31 countries now have content laws for their auto industries, many of which are stiffer than those in the labor-backed legislation.

"YET," HE SAID, "none to our knowledge has ever been challenged under the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade. In the meantime, Japan has continued to expand trade with nations that have content laws and other trade policies to protect domestic auto markets."

Fraser said that if the questionable assumption of trade retaliation is removed from its calculations, "even the conservative CBO study estimates an employment increase of 520,000 jobs if domestic content legislation is enacted."

After 7 Months

Pension Settlement Ends OCAW Texaco Strike

Port Arthur, Tex.—Some 4,000 members of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 4-23 returned to their jobs at the Texaco Inc., refinery here, ending a seven-and-a-half month strike against the company.

The workers struck the firm Jan. 7 in a bitter dispute involving pensions. Under a new three-and-a-half year settlement ending the walkout, Texaco agreed to provide the union $3 million to distribute among some 650 workers who retired over the past six years.

OTHER KEY provisions of the settlement include an incentive separation plan and wage increases equal to the industry pattern agreed to by other major oil refiners last year.

OCAW members ratified the pact by a 2-to-1 majority. Similar agreements also were approved by 80 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, a small unit of Machinists, and members of an unaffiliated union.

The pension issue—the focus of the strike—centered on the way in which the company unilaterally calculated benefits for workers who chose to retire with a lump-sum retirement option after 1976. The union charged that Texaco violated its previous bargaining agreement by increasing the percentage by which benefits were discounted when taken in a lump sum.

THE UNION took the company to court and won a decision against the discount policy. Texaco appealed the decision to the Fifth U.S. Circuit Appeals Court in New Orleans, where the case was pending. The new contract settles the dispute.

The $3-million payment will be distributed to workers who retired between February 1976, when the company started reducing the lump-sum payments, and January 1982, when the OCAW workers struck. Eligible workers could collect as much as $5,000 each. At the same time, the union agreed to lower lump-sum retirement payments in the future.

The new contract agreement contains wage terms similar to those approved by the nation's additional 50,000 refinery workers earlier in OCAW's 1982 round of oil bargaining. Wages would be increased by 9 percent as soon as the contracts are signed, and by 90 cents an hour 10 months later. Ten months after the second increase, the Port Arthur workers would receive an amount equal to the first-year increase under contracts negotiated last year by other OCAW local unions.

THE INCENTIVE separation plan, intended to reduce the Port Arthur work force by attrition, provides that any employee who chooses to leave the company within 45 days of the contract signing will receive a lump-sum payment of $4,000, plus one week's pay per year of service. The retirement incentive would be paid over a 24-month period.

Several productivity issues also were settled, and the company agreed not to expand its use of outside non-union craft workers.

Engineers Move To Expand Local Political Action

Seattle—Delegates to the 45th convention of the Professional & Technical Engineers stressed the importance of involvement in the political process to achieve the union's goals and directed all locals to establish political action and education committees.

The resolution calls for appointment or election of a chairperson to carry out the main activities of the local PAC—constituent lobbying of congressional representatives and state and local legislators.

THE 125 DELEGATES also approved a score of other resolutions during the weeklong meeting, which in effect constitute the union's program over the next two years. IFPTE's 20,000 members are divided approximately 55 percent in the public sector and 45 percent in private employment, and resolutions reflected the concerns of both groups.

The convention re-elected the union's two full-time officers—Rodney A. Bower to a sixth term as president and John H. Dunne to his eighth term as secretary-treasurer.

Four incumbent vice presidents were re-elected—Michael Waske, Leon Olsen, Vincent Cacchiotti, and Harold G. Revait. Dominick Critelli, former president of IFPTE Local 195, Totowa, N.J., was elected vice president of the union's Atlantic area to succeed Stephen D. Hage of East Brunswick, N.J., who did not seek re-election. Following the convention, the executive board re-elected Cacchiotti executive vice president.

AMONG RESOLUTIONS pertaining to the public sector, delegates called for legislation to create equity for federal workers now denied payment for legitimate travel expenses and forced to reside in substandard facilities under a statutory requirement that bachelor officers' quarters be used. Another resolution called for an IFPTE commission study of alternative health care plans for federal employees.

In addition, the convention approved resolutions favoring postcard voter registration, re-establishment of safety and health programs cut by the Reagan Administration, and patent law reform.

Speakers included Executive Director John Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.; Earl D. McDavid, national representative of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; President Marvin Williams of the Washington State AFL-CIO; William Dodds, organizing director for the National Council of Senior Citizens; Rep. Mike Lowry (D-Wash.), and Seattle Mayor Charles Royer.

OSHA Hit for New Delay On Cotton Dust Standard

Union job safety specialists accused OSHA of collaborating with employers on tactics to delay full implementation of the federal cotton dust standard.

The charges came in response to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's proposal to give knitting mill employers another extension of a "temporary stay" from the 1978 regulation designed to help protect cotton industry workers from disabling brown lung disease. The stay has already been extended three times since Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter took over as OSHA administrator in 1981.

AUCHTER BASED his call for a further extension on the need to review findings of a study—sponsored and paid for by employer associations—which contends that exposure to cotton dust in the knitting industry does not pose a significant health risk to workers.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor charged that OSHA is using questionable employer-funded studies "in an attempt to substantiate its argument for further delays in implementing the standard."

Eric Frumin, safety and health director of the Clothing & Textile Workers, called Auchter's action unjustifiable.

"You shouldn't stay a law just because industry complains about it," Frumin declared.

INDUSTRY HAS opposed the cotton dust standard since its inception. Employer groups had sought to overturn the standard, but the Supreme Court ruled on the side of AFL-CIO unions in 1981 in upholding the essence of the standard.

ACTWU, whose members are directly affected by the stay, pointed out that the study behind the OSHA delay was commissioned by the National Knitwear Manufacturers Association and that the two University of North Carolina researchers who conducted the study were working under a grant from Cotton Inc., another employer group.

Frumin also noted that the study was administered by knitting mill officials, and data were based on company-supplied medical records.

OSHA SAID the study indicates that respiratory problems reported by workers in the knitting industry are about the same as those reported for other blue-collar workers in the Southeast who are not exposed to cotton dust.

"It's not too surprising to find this type of response," Frumin said. "Workers are often afraid to report symptoms to company personnel for fear of reprisals."

The only way to get accurate data is through independent studies where workers are assured complete confidentiality, he said.

According to ACTWU estimates, some 150,000 American workers suffer from occupationally contracted byssinosis, or brown lung disease, including 35,000 who are totally or permanently disabled.

OSHA is applying its weaker pre-1978 exposure limit for the knitting industry during the current stay of the standard. The federal job safety agency will accept comments on the stay extension until Sept. 13.

September Calendar Listed By Labor Studies Center

Institutes on organizing techniques and administrative methods will highlight activities at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in September. Six AFL-CIO affiliates, three AFL-CIO departments and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) will use the campus for their own training programs. The schedule:

Organizing Techniques I, Sept. 12-17—A review of the essentials in a successful organizing campaign: Programming in-plant committees, developing winning issues, making house calls, and responding to employer attacks. National Labor Relations Board procedures are explained.

The Union Administrator and Business Agent, Sept. 12-17—A program for officers and other paid officials of locals where one or two people carry the full-time load to help plan work schedules, pinpoint problems, handle committees, train backup assistance and communicate with members.

Unions using the campus for their own staff training programs are: Flight Attendants, Aug. 30-Sept. 2; Brewery Workers, Aug. 31-Sept. 3; Iron Workers, Sept. 3; Communications Workers, Sept. 12-Oct. 1 and Sept. 19-24; Railway & Airline Clerks, Sept. 19-24, and State, County & Municipal Employees, Sept. 26-Oct. 1.

The federation's Dept. of Education has scheduled a program for labor educators on retraining for new careers and life planning Sept. 7-10. The Dept. of Organization & Field Services will sponsor a seminar for state central body officers on state legislation Sept. 28-Oct. 1. The Dept. of Community Services will bring its headquarters and regional field staff to the campus Sept. 29-Oct. 1 for a brainstorming session.

AIFLD is host for 40 Spanish-speaking trade unionists from Latin American countries. They'll be on campus until Sept. 24.

Enrollment is open for four programs at the George Meany Center during October. They are: Effective Speaking, Oct. 3-8; Labor Law, Oct. 3-8; Advanced Skills for Union Leaders, Oct. 17-22, and Advanced Grievance Arbitration, Oct. 24-29.

Information on these and other labor studies may be obtained from the registrar, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

VOTER REGISTRATION drive with a goal of registering all of the 14,000 members of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 420 in New York City is nearing completion as the local's president, Jim Butler, points with pride to new registrations collected by union volunteers. The drive, conducted out of the union's own bus, has concentrated on black and Hispanic communities in Manhattan as well as local union members.

workable economic theory into the Constitution and urged personal calls on House members in their home districts to let them know the intensity of labor's opposition to the amendment.

Pepper, the veteran congressman and former senator who has championed the cause of America's elderly, said massive slashes in social security benefits would be the only possible way to balance the budget in today's deep recession economy.

SOMBROTTO stressed the point that an economy keyed to full employment and production is the only path to a balanced budget, and Cortese described Reagan's embrace of the amendment as "a political ploy in a year of massive deficits" brought on by the President's failed economic policies.

McEntee cited the conclusions of the econometric study undertaken by AFSCME, which pointed to an additional 2.6 million unemployed, a sharp drop in total output, further destruction of federal programs and, as a byproduct, a $50 billion loss of state and local revenues.

Donahue, in his remarks and in response to questions, likened the phrase "balanced budget" to the equally misleading slogan of "right-to-work."

HE STRESSED the double goal of the grass-roots lobbying effort—to persuade House members not to provide the 218 signatures needed to take the amendment out of the Judiciary committee and bring it to the floor and to vote against the proposal if it comes before the House.

He told a questioner that the AFL-CIO is not a "one-issue" organization, but that House members should be aware of the importance labor puts on this issue. It would be hard to campaign with enthusiasm for the election of members of Congress who vote wrong on such a job-related issue, he suggested.

A few score of still uncommitted House members could tilt the outcome either way, the speakers stressed in their remarks. And a large number of this group represent the districts to which the telecast was aimed and adjoining areas.

Consumer Price Increase Slows Following Surge

Consumer prices rose more slowly in July than in either of the two preceding months, but the six-tenths of 1 percent increase still was high by historical standards.

Fuel and medical-care costs went up the most over the month, but these were offset by a drop in food and beverage prices, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

THE JULY increase in the government's consumer price index lifted the CPI 6.3 percent above its year-earlier level. In the three months ended in July, the index rose at a compound annual rate of 10.9 percent.

In June, the CPI had risen a full 1 percent while in May the index rose nearly as much, nine-tenths of 1 percent. Last month's slowdown in the rate of inflation, coupled with a rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours, allowed real earnings of production or nonsupervisory workers in nonfarm businesses to edge up two-tenths of 1 percent after declining 1.4 percent in June. Real earnings in July were still 1.4 percent below the year-earlier level, however, BLS noted.

THE PRICE moderation at the retail level last month followed similar moderation at the wholesale level reported earlier in August by BLS. The government's producer price index for finished goods in July rose six-tenths of 1 percent, the same increase as in the CPI.

The food and beverage component of the CPI remained unchanged over the month as a drop in grocery store food prices was offset by moderate increases in the price of restaurant meals and alcoholic beverages. BLS said the decrease in grocery store items was largely attributable to a decrease in prices for fresh fruits and vegetables and a deceleration in meat prices.

HOUSING costs rose six-tenths of 1 percent in July after increasing 1 percent in June and 1.4 percent in May, as home prices increased eight-tenths of 1 percent and mortgage rates fell for the third consecutive month.

Two-thirds of the 1.2-percent increase in the transportation component was attributed to higher prices for gasoline and used cars. Gasoline prices climbed a seasonally adjusted 2 percent.

Black Mississippi Democrat Nominated for House Seat

Labor endorsed Robert G. Clark won the Democratic nomination for Congress in a racially mixed Mississippi Delta district and stands a good chance of becoming the first black the state has sent to the House since the Reconstruction era.

Clark, who is chairman of the Education Committee in the state House, won easily with 57 percent of the vote against three white opponents. The incumbent congressman, David R. Bowen, did not seek re-election after district lines were redrawn by a federal court.

WHILE THE new district has a 54 percent black majority, blacks make up only 48 percent of the voting age population and just 35 percent of the registered voters. But Clark carried 19 of the district's 21 counties, including heavily white areas. He will face Webb Franklin, a well-financed, white Republican candidate in November.

In some other recent primaries:

- Michigan Republicans veered sharply to the right and nominated insurance executive Richard Headlee for governor in an upset victory over Lt. Gov. James Brickley. His Democratic opponent will be labor-endorsed James J. Blanchard, who is leaving Congress with a COPE record of 126 "right" and only 15 "wrong" votes.

In the Senate contest, incumbent Democrat Donald W. Riegle, Jr., was unopposed, and a former six-term congressman, Philip E. Ruppe, won the GOP nomination. Sander Levin, the brother of Michigan's other senator, Carl Levin, won the Democratic nomination in a Detroit and suburban House district from which Democrat William M. Brodhead is retiring. It is considered a safe Democratic seat.

- Missouri Democrats nominated Harriet Woods, a popular state senator, to run for the U.S. Senate against incumbent Republican John C. Danforth.

In a closely watched House race, incumbent William Clay was an easy winner in the Democratic primary despite redistricting that changed a black majority to a white majority. He had substantial labor support.

- In Kansas, incumbent Gov. John Carlin easily won the Democratic primary while a costly media campaign helped real estate developer Sam Hardage edge out his Republican competitors.

- Tennessee Democrats renominated Jim Sasser for the Senate. Sasser's COPE record is 69 percent "right." His Republican opponent, Robin L. Beard, had a COPE record of only 14 percent right during his service in the House.

THERE WAS considerable interest in the 4th Congressional District primary, where the Democratic nomination went to Jim Cooper, the son of a former Tennessee governor, and Republicans nominated Cissy Baker, the daughter of Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr.

- Oklahoma's incumbent governor, George Nigh, easily won the Democratic primary and will seek to become the first governor in the state in history to serve a second term. State Auditor Tom Daxon is the Republican nominee.

- In Georgia's 4th and 5th congressional districts, a three-judge federal court rejected the boundary lines carved out by the legislature and redrew the districts. The court then postponed the primary until Nov. 2, the date of the general election. If a runoff is needed, it will be held Nov. 9, and the general election is set for Nov. 30.

Local Action Pushed to Meet Health Care Needs of Jobless exist if Congress had enacted universal, comprehensive national health insurance, or at the very least assurance of continued health coverage for the unemployed, as the AFL-CIO has long recommended," Kirkland stressed.

THE NEED for continued health protection for the unemployed was also emphasized in a statement by Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser, in his role as chairman of the Health Security Action Council.

Fraser welcomed action by Congress to extend jobless benefits for workers who have exhausted their state entitlements. But he said Congress should at the same time have provided for continuation of health protections.

Kirkland's statement pointed out that many of the new unemployed are forced to postpone needed medical care for themselves and their families because they are without insurance coverage but are not yet poor enough to qualify for Medicaid. The working poor are often in a similar situation, Kirkland said, because of the Reagan Administration's cutback of coverage and welfare assistance.

SPEAKING for the Health Security Action Council, Fraser said a comprehensive national health program remains a key goal, "but people are being harmed and are suffering now."

To meet the immediate need, the council has proposed:

- Easier access to Medicaid for the unemployed.

- Provision for continuation of employee health insurance during periods of unemployment.

- Reopening of union contracts to provide for health insurance coverage during layoffs, similar to existing agreements negotiated by the UAW and other unions.

- Low-cost interim health policies from the insurance industry.

- State and local programs to meet special health care needs for jobless workers and families.

- Stepped-up efforts by local, voluntary health care coalitions including hospitals, doctors and other providers to develop programs of free care to meet the current special need.

White House Fellowship Applications Available

Applications are being accepted now through Dec. 1 for White House Fellowships for 1983-84. The fellowship program, begun in 1964, is designed to offer firsthand experience and involvement in governing the country. White House Fellows serve for the year as assistants to the Vice President, Cabinet secretaries or senior White House staff.

The President's Commission on White House Fellowships says applicants must be U.S. citizens, but there are no educational requirements or career or professional categories. Candidates should have a record of "demonstrated excellence in their professional roles as well as significant breadth of interests and community involvement." Federal employees are not eligible, except career military personnel.

Copies of the application and information are available from the President's Commission on White House Fellowships, 712 Jackson Place, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20503.

Machinists Ratify USAir Settlement

Mechanics and storage workers employed by USAir ratified a new 28-month contract by an overwhelming margin, with support for the pact registered by some 80 percent of those voting, the Machinists reported.

The agreement includes a 25-percent increase in basic wages over the life of the contract, plus improvements in fringe benefits, for the nearly 2,000 IAM members covered by its terms. The airline serves 26 cities across the country.

THE REAGAN RECESSION

SIX MONTHS AFTER President Reagan took office his economic policies pushed the nation into the most severe downturn since the Great Depression of the 1930s. The Administration has repeatedly tried to shift the blame for this recession to everything from the previous administration, the past 50 years, or events beyond their control. The fact is, however, that the recession was deliberately engineered and was the inevitable and predictable result of the misguided and inequitable program of massive unfair tax cuts, heartless budget cuts and high interest rates. At the time of the inauguration in January 1981, the unemployment rate was 7.4 percent, the industrial production index was 8 percent above its July 1980 low, the index of "coincident economic indicators" (which tends to track the movements of the overall economy) was 4 percent higher than its July level, and real gross national product had risen during the final half of 1980. In other words, the economy was well on the road to recovery and growth.

When Reagan took office, he began to put in place the four basic elements of his economic plan: a slowdown in monetary growth which has produced destructively high interest rates; massive tax cuts skewed to large corporations and the wealthy; budget cuts primarily aimed at social programs; and a rollback in regulations protecting workers, the environment, and consumers. It took another six months for Reaganomics to really take hold and reverse the path of the economy from growth to decline. From January through July 1981, industrial production rose and unemployment declined slightly to 7.2 percent.

Since July of 1981, however, the economy has fallen into a sharp decline. The effect on working people has been particularly devastating. From July of 1981, the unemployment rate has increased from 7.2 percent to 9.8 percent in July 1982, its highest level in more than forty years.

During Reagan's first year in office, his Treasury Secretary predicted the U.S. economy would come "roaring back" in the spring of 1982. But in the spring quarter of 1982, the number of workers counted as officially unemployed averaged 10.4 million. An additional 1.5 million had given up entirely on the desperate and fruitless search for work, and 5.7 million were forced to work part time. Thus, Reaganism has resulted in 17.6 million Americans suffering job loss and income loss.

The unemployment rate for adult men now stands at 8.8 percent. Among other excuses, Reagan has tried to blame high unemployment on the increased participation of women in the labor force. Yet, the increase in the number of adult males unemployed in the past year is without precedent since the Depression. Three fifths of the increased unemployment since July 1981 occurred among adult men.

The five million adult males now unemployed constitute nearly one-half of the total officially unemployed. This five million level is five times greater than the average number of unemployed adult males during the late 1960s. In addition, there are 3.7 million unemployed adult women, for an unemployment rate of 8.4 percent. Minorities have been devastated, with black Americans experiencing an unemployment rate of 18.5 percent. For black teenagers, the situation is catastrophic with an official unemployment rate of 50 percent. Untold numbers are experiencing the greatest economic hardship of their lives; permanent job loss threatens hundreds of thousands.

The effects of the Reagan Recession are being felt throughout the economy. The auto, steel, and construction industries, which together directly and indirectly account for more than one out of every three jobs in the country, have been particularly hard hit. Manufacturing employment has declined by more than 1.5 million since July 1981. While the industrial areas of the Northeast and Midwest continue to suffer from the combination of cyclical unemployment and permanent job loss, the number of unemployed has increased the fastest in the states of the South and West during the Reagan Recession. As of June 1982, the last month for which data is available, 17 states plus the District of Columbia had double-digit unemployment rates, compared with one state and the District of Columbia in July 1981.

According to the Reagan Administration, the huge tax giveaways to business and the wealthy were supposed to stimulate a job-creating investment boom. Corporate income taxes are lower by a third compared to year-earlier levels, yet business investment has been declining in 1982. For the second quarter of 1982, the pace of business investment, on an annual basis, was 3.3 percent lower than during 1981. Industrial production has declined by 10 percent since last July, and with more than 30 percent of industrial capacity idle, there is little reason to expect a significant upsurge of capital spending in the near future.

The Reagan-Federal Reserve devotion to a high interest rate policy continues to have shattering effects on housing, construction, automobile, farming, state and local governments, and other sectors particularly sensitive to the cost of borrowed funds. Home mortgage delinquencies, foreclosures, and business failures are at record high levels. The damage to thrift institutions caused by high interest rates have severely taxed the deposit insurance agencies. The recently-enacted tax bill of August 1982, initiated by key Republicans and vigorously supported by Reagan, partially reverses the massive tax cuts of a year earlier. It represents an admission by Congress and the President that the earlier cuts were reckless, inequitable and ineffective in producing the promised "supply-side" economic recovery.

This report, presented to the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its August meeting in New York, describes the grim reality of the Reagan recession in terms of unemployment and various economic indications of the economic downturn. The pain and suffering of the unemployed is detailed in various newspaper accounts. A program to reverse the recession, as proposed by the AFL-CIO at its February 1982 Executive Council meeting, concludes this section.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Unemployment is a key indicator of the economy's performance and its impact on people. According to the National Bureau of Economic Research, the official "caller" of business cycle dates and turning points, the Reagan recession began in July 1981. Since then unemployment has increased sharply, with joblessness rising by 3 million workers as of July 1982. The 9.8 percent seasonally adjusted unemployment rate for July of 1982 represents the highest level in more than 40 years.

In spite of the fact that unemployment surpassed all postwar records, the Administration failed to support any of the traditional anti-recession policies used in other recessions to ease the calamity of unemployment. This represents a serious deterioration from the post-World War II experience of the United States and an unconscionable retreat from the commitment to full employment set forth in the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978.

Reagan forecasters, who have consistently missed the mark in their projections for the economy, are now optimistically predicting a drop in the unemployment rate to 8.4 percent in 1983, and 7.6 percent in 1984. Even this optimistic forecast leaves unemployment rates at very high levels. A European forecast for the United States by OECD (Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development) projects the U.S. unemployment rate at 10 percent in 1983.

Discouraged Workers and Involuntary Part-Time Workers

The reality of unemployment is much worse than the official monthly statistics imply. For the second quarter of 1982, the months of April, May, and June, an average of 10.4 million people were officially counted as unemployed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. An additional 1.5 million "discouraged" workers had given up entirely on the desperate and fruitless search for work. Their plight is not captured in the official unemployment rate. The number of discouraged workers has increased by 43.5 percent since the second quarter of 1981.

Of those employed, 5.7 million were forced into part-time schedules because of the slack economy. Thus, a total of 17.6 million Americans are suffering job loss and income loss.

Total Experiencing Some Unemployment During the Year Approaches One Third

The unemployment figures are monthly averages. But the total number of people hit by unemployment in the course of a year is substantially higher. Since 1959, the total number of workers experiencing unemployment during a year has ranged from 2.7 to 4.2 times the number who are unemployed in any given month.

Thus, in 1981, average monthly unemployment was 8.3 million persons, but more than 23 million workers were jobless during the year—about 20 percent of the workforce.

In 1982, with the monthly number of unemployed running well above last year's levels, the total number of workers hit by unemployment will probably be between 27 and 33 million, nearly one out of three American workers.

Unemployment Rates for All Population Groups at Post-World War II Record High Levels

The number of unemployed increased by 38 percent (3 million) from July 1981 to July 1982. All age, sex, and racial groups experienced significant deterioration in their employment prospects. The unemployment rates for all groups—adult men, adult women, teenagers, whites, blacks, and Hispanics—are at post-World War II record high levels. For the category, "women who maintain families," the unemployment rate of 12.0 percent is at its highest level (except for the 12.4 percent June 1982 rate) since this statistic was introduced in 1967.

Unemployment Increases Fastest Among Adult Males

The unemployment rate for adult men now stands at 8.8 percent. The percentage increase in the number of unemployed from July 1981 to July 1982 was greatest among adult males, with an increase of 54 percent over a year ago. Another way to consider it is that three fifths of the increased unemployment occurred among adult men. The more than five million adult males now unemployed constitute 47 percent of the total officially unemployed. This is five times greater than the average number of unemployed adult men during the late 1960s. Of all working people, adult men have traditionally had the most stable attachment to the labor force and are proportionately more often the primary income earner supporting families.

There are nearly 3.7 million unemployed adult women, for an unemployment rate of 8.4 percent. Approximately one out of eight women who maintain families is unemployed.

Minorities Suffer Depression Level Unemployment Rates

Black unemployment increased by more than a quarter from July 1981 to July 1982, climbing from 1.6 million to over 2 million jobless workers. This represents an official unemployment rate of a staggering 18.5 percent. Unemployment among workers of Hispanic origin climbed to 832,000 in July, 41 percent greater than last year and the unemployment rate now stands at 13.9 percent for Hispanics.

Employment Prospects for Teenagers Rapidly Disappearing

In the face of mounting layoffs, young people just entering the labor market cannot find jobs. The official teenage, (ages 16-19), unemployment rate increased from 18.7 percent to 24.1 percent over the year of the Reagan Recession. For black teenagers, the unemployment rate increased from 40.0 to 49.7 percent, and for black teenage males, from 42 to 48 percent.

For white teenagers, unemployment declined by 11 percent over the year, and the number of black teenagers with jobs fell by an alarming 17 percent. While 44 percent of white teenagers have a job, only 18 percent of black teenagers do.

Unemployment by Occupation

Blue-collar workers have suffered most of the job losses during the recession with their unemployment rate up from 9.5 to 14.4 percent.

White-collar unemployment increased to 4.9 percent in July of 1982 with the unemployment rate for clerical workers reaching 6.9 percent. Professional and technical workers and managers have been forced into the unemployment line with unemployment surpassing one million. Many hard-pressed large corporations have pink-slipped thousands of professionals and managers. Layoffs have even occurred among high technology electronics firms once thought to be immune to recession in the 1980s.

Unemployment among service workers increased from 8.0 percent to 10.5 percent in July 1982.

Unemployment By Industry

Manufacturing and construction continue to bear the brunt of the recession's impact. Unemployment in manufacturing has increased precipitously from 7.3 percent in July 1981 to 12.0 percent in July 1982. Unemployment in durables manufacturing, which includes autos, steel, and machinery, stands at 12.7 percent and in nondurables at 11.0 percent.

Construction unemployment surpassed one fifth with a July 1982 rate of 20.3 percent. In the wholesale and retail trade sector unemployment is 10.5 percent; transportation and public utilities, 6.1 percent; and in finance and service industries, 7.0 percent.

For the private, non-agricultural sector in general, the July 1982 unemployment rate was 10.2 percent. Employment among government workers has provided somewhat of a stabilizing force during the recession with the unemployment rate remaining at 4.6 percent. The high unemployment rate among agricultural wage and salary workers, 13.8 percent, reflects the depressed condition of the farm sector.

Average Duration of Unemployment Increases

In July 1982, the average unemployed worker was out of work for 15.6 weeks. More than one third of the unemployed have been jobless for 15 weeks or longer, with 16.7 percent unemployed for more than half a year. As the recession continues, the average duration of unemployment will further increase.

Unemployment by State and Region

In July 1981, Michigan and the District of Columbia had double-digit unemployment rates. By June 1982, the latest month for which data are available, 16 other states had joined them in the double-digit category.

Heavily dependent on depressed auto, steel, textile, or lumber industries, the states topping the list in June include Michigan with an unemployment rate of 14.3 percent, Alabama with 13.9 percent, Washington with 12.4 percent, and West Virginia and Ohio with 12.3 percent.

While the industrial areas of the Northeast and North Central continue to suffer from both recession related and longer term job loss, the number of unemployed has increased the fastest in the South and West. On a seasonally unadjusted basis (seasonally adjusted data are not available by states), the number of unemployed increased by 34 percent from July 1981 to June 1982 for the nation as a whole. Unemployment increased fastest in the South over this period, increasing by 43 percent; for the West, 39 percent; and for the Northeast, 21 percent. By region, the number of states with double-digit unemployment rates in June 1982: South, six plus the District of Columbia; North Central, five; West, five, and Northeast, one.

For June 1982, five states had rates below 6 percent: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Wyoming. For predominantly agricultural states like the Dakotas and Nebraska, low unemployment rates mask the precarious condition of their farm economies. The dramatic slowdown in invest-

Unemployment Benefit Exhaustions

As high unemployment continues, more and more people are using up their unemployment benefits. Termination of benefits removes their safety net, and further reduces consumer buying power. Prior to the current deep Reagan recession, additional unemployment benefits had been generally available during periods of high unemployment to workers whose regular state benefits had run out. Reagan-mandated budget cuts in 1981 and 1982 have prevented hundreds of thousands of unemployed workers from receiving benefits beyond the regular 26-week period. Most workers who exhaust benefits and can't find jobs do not qualify for welfare and are left with nowhere to turn for even minimal economic assistance.

From July 1981 through June 1982, 3.3 million workers have used up their regular benefits. In those states where extended benefits have been available over 600,000 have exhausted these benefits as well.

The rate of benefit exhaustion, including both "regular" benefits and "extended" benefits, was over 500,000 people per month for the second quarter of 1982 (April, May, and June). Given current conditions, this level will likely climb; for all of 1982 it is expected that at least 4 million people will see their unemployment benefits run out.

During the 1974-75 recession, the maximum duration of unemployment benefits was extended to 65 weeks. Even though unemployment is worse in the current recession, Congress and the Administration have passed measures to severely restrict extended benefits. Only very recently, as part of the 1982 tax bill passed in mid-August, has Congress moved to provide temporary additional benefits. The federal supplemental benefits will only extend present eligibility by six to ten weeks (depending on the state), bringing the maximum in any state to 49 weeks. This program will run from Sept. 12, 1982, to Mar. 31, 1983.

In past recessions supplemental benefits were funded out of general revenues, but this time Congress is forcing jobless workers to finance the program through a lowering of the threshold at which unemployment compensation is counted as taxable income.

EMPLOYMENT FALLS

The number of jobs has to grow by about 1.5 percent a year in the United States, or about 1.5 million jobs per year, to keep up with population and labor force growth and hold unemployment at the same rate. In the year of the Reagan Recession, from July of 1981 to July of 1982, total nonfarm payroll employment has declined by 1.7 percent, with a net loss of 1.6 million jobs.

The largest losses have occurred in manufacturing and construction. Manufacturing employment has fallen by 1.5 million from July of last year to July of this year. This represents a decline of 7.6 percent. Construction employment has decreased by a quarter of a million since July 1981.

Employment in the transportation and public utilities sector has fallen by 110,000. Total government employment has dropped by 114,000 from a year before, with large declines in the state and local government sector. Many states, cities, and school districts have laid off employees during the past year, and the employment data in coming months will continue to reflect these declines. Other sectors have shown some gains, although at rates considerably below the pace of their expansion in the 1970s. Employment in wholesale and retail trade has registered an increase of less than one-tenth of one percent from July of 1981 to July of 1982. However, from 1970 to 1979, this sector grew by an average annual rate of 3.3 percent. Employment in the financial sector has increased by 1.0 percent during the recession, compared to an average rate of growth of 3.5 percent during the 1970s. The largest gains in employment were in services, with an increase of 451,000 jobs. Yet, this 2.4 percent increase is dwarfed by the average annual rate of increase during the 1970s of 4.4 percent.

Employment has declined in every one of the manufacturing industries during the recession. Losses were heaviest in the durable goods industries, particularly: primary metals (which includes steel), down by 209,000 jobs or an alarming 18.5 percent; nonelectrical machinery, down by 253,000 or 10.0 percent; transportation equipment (which encompasses autos), down by 169,000 or 8.8 percent; and fabricated metals, down by 169,000 or 10.5 percent. These metal and machinery industries constitute the core of U.S. industrial strength and largely account for this nation's manufactured exports. Under Reagan, their employment has declined by an average of 11 percent. It is widely recognized that the sustained unemployment of the human and capital resources in these industries constitutes a serious and perhaps irreversible drag on U.S. industrial productivity.

The depression in housing construction largely accounts for the 9.7 percent decline in employment in the lumber and wood products industry. This decline has produced double-digit unemployment rates in the lumber-dependent states of Oregon and Washington.

Employment has contracted by 5.3 percent in nondurable goods. Textiles and leather goods had the most precipitous decline, 10.9 and 13.8 percent, respectively. Apparel employment has fallen by 105,000 from July 1981 to July 1982, for a decline of 8.4 percent. In the auto-related rubber industry, employment is off by 6.0 percent.

HOURS OF WORK DECLINE

Average weekly hours of work for all private sector workers continue to decline in 1982, dropping 0.5 hours for the first seven months of this year compared to the first seven months of 1981. In manufacturing, the falloff in hours worked was even greater, dropping 1.2 hours from 40.1 hours from January to July of 1981 to an average of 38.9 hours for the corresponding period in 1982.

These 1982 levels remain considerably below the levels of the late 1970s.

Although lower than year earlier levels, considerable overtime continued in nearly every manufacturing industry in spite of the recession. The total hours of overtime worked in each week for the first seven months of 1982 were the equivalent of nearly 800,000 full-time jobs (784,680).

Overtime hours in manufacturing declined from 3.0 hours per week for the first seven months of 1981 to 2.4 hours for the same period in 1982; the decline was from 3.0 to 2.2 hours in durables manufacturing.

BUYING POWER DECREASES

The buying power of American workers' paychecks continues to decline in 1982 and remains considerably below the levels prevailing in the late 1970s. While gross average weekly earnings for workers in private industry increased by 4.5 percent from $255.20 in 1981 to $266.57 in June 1982, the real buying power of that increase actually declined by 1.8 percent as real spendable earnings were reduced by inflation and social security and federal income taxes.

This decline in workers' buying power erodes the living standards of workers and their families and contributes to the recession as reduced buying power leads to lower production and further layoffs. Since 1977, average real spendable earnings have dropped by 15.1 percent.

POVERTY SHARPLY UP

The slack economy and extremely high unemployment are forcing more and more Americans into poverty. There were 31.8 million people living below the poverty level in 1981, an increase of 2.2 million over 1980, or 7.4 percent. The percentage of the total population living in poverty rose from 13.2 to 14.0 percent. The growing unemployment in 1982, and the cuts in the federal programs protecting the working poor, the unemployed, the disabled, and the destitute will add millions more to the poverty rolls in 1982.

Both the number of people in poverty and the poverty rate are already at their highest levels since the mid-1960s. The abrupt increase in poverty in 1981 represents the first sustained increase in poverty since the government started recording poverty data in the late 1950s.

Poverty is particularly widespread among blacks, children, and women who maintain families. More than one-third of blacks and women who maintain families live in poverty. One out of five children lives in poverty. The number of married-couple families who are poor increased 10 percent during Reagan's first year in office.

THE INTEREST RATE SQUEEZE

High interest rates and the Reagan-supported tight money policies of the Federal Reserve have contributed to the severity and duration of the recession. In the past, interest rates usually declined during the depths of a recession because the slack pace of economic activity reduced the need for financing. During this recession, however, interest rates have remained near their historic peaks. Only in the past two months—July and August—has economic weakness begun to produce signs of abatement.

Prime and Discount Rates, 1977-July 1982

The sensitive "prime rate"—the rate large banks charge on loans to their biggest corporate customers—remained at a prohibitively costly 16.5 percent from February until July, when it was marginally reduced to 15.5 percent. In mid-August it dropped to 14 percent. During Reagan's tenure, the prime rate had never previously gone below 15 percent. It averaged nearly 19 percent during 1981 and over 16 percent in the first half of 1982.

The Federal Reserve "discount rate" hit a new record high of 14 percent in May 1981. From last December until July it remained at 12 percent when the Federal Reserve slightly reduced the discount rate to 11.5 percent and then to 10.5 percent in mid-August.

Mortgage interest rates have remained at levels which have stymied housing construction and sales. At 15.7 percent in July 1982, the mortgage rate significantly exceeds its 13.6 percent level of January 1981 when Reagan took office.

Some short-term rates are at lower levels now than at the beginning of 1981, largely because of recession's impact on business investment loan demand.

A key reason for these high interest rates is the massive loss in revenue caused by Reagan's tax cuts—a revenue loss which disproportionately favors business and the wealthy. As a result of these cuts, the deficit and the Treasury's borrowing needs have soared. At the same time, however, the Federal Reserve is restricting the availability of funds in its attempt to achieve the slower rate of monetary growth both it and the Administration support.

High interest rates have added to the deterioration in equity that has resulted from Reagan's tax and budget cuts. In 1974, wages and salaries constituted 66 percent of total personal income. Personal interest income was 9.6 percent of total personal income. By July 1982, wages and salaries were down to 61 percent of personal income, while the interest income share had risen to 14.7 percent. Because interest earnings are predominantly paid to upper income groups, this shift reflects a growing trend towards fundamental imbalance and unfairness in the distribution of income.

BUSINESS AND CONSUMERS IN DISTRESS

Business Failures and Bankruptcies

Continued recession and high interest rates are driving companies of all sizes and in all industries and regions out of business more rapidly than at any time since the Great Depression. During the first half of this year, more businesses failed than during all of 1975, the previous worst postwar recession year. The business failure rate, considered in relation to the total number of businesses, is at its highest level since 1933, one of the worst years of the Great Depression.

The depressed purchasing power caused by continued high unemployment keeps sales down and makes it more and more difficult for corporations to pay their bills. Hard-pressed firms resort to layoffs to cut their expenses and to short-term borrowing to pay their bills. But layoffs further worsen consumer spending and sales, and high interest rates rapidly add to the burden of debt. For this stage of a recession interest rates have remained unusually high. In addition, the decline in production and sales has been particularly steep. As a result, many firms are finding it impossible to stay afloat.

Business bankruptcies have become all too common as this recession continues to strangle the economy. For every business which fails and closes down entirely, three or four more file for bankruptcy. Some will try to stay in business by selling off assets and reorganizing, which usually entails large layoffs. An increase in bankruptcies threatens to escalate as firms which are owed money by bankrupt firms are forced to write off those debts. But this, in turn, weakens their own financial position, making additional bankruptcies more likely.

Because small businesses must pay higher interest rates, on less favorable terms than large corporations, small firms are particularly vulnerable in this recession. The House Small Business Committee has noted that extended high interest rates and recession constitutes "the death knell" for thousands of small businesses.

Several large firms have also had to declare bankruptcy in 1982, including the building supplies retailer, Wickes Company; Braniff Airlines; and A. M. International, an office equipment manufacturer which started in business in the 1800s.

Business Failures, 1932-1982

Weakness in Financial Institutions

Sustained high interest rates have also had disruptive effects in the financial sector. Savings and loan institutions, in particular, have been hard-pressed to pay the high rates necessary to keep deposits, since they derive their income from low-yielding loans made when interest rates were much lower. More than eight out of every 10 savings and loan institutions suffered losses in the last half of 1981, and for the entire year, the industry lost over $4 billion.

The ripple effects of a bank failure or the collapse of a bond dealer can reverberate across many institutions and regions. The recent collapse of the relatively small Penn Square National Bank in Oklahoma City led to heavy loan losses among some of the largest New York and Chicago banks and resulted in the layoff of 400 employees by a Seattle bank which experienced large losses. One hundred thirty two credit unions with deposits in Penn Square were also affected.

By early August of this year, there had been 27 bank closings due to financial difficulties. This is more than during any other full year in the postwar period and compares very unfavorably with annual average bank closings of between five and eight for the decades of the Fifties, Sixties, and Seventies.

Personal Bankruptcies

Individual and family incomes have suffered greatly from high unemployment and the slack economy. Thousands are finding it impossible to sustain their living standard and have filed for bankruptcy as their indebtedness has swamped their ability to repay. Personal, non-business, bankruptcies are being filed at a rate of 38,000 per month, twice the level prevailing during the last decade.

Home Mortgage Delinquencies and Foreclosures

As of March 31, 1982, over 5 percent of all outstanding home mortgages were delinquent, a record high since the Mortgage Bankers Association started its survey in 1953. The Mid-Atlantic and Great Lakes states experienced the highest delinquency rates, ranging from 5 to 8 percent in all of these industrial states.

Continued record high unemployment and interest rates are forcing tens of thousands of people to lose their homes through foreclosure. For the first quarter of 1982, foreclosure proceedings were underway for between 100,000-140,000 homeowners. For the second quarter of 1982, it is anticipated that foreclosure proceedings were started for another 50,000 morgtages.

Farm Loan Delinquencies

The cost of farm operations is acutely sensitive to interest rates. Farmers typically borrow heavily at the beginning of the crop year to purchase seed, fertilizer, herbicides, and fuel. Historically high interest rate costs are contributing substantially to expectations that net farm income this year will be at its lowest level in fifty years. Reminiscent of the 1930s, many family farmers are now threatened with losing their livelihood. Thousands are "voluntarily liquidating" their farms. As of the end of May 1982, one-third of all Farmers Home Administration loans were delinquent.

GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT DOWN

The nation's total output of goods and services declined sharply in the last quarter of 1981 and the first quarter of 1982. While the preliminary data for the second quarter indicate a small improvement, more recent data raise doubts about any real gain. The gross national product (GNP) is a dollar measure of the nation's total output of goods and services. GNP, adjusted for inflation, fell at an annual rate of 5.3 percent in the fourth quarter of 1981 and 5.1 percent in the first quarter of 1982.

Although the Commerce Dept. reported an annual rate of increase of 1.3 percent in real GNP for the second quarter of 1982, this slight increase is entirely attributable to a slower rate of inventory liquidation. Current production was actually lower in the second quarter than in the first quarter of 1982.

During the first quarter of this year, with the recession spreading and high interest rates making it extremely costly to maintain existing inventory levels, businesses sharply reduced their inventories. Inventory liquidation continued in the second quarter, but since the decrease was smaller than in the first quarter, the net effect on the change in GNP was positive.

The nation's total output, considered at an annual rate, was lower in the second quarter of 1982 than it was in 1979.

CORPORATE PROFITS

Corporate after-tax profits rose rapidly in the late 1970s. As a result of the brief recession in 1980, after-tax profits for that year declined 4.4 percent from 1979. Following a recovery during the first quarter of 1981, profits have fallen off sharply. From the first quarter of 1981 to the second quarter of 1982, profits after taxes declined by 29 percent. This represents a record decline during any recession since World War II.

Profits before taxes have also declined more than during any previous postwar recession, dropping by 33 percent from the first quarter of 1981 to the second quarter of 1982. Partly as a result of the Reagan business tax cuts and partly due to recession—corporate income tax payments have fallen by almost 41 percent.

Corporate after-tax profits are divided between dividends and undistributed profits, or retained earnings. Retained earnings, along with borrowed funds or new stock offerings, are the sources of the funds for corporations to finance investment. Lower earnings undermine corporations' ability or willingness to invest and, of course, high interest rates affect the cost of investment. Since the first quarter of 1981, corporations experiencing shrinking before- and after-tax profits have chosen to increase dividend payments to stockholders rather than to invest. Payments to stockholders have actually increased by almost 13 percent.

INVESTMENT DROPS

Expenditures for new plant and equipment in real terms increased in 1981 before dropping off sharply in the first half of 1982. For the second quarter of 1982, the pace of business investment on an annual basis, was 3.3 percent lower than during 1981. Investment in new production machinery was down by 6.5 percent.

Reagan's massive tax giveaways to business have been an abysmal failure in stimulating business investment. Any argument that these cuts haven't been in place long enough to judge their effectiveness can be totally rejected. Retroactive to January 1981, the business cuts have had a year and a half to generate the promised investment boom. It hasn't worked.

In actuality the huge and unbalanced tax cuts have deterred business expansion. The resultant deficits and the Administration's support for a policy of slowing down monetary growth have pushed the cost of credit to levels which make investment prohibitively expensive. In addition, the Reagan recession has reduced business sales and cash flow as a source of funds for investment. The large proportion of existing capacity lying idle also serves to dampen business plans. Moreover, even during periods when the economy is growing, corporate tax cuts are not necessarily invested in new productive plant and equipment. The increased cash flow may be used to finance investment overseas, speculation, dividend increases, mergers, acquisitions, and relocations.

In the hysteria to cut taxes to promote capital formation, the underlying strength of investment was conveniently overlooked. By 1979, the share of real investment in real GNP rose to match its highest two peaks during the entire postwar period. Moreover, during the Seventies, as a whole, investment's share in GNP was higher than during the sixties.

HOUSING STARTS SLUMP

In 1977 and 1978, housing starts were averaging 2 million units a year. In 1981, housing starts fell to a 35-year low, with a total of only 1.1 million units. The persistence of prohibitively high mortgage interest rates has prevented any rebound in the housing industry.

In July of last year, only 1,040,000 units were started (at a seasonally adjusted annual rate). From August 1981, housing starts have remained below the one million mark except for May and July 1982 when government assisted multifamily housing starts (which the Reagan Administration is trying to phase out) produced temporary spurts. Averaging 975,000 for the first seven months of the year, housing starts in 1982 may total even fewer than in 1981.

Mortgage rates are expected to remain high under the dual squeeze of the tax cut-induced deficit and slow money growth. In addition, the Administration has mounted an all-out campaign to eliminate federally subsidized housing construction. Perhaps the worst blow was the recent presidential veto of housing in the urgent supplemental appropriation bill for fiscal 1982. This bill, in its initial form which was vetoed, would have provided $3 billion for a three-year housing program. The vetoed housing stimulus would have provided an estimated 200,000 newly built homes that would have been aided by the government through interest assistance for home buyers. In sum, outlook for the housing industry under Reagan's economic program remains grim.

INDUSTRIAL PLANTS IDLE

Industrial production fell by 10.3 percent between July 1981 and July 1982. The Federal Reserve Board index, which covers manufacturing, mining, and utilities, declined in every month but one during the Reagan Recession year.

The falloff in industrial production is accompanied by the drop in utilization of industrial plants and equipment. In July of 1982, more than 30 percent of the nation's manufacturing capacity was idle. This is the highest level of idle capacity since the depths of the 1974-1975 recession. In the iron and steel industry, unused plant and equipment exceeds 50 percent; and capacity utilization in the motor vehicles and parts industry is less than 60 percent.

AUTO PRODUCTION NOSEDIVES

Domestic auto production continued its sharp nosedive in the first half of 1982, with output averaging 17 percent below 1967 levels.

Auto sales for June 1982 of U.S. producers were at their lowest level for the month since 1958. In recent months, sales have fluctuated up and down but remain well below historic levels. In the first half of the year domestic auto producers sold fewer than 3 million cars (an annual rate of less than 6 million) for the first time since the 1950s. Sales of imported cars accounted for 30 percent of the domestic market in June. Nonetheless, combined domestic and foreign auto sales in the United States were down 11 percent in June 1982 compared to June 1981.

FOREIGN TRADE IMPACT

The U.S. trade balance suffered a record $40 billion deficit in 1981, and in the first six months of 1982, the deficit was already over $18 billion in spite of a big drop in oil imports. Other nations increased their barriers to imports of U.S. goods and subsidized their exports to the U.S. market. The Administration took no effective action to halt this trend.

The Administration's money policies have raised the value of the dollar, encouraging imports and retarding exports. These monetary policies have raised the value of the dollar by 20 percent against the Japanese yen and 22.4 percent against the German mark between December 1980 and July 1982.

The dual impact of the U.S. recession and the tight monetary policy's impact on exchange rates had a particularly aggravating effect on the trade of manufactured goods. In 1981 imports of manufactured goods rose 13 percent, while exports of manufactured goods were up only 7 percent, leaving only a small net advantage for the export of U.S. manufactured goods. But in the first six months of 1982, U.S. trade trends in manufactured goods turned negative. Imports of manufactures rose 7 percent over the same period in 1981 and exports of manufactures actually declined 8 percent. The $6.6 billion trade surplus in manufactures in the first six months of 1981 became a $4.1 billion deficit in the same period of 1982.

INFLATION PERSISTS

For two consecutive months, the consumer price index (CPI) has increased at double-digit annual rates. After several months of moderation, the CPI-W increased 0.9 percent in May and 1.0 percent in June.

The same items which accounted for most of the prior slowdown in inflation were responsible for the jump in May and June. The one-month increase in home prices was 2.8 percent in May, followed by 2.3 percent in June. Consumer energy prices rose 1.6 percent in May, and 4.3 percent in June. Food rose 0.8 percent and 0.6 percent in May and June respectively.

For the six-month period ending in June 1982, the overall consumer price index rose at a 4.9 percent seasonally adjusted annual rate. This compares to an 8.7 percent increase for the 12-month period ending in December 1981. The primary sources of the moderation during the most recent six-month period were: housing, which increased 7.5 percent compared to 10.0 percent in 1981; apparel, which increased 1.9 percent versus 3.6 percent in 1981; and transportation, which actually decreased at a 2.1 percent annual rate during the last six months, compared to an 11.3 percent rise during 1981. Food prices rose at a 5.5 percent annual rate during the last six months, up from the 4.0 percent rise posted in 1981. Still, this is much lower than the increases experienced in past years.

Some of this moderation in the overall rate of inflation was achieved by slamming the brakes on the economy. Much of the slowdown, however, was due to luck—the coincidence of a huge oil surplus along with bumper crops in agriculture. The 2.1 percent rate of decline in the transportation component of the CPI resulted primarily from the oil surplus, and the continued moderation in food prices reflected the abundant grain stocks.

As illustrated by the sharp rebound in May and June, prices of these items, as well as the cost of shelter, are highly volatile. Less volatile in price, but equally important as a necessity for living, is the cost of medical care. Double-digit price increases continued to plague consumers of medical care during the latest six-month period.

The recent sharp rebound in consumer prices demonstrates that engineering a precipitous drop in economic activity has failed to address the structural problems that generate the volatility in the cost of necessities.

THE AFL-CIO'S ALTERNATIVE TO REAGANOMICS

The Alternative provides for: increase revenues from undoing the worst aspects of last year's tax giveaways, scrutinizing defense outlays and financing any required increases with a corporate and individual surtax, restoration of newly proposed budget cuts, and establishing new jobs programs. It points out ways to raise additional revenues by closing specific tax loopholes:

INCREASED REVENUES

Increased Revenues from Revisions of Tax Law	Anticipated Revenues (in billions)
Cap the 1982 and 1983 individual tax cuts at $700 per family	$20
Repeal the leasing of tax credits by corporations	8
Repeal the new loopholes in the oil windfall profits tax	2
Modify the widened estate and gift tax provisions	1
Repeal the future indexing of tax rates	—
Total	$31 billion
Increased Revenues from Savings
Scrutinize defense outlays and finance any required increases with a corporate and individual surtax
Current proposed defense budget increase	$33

Mediation Fee Plan Termed 'Shortsighted'

The AFL-CIO called on the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to withdraw its "shortsighted" proposal to charge user fees for its services.

The mediation agency announced last month that a $25 charge would be required for furnishing panels of arbitrators to choose from and an additional $30 for direct appointment of an arbitrator.

IN A LETTER to FMCS General Counsel Nancy Broff, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said the proposal violates policy spelled out in the 1947 law that created the agency.

"FMCS's services are not for the benefit of the parties to a labor dispute," he pointed out. "Those services are for the benefit of the public."

Oswald noted that Title II of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, which established the agency, cites "the advancement of the general welfare, health, and safety of the nation" as the goal of federal mediation.

While the FMCS claims its desire is to cut down on "frivolous" requests, Oswald warned that meritorious requests will also get sidetracked, particularly those by parties with limited resources.

"THE FACT that panels are requested and not used, just as lawsuits are brought and then settled, indicates that the dispute settlement system is working," he said.

Services provided by the mediation board also would be affected by the proposed user fee schedule. Payment of fees would be required when services are requested.

The agency estimates that the user fees would result in annual savings of about $490,000. Last year the FMCS furnished 33,194 panels and appointed 13,219 arbitrators. It anticipates that, with the imposition of the fee schedule, requests for services will probably decline about 25 percent.

The agency is accepting written comments on its proposal until Sept. 7.

Jobless Rate Tops 18% In Apparel Industry

Bushkill, Pa. — Unemployment in the domestic apparel industry soared to 18.1 percent in the first three months of 1982, Research Director Herman Starobin of the Ladies' Garment Workers told a meeting of the union's executive board at Unity House here.

Starobin attributed the steep rise to reduced orders from clothing retailers, high interest rates fostered by the Reagan Administration, and continuing imports of women's and children's wear. At least 17 percent of the industry's experienced workers still were without jobs in May, he added.

NO LAUGHING MATTER brings cartoon favorites to the picket line with local unions representing striking technicians and production workers at Group W Cable in Santa Monica, Calif., and the motion picture screen cartoonists who are on strike against major Hollywood studios. The five affected Theatrical Stage Employees local unions joined forces at the cable company's doors to dramatize the refusal of the Westinghouse Broadcasting affiliate to bargain with its employees and the insistence of the animated film studios on broad rights to contract out work to overseas studios and to non-union shops.

Court Upholds Labor Board On Order to Rehire Strikers

A federal appeals court upheld a 1977 National Labor Relations Board ruling that accorded striking employees of a Tennessee firm status as unfair labor practice strikers even though they began their strike to secure recognition of their union.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit agreed with the board that the strike was converted to an unfair labor practice strike when the company engaged in widespread violations of federal labor law serious enough to warrant a remedial bargaining order. Unfair practice strikes are entitled to immediate reinstatement if they offer to return to work.

A STRIKE for recognition is generally treated as an economic strike. Economic strikers who seek to return to their jobs are not entitled to reinstatement under the law if they have been replaced by strike breakers.

The case involved John Cuneo, Inc., of Chattanooga, a manufacturer of fire sprinkler systems, and Road Sprinkler Fitters Local 699, which secured a majority of signed authorization cards asking for union recognition and designating the union as bargaining agent. The company refused to recognize and bargain with the union and embarked on a series of unfair practices, including illegal interrogation and coercion of union supporters.

After the workers struck the plant in September 1977, management hired a Pinkerton guard who, together with the company's labor counsel, began photographing the picketers.

The strike continued until mid-november when the union sent to management unconditional offers to return to work by seven of the strikers. Although vacancies existed, none of the seven was immediately reinstated.

TWO WERE rehired in February 1978, but were told they must not talk about the union while on the job. The two also were warned that they would be fired if they were late for work three times. The NLRB found that the new tardiness rule applied only to the reinstated workers.

In finding that the widespread management violations had changed the strike into an unfair practice strike, the NLRB ordered the company to offer immediate and full reinstatement to those who sought to return, making them whole for any lost earnings back to mid-November 1977.

The appeals court said that it had no trouble affirming the agency's findings.

Jobless Rate Exceeds 10% In 18 States

Rising unemployment was experienced in nearly every state in June as 47 states and the District of Columbia reported higher jobless rates that month compared to a year earlier.

Eighteen states reported joblessness of 10 percent or higher, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said, in a month when the national unemployment rate hit a seasonally adjusted 9.5 percent. State and local rates are not adjusted for seasonal variation.

THE HIGHEST jobless rate was in Michigan, where 14.3 percent of the workers were jobless in June. A year earlier, the rate was 11.1 percent.

After Michigan, the highest rate was 13.9 percent in Alabama, which compared with a year-earlier level of 11.4 percent. Others with rates over 10 percent included Illinois, 11.7; Indiana, 11.5; the District of Columbia, 11.3; Indiana, 11.5; Ohio, 12.3; South Carolina, 11.5; Washington, 12.4; and West Virginia, 12.3.

Unemployment data for Iowa and Kentucky were not available, and therefore rates for those states were not included in the report.

States with heavy industry remained hardest hit by the recession. Jobs in manufacturing, transportation and public utilities, and construction were lost in most states. On the other hand, services industries showed job increases in most areas.

OVER THE YEAR ended in June, employment fell by between 100,000 and 200,000 in five states—Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. In contrast, employment expanded in Texas, 145,000, and Florida, 35,000, due largely to gains in trade and service industries.

North Dakota had 4.7 percent unemployment in June, the lowest of any state.

Among the 208 metropolitan areas for which June 1982 data were available, 80 had jobless rates of 10 percent or more. Rockford, Ill., and Modesto, Calif., had the highest rates—19.1 and 19 percent, respectively. The lowest rate was in Stamford, Conn., 3.4 percent.

Garment Union Boosts Dues To Expand Organizing Effort

Atlantic City, N.J.—A dues increase and per capita tax boost keyed to expanded organizing efforts were approved by the 31st convention of the United Garment Workers.

Dues will go up in five annual 50-cent increments each Jan. 1 beginning in 1983, under the action adopted by the delegates. Minimum dues will rise from a current $5.45 per month to $7.95 per month.

A TOTAL $1.50 per capita tax increase over the five years will see the tax rise 30 cents each Jan. 1 from the current $3.80 to $5.30 by 1987.

William O'Donnell, the union's president, was elected to his second five-year term and Sec.-Treas. Calvina S. Little to her first full term. Little has held the office since 1978 when she was named to the post after the retirement of Catherine C. Peters.

All members of the union's executive board were also re-elected.

In his remarks to the convention, O'Donnell stressed the need for increased organizing efforts and political action, particularly on the local level. He urged the union's members to "register and then get out to vote because many times your vote can be the deciding vote."

O'DONNELL reminded the delegates that Election Day will be "Solidarity Day II" for union members to help prevent the Reagan Administration "from taking away the gains we have established through the years."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in an address to the delegates, observed that the labor movement is "fighting an economic policy that is a proven loser in other countries as well as our own, with only broken promises of upturns."

Social programs unions fought for and won over the decades are "down the drain," Donahue said, emphasizing that "the ouly thing that is going to solve the problems of the country is putting people back to work."

HE URGED the delegates to be active in the elections "to try to counteract the President's programs that are depriving the working men and women, those desiring education and senior citizens of their benefits."

On behalf of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Donahue also accepted the union's Joseph P. McCurdy Memorial Award for outstanding achievement.

The delegates adopted a series of resolutions scoring attempts to gut the social security system, the Davis-Bacon and Service Contracts Act and other programs of importance to workers, including occupational safety and health.

Government Employees Re-Elect Ken Blaylock

New York—Kenneth T. Blaylock won re-election as president of the American Federation of Government Employees by a decisive margin over three opponents.

Delegates to the AFGE convention here gave Blaylock 120,529 votes to 48,187 for Carl Sadler, 35,113 for Virgel Miller and 1,993 for Douglas Cook.

Blaylock, 47, will be starting his fourth two-year term.

Shop Stewards' Tribute Set for Union Label Week

The union label and the contributions of shop stewards will get special recognition throughout the organized labor movement during the first week of September.

The week that includes Labor Day has traditionally been designated "Union Label Week" by the AFL-CIO and the federation's Union Label & Service Trades Dept., which promotes a variety of local observances including parades, fairs and cooperative programs with local employers and merchants. Many local governments issue "Union Label Week" proclamations for their cities or states.

Department Sec.-Treas. John E. Mara said the week helps encourage consumers to buy union products and use union services and to look for labels and shop cards as a sign of quality.

National Shop Stewards Week was set for the same period by the AFL-CIO Executive Council to recognize stewards as "the union member's first line of defense against arbitrary action by management."

Hard-working stewards play a vital role in achieving "justice on the job," the council said, and it urged both Congress and local governments to join organized labor in endorsing the week of recognition.

Apprenticeship Chairman Quits, Blasts Neglect

The chairman of the Federal Committee on Apprenticeship has resigned with a sharp protest over what he called the Reagan Administration's "abysmal record" of "disinterest, inactivity and neglect" for apprenticeship training programs.

In a strongly worded letter to Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, Dr. Robert W. Glover, a professor at the University of Texas, said he was giving up the post he has held for four years because under Donovan's administration the committee "has become no more than a facade."

"The bald truth is that after a year and a half into this Administration, the Dept. of Labor has not achieved any positive accomplishments in apprenticeship training," Glover told Donovan.

"Indeed," he charged in the letter, "there is only a litany of losses for apprenticeship."

Glover told other members of the committee in a letter announcing his resignation that he felt the department's "neglect" of apprenticeship "has reached such a high level that I feel it is ludicrous to continue to serve as chairperson of the committee." He urged that national apprenticeship efforts be supported regardless of Labor Dept. sponsorship.

Glover pointed out that for more than six months almost half of the memberships of the FCA were vacant waiting for Donovan's appointments and that the committee's budget was eliminated more than a year ago, yet no new financing arrangements have been made.

ON JULY 1, Glover said, the committee's charter was allowed to lapse "not because of any conscious decision within the department, but because the charter renewal papers have taken an extraordinarily lengthy time moving through the chain of command within the Employment & Training Administration."

Twenty-two of the 25 members of the committee represent the private sector, so it is "ironic" Glover said that at the very time the department has been pushing greater private sector action, the secretary's office has been "incapable of working effectively with its own private sector advisory group."

Administration rhetoric about promoting training rather than income maintenance programs has not been matched by action, Glover charged.

HE ALSO reminded Donovan that relative to other Labor Dept. training activities, apprenticeship takes little time or government money because it has such wide private support and funding.

The Labor Dept. "has all but wiped out almost every funded activity" including apprenticeship information centers and targeted outreach programs, which will mean that women and minorities in particular will have less information about apprenticeship and fewer chances to get training, Glover said.

These and other programs were cut or severely damaged "across the board without respect to program performance," he told Donovan.

Glover said the Administration's attempts to revise the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law "would have undermined apprenticeship in the construction industry and replaced apprentices with helpers for whom there is no training requirement."

AMONG THE other casualties, he noted, are nearly all apprenticeship research programs and the state and national apprenticeship data system. Only one "badly mismanaged" research program remains, and figures on the number of apprentices now depend on "an inferior data system" operated by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, he observed.

Glover also warned that the department's general aptitude test battery, widely used by apprenticeship sponsors, is also in danger of being cut.

He said Labor Dept. officials discuss "decentralizing" apprenticeship programs to the states without offering any "coherent" plan for accomplishing that goal and maintaining the essential minimum national standards that safeguard the "transferability of skills" within trades in a mobile society.

The Employment & Training Administration has been "demoted" to the bottom of the department's organization chart, Glover asserted, and many positions, including state and regional directorships, have not been filed.

BUREAU OF Apprenticeship Training staff has been cut, and the remaining workers are under constant threat of furloughs or layoffs, Glover said, stressing that "it is difficult to imagine a worse environment for accomplishing anything constructive."

Glover urged Donovan "to reconsider the apparent low priority you have placed on apprenticeship" and the committee.

If apprenticeship is to meet the nation's needs for skill training, it must be "significantly expanded" and its "orphan status" in the Labor Dept. must end, Glover said.

Emergency Boards Propose Settlements in Rail Disputes

Two presidential emergency panels appointed in separate disputes involving the United Transportation Union, the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, and the nation's freight carriers recognized the validity of most union arguments in the two cases.

The factfinding boards, however, said both unions should accept the pattern wage settlement already agreed to by 11 other unions. Both the UTU and the BLE had sought variations of that settlement.

THE PANELS rejected the carriers' position that the general wage and cost-of-living increases should not be applied to particular items of employee compensation such as overmiles, arbitraries, and special allowances.

The panel in the UTU dispute supported the industry's proposal for elimination of cabooses from trains but only in certain circumstances. The board recommended that the parties negotiate guidelines on the national level to implement the recommendation.

The union maintains that eliminating cabooses could be hazardous to workers and the public.

A recommendation involving the Engineers said that the union should be permitted to negotiate for adjustments in pay for its members because of crew modifications, but should not be allowed to strike if agreement is not reached.

THE BOARDS also urged establishment of a study commission for a review and negotiation of basic pay concepts and work rules in the industry. While the carriers had asked for this and the board endorsed the request, it rejected the proposal that all commission findings be submitted to binding arbitration.

The panel also said meal allowances should be raised to reflect increases in the cost of living.

Under the National Railway Labor Act, the two emergency boards were named to study impasses that had arisen in the disputes.

The BLE, which had called a nationwide walkout in July before President Reagan issued an order for a "cooling-off" period, based on the panel's recommendations does not materialize.

A BOARD was appointed in the UTU case after the union announced a selective strike against nine carriers. The UTU now has until Sept. 20 to resolve issues, or call a strike.

Both boards were made up of the same people—Dr. Arnold Weber of Colorado University, chairman; Jacob Seidenberg, a professional mediator and attorney from Falls Church, Va., and Prof. Daniel Quinn Mills of the faculty of the Harvard School of Business Administration.

Kirkland Protests Makeup of Social Security Panel

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has objected to the newly designated Advisory Council on Social Security and urged Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to appoint three employee representatives to rectify what "seems to be a violation of our understanding."

In an Aug. 20 letter to Schweiker, Kirkland noted that he had agreed, at Schweiker's request, to serve as the official employee representative on the National Commission on Social Security. "It was your suggestion that the national commission also serve as the advisory council," Kirkland said.

Thus, Kirkland expressed concern at learning, from letters sent to other members of the commission, "that you are about to appoint members to a newly designated advisory council, which would focus on Medicare."

"I am particularly concerned that this advisory council is being appointed without official employee representation, which is contrary to longstanding practice," Kirkland wrote.

He recommended that Schweiker name three employee representatives: Alvin E. Heaps, president of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union; Bert Seidman, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, and Howard Young, director of the Dept. of Social Security of the Auto Workers.

Congress Halts Payments For Hospital Union-Busting

represented a "neutral" policy by the government on labor-management issues.

IT'S NOT "neutral," Kirkland protested, to use federal funds to discourage workers from joining unions.

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney told a news conference that professional union-busters have been hired by management in at least 75 percent of union organizing campaigns at health care institutions with billings averaging about $100,000 a campaign.

The SEIU and other unions in the health care field mounted a campaign to block such payments.

Chairmen of four House committees and subcommittees concerned with health care costs wrote a letter of protest to HHS Sec. Richard S. Schweiker. And Rep. Charles B. Rangel, chairman of a Ways & Means subcommittee, achieved committee approval for legislation restoring the ban on the use of Medicare funds to fight unions.

UNDER THE procedures agreed to in the House-Senate conference on the tax bill, measures approved by the Ways & Means Committee could be included in the final version of the bill even if they had not been acted on by the House or Senate.

That strategem made it possible to include language reversing the Administration policy in a veto-proof bill. The new policy will take effect when the President signs the tax bill.

Second Anniversary of Solidarnosc

Last fall Solidarnosc's leaders asked Jan Sawka to create the official Solidarnosc poster for reproduction at Christmas. They asked for a work of art that expressed the hopes of the Polish people.

His beautiful poster was on the press December 13 when the Polish government cracked down on Solidarnosc. The posters were destroyed.

Sawka has recreated this work and asked the AFL-CIO to pick up where Solidarnosc left off. Proceeds from the sale of the poster go to the AFL-CIO Polish Workers Aid Fund, a major source of assistance to Poland's free trade union movement.

Don't just remember. Help.

Poland's Taste of Freedom

DURING THE WARM, dry summer of 1980, the wave of labor unrest that swept Poland came late to Gdansk. Strikes started on July 1 of that year, in the railroad yards of Lublin, near the border of the Soviet Union, to Warsaw and other industrial cities before leaping north to the Baltic seaports.

The communist regime of Edward Gierek sent its agents flying from city to city in a typical attempt to buy off the strikers. For a short period, it seemed calm, and foreign journalists who visited the shipyards in Gdansk were told all was well.

Then, a boss committed a fundamental error. He fired Anna Walentynowicz, a middle-aged crane operator who had long worked to form an independent trade union. Within an hour, workers young enough to be her sons had hand-lettered signs paraded through the yard: "Anna has been fired."

Men and women throughout the yard put down their tools and gathered under the trees near the commissary. It was time to strike, they agreed by consensus. They had other grievances beyond the unfair treatment of a sister.

Word spread throughout Gdansk and its neighboring cities that the Lenin yard was shut down. Other workers went on strike.

THE MESSAGE reached Lech Walesa, an electrician who had been fired from the shipyard some years before for agitating to form a free union. He hitched a ride on a small truck and went to the waterfront. Friends hoisted him over the wall.

By consensus, again, Walesa was chosen strike leader. The history of Poland and East Europe, at that point, began to change.

Polish workers for nearly 20 years had kept their communist masters nervous by taking their grievances to the streets in demonstrations and strikes. What made the summer of 1980 different was that the workers kept their strikes peaceful and moved beyond the stage of protest to the crucial stage of organization.

In August 1981, while hundreds of workers peacefully occupied the shipyards, Walesa and his committee negotiated with representatives of government. Elected worker delegates from the entire seacoast region sat in permanent session until the negotiations ended with the historic recognition of the right of Solidarnosc, a new federation of free trade unions, to function in a communist society for the first time.

THE COMMUNISTS have since welched on their agreement. Walesa was thrown in jail last December and is still confined. The military is in control in Poland because the Communist Party has, in effect, been overturned.

So far, the Army rulers have found they can keep order, but they cannot make people work. The military, like the communists, has discovered that once Poland tasted the basic rights to assemble and to organize freely, coercion is no longer a viable tool.

The Cardinal Archbishop of Poland warned the military a few days ago that the right to organize is a "basic right" and that no one "can deprive us of that right."

With this second anniversary of the founding of Solidarnosc coming so close to American Labor Day, it is a good time to ponder this history.

Immigration Reforms Needed To Halt Employer Exploitation

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE UNITED STATES, a nation of immigrants, always has been a strong magnet for enterprising men and women seeking economic opportunity and political and religious freedom.

Benefits to the nation resulting from the ingenuity and hard work of its immigrants are readily apparent in any reading of U.S. history.

The successes and benefits documented for immigration present another, less proud picture.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS come to the United States for primarily the same reasons as legal immigrants—jobs and a chance for economic and social success. Jobs are the magnets that override the dangers of illegal entry and make the risk worthwhile.

But once here the illegal immigrant lives in fear of discovery and deportation. This makes undocumented workers easy targets for exploitation by unscrupulous employers who pay substandard wages and force them to work under unfair conditions.

The illegal immigrant does not enjoy the protections of most American workers, such as fair labor standards, the right to organize, or job health and safety laws. Nor does he have the protective welfare benefits in hard times, such as unemployment compensation, food stamps or help with housing, medical expenses and other necessities of life.

IN A RECENT paper, former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall, who served on the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policies created by Congress in 1979, described some of the problems created by illegal immigration.

The "costs," Marshall said, include "the perpetuation of low-wage, low-productivity job systems that lower the average level of productivity in this country. They include the rebirth of 19th Century garment district sweatshops in New York and other metropolitan areas. They include mounting political and ethnic tensions and sporadic outbursts of xenophobia; strained bilateral relations with sending nations, especially Mexico; and increasing pressure on the integrity of our immigration and labor laws.

"MOST OF ALL," Marshall said, "the costs include increased inequality of income between advantaged and disadvantaged persons in this country—inequality resulting from the increased job competition and depressed wages and working conditions for the almost 30 million low-skilled U.S. workers (especially the 15 million earning $3 an hour or less) who compete directly with illegal immigrants."

Conservative estimates by the Census Bureau put the number of illegal aliens in the United States at between 3.5 to 6 million. Since the early 1960s, there has been a tenfold increase in the number of illegal aliens apprehended yearly, from under a hundred thousand to a million.

With over 12 million Americans officially unemployed or too discouraged to look for work, it might be easy for the United States to seize such a moment for an hysterical and inhumane reaction to the problem of surging illegal immigration.

So it is commendable—and undoubtedly a reflection of the character and history of the nation—that the current immigration reform underway in Congress is largely based on the careful study and recommendations of the Select Commission.

THE SENATE recently passed an immigration reform measure, introduced by Sen. Alan Simpson (R-Wyo.), a member of the Select Commission, that follows most of the commission's recommendations. This includes an amnesty program and sanctions against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens.

The amnesty program would put a halt to excesses resulting from mass round-up and deportation programs, and employer sanctions would punish unscrupulous employers and help shut off the job magnet for illegal aliens. Labor has strongly supported both provisions.

Unfortunately, the Senate strayed from the commission's recommendations and approved an expanded temporary foreign worker, or H-2, program. This program permits the importation of labor in job areas, such as agriculture, that the federal government decides do not have adequate American workers to fulfill labor needs.

As Marshall pointed out, such programs tend to depress wages for low-skill jobs, decrease productivity by encouraging employers to postpone capital improvements and encourage a permanent subclass in the American workforce.

Hopefully, Congress will correct the H-2 program provisions and pass a workable immigration reform bill which is fair to illegal aliens, the nation and American workers.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Is Back Home; Now Is the Time To Stop The Program-Slashing Balanced Budget Amendment

The time for action to stop the balanced budget Constitutional amendment is now. Right-wing backers of the amendment already have pushed it through the Senate. They will try to push it to a House vote after the recess.

Congress is back home for the Labor Day recess, so now is the time to contact your Representative at his or her district office (consult your local yellow pages under Government, U.S., House of Representatives). Make a personal visit, a phone call, or drop a postcard in the mail now.

Urge your Representative:

1) Not to sign the petition to discharge the amendment from the House Judiciary Committee. If your Representative already has signed on (see chart below), ask him or her to sign off the list.

2) To vote against the amendment if it should reach the floor.

The chart below provides the most recent information available about each Representative's position on the amendment.

BACKGROUND: HOUSE ACTION

1 Introduced: The balanced budget amendment was introduced last year in the House by Rep. Ed Jenkins (D-GA). It currently has at least 225 cosponsors; 291 are needed for passage.

2 Stalled in Committee: The amendment was reported to the House Judiciary Committee, where it stalled due to the opposition of key members of the panel. The committee may report a less harmful statutory version of the amendment--not a Constitutional amendment.

3 Procedural Battle on "Discharge" Petition: Right-wing backers of the balanced budget amendment are trying to "discharge" it from the Judiciary Committee. Because discharge is a highly unusual procedure in Congress, it is granted only under strict rules of timing and debate. A discharged bill may come to the floor only on the second or fourth Monday of a month, and a majority of Representatives must have signed the discharge petition 7 legislative days prior to that.

Thus if the right wing can get 218 Representatives to sign the discharge petition by Sept. 16 (currently they have 201 signatures), they may be able to bring the balanced budget amendment to the floor on Sept. 27.

Balanced Budget Amendment Hurts Social Security

The balanced budget Constitutional amendment may seem appealing to politicians, but its appeal vanishes when you see what it would do to the economy. That's why the overwhelming majority of independent economists, including several Nobel prize winners, oppose the measure.

1) Balanced Budget Amendment = Big cuts in Social Security and other programs

The Congressional Budget Office warns that the balanced budget amendment would force $170 billion in budget cuts or tax increases in its first year. Congress probably would be unwilling to boost taxes that much, and budget cuts of that magnitude would make it impossible to rule Social Security off-limits.

2) Balanced Budget Amendment = A sagging economy

A study prepared by AFSCME, using the independent Data Resources, Inc. economic model, shows that the balanced budget amendment would cause a loss of $519 billion in total U.S. economic output during its first three years.

3) Balanced Budget Amendment = Higher unemployment

The AFSCME study projects that the balanced budget amendment, if it took effect in 1985, would add 2,650,000 Americans to the unemployment rolls by 1987.

Support for Solidarity Affirmed

SIGN OVER the portico of AFL-CIO headquarters spells out the federation's number one concerns in the domestic and foreign areas: double-digit unemployment and the continued detention of Solidarity members in Poland.

Poland's Embattled Union Hailed on 2nd Anniversary

By James M. Shevis

The American labor movement marked the second anniversary of the founding of Poland's since-suppressed Solidarity trade union with a vow "never to betray our own ideals by abandoning the brave workers of Poland" and a call for stiffer U.S. sanctions against the Polish communist regime.

As thousands of Solidarity supporters in Poland took to the streets to observe the occasion and protest the martial law that has existed there since last December, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland renewed the federation's demand that the Reagan Administration "stop the flow of credit to the Soviet bloc, stop financing Lech Walesa's captors." The Solidarity leader has been confined by Polish authorities since last year's crackdown.

IN A STATEMENT read at a federation headquarters rally, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO would never accept the repression of Solidarity and promised continued support of the first free union ever to gain official recognition in a communist-ruled nation.

"Only Poles can liberate Poland," he pointed out, "but they must know they are not alone." Kirkland was returning from Europe, where he had gone on federation business.

Exactly two years earlier, on Aug. 31, 1980, the Polish government agreed to the demands of striking workers at the giant Lenin shipyard in Gdansk and signed an historic document granting unprecedented freedoms to Poles, including the right to form free unions independent of the government and the right to strike.

THE BIRTH of Solidarity sparked 16 months of political reforms, which came to an end the night of Dec. 12-13 when a military junta headed by Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski declared a "state of war," or emergency, existed in Poland, suspended the union, and jailed thousands of its members.

During the AFL-CIO rally, Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner charged the Reagan Administration ignores its responsibility to protect human rights when it permits giant American corporations to provide technology, trade, and credit to the Soviet Union.

"What we ask for Polish workers is the same basic rights we ask for ourselves," said Turner, an AFL-CIO vice president. He accused the Polish and Soviet governments of going back on their word under the Helsinki accords, the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and the International Labor Organization's convention No. 87 guaranteeing freedom of association by refusing the right of free and independent unions to exist in their societies.

Social Programs At Stake in Veto Of Funding Bill

By David L. Perlman

The independence of Congress and the part-time community service jobs of 54,000 low-income older Americans will be equally at stake when the House and Senate attempt to override President Reagan's veto of an emergency funding bill.

Reagan termed the $14.1 billion appropriations measure a "budget-buster" because it included about $900 million for social programs the Administration wants to cut back. At the same time, he complained that Congress didn't provide all of the new military funding the Administration had requested.

A MAJORITY of Republicans in both the House and Senate had joined Democrats in approving the supplemental appropriations bill, and they will have to

Little to Cheer About

Labor Day Messages Assail Job Destruction

By Susan Dunlop

American workers have little to cheer about this Labor Day, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressed in their traditional holiday statements.

"There is not a working family in the land that has not been injured to some degree," Kirkland said, "by the destructive policies of the Reagan Administration and the recession that is part and parcel of those policies."

BY HIS action's and policies, "President Reagan has treated workers as wholly expendable," Kirkland said.

And, because of "the cold-blooded decision to instigate mass unemployment as a weapon against inflation," he emphasized, more than 10.8 million Americans are jobless.

Unemployment is "a disease that withers the human potential," Kirkland said, adding that because work is the "basis of the sense of personal worth that engenders both self-respect and respect for others," it is also the "bedrock" of social stability and order.

Joblessness undermines that stability, and because of its "disruptive and disintegrative effects," it is "the most dangerous force, short of famine, pestilence, war and death, that can be let loose in the world," Kirkland asserted.

THE GOAL of the American labor movement, he said, is to help bring about the best and most productive society possible for human beings to achieve, "and the place to start . . . is to give every human being access to the world of work. That means providing a job worth doing for every man and woman who is able and willing to work"

Kirkland likened the Reagan Administration's promises of better days ahead to the Hoover Administration's assurances fifty years ago that "prosperity is just around the corner while the American economic house was collapsing around our ears."

The disastrous, job-destroying budget, tax and high-interest rate policies of the Republican Reagan Administration are pushing many American workers and their families lower and lower down the economic ladder, Kirkland charged. He stressed that the damage is magnified by the deep cuts in social programs just at

Strange Cult

Varied Front Groups Abet LaRouche's Quest for Power

By Wesley McCune

Special to the AFL-CIO News

If nothing else, Lyndon LaRouche is indefatigable. Starting 15 years ago on the extreme left and switching to the extreme right without conceding any change, the energetic movement leader has adopted new names and new techniques to attract attention and new followers.

Although he is generally credited with only 2,000 to 3,000 followers in this country, he retains a cadre of several hundred hard-core workers, even after a block of them defected in the past year.

Starting as the National Caucus of Labor Committees, LaRouche changed the name to U.S. Labor Party and now uses the equally deceptive name of National Democratic Policy Committee. In his later phase, he has sought respectability by such activities as running for President twice, after emerging from the shadows of anonymity.

HIS TACTICS in the earlier phase included harassment and violence, such as beatings by their own account of at least 40 opponents, principally members of the Communist Party and black-power activists. In his more genteel phase—during his 1980 run for the Presidency in New Hampshire—LaRouche supporters began the tactic of impersonating reporters and others,

STRANGE CULT LaRouche's Quest for Power

sometimes using harassing phone calls defended as necessary for "security."

The rough stuff was not casual. During the 1980 presidential campaign, LaRouche travelled with armed body guards, and leaders of his motley organization have been trained extensively in terrorist tactics and "self defense" at two centers. One is his own, a farm near Glens Falls, N.Y., where foreigners and Americans took classes in weapons systems, explosives, handguns and close-order drill.

MORE professional training of this kind has been obtained at a compound in Georgia which is run by Mitchell WerBell III, a developer of guns and trainer of bands for abortive overthrows in Latin America. WerBell is also a supporter of the radical-right Liberty Lobby and close friend of its head, Willis A. Carto.

"We train them in martial arts, pistol shooting, paramedical skills, the use of shotguns, rifle countersniper activity, counter-surveillance, and the control of three-car caravans," WerBell told a reporter.

As recently as last year, LaRouche took eight bodyguards sporting sunglasses and walkie-talkies to visit a member of Congress. Though an ardent conservative, the congressman has "steered clear" of LaRouche ever since.

Other congressional offices report the use of deception by LaRouche's agents, such as representing themselves to be reporters for well-known publications or using names of government officials.

BESIDES resorting to such tactics, LaRouche has spawned a wide assortment of projects and subgroups with misleading names, some amounting to fronts for his well-dominated empire that takes in $3 to $5 million a year, none of it accounted for publicly.

A prime example comes from the Chicago area, where funds were actively solicited for about two years for something called the National Anti-Drug Coalition and a publication called War on Drugs. After many questions were raised about the operation, it was disclosed to be run by LaRouche disciples and commingled with his various funds.

Without registering either as a political group or a charity, the network of hawkers was taking in an average of $2,000 a day in the Chicago region with a claimed 7,000 subscribers there, and a significant number of the salespeople were contributing to LaRouche's campaign for President of the United States in the Democratic primaries.

Along with the fund-raising, the network was typically spreading its conspiracy theory of world problems. The Chicago Sun-Times was accused of being in collusion with Notre Dame University President Theodore Hesburgh and two Chicago priests to create "financial chaos" in the Catholic church and somehow carry on a worldwide conspiracy to foster population control.

A former member commented: "Their only constraint is what they can get away with. Anything and everything goes."

Some of the fronts used in the past—and probably defunct—have been called Revolutionary Youth Movement, National Unemployed and Welfare Rights Organizations, International Workingmen's Association, Committee for Fair Elections, and Labor Organizer's Defense Fund.

A MAJOR FRONT which is very much alive is the Fusion Energy Foundation (FEF), which pushes hard for more use of atomic energy and actually enjoys tax-exemption. One of several attractive publications hawked by LaRouche workers at airports, Fusion is jam-packed with apparently learned, scientific articles about nuclear energy. It does not disclose its control by LaRouche, but he is sometimes in it. For example, the 72-page issue of Jan. 20, 1980, contained a full-page ad with his picture and headlined: "On February 26, this man will end the myth that most Americans oppose nuclear energy." The date was explained as being that of the New Hampshire primary in which he was running for President as a Democrat (without, of course, any involvement of the party).

Another of his professional-looking magazines is The Campaigner, which boasts that it is being published as "the independent journal of the newly revived humanist movement" to "rescue our children from the evils of drugs, pornography, and rock music." Although not identified with LaRouche, it contains articles by him (without further identification of him).

A THIRD, more esoteric magazine is Executive Intelligence Review, identified as a publication of New Solidarity International Press Service, another LaRouche operation with foreign offices and a modern teletype network which services his branches throughout the United States.

A mish-mash of articles from abroad, EIR also embraces such LaRouche themes as "the one-world conspiracy," referring to the United Nations and various specialized international agencies.

The oldest and brashest of his publications is a newspaper called New Solidarity, not to be confused with Solidarity, the long-time organ of the United Auto Workers with whom he has fought for years.

Symbol Used by LaRouche's U.S. Labor Party

An analysis of targets selected for attack in the publication shows these samples among liberal groups, in addition to a significant number of conservative objects of LaRouche's scorn: the Jesuits, the National Council of Churches, the American Friends Service Committee, American Civil Liberties Union, Ladies' Garment Workers, National Education Association, International Red Cross and Jesse Jackson's "Operation Push."

LaROUCHE'S most virulent attacks, however, are reserved for Jews for whom he often uses the code words "Britain" or "British," a reference to the Rothschilds and other Jewish-surnamed bankers in London.

In a detailed study of the LaRouche cult to be published later this month by the League for Industrial Democracy, New York journalist Dennis King documents LaRouche's anti-Semitic theory of history that accuses Jews of centuries of crimes ranging from the death of Jesus Christ to encouraging drug addiction in American cities.

To LaRouche, the LID study notes, Jews are a "treasonous apparatus" operating on behalf of the "British" whom he calls a separate, morally depraved, subhuman species bent on destroying the human race. "Britain" and its "Zionist" agents, according to LaRouche, plan to destroy the human race through usury, drugs, famine, plagues and nuclear war.

LaROUCHE HAS called the Nazi Holocaust "mythical," and he has called for the "immediate elimination of the Jewish lobby and other British agents" from American government, business and labor, if necessary by force, including "the treatment . . . (applied) to Japan in 1945."

The LID study also documents LaRouche's plans in 1978 to circulate a resolution calling on unions to kick "Zionists" out of their ranks and to mobilize their resources against Jews "both inside and outside of the labor movement."

An article in New Solidarity announced that the attack would largely be directed against the leadership of the AFL-CIO, King reports in the LID study. The article said, "The recent issues of AFL-CIO publications provide ample evidence that the AFL-CIO is acting as a malleable tool of the Jewish Labor Committee and its Zionists sponsors." The "evidence" cited by the LaRouche publication included a statement by then-AFL-CIO President George Meany calling on the U.S. government to press the Soviet Union to recognize the human rights of all Soviet citizens, including Soviet Jews.

WHETHER THE ideology is liberal or conservative, LaRouche jumps on current events to exploit publicity. Last fall, when Sen. Harrison Williams of New Jersey, a liberal Democrat, was in danger of being expelled for his participation in the ABSCAM scandals (he later resigned), LaRouche produced a half-hour film in which the senator explained his side of the affair.

LaRouche described the controversy as a "frame-up" of Williams and ABSCAM as a "treasonous" action by the FBI, charging some members of Congress with promoting or condoning policies "more hideous than those perpetuated by Albert Speer and others under Adolph Hitler." And he accused the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think-tank, with being behind the plot, calling it a "sham opponent of the Trilateral Commission."

All of which added to the mystery of the energetic chamelon who holds together a network capable of violence and many other kinds of mischief.

(Part 3 next week)

Reaction to Solidarity Reveals Basic Anti-Unionism

The following is excerpted from "The Lyndon LaRouche Cult: Enemy of American Labor," to be published later this month by the League for Industrial Democracy, 275 Seventh Ave., New York, N.Y. 10001. The author, Dennis King, wrote an award-winning series on LaRouche for the Manhattan weekly, Our Town, in 1979-80.

LaRouche and his followers moved away from communism long ago, but they retained an admiration for the Soviet bureaucracy and for its role as the center of anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism in today's world. This has led the NCLC into its most flagrant display of hostility toward organized labor. When the Polish military cracked down on the Solidarity trade union in December 1981, the NCLC jumped to the defense of the Polish military, echoing the most discredited lies of Pravda.

On Jan. 25, 1982, the NCLC newspaper published a front-page editorial, "Don't Meddle in Poland," which claimed that "elements of Solidarity" were controlled by Western intelligence agencies, and described the efforts of the AFL-CIO to help Solidarity as "deadly games."

"Were those who support the activities of Lane Kirkland . . . and (his) ilk to now desist from present and planned covert operations, targeted against the Polish nation-state, then stability might soon be returned to that nation," said the NCLC.

On Jan. 21, the NCLC newspaper praised the "broad purge" that was reportedly underway within the Polish state administration. "From the first concrete instances of this clean-up," the NCLC writer said, "the martial regime of Gen. Jaruzelski is removing from positions of influence some of the hardcore British intelligence protégés." In LaRouchian code language ("British" for Jew), this parallels the charges made by Polish hard-liners (and also some West European neo-Nazis) that "Zionists" are responsible for the growth of Solidarity.

These statements are only the tip of the iceberg. Two years ago, when the independent Polish workers' movement was first gaining strength and Edward Gierek was still premier of Poland, LaRouche wrote an article of sympathetic advice to Gierek which foreshadowed recent events.

THE ARTICLE included a mixture of LaRouche-style and Soviet-style anti-Semitism, calling the growth of the workers' movement a "Trotskyite insurrection" and stating: "As . . . with sheep generally, Judas goats appear often to lead political sheep to fresh slaughter. . . . So the Polish strikers . . . are marching to slaughter behind British intelligence's KOR-centered Judas goats." (The dissident group KOR had frequently been accused by communist hard-liners of being "Zionist" dominated.)

LaRouche then described what he would do if he were "in Mr. Gierek's shoes": "My approach to the general strike," LaRouche said, "would be analogous to my response to the ghetto riot in some major U.S. city." He then went on to discuss police tactics:

"Law enforcement will concentrate . . . on pre-identifying and surveilling the known provocateurs, taking them out of the situation by arrest and detention. Without the provocateurs, the ordinary citizens . . . will tire themselves out. . . ."

AND AGAIN: "In general . . . use force to contain and separate groups of rioters from one another and from uninvolved areas of the population. Isolate and neutralize the agents-provocateurs as inconspicuously and quickly as possible, and let the dupes tire themselves back into a normal state of mind."

There you have it. A perfect description of the martial law tactics implemented two years later by the Polish military. It is unlikely that LaRouche's article influenced the Polish communists; but the article does reveal—beyond any doubt—the anti-labor essence of LaRouche's politics.

Making Mischief in Mexico

The deceptively-named front organizations for the Lyndon LaRouche cult have fooled people in other countries as well as in the United States.

New York magazine reported the confusion in Mexico earlier this year when LaRouche, identifying himself as chairman of the advisory board of the National Democratic Policy Committee, wangled a meeting with Mexican President Jose Lopez Portillo. LaRouche puzzled Mexican reporters, who believed him to be the "leader" of the Democratic Party in the United States, by telling them that then-Sec. of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr., and his predecessor, Henry Kissinger, were "non grata"—unwelcome—in Latin America.

The U.S. Embassy and the Democratic National Committee sought to undo the damage by getting the word out that LaRouche spoke only for himself, was not a major political figure, and has no connection with the Democratic Party.

Little to Cheer About

Labor Day Messages Assail Job Destruction

the time the recession makes these programs necessary.

Donahue stressed in his message that Labor Day 1982 arrives when the American economy "is in a tailspin and the outlook for the future is grim."

VOTES ON Election Day can mean a Congress that will say "no" to the Reagan Administration's "cruel" budget cuts, tight money policies and "unwarranted tax advantages for the wealthy while piling oppressive new tax burdens on working people and their families," Donahue said.

He called on American workers to pledge this Labor Day to register and vote "for a Congress which will increase jobs and ease human suffering; which will rebuild public facilities and restore public services; which will enhance the nation's physical and human resources."

METAL TRADES Dept. President Paul Burnsky said the labor movement, "as we always have," must take the lead "in moving America back on course toward prosperity and justice. We must vigorously pursue our role as the people's lobby both in reminding our national leaders of our people's needs and in stimulating voter activity . . . on behalf of office seekers who understand the responsibility of government to all its citizens."

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. emphasized that with millions of Americans out of work, "much work needed to be done is not being done" as public facilities deteriorate dangerously and housing construction continues to fall off sharply.

Georgine also pointed to attempts by the Reagan Administration to undermine the 50-year-old Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law as an example of the "open season" that has been declared on labor standards.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEE Dept. Executive Director John Leyden warned that "America must be braced once the upcoming elections are over for a renewed attack on social security, the most cherished of all our social programs."

American working men and women should remember the rallying call of organizer Mary "Mother" Jones, "Pray for the dead, and fight like hell for the living," Leyden said.

John E. Mara, secretary-treasurer of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., observed that "there's an irony to Labor Day 1982 in that almost 10 percent of the work force are not privileged with the opportunity to labor."

Mara called attention to the fact that in addition to the dismal statistics on unemployment, business failures, foreclosures and the swelling ranks of the poor are the number of jobs "given away" by the failure of the U.S. government to insist on fair trade policies with other countries and on a modern industrial growth policy.

INDUSTRIAL UNION Dept. President Howard Samuel charged that "the greatest tragedy of all is that millions of those unployed will remain jobless even when our nation begins to emerge from the recession. Their companies have gone out of business, their industries have retrenched permanently."

American industry will continue to decline, Samuel said, until we recognize the need for an industrial policy. Government must acknowledge its role as a partner in assuring economic growth and full employment, he urged.

In his message, Food & Beverage Trades Dept. President Robert F. Harbrant noted that "the glorious predictions of supply-side economics have instead become the inglorious reality of soup kitchens and unemployment offices strained beyond capacity."

He scored the Reagan Administration's attempts to gut child labor laws and introduce a program to bring low-paid foreign "guest workers" into the United States as "ill-advised and reprehensible moves in any time, but all the more unconscionable when unemployment is at post-war highs and White House concern is apparently at post-war lows."

Network Broadcasts Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO leaders will appear on the following radio and television programs over the Labor Day weekend, Sept. 5 and 6:

Vice President John H. Lyons on Mutual radio, Monday, Sept. 6, 12:15 p.m. EDT.

President Lane Kirkland on NBC radio, Monday, Sept. 6, 12:30 p.m. EDT.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue on CBS radio, Monday, Sept. 6, excerpts during hourly news programs.

Kirkland also is scheduled to appear on the ABC television program "This Week with David Brinkley" Sunday, Sept. 5, at 11:30 a.m.

Local stations may alter program schedules and should be checked for exact broadcast time.

BOXING GLOVES modeled by Postal Workers President Moe Biller at the APWU convention tied in with the new "image-building" television advertising campaign planned by the union. Biller said the APWU will "hit back against those who have tried to make the American postal worker a punching bag."

Postal Union Delegates Put Political Fund Over the Top

Miami Beach, Fla.—Delegates to the American Postal Workers Union convention backed up a resolution of "non-support" of Administration policies with cash contributions that put the APWU political fund over its $350,000 goal.

The 2,600 delegates represented more than 300,000 active and retired members, and President Moe Biller promised that the union will "hit back against those who have tried to make the American postal worker a punching bag."

IN ADDITION to expanded political efforts, the APWU will mount an "image-building" series of television, radio and print media advertisements this fall. The advertising program was previewed at the convention and enthusiastically applauded.

On internal issues, the convention approved a changeover of previously part-time union positions to create new full-time posts of business agents, who will be elected by regions and crafts.

National officers are currently in the second year of three-year terms, and the new positions will be filled next year when the union's officers are chosen in a nationwide mail ballot.

KEYED TO the new positions is a 45-cent increase in the per capita tax to take effect in October 1983. The present per capita payment, including an assessment that was rolled into the permanent structure, is $6 a month.

Delegates approved a clarification of the "no-contract, no work" declaration adopted by a previous convention. It specified that "further negotiations are not eliminated if the parties are not in agreement at midnight of the current contract deadline, as long as it is understood that we continue under a contract." Further, the policy will no longer be regarded as a "mandate" but "as an alternative if the national negotiators deem it necessary."

In another area, the convention adopted an "interpretive resolution" affirming that the union's executive board has the authority, between conventions, to engage in transactions it deems in the best interests of the union. Delegates also restored the right of retired members who pay full dues to seek elective office.

FORMER Vice President Walter F. Mondale was among the convention speakers, and he brought delegates to their feet by clasping hands with APWU officers on the platform and singing Solidarity Forever with them.

There was a similar, moving scene the next day as Coretta Scott King brought the convention together with the civil rights hymn, We Shall Overcome.

The president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, Jean-Claude Parrot, received a warm welcome from the delegates as did Gary Eads, the president of the Air Traffic Controllers.

ON THE EVE of the convention, a congressional leadership rally was addressed by seven House members. They included Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Chairman William D. Ford (D-Mich.) of the Post Office & Civil Service Committee and five other House members with committee posts important to postal worker interests: Representatives William Clay (D-Mo.), Mickey Leland (D-Tex.), Benjamin A. Gilman (R-N.Y.), Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) and George Miller (D-Calif.).

Asbestos Bankruptcy Claim Hit as 'Ploy'

The AFL-CIO characterized the Manville Corp.'s petition for reorganization under the Federal Bankruptcy Code as a "ploy" to escape its responsibility for the asbestos industry's concealment of the deadly effects of asbestos on the health and lives of exposed workers.

George H. R. Taylor, director of the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, predicted that the next move of the company and the industry would be to use this bankruptcy device to push for legislation making the taxpayers foot the bill for compensation of the victims of workplace exposure to asbestos.

MANVILLE, formerly known as Johns-Manville, was for many years a major manufacturer of asbestos products. In filing for bankruptcy Aug. 26, the Denver-based firm became the second large U.S. company to seek Chapter 11 protection because of lawsuits related to asbestos and health. UNR Industries, Inc., of Chicago filed for reorganization in July, citing 17,000 damage claims pending against it.

Manville, the largest single asbestos producer in the world, filed the petition because of what it called the prohibitive cost of contesting over 16,000 asbestos-related lawsuits. The effect of the filing was to suspend damage suits against the company from workers who claim their health was eroded from exposure to asbestos at Manville worksites.

Asbestos has been shown to cause asbestosis, a usually fatal scarring of the lungs, lung cancer, and mesothelioma, a unique form of cancer of the lung's lining.

OF THE estimated 16,500 suits filed against Manville, 90 have gone to trial and the company has won 40 percent of them. James Beasley, treasurer of the company, said the asbestos litigation "could range from anywhere between $2 billion to many times that amount over the next 20 years."

Sheldon Samuels, director of health, safety and environment for the AFL-CIO's Industrial Union Dept., said the Manville action is "a symptom of the failure of the government, especially this Administration, to provide meaningful medical assistance in interrupting the development of disease and a fair compensation system that protects the legal and financial rights of workers and their families."

The AFL-CIO has long supported uniform federal standards for worker compensation, particularly in the field of industrial illness resulting from exposure to the thousands of toxic materials in the workplace.

Taylor said the federation would continue to oppose any legislation that would deprive workers of their full legal rights to seek relief or which would absolve industry of its responsibilities to shoulder the costs of worker illnesses which it caused in the first place and then concealed.

MEANWHILE, a key congressman, Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) announced plans to hold hearings on Manville's decision to file for reorganization. Miller, the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards, said the hearings would also address the more general asbestos liability problem.

Miller is sponsor of a bill that would require asbestos manufacturers and suppliers to set up a compensation fund.

Submarine Draftsmen Affiliate with UAW

Groton, Conn.—Members of an independent union at General Dynamic Corp.'s Electric Boat division here voted to affiliate with the Auto Workers.

The decisive vote, 897-737, followed three years of turmoil that began when the independent Marine Draftsmen's Association struck the submarine yard over massive work rule changes.

After the strike ended, the MDA executive board under President E. Roy Colville began exploring the idea of affiliating with an international union. Interest in the UAW was strengthened with General Dynamic's purchase earlier this year of several Chrysler tank plants.

At 50th Anniversary Convention

Election Day Solidarity Pressed as AFGE Goal

New York—More than 1,600 delegates to the 28th convention of the American Federation of Government Employees celebrated the union's 50th anniversary by calling for solidarity among government workers and pledging to work with other unions to strengthen political action programs for the 1982 and 1984 elections.

The convention elected officers to the union's top four posts and defeated proposals for a per capita dues increase.

AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock overwhelmingly won re-election over three opponents to his fourth term. Blaylock received more than 2.5 times the votes of the nearest contender.

ALSO RE-ELECTED were Barbara B. Hutchinson to her second term as director of the AFGE Women's Dept. and Sec.-Treas. Nicholas J. Nolan to his fifth term in that office. Hutchinson drew 148,973 votes to 56,028 for Denise Osborne. Nolan received 110,747 votes to 77,435 for Bill Nussbaum and 16,923 for Norman Fischer. Both Blaylock and Hutchinson sit on the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

John Sturdivant out-polled seven other candidates to win the contest for the vacant executive vice president position. On the second ballot, he received 125,384 votes to 73,118 for Allen Kaplan, an AFGE vice president. Sturdivant was the administrative assistant to Executive Vice President Joe Gleason, who died last March.

"I want to first give a call for unity," Blaylock told the convention immediately following the elections. "We've got some major goals to reach if we're going to move this union forward over the next few years," he said "Organizing new members, political action, and public information will continue to be this union's priorities as we gear up for the coming national elections."

IN A MAJOR address to the convention, former Vice President Walter Mondale told the delegates that this is a good time "for all of us to recognize the reasons we need a free, independent trade union movement in this country." He said, "Show me a country with an independent union movement, and I'll show you a free country. But, show me a country that prohibits unions, and I'll show you a country that lives in slavery."

Mondale, who had a 100-percent AFGE voting record during his two terms in the Senate, urged the delegates to become involved in political action and to support the union's political action committee. This is the only way to counter the big business groups who are "trying to buy America," he said.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the convention that "by making the National Right to Work Committee Legal Defense Fund eligible to get their hands on your donations, the Administration was trying to trick you into financing the destruction of your union and the unions of your brothers and sisters. . . . There's nothing charitable about that Right to Work gang."

Donahue urged AFGE members to designate their contributions in the Combined Federal Campaign to the organizations they support.

He stressed the importance of understanding the congressional records compiled by the AFGE, the platforms of the political parties and the intentions of the candidates in the upcoming election.

"THE HATCH ACT can't prevent you from doing that," he said. "It can't prevent you from making those comparisons, from telling your friends and family about those votes, from being involved in your union political action program, and from getting people out to vote."

Other speakers to the convention included New York Gov. Hugh Carey; AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, who is president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women; Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP; Rep. Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), and International Labor Press Association President Diane Curry.

In other convention action, the delegates approved changes in the union's constitution to reflect new federal labor laws and Labor Dept. regulations. In a heated debate, the convention failed to reach the two-thirds majority vote needed to approve a per capita dues increase proposal.

Blaylock observed that the economy has not been good to government workers and said the union would have to increase organizing efforts to obtain the funds needed to carry out programs required by the members.

Federal Catch-Up Pay Hike Slashed by Reagan to 4%

President Reagan slashed the catch-up salary increase that 1.4 million federal employees are scheduled to receive in October from 18.5 percent to 4 percent, the amount budgeted by Congress.

Federal workers haven't received their full comparability increase since 1977, and [illegible] slumped accordingly. Presidents Nixon, Ford and Carter, as well as Reagan, have used a loophole in the salary comparability law to reduce annual pay adjustments that are supposed to be based on salary surveys of comparable private industry jobs.

LAST YEAR, Reagan sliced a 15.1 percent comparabilty raise to the 4.8 percent set by the budget.

The gap has been widening each year under the cumulative effect of presidential cutbacks, and the American Federation of Government Employees protested that federal employees are falling "further and further behind."

AFGE, which represents the largest group of federal workers, has protested what it sees as the nullification of the intent of the 1970 law that was supposed to keep federal pay on a par with private industry through annual adjustments that would take effect automatically.

THE COMPARABILITY determination starts with a Bureau of Labor Statistics survey each spring of salary levels in key private industry jobs. Unions representing federal workers then have an opportunity to make recommendations or challenge procedures, and the President's "pay agent" then informs the President of the adjustments needed to achieve comparability.

The term "pay agent" actually refers to a three-person panel consisting of the director of the Office of Personnel Management, the director of the Office of Management & Budget and the Secretary of Labor.

If the President approves their recommendation, it takes effect automatically in October. But the President may propose an alternative adjustment not later than Sept. 1, which will take effect unless either the House or Senate passes a resolution of disapproval before the October effective date.

REAGAN'S statement noted that the law allows him to propose a lesser amount, and declared:

"Under that authority, in accordance with our economy recovery program, I am submitting to the Congress an alternative plan for a 4 percent increase in federal white-collar pay this October in lieu of the 18.47 percent increase indicated under current comparability calculation methods."

Ironically, Reagan's original budget proposal had contemplated a 5 percent comparabilty raise. But the 4 percent figure was used in the budget resolution enacted by Congress, and the President's alternative plan accepted the congressional ceiling. The budget action by Congress would appear to rule out the possibility of House or Senate action to disapprove the 4 percent alternative and thus mandate a raise of nearly 18.5 percent.

THE AFGE noted that in terms of take-home pay, the increase will slip below 3 percent in January when federal employees will have 1.3 percent of their pay deducted for the Medicare tax in addition to the 7 percent deducted for their civil service pensions.

By law, military salaries are linked automatically to the comparability adjustments for federal civilian employees. But Congress has not always followed that formula. Last year, it voted separate military pay increases substantially higher than the 4.8 percent civilian level. Reagan's statement on the 4 percent alternative noted that "Congress is currently considering legislation dealing with military pay increases" which, if enacted, "will supersede the increase that military personnel would otherwise receive under this alternative plan."

The federal government's 600,000 hourly-paid blue-collar workers are supposed to have their wages adjusted each year on the basis of local area surveys of private industry jobs. Effective dates of these adjustments vary with the timing of the surveys.

IN PRACTICE, Congress in recent years has used legislative riders to appropriations bills or budget reconciliation measures to impose the same percentage ceiling on hourly-paid workers that has been set for salaried employees.

Postal pay is set through collective bargaining with the U.S. Postal Service, and is not tied to federal salary adjustments.

NAACP Slates Open House At New Headquarters

New York—The NAACP has moved its national headquarters to 186 Remsen St., Brooklyn Heights, N.Y. 11201, effective Sept. 1. The new telephone number is (212) 858-0800. The organization will hold open house at the new headquarters from 3 to 5 p.m., Sept. 11 and 12, and 4:30 to 8 p.m., Sept. 13.

Veto of Emergency Funds Threatens Social Programs

backtrack to block the two-thirds vote needed to override the veto.

The "unwarranted spending" of which Reagan complained in his veto message allows low-income persons 55 or older to work up to 20 hours a week at modest salaries in day care centers, hospitals, senior centers and in programs that provide home health care and chore service to aged and handicapped persons.

It is funded under Title V of the Older Americans Act, which Congress reauthorized earlier this year, and National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman terms it one of the Labor Dept.'s "most efficient and effective programs," lauded by mayors and county officials.

THE VETO "makes no sense" and should be overridden, Clayman urged.

Other funding objected to by the President includes an attempt by Congress to restore $148 million cut last year from compensatory education programs for disadvantaged children and $217 million in federal grants to help children from low-income families attend college. The bill also includes added funds for postal services and urban mass transit grants.

The President's sharply worded veto message was read as a political reconciliation gesture to the Republican right wing, which had attacked the President as a backslider for his embrace of higher taxes.

HOUSE MAJORITY Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.), who had helped line up Democratic votes in support of the revenue measure, said the President's veto "revives the spirit of confrontation."

He warned that Congress wouldn't necessarily re-enact some of the Administration-sought funding in the bill, such as the $350 million for economic aid to the Caribbean Basin nations, if it were forced to drop "needed help to the old, the poor and the handicapped in our own country."

These were among the considerations that reportedly led Sec. of State George P. Shultz and Defense Sec. Caspar W. Weinberger to strongly urge the President to sign the bill.

Wright said congressional Republicans who had urged Reagan not to veto the bill included Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (Tenn.), Senate Budget Committee Chairman Pete V. Domenici (N.M.) and Rep. Silvio O. Conte (Mass.), the ranking Republican on the House Appropriations Committee.

Only one Reagan veto has been overridden by this Congress. That was a labor-supported measure to continue the domestic printing requirement of the Copyright Act and avoid a massive wipeout of printing-related jobs. But until now, the President has had his way on all spending bills.

To Protect Bargaining Gains

Letter Carriers Mount Grass-Roots Campaign

San Francisco — Union letter carriers don't intend to allow gains made at the bargaining table to be chipped away by a hostile Administration or an uncaring Congress.

That's the message delivered by more than 4,000 delegates to the 53rd convention of the National Association of Letter Carriers. It was reflected in convention action, in applause for speakers who stressed the importance of the Nov. 2 elections, and in contributions and pledges to the union's political fund.

NALC PRESIDENT Vincent R. Sombrotto called on the union's quarter-million members to form "a grass-roots legislative army" to protect jobs and benefits.

The "no-layoff" guarantee in the union's contract doesn't make postal employees immune from an Administration that considers government a burden rather than a service to the public, he stressed.

Sombrotto and other top officers of the NALC were re-elected by acclamation. Only one of 10 headquarters offices and five of the 15 regional positions of national business agent were contested and will be voted on in a mail ballot this fall. It was the first time the NALC presidency has been uncontested since direct mail voting was established in 1976.

THE NEW TERMS will be for four years instead of two years. Delegates voted approval of the longer terms after proponents stressed in debate a potential savings of $500,000—the approximate cost of each election requiring a mail ballot. Conventions will continue to be held biennially.

Delegates also approved an increase in per capita payments for active members amounting to 50 cents a month—from $66 to $72 a year.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr. and Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) were among the speakers who brought the delegates to their feet with sharp attacks on the Reagan Administration's devastation of the national economy.

"THERE IS not a working family in America that has not been injured by the economic disasters that surround us because of the policies of the Reagan Administration, aided and abetted by the 97th Congress," Donahue charged.

Not since 1934 have so many Americans been jobless, he said. But there was hope then because Franklin D. Roosevelt was in the White House. The New Deal Administration, he said, considered that the federal government should strive to "relieve suffering and create jobs," not merely "issue cheerful forecasts and preside over the ruin and impoverishment of the American people."

The delegates, from all 50 states, combined trade union militancy with the flavor of mainstream America.

LETTER CARRIER bands from several cities played during convention intermissions, speakers were greeted with the rousing "Hip, Hip, Hooray" cheer that has become a trademark of NALC conventions. The hat was generously passed for the Muscular Dystrophy Association—the NALC's traditional charity—as well as for the union's growing political education fund. And the convention closed with the singing of Solidarity Forever.

Resolutions were vigorously debated from the floor and committee recommendations were often challenged, sometimes successfully. Among the actions taken despite adverse recommendations was adoption of a constitutional amendment barring conventions and national meetings in states with "right-to-work" laws that forbid the union shop. The convention bar is effective in 1986 and the national meeting bar in 1983.

IN ADDITION to Sombrotto, Executive Vice President Tony R. Huerta, Vice President Francis J. Conners, Sec.-Treas. Richard P. O'Connell and all but one of the other resident officers were unopposed. Health Plan Director Robert J. Buntz, whose home local is in Des Moines, Ia., is being challenged by Timothy J. Arntz of Aurora, Colo. Regional contests are scheduled in the San Francisco, Denver, St. Louis, Dallas and Boston districts.

The union had previously chosen Las Vegas, Nev., as the site for its 1984 convention and St. Paul, Minn., won the convention vote for the 1986 convention.

Auto Workers Chosen By GM Unit in Georgia

Fitzgerald, Ga. — Some 300 production and maintenance workers at the General Motors Delco-Remy plant here are now represented by the Auto Workers.

UAW Vice President Owen Bieber, who heads the union's GM department, said recognition came after an independent arbitrator certified that a majority of Fitzgerald employees had signed cards authorizing the UAW to represent them in collective bargaining.

"Over 99 percent of GM production and maintenance workers in the United States now are unionized," Bieber observed.

POLISH WORKERS have taught the world a lesson, reminding people and governments everywhere of the unbreakable connection between trade union rights and human rights generally, Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner told a rally commemorating the second anniversary of the founding of the Polish free trade union, Solidarity. The rally was held in Washington.

Deepening Recession Belies Rosy Forecasts of Recovery

Despite another rise in the government's leading economic indicators and recent surges in the stock market, Americans should not be fooled into thinking that the Reagan Recession is over, the AFL-CIO warned.

"Speculation may make Wall Street soar, but not one single job has been created by those transactions," Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

"And the reduction in interest rates comes in spite of the policies of the Reagan Administration and the Federal Reserve Board, rather than because of them, and comes rather from the inevitable decline in lending which results from the depth of the recession and the lack of demand for loans," Donahue observed.

RECOVERY involves more than a slight downturn in interest rates, he said: It means correcting all the damage done to the economy since the present Administration assumed office, he said. Donahue pledged the AFL-CIO would continue to push for enactment of its alternative economic program to repair the damage of Reaganomics, "and get us back on the road to full employment."

With unemployment at its highest level in 40 years, the July increase of 1.3 percent in the composite index of leading economic indicators left a hollow ring. While Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige, whose office announced the increase, saw the pickup as "encouraging evidence that economic recovery is about to get under way," there were other signs that seemed to belie this optimism:

- Sales of new single-family houses fell 4.9 percent in July to the third-lowest level on record while the median price of new houses rose to a record $73,600, the Commerce Dept. reported. Through July, just 226,000 new houses had been sold this year, down 22 percent from the same seven months last year.
- Dun & Bradstreet reported that 696 companies failed in the week ended Aug. 26, more than two and a half times as many as the same week a year earlier and higher than any week since the early 1930s. The credit rating and business information service said the previous record for business failures was in the Depression year of 1932 when an average of 612 businesess failed each week.
- Manufacturers of metal products reported July orders for machine tools slid 14 percent, continuing a general trend downward. The value of the orders was down 44 percent from a year earlier, the National Machine Tool Builders Association said.
- A survey of business economists showed a downward revision in expectations about any solid economic recovery. Only 9 percent of those who answered the National Association of Business Economists opinion sampling said employment was rising in their areas, a drop from the 19 percent who saw more hiring three months ago.

Poland's Solidarity Hailed on 2nd Anniversary

"In so doing, they have assaulted freedom itself," he said. "If the candle of freedom is extinguished in Gdansk, the light of freedom will be dimmer throughout the world."

EVEN AS the rally was being held, in Warsaw and in the big provincial cities of Poland truckloads of police and antiriot troops used tear gas, water cannon, and truncheons to break up crowds of demonstrators chanting, "Freedom," "Lift martial law," "We want Walesa," "Solidarity," and "Gestapo, Gestapo." An overnight curfew was imposed in southwestern Poland after riot police fired on demonstrators in Lubin, killing two people and injuring 12 others.

The demonstrations showed "once again that repression will not solve Poland's problems and that reconciliation among the authorities, the church and Solidarity is urgently needed," U.S. State Dept. spokesman John Hughes told reporters.

AT THE AFL-CIO rally, which was sponsored by the federation's Metropolitan Washington Council, Jerzy Warman, a former student activist in Warsaw and now a representative of the Committee in Support of Solidarity in New York, saw the Polish free labor movement gaining a tactical initiative from the demonstrations.

By gathering and marching peacefully through the streets of Polish cities, Warman said, Solidarity supporters engaged in "yet another determined effort to teach the regime the simple, yet oldest and most fundamental, lesson of Polish politics: the nation cannot, and must not, be ruled against the people, without their participation.

"Solidarity may have lost a battle, but the war, which it will ultimately win, has only just started," he declared.

LOOKING BACK on the formation of Solidarity two years ago, Warman spoke of how the birth of the union was "like a ray of sunshine piercing the dark shroud of totalitarianism" that had been wrapped around Poland since the Soviet takeover after World War II.

"Communism fits Poland like a beggar's clothes, and indeed this has been the result of the communist rule—they beggared the country," he said.

In an opening prayer, Rev. John O'Conner of the Catholic Archdiocese of Washington called on the audience to reflect on the meaning of Solidarity's second anniversary for them.

"Poland's problem is to a certain extent our problem," he said. "It is the world's problem, and to solve it Poland needs help from us."

MURRAY SEEGER, the final speaker, was in Poland two years ago, covering the signing of the Gdansk agreement as a correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. Now the director of information for the AFL-CIO, Seeger recalled the impact of the occasion, "one of the greatest human events" of the postwar era.

Since Solidarity burst on the world stage, he said, the Polish United Workers' (Communist) Party has lost 600,000 members. "The party has been usurped for the first time in Eastern Europe," he observed. "The military has taken over."

Seeger drew attention to an AFL-CIO statement in the New York Times a day earlier commemorating Solidarity's founding, and comparing the struggle to form free trade unions in communist Poland with a similar struggle by black workers to build free and independent unions in South Africa.

"IN POLAND, South Africa, and everywhere else workers struggle for trade union rights, freedom of association is at stake," the statement said. "Democracy itself is at stake. That's worth remembering this Labor Day."

Seeger also announced that petitions calling on the Polish government to end martial law, release all Solidarity detainees, and resume good-faith talks with the union based on the principles of the Gdansk agreement had been signed by an additional 100,000 Americans, and were to be turned over to the Polish embassy.

In addition to the signatures, he said, the AFL-CIO collected over $250,000 in material aid, such as printing and office materials, which was sent to Solidarity before last December's crackdown. The federation is continuing to raise money but holding it "until we can be sure how it will be used," he said.

FOLLOWING the rally, a 24-foot-long sign was erected atop the portico of the AFL-CIO headquarters building to draw attention to the federation's main foreign and domestic goals: restoration of Solidarity in Poland and a reduction in U.S. unemployment.

"AFL-CIO remembers," the sign reads. "This is 262 days for Solidarnosc (Solidarity) prisoners. U.S. employment over 10.8 million—9.8 percent." The sign will be updated as time and events warrant.

Other gatherings to mark the Solidarity anniversary were held in New York, Chicago, and Buffalo.

Kirkland on Labor Day

America's Workers Not Expendable

By Lane Kirkland

THIS IS THE 88th observance of Labor Day since the Congress made it an official holiday, 12 years after the fact. It is the 100th anniversary of Labor Day as proclaimed and celebrated by the labor movement itself.

On Monday, Sept. 5, 1882, New York trade unionists stopped traffic on Broadway, raised their banners and stepped off in a march that will never end as long as workers continue to assert and validate their own existence and to pursue their own goals through their own democratic institutions, with or without the blessing of office-holders.

On this one day of the year, by long custom, our national leaders feel obliged to issue formal statements attesting to the dignity of work and the value of those who do it.

So President Reagan, on Labor Day 1982, tells us that "this occasion brings deserved attention to those who have toiled to build our nation and to shape a prosperous life out of dreams of early immigrants."

"Today," says the President, "we recognize the honor and the value of all work and the great satisfaction that flows from a job well done."

WORKERS deserve at least some attention from their President on the other 364 days of the year, but they do not get it. By his actions and policies, President Reagan has treated workers as wholly expendable.

There is, God knows, little to celebrate on Labor Day 1982. The number of workers who can say that they are better off today than on Labor Day last year or the year before is close to zero.

Because of the cold-blooded decision to instigate mass unemployment as a weapon against inflation, 10.8 million Americans are without a means of livelihood, according to the government's means of tabulation.

The statistics are easy to recite, but the human facts behind them are almost impossible to grasp. Imagine an unemployment line more than 4,000 miles long, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific and doubling back again almost to the Mississippi.

Or think of the unemployed workers as residents of a single community—call it South Succotash. That, you will recall, is where the President told us that "some fellow has been laid off from his job," but that it is not news. That population of nearly 11 million is bigger than New York and Los Angeles rolled together. It is bigger than the total population of Ohio or Pennsylvania.

THERE IS nothing these jobless men and women can't do. They can divert rivers and rearrange mountains. They can turn trees into lumber or paper. They can mine ore, smelt it and fabricate it into anything you like. They can build houses, hospitals, factories and skyscrapers. They can make, maintain and operate cars, trucks, railroads and ships. They can spin, weave and sew; grow, preserve, prepare and serve food. They can keep books, run computers or build them; they can comfort the sick, teach the young, keep order and protect the public safety.

They make up a population of extraordinarily diversified skills because they are, in fact, a cross section of the American people. In education they range from the lowers grades to the highest academic degrees. In experience they range from youngsters looking for their first foothold in the world of work to master craftsmen who have been perfecting their skills over richly productive lifetimes.

LIKE ALL of God's creatures, they want to grow to their full potential, to send their roots as deep and spread their branches as wide as nature permits. They want to prepare the way for their children to surpass their parents' limits.

There never was, anywhere on earth, any resource to be compared with this great living reservoir of talent, capability and aspiration. And it is highly perishable. It can't be put in cold storage or warehoused like its products and artifacts. Either it grows and develops, or it withers.

Unemployment is the disease that withers the human potential. With every day that passes, more and more of its victims are becoming less employable. Since the first colonies were planted, work has been the central fact of life in the United States. All our lives revolve around it. The first question a child is asked when he starts schools is, "What does your father do?" The second is, "What do you want to be when you grow up?"

Throughout life, "What do you do for a living?" will be the first question of nearly everyone he meets, and the answer will govern his credit rating, his place in the community and the future of his children, as well as the length and prominence of his obituary.

FOR BETTER or worse, in our own eyes and in the eyes of others, we are what we do. The work we do, how well we do it and how it is rewarded, is the basis of the sense of personal worth that engenders both self respect and respect for others—the bedrock of social stability and order.

To lose one's livelihood instantly breaks some of the links that bind us to others. It calls into question our personal identity and puts severe strains on all of our family and economic and social relationships. And sooner or later, if it continues long enough, it undermines our mental and physical health, and spreads its infection to the society of which we are a part.

Because of its disruptive and disintegrative effects, unemployment is the most dangerous force, short of famine, pestilence, war and death, that can be let loose in the world. A rational society, in sheer self defense, should strive to overcome it with all the resources it can find or invent.

THE ULTIMATE goal of the American labor movement is, and always has been, to help bring about the healthiest, best-educated, most creative and most productive society that it is possible for human beings to achieve.

The place to start, in our view, is to give every human being access to the world of work. That means providing a job worth doing for every man and woman who is able and willing to work. It means making a start toward carrying out the goals of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act, which has been the declared policy of the United States since it was adopted by Congress in 1978.

In the last year of the Carter Administration, a National Accord was reached between the AFL-CIO, leaders of business, and the Administration that would have made a strong start toward full employment. It laid the groundwork for a massive reindustrialization program through which government, labor and industry could work together as partners to restore the country's eroded industrial capacity, starting with the industries and regions where unemployment is highest.

It would have established rational priorities for allocating money and credit to the most constructive uses. It would have brought new and better housing within reach of those who need it. It would have reversed the steady deterioration of highways, bridges and public facilities of all kinds that are now falling to bits because of neglect.

AND IT WOULD have brought hope and self-sufficiency and stability to millions of families by making breadwinners once again able not only to put bread on the table, but to make solid contributions to the federal treasury and promote the public welfare.

That National Accord and the strong economy and healthy society it aimed at have played no part in national policy since the Reagan Administration took office.

But all around us we see growing evidence that the National Accord, or some version of its direct approach and its human values, must ultimately prevail.

Reaganomics is a blind cave. There is no light at the end of the tunnel of recession, unemployment and national decline and deterioration into which Reaganism has led us.

IT IS our hope that before next Labor Day the people of the United States will see the truth and that they will turn their backs once and for all on the premise that the right to increase wealth carries with it the right to diminish human life.

And we will nourish that hope with the hardest work we can deliver.
those men and women who will restore America to the greatness which this country deserves.

Donahue on Labor Day

Election Holds Key to Economic Turn-Around

By Thomas R. Donahue

WE CELEBRATE Labor Day 1982 in difficult and uncertain times.

The American economy—which was built by the hands, the minds, the dedication and the determination of the working men and women of this country—is in a tailspin, and the outlook for the future is grim.

Two years ago, in the midst of the presidential campaign, candidate Ronald Reagan asked the American people to search their minds and their pocketbooks, and to come up with the answer to a fundamental question:

"Are you better off now than you were four years ago?"

The Republicans have been in control of the White House and the Senate for nearly two years now. They have set America on a dangerous new course. They have reversed many of the gains we achieved through bitter struggle over the previous 50 years—and further reversals of direction are likely.

So it's fair to ask the question again:

"ARE WE BETTER OFF now than we were before the Reagan Administration came into power?"

Are we better off with unemployment inching inexorably up to the 10-percent mark—to the highest level since the Great Depression of the '30s?

Are we better off with 10.8 million Americans officially listed as looking for jobs in an economy ravaged by layoffs and plant closings, and with millions more not counted among the unemployed because they have become so discouraged by the sorry state of the economy that they've given up hope and given up looking for work?

Are we better off when millions of long-term jobless exhaust their unemployment compensation benefits without finding work—and when the Administration only reluctantly agrees to a brief extension of those benefits, and then only as a trade-off for its tax increases?

ARE WE better off with high interest rates which prevent those who do have jobs from buying homes or automobiles, furniture or major appliances—and when their lack of purchasing power, in turn, erodes job opportunities for workers in those industries?

Are we better off with a tight-money policy which discouraged the building of new plants, the buying of new equipment, the modernization of America's productive capacity, so that we find ourselves less and less able to compete with products built in modern facilities abroad?

Are we better off with cuts in social security, cuts in Medicare, cuts in Medicaid, cuts in food stamps, cuts in aid to the weakest, the neediest, the least privileged in our society?

ARE WE BETTER OFF? Of course not.

The Reagan Administration's empty slogans and hollow promises of better days ahead sound suspiciously like those of the Hoover Administration half a century ago, when the American people repeatedly were assured that "prosperity is just around the corner," while the American economic house was collapsing.

The disastrous, job-destroying budget, tax and high-interest rate policies of the Republican Reagan Administration are pushing vast amounts of American workers and their families lower, rung by rung, down the economic ladder. The damage caused by unemployment is magnified for all groups in our society by the deep budget cuts in social programs at the exact moment that the recession makes them so needed.

The Reagan policies are creating a generation of grievously injured families, without funds for schooling, health care or adequate food or housing; without respected family role models of breadwinners with the pride of a steady, well-paying job; and without hope for the further advancement of their children.

These are the grim facts which face America, and on this Labor Day we, in the trade union movement, must ask ourselves:

"What are we going to do about all this? How can we get America moving again?"

THE ANSWER lies in our ability and our willingness to mobilize our strength and our resources in order to make our voice heard, loud and clear.

In 1981, the trade union movement and its stalwart friends—nearly a half-million Americans—staged a massive Solidarity Day demonstration on the Mall in Washington, D.C. The purpose of Solidarity Day 1981 was to make clear to the President, to the Congress and to the rest of America that we were united in our efforts to support constructive alternatives so that we could breathe life again into our faltering economy.

Solidarity Day 1982 will be held on Nov. 2. Instead of gathering again in Washington, we are urging our members to gather at their polling places across the country—to let their votes speak for them on the issue of the direction in which America should be moving, and on the best way to get from where we are now to where we want our country to go.

We have to unite behind the candidates for office who support our goals of an America in which people are fully employed, at jobs which are productive and for wages which are fair and equitable.

We have to unite behind the candidates for office who support our goals of an America which keeps faith with women, blacks, Hispanics, native Americans—everyone.

WE HAVE TO unite behind the candidates for office who support our goals of an American industrial society which can compete with goods produced by the sweat of exploited workers abroad, and then subsidized by their governments so that they enter our market at prices which undercut goods produced by American workers.

And we have to unite in opposition to candidates whose allegiance lies, not with working people and their families, but whose loyalties run, instead, to the wealthy, to giant corporations, to the privileged class.

We have to give America back to the working people who made it what it has been in the past, and what it can become again in the future.

No Worker Stands Alone

WITH BANDS AND BANNERS, Labor Day marchers in New York will be carrying on a 100-year tradition.

Police will stop traffic to let the parade pass, not beat back marchers with water cannons and concussion grenades as in Gdansk, where Polish workers sought to march in peace on the second anniversary of Solidarnosc.

But lest we forget, America's workers have also faced clubs and tear gas—and live bullets, too—both before and after that first Labor Day parade in 1882.

The railroad strikes in 1877, sparked by a wage cut, led to pitched battles between armed troops and workers in Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Chicago and scores of cities across the land.

In 1892, 10 years after the first Labor Day parade, at Andrew Carnegie's steel works at Homestead, Pa., Pinkerton detectives fired on strikers and the state militia was called in to break the union.

The National Guard attack on a tent colony of striking miners in Ludlow, Colo., in 1914 left 11 children and two women dead.

There are union members today who don't need a history book to recall the Memorial Day shooting of Republic Steel strikers and the threats and beatings faced by a generation of union organizers.

In the United States, as in Poland, workers have faced guns and clubs when they asserted the right to form free unions.

THERE IS an obvious difference, of course.

Through free elections, the basic right to organize has been achieved by law. The sheriff or governor who tries to put the might of government on the side of employers in labor disputes must at least answer to the voters and the courts.

But our days of struggle are recent enough so that the battle for survival by Solidarnosc is clearly identifiable as our battle, as the battle of free workers everywhere.

Just a year ago this month, at the Solidarity Day rally that stretched as far as the eye could see from the Washington Monument grounds to the steps of the Capitol, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called out to the vast gathering: "Look around you. You are not alone."

On the second anniversary of Solidarnosc, the shipyard workers in Gdansk who had launched the first free trade union movement in a communist country converged at the monument that had been erected to commemorate workers killed in a 1970 demonstration for democratic rights.

A New York Times account quotes a young woman who defied the authorities to join the shipyard workers in their show of support for their suppressed union.

She told the Times reporter that she came because she wanted to show the shipyard workers that "you are not alone."

Let that be part of the Labor Day message of America's trade union movement as well.

To our brothers and sisters in Poland, and wherever else workers cannot march in peace this Labor Day, you are not alone.

That's what Solidarity is all about.

NFL Team Owners Reminded Football Players Are the Game

By Press Associates, Inc.

WE ARE THE GAME. That's the rallying cry of the National Football League Players Association in its struggle to win a decent contract and establish a strong union.

If that slogan accurately reflects a sense of unity among the players and a recognition of their self-worth, it could mark an important turning point for the young organization.

It recalls the "I Am A Man" placards carried by the sanitation workers of Memphis, who finally won their fight when Martin Luther King, Jr., gave his life in their cause.

The millionaire owners of the football teams, in their arrogance and obstinacy, bring to mind the Carnegies and Fricks and Fords and Boulwares and J. P. Stevens of other union struggles. In this day, it seems strange to have to quote the Supreme Court decision of 1937 upholding the Wagner Act.

Chief Justice Hughes wrote for the majority: "Employees have as clear a right to organize and select their representatives for lawful purposes as the respondent has to organize its business and select its own officers and agents. . . . Long ago we stated the reason for labor organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer. . . ."

IN FOOTBALL, the individual is helpless. About 97 percent of the players have individual contracts, but they are worthless if a player "flunks" a physical or is cut from the squad.

The union's primary goal in the current talks is to enable most pro football players to catch up with those in other major sports. About two-thirds of the 1,500 pro football players make in the $40,000-to-$70,000 range, according to the union. Management claims the average is $90,000. In baseball, the average salary last year was $192,000 and in basketball, the average was $215,000.

The owners are hardly pleading poverty. The new $2-billion television contract means that each of the 28 teams will receive $14 million in 1982 from TV revenue alone, an increase of $8 million per team. It is estimated the NFL will gross $640 million in 1982, or about $23 million per team.

When the time is right, the owners are expected to shift to pay TV. Now rolling in millions, they will be rolling in billions.

That's why the NFLPA is seeking a percentage of the gross now, aiming at 55 percent. When there were two leagues in the 1960s, the bidding for players meant salaries took 67 percent of gross revenues. After the merger, the union said, collusion between the owners held down salary levels and player starting salaries now amount to 32 percent of the gross. In baseball, they account for over 50 percent and in basketball about 66 percent.

BUT WHILE money gets the publicity, safety is the most important common concern of the players and the union. The nature of the game and playing on the hard surfaces that underlie artificial turf have shortened careers to an average of 4.2 years.

"One injury and it's all over," says NLFPA Executive Director Ed Garvey, citing several permanently disabled players and many with stiff knees and plastic knees and hips.

The union believes its demand for a percentage of the gross will enable it to establish a more equitable salary structure, protect both veterans and rookies, and lengthen careers. It wants access to medical records, an equal voice in the rules to reduce injuries, and it wants artificial surfaces replaced by natural turf.

THE PLAYERS' UNION in recent years has been solidifying its ties within the labor movement. All 28 team "locals" are affiliated with AFL-CIO state federations and local central bodies. The players always have been active in working with youth and in charity campaigns. Now they are taking part in the AFL-CIO organizing drive in Houston and in individual union campaigns.

In a time of high unemployment, the players are especially sensitive. "We don't expect an unemployed auto worker to have sympathy for our level of income, but to understand the common struggle," said Upshaw. "The figures are different, but the career length is different too."

There have been many, many workers from the mines, the mills and the assembly lines who were worn out at 50 or 55 and dumped on the human slagheap by employers. They probably would understand.

MEMO FROM COPE

RTW Legal Front . . . . The Worker's Buddy

With 'Friends' Like This, Who Needs Enemies?

Do you know what the National Right to Work Legal Foundation is? It's a spin-off of the National Right to Work (for less) Committee (NRTWC), which has been pushing for state compulsory open shop laws for nearly 30 years.

NRTWC created its legal arm in 1968 to go hunt around the country for disgruntled union members willing to enter court suits against their union. The legal foundation then produces lawyers, and it finances and masterminds the court fight. Now and then, it wins one. But even when it loses, it gets a lot of mileage out of the harassment of target unions.

It claims it's only trying to safeguard the "freedom of workers against the abuses of union power."

So that's what it is, and what it says it is.

The interesting question, though, is not so much what it is, but who it is. Who are the people so worried about the "abuses of union power" that they collect and spend millions of dollars on court cases to protect workers' "freedom" this way? Who could be such good friends of working people?

Well, only one of their 14-member board of trustees is himself a worker. The rest are corporate leaders, lawyers, writers, professional anti-unionists—most of them with long and close connections to the right wing. The trustees follow:

► Reed Larson—President not only of the legal defense foundation, but of the national RTW committee, as well. Has been with NRTWC since 1959. The legal arm is believed to be his brain-child. Larson made a splash for anti-union forces in Kansas in 1958, when he led successful referendum drive for work-for-less law in a year when voters in five other states forcefully slammed the door on it at the polls.

Larson is a member of the Council for National Policy, a super-group bringing together leaders of the so-called "new right" and the "religious right" for joint planning on goals and strategy.

Larson is treated like a hero in "new right" publications, gets a lot of space in monthly Conservative Digest, put out by "new right" top banana and direct-mail specialist Richard Viguerie. All this notwithstanding the fact that the RTW movement under Larson has gained just one state in the more than 20 years he's been its leader, despite the millions of dollars of contributors' money he's spent.

► Whiteford S. Blakeney—North Carolina attorney who represented, without fee, rail workers who sued their union. Has been board member of RTW committee as well as legal foundation.

► John A. Davenport—Retired editor of Fortune magazine, active in a number of right wing organizations. Charter member of Mont Pelerin Society, an old-line right wing "think" group. Former director of American Conservative Union, which has led the fight to dismantle OSHA. Member of Free Society Association, organized after 1964 presidential election to continue to promote ideology of Sen. Barry Goldwater.

► Shelby Cullom Davis—Investment banker; trustee of Heritage Foundation, right wing think-tank, founded and funded by union-busting beer tycoon Joe Coors. Active in NRTWC as well as its legal foundation.

► Mrs. W. St. John Garwood—Writer; big contributor to National Conservative Political Action Committee, one of "new right's" most active, most effective PACs. Also helps fund Conservative Victory Fund (fostered by American Conservative Union), and Young America's Campaign Committee (YAF's PAC).

► Robert M. Gaylord Jr.—Principal officer of Ingersoll Milling, Rockford, Ill., and of Ingersoll Foundation which helps fund numbers of right wing groups, as does his personal money. Former president National Association of Manufacturers, which three years back launched the Council for a Union Free Environment offering professional union-busting guidance to corporations.

► Thomas J. Harris—Chairman of RTW legal foundation's board of trustees. Spearheaded unsuccessful Oklahoma for-less referendum drive in 1964.

► J. P. Humphreys—Former executive, National Cash Register Co. Trustee, Foundation for Economic Education, a right wing group on the scene for years distributing ultra-conservative studies on economic matters.

► William K. Lomason—Auto executive; vice president, Michigan Citizens for Right to Work.

► Raymond C. Losornio—Only worker in the crowd; past president, still member of Tulsa, Okla. Local 386, unaffiliated National Federation of Federal Employes. Present chairman, National RTW for-less group; past president, Oklahomans for RTW.

► Menlo F. Smith—Corporate board chairman; board member of National Legal Center for the Public Interest, an ultra-conservative group which patterns itself after liberal public interest law groups, but opposes them and their objectives. Generous contributor to right wing organizations.

► Louis E. Weiss—Corporate president. Official of NRTWC and Americans Against Union Control of Government, "new right" group whose specific aim is to weaken public employee unionism. Director of Center on National Labor Policy, organized to prevent "the abuse of labor union power," which includes pretty much same cast of characters as NRTWC, the legal foundation and other rightist groups that make careers of attacking unions.

Odds 'n Ends

REQUIEM FOR ADMINISTRATION is said by "new right" leaders, continuing angry at Reagan Administration for what they think is its tepid pursuit of their agenda. "New Right Report," a Richard Viguerie publication, says: "A recent high-level strategy meeting of 30 conservative leaders (concluded) that the Reagan Administration no longer exists." It goes on to blame "senior Reagan advisors," says it's necessary for rightist groups to push their agenda "independent of the administration."

'GETTING TO KNOW YOU' not a bad song for members of the U.S. House to start singing to their constituents. Recent Gallup Poll shows only 46 percent of voters can name their representative in Congress. Apparently, recognition and interest grow with age. Only 29 percent of the 18-29 age group could name their representative; 52 percent of the 30-49 age group, 55 percent of those 50 and older.

FROM ANONYMOUS observer: "Reaganomics is giving voodoo a bad name."

TALK ABOUT FOUL-UPS, here's what happened to GOP Rep. Phil Ruppe who's challenging Sen. Don Riegle (D) in Michigan. Ruppe campaign sent information packet to about 2,000 PACs. Here's a sequence as it showed up in a printed question-and-answer sheet: Question: Who is best suited to handle the future energy problems the U.S. faces? Answer: Don Riegle, of course. Question: Who are the big pro-government groups supporting in the Senate election? Answer: Phil Ruppe, of course.

SO-CALLED 'FAMILY' agenda of new right and religious right political action groups takes some strange turns. Several religious right groups put out voting records that describe the notion of adjusting income tax brackets to inflation as a "key moral/family issue." They explain it's a "family" issue because it can offset "the ruinous and immoral effects of inflation."

RECORD NUMBER of initiatives in the states, with more than 50 expected to get place on November ballot out of the 190-plus for which signatures are being sought. That's a mess of them, since only 23 states allow the process. They range from efforts to try to increase alcohol content of dessert wine to protection of the moose to abolition of daylight savings time. Many promote new tax limitations, nuclear power curtailment, tightening of welfare laws.

BIG BUCKS FOR BIG OIL show up in PAC reports. The 183 political committees formed by the oil and gas industries had already kicked in $3,074,882 to favored candidates as of May 31 of this year. They had an additional $1,245,076 on hand and have doubtless collected a bundle more. They've already put $77,615 into the re-election campaign of Sen. Orrin Hatch (Utah), chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, and $66,750 has gone to Rep. Phil Gramm (Texas), a leader of the so-called "Boll Weevils" in the House, a group of Reagan-supporting Democrats.

No Votes Count!

COPE Memo tries to keep tabs on close elections to demonstrate how much one vote can mean.

Well here's a switch. Here's an election where no votes counted.

Because nobody voted!

Recently, Dayton, Ohio Precinct 1-D held an election to determine whether to allow Sunday carry-out liquor sales in the University of Dayton area.

Result: 0-0. No votes. Zip. Naught. Nothing.

On the Other Hand . . .

Elsewhere in Ohio . . . voters in the school district of Lake Township might have another go-around this November on a school levy that passed a year ago. Because the vote was so close the first time, some citizens petitioned for another try.

How close the first time? Two votes—1152-1150. One vote counts!

Whatever Happened to . . .?

Whatever happened to President Reagan's prophecy in presenting his original budget on Feb. 18, 1981, a month after taking office?

He specifically predicted rapid economic growth and a swift and huge decline in the federal budget deficit. He told the country that:

- In fiscal 1982, the budget deficit would be $45 billion.
- In fiscal 1983, the budget deficit would be $22.8 billion.
- In fiscal 1984, the budget would be balanced.
- In fiscal 1985, Reaganomics would create a budget surplus of $5.89 billion.

To answer the question "whatever happened to . . ." here's President Reagan Aug. 12, 1982: "We warned you in the beginning that there would be no instant miracles."

Unemployment Sticks at 9.8%

100TH ANNIVERSARY Labor Day parade along New York City's Fifth Avenue drew more than 400,000 participants, double last year's attendance. Local union delegations waving banners, flags and signs were accompanied by bands, floats, and the city's famed Radio City Music Hall Rockettes in a seven-hour parade led by Grand Marshal Michael Mann, the AFL-CIO's regional director, and New York City AFL-CIO President Harry Van Arsdale.

Kirkland Calls Jobless Level 'No 1 Scandal'

By James M. Shevis

Unemployment "continues to be the number one scandal" in America, the AFL-CIO declared as the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported the nation's jobless rate held steady at 9.8 percent in August, matching the highest rate of the past 40 years.

"The White House has abandoned working people," Federation President Lane Kirkland told a news conference following release of the employment figures. "Congress must quickly enact a recovery program that will put Americans back to work."

THE NUMBER of officially unemployed workers, 10.8 million, is so large that the total of jobless men, women, and young people would stretch 4,000 miles, long enough to reach from coast to coast and part way back again, Kirkland said. But the BLS figures do not tell the true extent of joblessness in America, he stressed.

Kirkland pointed out that the official jobless rate excludes "discouraged" workers—those who want to work but have given up looking because they do not think jobs exist for them—and people working part-time because they cannot find full-time jobs. The BLS reported there were about 1.5 million discouraged workers in the second quarter and another 5.6 million working part-time for economic reasons.

If all of the discouraged workers and half the number of those working part-time for economic reasons were added to the official jobless count, true unemployment in America today would come to 15.3 million, or a jobless rate of 13.6 percent, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research calculated.

"THE MESSAGE carried by these figures is that unemployment continues to be the number one scandal in this country," Kirkland said. "The message is that the suffering which the policies of the Reagan

Solidarity Spirit Marks Labor Day Celebrations

By Susan Dunlop

A strong current of solidarity and a determined mood to use political action to reverse the damage done by the Reagan Administration spurred hundreds of thousands of union members to turn out for one of the largest rounds of Labor Day activities in recent years.

Parades, rallies and outings combined traditional family festivities with opportunities to speak out on the jobs crisis and the faltering economy. In many cities, state and local central labor bodies reported the largest turnouts ever for their Labor Day observances.

THE REAGAN Administration and its supporters in state and congressional offices were denounced at rally after rally for bringing on the crippling recession and the highest jobless rate since World War II.

Attendance at New York's parade topped 400,000, nearly double the number that participated the year before. The march also marked the 100th anniversary of the first Labor Day parade, held in New York on Sept. 5, 1882.

The parade's grand marshal. AFL-CIO Region VII Director Michael Mann, and marchers in the seven-hour parade up Fifth Avenue "were in a real fighting mood" brought on by the Reagan Recession and unemployment as well as attacks on labor standards and critical social programs.

"WE HOPE the message was heard all the way to the White House in Washington," Mann said.

Hundreds of bands, colorful floats and marching contingents from some 250 area unions stepped off in the parade whose theme was "Jobs, Solidarity and March to the Polls Nov. 2."

Lt. Gov. Mario Cuomo, the COPE endorsed candidate in New York's Democratic gubernatorial primary, announced that the state had proclaimed the first week in September "Shop Stewards Week" in line with the AFL-CIO's call for recognition of stewards during that period.

House Rejects Reagan's Veto Of Funding Bill

The House voted 301-117 to override a presidential veto that would have killed funds for part-time jobs for the elderly and for school programs to help the most disadvantaged children.

Funds for these and other labor-supported programs that the Administration wants to cut back were included in an emergency appropriations bill President Reagan attacked as a "budget-buster."

THE HOUSE VOTE to override—22 more than the required two-thirds—shifted the battle to the Senate, where Republicans have an outright majority.

In the House, 220 Democrats were joined by 81 Republicans on the vote to override. Thirteen Democrats voted with 104 Republicans to support the veto.

The AFL-CIO had urged House members to override the veto, stressing that the total amount involved was less than the

LaRouche's Ambitious Designs on Labor

By Wesley McCune

Special to the AFL-CIO News

One of the early ambitions of Lyndon LaRouche in his checkered left/right career was to take over the AFL-CIO and the American labor movement, among other institutions, as a step toward seizing power in the United States.

Like most of his ambitions, such as being elected President of the United States, the aim was wildly boastful; but in failing to achieve his goals LaRouche has manipulated, deceived, infiltrated and caused endless mischief. Including within the labor movement.

Wesley McCune, the author of this series, is director of Group Research, Inc., which keeps watch on extremist groups of both the left and right.

The mischief apparently started in the late Sixties, when he split with some radical student activists and organized the National Caucus of Labor Committees and made himself some kind of self-ordained labor figure.

From a position far to the left of the recognized labor movement, LaRouche

Last of three articles

also operated several front groups with vague labor connotations in their names and then started the U.S. Labor Party. During both phases, which blended and overlapped, he has alternately courted and attacked various labor unions.

In the early Seventies, his organizations conducted a bitter propaganda campaign against national union leaders, frequently charging them with being part of LaRouche's imagined conspiracy of world figures, such as the late Nelson Rockefeller, with law-enforcement agencies to enslave the world.

ROAMING GROUPS have harassed many local unions, and the organization's newspaper, New Solidarity, has been sold at plant gates to stir up dissension. For example, USLP tried unsuccessfully some years ago to get a United Auto Workers group in Detroit to pass a resolution describing three international union presidents and Lane Kirkland as "labor traitors."

The UAW's Leonard Woodcock was a particular target of the agitators, although

Labor an Early Target for LaRouche

it was difficult, as usual, to tell just why he was being picked on.

Probably the best clinical example of how LaRouche's dedicated troops have tried to cause trade union dissension occurred in York, Pa., where all the tricks were used to discredit veteran labor leaders.

OPERATING with a handful of agents who set up headquarters in York, augmented by trouble-makers brought in occasionally from nearby cities, a concerted smear campaign was run against the district representative of the Machinists, who was also president of the Central Labor Council; the vice president of the council, and the international representative of the United Furniture Workers. All had deep roots in the community.

After being denied admission to a meeting on unemployment, the agents sued the union officials (charges were thrown out) and put out a leaflet implying crudely that they were homosexuals.

The trade unionists and their families also received threatening, sometimes obscene, phone calls, and other leaflets listed their phone numbers, urging people to "call these creeps and let them know how you feel about their gestapo tactics."

TYPICALLY, there was no specifically stated position—just stirring up trouble. One leaflet was captioned STOP FASCISM IN YORK, VOTE U.S. LABOR PARTY.

At the same time—the other side of the coin—LaRouche has been directing a cozying up to unions around the country, if not an outright attempt to infiltrate them. This operation has been more subtle, more sophisticated, but adds to his reputation for being schizophrenic, irrational, opportunistic or diabolic.

Some of the confusion he creates comes from occasional publications on subjects apparently dear to the worker's heart. For example, during his 1980 run for the Presidency (as a Democrat), LaRouche issued an attractive 30-page pamphlet titled "How to End Inflation and Unemployment," although a fair reading of it would leave a very confused impression, if any.

ABOUT THE same time—and during national debate on the subject—he put out a policy statement titled "Do Not Repeal The 'Davis-Bacon' Law," a polemic praising Alexander Hamilton and attacking the British but not mentioning organized labor's opposition to repeal of the law.

By the late Seventies, the U.S. Labor Party had dropped its attack on trade unions and adopted a tactic of snuggling up to liberal organizations and almost any other it could get a kind word from, perhaps because its leader was running for President—without, of course, any backing from the traditional elements of the Democratic Party.

For instance, LaRouche conducted a heavy courtship with the National Farmers Organization, a Midwest group more concerned with commodity price stabilization than with ideology, but was quickly rejected.

More significantly, LaRouche went after the Teamsters, preying particularly on the existence of a dissident "reform" group within the union which they could attack. In the Midwest, at least, they scored with some leaders and helped distribute disruptive material, but when it could have appeared that the Teamsters were endorsing LaRouche for President, the national office stepped in.

The late Frank Fitzsimmons, president of the union, wrote LaRouche campaign committees that "nothing could be further from the truth." He added that the union's executive board at its January 1978 meeting "unanimously adopted a resolution disclaiming any association by the Teamsters with the U.S. Labor Party, noting that the U.S. Labor Party is not in harmony with the aims and goals of the U.S. labor movement" and that "any suggestions to the contrary are false and misleading."

And the letter was displayed in the July 1979 issue of the union's official magazine.

One of the movement's cruder techniques, calling labor papers in the name of legitimate reporters, has been refined into the technique of establishing a special labor editor for at least one of LaRouche's slick magazines, Executive Intelligence Review. Using that title, the apparatus requests background and biographical material from unions on a friendly basis.

YET THE Jan. 12 issue of EIR magazine this year contained an item about AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue which was headlined: "AFL-CIO joins DNC in fascist organizing drive."

Previous overtures to the AFL-CIO headquarters on behalf of LaRouche's latest organizational gimmick, the National Democratic Policy Committee, were totally rebuffed, and word was sent out to affiliates to "ignore all solicitations from this group and advise your local unions so that they will not be manipulated by these misrepresentations."

Then union officials, particularly editors, were barraged with requests for cooperation from a new publication called American Labor Beacon. Quick checks disclosed that its editor and publisher, Larry Sherman and Allan Friedman, had been very big in the LaRouche movement.

ALTHOUGH BOTH responded to inquiries by declaring that they were no longer connected with LaRouche—and were even critical of him—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland issued an advisory to affiliates "not to join or to contribute to such groups," and the International Labor Press Association advised that "cooperation with this publication or the purchase of subscriptions should be discouraged."

As one editor put it, "finding what LaRouche really stands for is as hard as finding a union bug on his publications."

NO RHYME OR REASON, except unquestioned allegiance to the ambitions of Lyndon H. LaRouche, Jr., marks the LaRouche cult's wild swings along the political spectrum. Headlines from the cult's publications chart the murky path of LaRouche's thinking. One consistent theme is anti-Semitism, sometimes cloaked in the code words "Britain" or "British" in reference to the Rothschilds and other prominent banking families with Jewish surnames located in London.

LaRouche Spinoff?

'Labor Beacon' Woos Unions with Cryptic Line

Detroit—Another product of the Lyndon LaRouche operation that has tried to foist itself upon the labor movement is the American Labor Beacon, published ten times a year by a group called Beacon News Service.

LaRouche was involved in starting the Beacon at the end of 1980. Although the Detroit-based Beacon members profess to have split from LaRouche a year later, their monthly sheet is not much different than it was under LaRouche.

THE PUBLISHER, Allan Friedman, was a long-time Midwest leader of LaRouche's now-defunct U.S. Labor Party. The editor, Larry Sherman, was a USLP candidate in Massachusetts throughout the 1970s.

While Sherman and Friedman were members, the U.S. Labor Party associated itself with the most reactionary groups in the country, such as the John Birch Society, the Ku Klux Klan and the Liberty Lobby. These alliances were initiated from 1974 to 1977, while the purported split by Sherman and Friedman did not occur until October 1981.

The November-December 1981 issue of the Beacon sought to give the impression that Sherman and Friedman had never been affiliated with LaRouche. In response to a printed letter, they said they had been "investigating the LaRouche organization for a period of time." What they did not say was that they had occupied leadership roles in his organization for close to a decade.

THERE ARE other examples of the Beacon's two-faced nature. Although it attacks the FBI's use of informants, Sherman himself once served as an informant for the FBI in New England.

The first issue of the Beacon professed to be "by, for and of the laboring man in America." But when they were openly with LaRouche, the Detroit people also had a company called Renaissance Printing which, according to the Detroit Typographical Union, went non-union in July 1981, just before Sherman and Friedman supposedly split away. There is still a Renaissance Printing company in Detroit, still in the same building with the Beacon, and still non-union. Further, it cleans its own offices and refuses to let the building's cleaning crews, members of the Service Employees, into its quarters. Meanwhile, Sherman and Friedman have had the Beacon printed at various local firms —at least four to date—in order to gain display of the union label.

The Beacon seeks to spread its "message" to local unions, particularly in the building trades, with high-pressure telephone sales pitches for subscriptions. Among its offerings are "exposés" of anti-union construction companies, such as Brown & Root. The thin report on that firm retails at $200 for 50 copies and contains little more than newspaper clips.

Also, while the Beacon claims to be serving the labor movement, it backed the Reagan Administration as a whole and its business-oriented supply side economics. It gave early and strong support to the policies of Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan.

Two other organizations appear to be outgrowths of Beacon activities.

The first is a so-called Committee Against Brilab and Abscam, which was announced when the Beacon first began publishing.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned at the time that the committee was "organized by individuals whose long-term interests are incompatible with those of trade unions." He advised federation affiliates to steer clear.

THE SECOND group that seems to be affiliated with the Beacon is Intellico. A union official familiar with its material characterized it as an "intelligence group." Larry Sherman's name is on the cover of a document written by Intellico that is believed to be filled with misinformation about other unionists.

When the Intellico operation was first discovered by a Charleston, W.Va., newspaper, the Beacon staff acknowledged that they "accept calls" for Intellico, but later denied it.

Whether Intellico, the Beacon, or other fronts, the formula is similar to LaRouche's. The publications try to link dissidents to Wall Street financiers; suggest that alleged organized crime figures are being persecuted by the Justice Dept., and reprint some legitimate information clipped from commercial newspapers. In fact, the International Labor Press Association found that the Beacon "News Service" consisted almost entirely of clippings from commercial newspapers.

The ILPA executive council described the Beacon as "little more than an extended—and not very coherent—editorial . . . full of unsubstantiated claims and stories of questionable validity designed to paint the labor movement and some people in it as martyrs and victims."

Why This Series?

The material on these pages concludes the AFL-CIO News series on Lyndon LaRouche, but not the paper's coverage of LaRouche operations that seek to disrupt organized labor's efforts to advance the interests of workers.

The series was designed to present a broad overview of the LaRouche organization, its tactics, philosophy and fronts, and alert trade unionists to LaRouche's attempts to identify with the labor movement, create mischief in its ranks, and ultimately take it over.

The News will continue to report on the activities of this extremist group and its leader.

Alabama GM Plants Gained In Card Check

Decatur, Ala.—The Auto Workers have won recognition as sole bargaining agent for some 1,700 workers at the Saginaw Steering Gear facility near here, the largest non-union General Motors Corp. operation in the country.

The organizing victory came without an election after an independent arbitrator certified that a majority of the employees had signed authorization cards designating the UAW to represent them.

The win at the three-plant Saginaw complex means that of 141 GM plants in 91 cities in 26 states only two small plants remain non-union. They are the Delco-Remy plants in Laurel, Miss., and in Anaheim, Calif.

UAW PRESIDENT Douglas A. Fraser called the victory "a testimonial to the courage and commitment of the men and women" at the Saginaw plant that capped six years of intense organizing activities.

Martin Gerber, UAW vice president and organizing director, hailed the recognition as a "major victory" that "gives new impetus to ongoing efforts to organize the many unorganized competitor plants in the country."

General Motors agreed earlier this year to recognize the UAW at any plant where it obtained signed authorization from a majority of production workers. Under this procedure, the union won recognition in April as bargaining agent for 415 workers at a Delco-Remy plant in Meridian, Miss., and in August for 300 workers at a Delco-Remy plant in Fitzgerald, Ga.

The agreement brings the Saginaw employees under the new UAW-GM master agreement reached last March. The pact's provisions include a two-year moratorium on plant closings, a prepaid legal assistance plan, and supplemental unemployment benefits.

Otero Appointed to Board Of Hispanic Policy Group

Jack F. Otero has been named to the executive board of the Hispanic Policy Development Project (HPDP) a non-profit organization concerned with educational, employment and social services issues.

Otero is vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks and executive vice president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

SHOW OF UNITY by state and national labor officers celebrates the reaffiliation of over 350,000 Auto Workers members in Michigan with the State AFL-CIO, ending a 13-year separation. The reaffiliation was sealed at a two-day unity conference in Detroit following special conventions of the Michigan AFL-CIO and the Michigan UAW Community Action Program. At the press conference announcing the action are, from left, State AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall, newly elected Michigan AFL-CIO Executive Vice President Sam Fishman, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, UAW President Douglas Fraser and UAW Vice President Don Ephlin, who is chairman of Michigan UAW-CAP.

350,000 Auto Workers Reaffiliate To Strengthen Michigan AFL-CIO

Detroit—What AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called a "reunited and re-energized Michigan labor movement" came into being Sept. 1 when delegates to a special convention of the Michigan United Auto Workers Community Action Program (UAW-CAP) voted unanimously to reaffiliate their more than 350,000 members with the Michigan AFL-CIO.

Following their vote, the 750 UAW-CAP delegates and more than 600 delegates who had attended a special Michigan AFL-CIO convention the previous day, met in a two-day "Unity Convention," co-chaired by State AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall and UAW Vice President Don Ephlin.

MARSHALL AND EPHLIN had headed a committee representing both organizations that had worked for a number of months to achieve the reaffiliation and end the separation that began when the Auto Workers disaffiliated in 1968.

The UAW's return brings the total membership of the Michigan AFL-CIO to almost three-quarters of a million.

Addressing the opening session of the unity convention, UAW President Douglas Fraser told the delegates "a united labor movement is not only important for this state, but it's important for the nation. My only regret," he added, "is that it didn't happen sooner."

Fraser told the convention delegates that "under the leadership of Lane Kirkland, the AFL-CIO is the most important force for progress in this nation," and called the unity convention "a turning point for Michigan."

BOTH FRASER and Kirkland, who followed him at the podium, castigated the Reagan Administration's economic policies which have plunged Michigan into an economic crisis and given that state an unemployment rate double the national figure. Both stressed the importance of a unified labor movement on the political front, and called on the delegates to redouble their political activities in the days remaining before the Nov. 2 election.

"Now is the time to show what we can do—now when working people are hurting and a hostile administration is rolling back the gains of half a century," Kirkland declared.

"And here is the place to start—here in Michigan, the heartland of industrial trade unionism and the unemployment capital of the United States."

KIRKLAND TOLD the delegates, "Every worker in this state has a vital stake in keeping Don Riegle in the United States Senate . . . every worker has a stake in sending Jim Blanchard to the governor's mansion instead of Richard Headlee, the Reaganites' choice."

He called for the defeat of the "five Michigan congressmen who have voted against workers' interests 70 percent of the time" and the re-election of "the twelve who have been with us more than 75 percent of the time."

In their deliberations preliminary to the unity meeting, Michigan AFL-CIO delegates adopted a series of changes in the state federation's constitution to accommodate the entrance of the UAW. These included establishing the position of executive vice president to serve with the current two officers and increasing the size of both the executive board and executive committees.

Delegates to the unity convention unanimously chose Sam Fishman, executive director of Michigan UAW-CAP, to fill the position of executive vice president. Fishman has been active in the UAW since he was hired as an assembler at Ford Motor Co. He is a former local union president and has headed the union's Michigan political action arm since 1967.

FORTY UAW representatives were named to serve on the enlarged executive board. These include the six international vice presidents—Don Ephlin, Owen Bieber, Odessa Komer, Marc Stepp and Steve Yokich, the six directors of Michigan regions of the union, the Michigan UAW-CAP director and 28 additional members from the six regions.

Walter L. Oliver will continue as secretary-treasurer and Marshall will remain president of the state federation until the next convention in June 1983 when Marshall said he plans to step down.

A Guide to the LaRouche Network

The following appears as an appendix to "The Lyndon LaRouche Cult: Enemy of American Labor," by Dennis King, which is scheduled for publication later this month by the League for Industrial Democracy, 275 Seventh Ave., New York, N.Y. 10001.

National Caucus of Labor Committees (NCLC). The core organization, composed of 400 dedicated LaRouche cultists in about 20 cities from Boston to Los Angeles. The largest concentration is in New York City, where the NCLC and most of its front groups have their national headquarters, and where the NCLC publishes its biweekly newspaper, New Solidarity, and its theoretical journal, The Campaigner.

International Caucus of Labor Committees (ICLC). The umbrella organization for the NCLC and its "co-thinker" organizations founded by LaRouche in Europe and Latin America. The NCLC prefers to use the name ICLC in most of its public pronouncements.

United States Labor Party (USLP). The former electoral arm of the NCLC, through which hundreds of LaRouchian candidates ran for public office in the 1970s but which was abolished when LaRouche became a "Democrat."

National Democratic Policy Committee (NDPC). The front group through which the NCLC is attempting to infiltrate the Democratic Party. The NDPC issues reports, holds seminars, lobbies on Capitol Hill, runs candidates in Democratic primaries, and sponsors limited-purpose groups such as the Committee to Defend Harrison Williams (see below). The NDPC claims to be "committed to economic recovery through low-interest credit, a gold-reserve monetary system, nuclear energy, farm parity, and an end to drug proliferation."

Fusion Energy Foundation (FEF). A tax-exempt organization which sponsors tables at airports where NCLC members sell literature produced by a variety of NCLC business and political fronts. The FEF also lobbies for nuclear power and for a crash program to develop fusion reactors. It claims 20,000 members and over 110,000 subscribers to its glossy monthly, Fusion.

National Anti-Drug Coalition (NADC). Like the FEF, a nominal sponsor of NCLC literature peddling a solicitation. In particular, the NADC pushes Dope, Inc., a book which alleges that wealthy Jews control the narcotics traffic. The NADC also lobbies for stiffer anti-marijuana laws and publishes the monthly magazine, War on Drugs.

Lafayette Foundation for the Arts and Sciences. Formerly called the Humanist Academy, this front sponsors concerts and symposia as a means of recruiting new followers for LaRouche. It strongly advocates a purge of jazz and rock music from American culture.

New Solidarity International Press Service (NSIPS). The business arm of the NCLC's intelligence staff, employing over 50 researchers, writers, and self-styled security experts. Its files contain potential smear data on thousands of individuals and organizations. Information from these files has been offered on occasion to the FBI, the CIA, state and municipal police departments, and nuclear power companies, as well as foreign intelligence agencies.

Executive Intelligence Review (EIR). A weekly newsmagazine published by the NSIPS.

Investigative Leads. A monthly NSIPS newsletter sent to police chiefs and Red Squad detectives around the country. Claims to be privy to details of assorted terrorist plots.

American Labor Beacon. Monthly newsletter sent to trade union officials, it was founded by Detroit NCLC members in 1980. Its publisher and staff have since resigned from the NCLC.

National Labor Committee to Defend Harrison Williams. With the apparent blessing of former U.S. Sen. Harrison Williams—one of the Abscam defendants—this committee is utilized to draw trade union officials into the orbit of the National Democratic Policy Committee. The Williams committee is the successor to the NCLC's Committee Against Brilab and Abscam (CABA).

Proceedings Available From 1981 Convention

A limited number of copies of the Proceedings of the 14th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO, which was held last November in New York, are available for purchase.

Included in the paperback volume are the 448-page transcript of the four days of convention proceedings and the 373-page report of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, along with an index covering both sections.

Copies of the proceedings, which are priced at $15, are available from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Kirkland Scores 'Scandal' of 9.8% Jobless Rate

Administration has brought to millions of Americans continues unabated.

"We were promised recovery in the spring, and we got more unemployment," he said. "We were promised recovery in the summer, and we got more layoffs. Now we are entering fall, and the news is still more layoffs and more people desperately seeking work."

Since the August unemployment survey was taken, the jobs picture "has darkened," Kirkland observed. The number of new claims for unemployment benefits has risen sharply, and business bankruptcies have soared to their highest level since the Depression year of 1932.

The immediate prospects for the economy are "bleak," Kirkland told newsmen, adding that he sees no early turnaround in the Reagan Recession that began in July 1981. Unemployment has increased from 7.4 percent when President Reagan took office to the 9.8-percent mark first reached in July of this year and matched last month. That is the highest level since the 9.9-percent annual average in 1941—before monthly figures were kept.

THE RECESSION has hit particularly hard at industries involved in manufacturing durable goods. There was another big drop of 300,000 in full-time jobs in August as joblessness continued to rise in the auto, steel, and rubber industries, in retail trade and in construction.

Much of last month's loss in factory jobs was at the auto industry's expense. After several months of improving job prospects, the unemployment rate for auto workers rose sharply in August to 20.8 percent. Since March 1979, employment in the industry has declined by one-third.

BESIDES THE large decline in full-time jobs and in goods-producing industries, BLS reported another discouraging indicator. The length of the average factory workweek, after having risen in the last few months, fell a seasonally adjusted three-tenths of an hour to 39 hours, erasing the small gains that had occurred since April. Factory overtime was unchanged at 2.4 hours a week.

Although BLS reported a rise of 107,000 in total employment to 99.8 million, the labor force rose over the month even more —by 122,000—to 110.6 million, lifting the official number of out-of-work Americans by 15,000.

Most major job categories showed no significant change between July and August. The largest monthly increases occurred among minorities, with the jobless rate for black workers rising from 18.5 to 18.8 percent and for workers of Hispanic origin, from 13.9 to 14.6 percent. For black teenagers, the rate jumped from 49.7 to 51.6 percent over the month.

AFTER RISING sharply since last summer, the jobless rate for adult men edged up one-tenth of 1 percent to 8.9 percent. The rate for adult women was down two-tenths of 1 percent at 8.2 percent. Jobless rates for whites, teenagers, and full-time workers remained close to their July levels.

By industry, the biggest jump in the jobless rate was for transportation workers, up from 6.1 percent in July to 7 percent last month. The rate for farm workers increased from 13.8 to 14.3 percent, while that of factory workers rose from 12 to 12.1 percent. Rates in the construction, finance, and government sectors remained unchanged at 20.3 percent, 7 percent and 4.6 percent, respectively.

State unemployment data showed higher jobless rates in Michigan, 15.2 percent; Ohio, 12.7 percent; New Jersey, 9.2 percent; New York, 8.5 percent, and Florida, 7.7 percent. The rate for Massachusetts dropped from 9.5 to 7.3 percent and for Illinois from 12.3 to 11.8 percent, the government said.

HUNDREDS OF PROTESTERS, including trade union representatives, demonstrated in front of the Polish consulate in New York City Aug. 31 on the second anniversary of the creation of the Solidarity free trade union movement in Poland. Speakers at the rally included Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and New York Mayor Edward Koch.

Broadcast Messages Stress Harsh Impact of Reaganomics

The goal of the labor movement is to create "the healthiest, best-educated, most productive and most creative society" possible, and full employment is the "first step" toward that objective, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed in a Labor Day radio address to the nation.

Full employment should be the "chief goal" of any society, Kirkland declared, warning that joblessness is "the worst and most destructive problem our nation faces today.

HE ASSAILED President Reagan for virtually ignoring the plight of millions of unemployed workers, and he pledged in the address carried over the NBC radio network that the labor movement intends to do "everything in our power" to bring about progress toward its goals "before the next Labor Day rolls around."

In other traditional Labor Day radio broadcasts, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the CBS audience that the labor movement's concern for the well-being of all Americans dates from long before Labor Day became an official national holiday. AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons said on the Mutual network that the labor movement's dedication to social and economic justice should be a rallying point for those who want to return the nation to economic growth and social advancement.

On Sunday, Sept. 5, Kirkland was interviewed on the ABC telvision program, "This Week with David Brinkley," and AFL-CIO Vice President Douglas A. Fraser appeared on NBC's "Meet the Press."

IN HIS radio message, Kirkland noted that by custom national leaders "search out the most glowing words they can find" on Labor Day to pay tribute to the dignity of work and the social and economic value of America's working people. But now, because of policies that have been in force for the other 364 days of the year, "American workers have less to celebrate on Labor Day 1982 than at any other time in nearly a half-century," he said.

Kirkland said the official jobless level of 10.8 million people "tells only part of the story," because that number swells to 15.2 million when those who have given up hope of a job and workers forced to work only part-time are included.

"How is it possible for any President to declare that he recognizes the importance of work and the dignity of workers while ignoring that unemployment line?" Kirkland asked.

HE SAID those who denounce "government waste" ignore the consequences of "the waste of human resources" that is taking place because of the Administration's policy of fighting inflation with high unemployment.

"It is hard to imagine," he declared, "a more irresponsible action that could be made in the name of 'fiscal responsibility.' If you waste people, it doesn't really matter what else you save." The American labor movement, Kirkland noted, like the founders of our country, "puts human values above all others."

Donahue also struck the theme of the labor movement's historic concern for protecting the rights of all Americans.

MANY THINGS Americans take for granted today, he said, "are the product of decades of struggle by the trade union movement."

Among those achievements is free public education, Donahue pointed out. And "organized labor was there" and still is in the struggle for social security, for insulation from the impact of unemployment or job-related illness or injury, for civil rights, for decent housing and in the fight to end discrimination against women and minorities, he stressed.

The labor movement was born out of a need to protect workers' rights on the job, but soon grew to a concern for "the lives of workers and their families when the day's work was done," Donahue said.

IN THE process, he observed, "we have enriched the lives," elevated the economic level and advanced the social welfare of all Americans. Labor's continued existence "as part of the social fabric of our nation is compelling proof of the rightness of our cause and of the continuing need for unions in our society," Donahue said.

On "Meet the Press," Fraser told reporters he believed union members are "intelligent, individualistic people who vote their conscience."

There is likely to be a "significant change" in attitude in this November's elections among union members who voted Republican in 1980, he asserted, primarily because "they saw the Carter Administration as not being the most effective in the world . . . and it was just the time for Ronald Reagan to arrive on the scene."

THE IMPACT of "Reaganomics" will mean that union members "in overwhelming numbers" who once voted for Reagan "will be opposing his policies," Fraser predicted.

Lyons told the radio audience that many benefits labor has won for all Americans are being threatened, among them safer workplaces, child labor laws, social security and equal employment opportunity.

The policies of the Reagan Administration "have pushed the country to the brink of economic disaster," he charged.

"Organized labor will not be silent," Lyons pledged. He recalled that the labor movement had "protested the folly and injustices" of the Administration's destructive policies when they were proposed, and protested "the inability or unwillingness of Congress to dissent" from them.

But organized labor will do more than protest, he declared. "We will urge action from Congress now to return our national economy to healthy growth and strength."

Dignity, Value of Work Cited By Leaders of Major Faiths

Work brings dignity and meaning to human life and at the same time is a way to serve God, leaders of the Catholic, Jewish and Protestant faiths declared in Labor Day messages.

Msgr. Francis J. Lally, secretary for social development and world peace of the U.S. Catholic Conference, pointed to Pope John Paul II's recent encyclical on human work, Laborem Exercens. Work, the message says, has to do with the "very identity of the human person . . . with one's dreams for the future and one's ability to love and respect others."

"TO THE DEGREE that we appreciate this special dignity of work, to that degree will we understand the tremendous social and human loss that results when millions of Americans cannot find work."

Rabbi Walter S. Wurzburger, president of the Synagogue Council of America, emphasized that "the Jewish tradition extols labor as one of the three pillars that make the existence of the world possible."

From a religious perspective, he said, "what matters above all is not what we receive, but what we give . . . the worthwhileness of our existence can be gauged by the extent to which we fulfill the religious mandate of imitating our Creator and becoming His partner in the process of creation."

RABBI WURZBURGER said that in a world preoccupied with "instant self-gratification," it is important to stress ideals of service and commitment, "to realize that participation in activities designed to render the world more fit for human habitation represents an important aspect of a meaningful existence."

General Sec. Claire Randall of the National Council of the Churches of Christ said Labor Day "is a good time to remind ourselves of the importance of work in the sight of God.

"One of the precious insights of the Protestant heritage," she said, "is that everyday, secular occupations are not just mundane, servile jobs but are as valuable, as 'holy,' as is full-time service in the church."

IT IS IMPORTANT that human beings serve each other in any way they can, Randall said, "and one's daily labor then becomes not just a means of livelihood but a contribution to the well-being of the world, a sacred offering to God and humankind.

A Labor Day statement issued by the Urban Bishops Coalition, released at the general convention of the Episcopal Church, affirmed their support of "the right and desirability of workers in the United States to organize and form unions."

The bishops stressed that they "decry the growing wave of anti-unionism mounting in the nation today which asks people to forget the struggles that led to this form of negotiation as a just way to settle differences."

THE STATEMENT stressed that "as long as the workplace is organized by the artificial division between ownership and labor, it is necessary to support the right of workers to organize and to negotiate for their rights as employees.

Festive Labor Day Celebration

New Gompers Memorial Dedicated in San Antonio

San Antonio, Tex.—This historic city, whose trade union heritage dates back to the era of the Republic of Texas, proudly displayed its union label over the Labor Day weekend with a joyous parade, the ceremonial unveiling of the Samuel Gompers Memorial, and a round of festivities and special programs.

It was a national event, with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and top officers of a dozen unions joining local and state union leaders on the parade reviewing stand across from the Alamo and at the dedication of the Gompers sculpture, commissioned by the San Antonio AFL-CIO in a parklike setting on a prominent downtown site donated by the city.

GOMPERS, WHO died in San Antonio in 1924, was the founding president of the American Federation of Labor, and Kirkland demonstrated with quotations why today's labor movement still honors its early leader.

Kirkland suggested that President Reagan would do well to heed the warning of Gompers that "it is a false and unwise economy and a lack of statesmanship to retrench public expenditures and improvements when such a course means suffering, misery and hunger."

By way of emphasis, Kirkland pointed to San Antonio's beautiful Riverwalk, built under Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal "to give work to people who badly needed work." Similar parks and buildings in cities from coast to coast "are among the most treasured assets" of the American people, he noted.

BUT TODAY, unemployed workers who could be building other Riverwalks are idle, their potential "squandered by an Administration that knows the price of everything and the value of nothing on the scale of humanity."

Kirkland spoke also of the Gompers concept of an unlimited goal of social justice for all humanity, to be achieved through a series of realistic steps to achieve the best conditions immediately possible—and then strive for better.

Gompers, the architect of the International Labor Organization, was returning from an international trade union gathering in Mexico when he died, and Kirkland said today's labor movement carries on that worldwide concern.

Joan Suarez, the president of the San Antonio AFL-CIO, opened the dedication ceremony with her co-hosts for the occasion, Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard and Glen Peterson, national vice president of the American Federation of Government Employees, who initiated the Gompers memorial concept. AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock, San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros and Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez shared honors with Kirkland at the dedication.

The 16-foot-tall statue of Gompers, surrounded by figures of working men and women, is by sculptor Betty Jean Alden and was commissioned by the San Antonio AFL-CIO.

The parade that followed the dedication was a festive affair with some 25,000 marchers, including contingents from other Texas cities, floats from nearly every local union and council, and marching bands.

FOR MANY of the participants, the day ended in family picnics including several large affairs hosted by unions.

During the preceding two days, there had been a series of receptions for international union officers who had come to San Antonio for the dedication and union-related meetings.

At a Labor History Forum, Communications Workers President Glenn Watts spoke of the future of unions. There was a brunch honoring Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez sponsored by the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement and a dinner honoring State AFL-CIO President Hubbard sponsored by the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

In remarks at the institute dinner and in press conferences and newspaper interviews, Kirkland stressed that labor-supported candidates are facing opponents that have "more money than we can ever dream of matching" to put into the political campaign.

But "we have people," he said, "trade unionists who know how to agitate, educate and organize . . . and only people can vote."

KIRKLAND TOLD reporters that his personal travels across the country as well as polls have convinced him that there has been "a substantial dropaway" of worker support for President Reagan since the 1980 elections. But many of the Democratic candidates for Congress are not getting the maximum benefit from the shift in public opinion because they are too "timid" to hammer away at the President's failed programs.

There is still "too much Tweedledum and Tweedledee" among Democrats in Congress despite the spread of unemployment and economic distress, Kirkland said.

SAN ANTONIO'S Labor Day observance was highlighted by the unveiling of this statue of Samuel Gompers, the first president of the American Federation of Labor. With AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is San Antonio Mayor Henry Cisneros. The dedication was followed by a parade of 25,000 union members, complete with floats and bands.

IBEW Gains New Unit At Teletype Facility

Skokie, Ill. — Production and maintenance workers at Teletype Corp.'s facility here voted 369 to 153 to affiliate with the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. For over 25 years, they had been represented by an independent union.

Tile Finishers Spur Action To Counter Reaganomics

Las Vegas, Nev. — Bold initiatives to counter the disastrous effects of "Reaganomics" were advanced at the 23rd convention of the Tile, Marble & Terrazzo Finishers.

Union President Pascal DiJames charged in his keynote address that "there is not one working family that has not been injured by the economic disasters of the Reagan Administration."

INSTEAD OF realizing a Reagan campaign promise of "jobs, jobs and more jobs," he said, the nation is suffering the highest unemployment since the Depression, with joblessness in the construction industry exceeding 20 percent.

DiJames urged delegates to press diligently for labor's legislative agenda when they vote in the Nov. 2 congressional elections. However, he warned, with only about 70 percent of the nation's eligible voters registered, labor must put on massive voter education, registration and get-out-the-vote drives.

"If we are to help reverse the anti-labor sentiment that seems to have swept through the Administration and the Congress," DiJames said, "the working men and women of America cannot allow themselves to fall victim to Election Day apathy."

SEC.-TREAS. Joseph Maloney of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. urged delegates to vigorously combat encroachments of the open-shop movement in the construction industry.

The growth of the open shop, Maloney declared, is the result of a carefully crafted plan by America's biggest businesses to slash construction wages and bust building trades unions.

"Their game plan is nothing less than to seize control of the industry's labor relations policies," he added.

Maloney charged that the Business Roundtable has been behind all the efforts to repeal the nation's prevailing wage laws, including regulations proposed recently by the Labor Dept. that would amount to administrative repeal of the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law. The BCTD, he noted, has won a preliminary injunction to prevent those regulations from taking effect.

AMONG OTHER speakers were Charles Brodeur, assistant to Carpenters President William Konyha; Fred Caccese, president of the Tile Contractors Association; Donald Mellskog, National Terrazzo & Mosaic Association; George Lavenberg, Ceramic Tile Institute, and John Herbstsomer, Union Labor Life Insurance Co.

Delegates adopted extensive revisions of the union's constitution and bylaws to bring them into compliance with Labor Dept. recommendations.

In other convention business, delegates considered a number of resolutions and were briefed on the growth of the union's annuity pension plan and on recent court decisions affecting labor.

Rallies, Parades Renew Solidarity Spirit

Huge crowds also turned out for Chicago's first Labor Day parade in 40 years, in which bands, floats and marchers pointed to union members' skills and services and the importance of buying union-made products.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland was the keynote speaker in San Antonio, Tex., at a round of Labor Day festivities that included the dedication of a statue of Samuel Gompers in the heart of the city.

In Los Angeles, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue spoke at the 36th Labor Day breakfast of the Catholic Labor Institute and later at a COPE picnic.

Donahue charged that the Reagan Administration is deliberately using high unemployment as a "tool to restructure society to reward the rich and punish the poor," and that labor must "organize, agitate and educate" for a better society.

THE WYOMING AFL-CIO linked Labor Day with "Wyoming Solidarity Day" and staged a march and rally at the state capitol in Cheyenne followed by a picnic at a nearby park. The attendance of over 3,000 marked the largest labor demonstration in the state's history, the federation said.

More than 5,000 people turned out for a picnic planned by the State AFL-CIO in Warwick, R.I., that included a support rally for 1,600 Machinists involved in an 11-month strike against Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co.

Richard Groulx, secretary-treasurer of the Alameda County, Calif., AFL-CIO said the attendance of 7,500 at the council's 25th annual picnic "was the largest since 1958 when we were fighting 'right to work.' "

THE IOWA AFL-CIO and many of the state's central labor councils planned a round of parades, picnics and outings that included political rallies. The South Central council staged a three-day Solidarity Day/Labor Day Fest at the state fairgrounds that local organizers said was the biggest Labor Day celebration in Des Moines in recent times.

Crowds ignored bad weather to turn out for marches in cities across Indiana, including Indianapolis, which also held its first Labor Day parade in 40 years.

The nation's job needs and the harsh impact of the Reagan Administration's policies were the focal point of the Detroit rally. Central Labor Council President Thomas Turner pointed to the forthcoming election and observed:

"We can't change the mistake we made in 1980. We can't retire Ronald Reagan. But we can retire his supporters."

AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward spoke at the 30th annual Labor Day Mass at the Shrine of the Sacred Heart in Washington, stressing that "human rights and workers' rights are essentially unalienable in bad economic times as well as in good."

Institutions like unions "established to secure these rights" should not be torn down at the whim of "those who control the means of production, whether government or private industry," he said.

At the mass, the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO presented its Cardinal Gibbons award "for dedication to human rights" in absentia to Lech Walesa, the imprisoned leader of the Polish union federation, Solidarity.

DIGNITY AND RIGHTS on the job that all workers want are the real goals members of the National Football League Players Association are fighting for in their current negotiations with team owners, NFLPA officials told the Sheet Metal Workers convention. From left are Sheet Metal Workers Sec.-Treas. Cecil Clay, NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey, Brig Owens of the NFLPA staff and Sheet Metal Workers President Edward J. Carlough.

Football Players' Issues Put Into Trade Union Language

New York—To a warmly sympathetic audience of Sheet Metal Workers, Ed Garvey, executive director of the National Football League Players Association, spelled out the issues in the widely publicized contract negotiations with team owners.

The central issue, Garvey said, despite all the six-digit figures that get tossed around, comes down to the same questions that are the core of thousands of labor-management negotiations:

"WHEN IT'S all said and done, it's exactly about what you men and women have fought for for years—and that is dignity in the workplace, a say in the working conditions that you have, and a right to stand up for what you believe in.

"That's what the fight is all about. With your help, we're going to win it."

Garvey and Brig Owens, a former Washington Redskin now on the NFLPA staff, were introduced to the Sheet Metal Workers convention by Pres. Edward J. Carlough, who said he wanted the members to know the facts about the dispute. After Garvey's speech, a score of delegates asked specific questions and pledged support to the players.

Garvey cautioned union members not to be put off by the high salary figures attributed to football players. "If you work for a wage, you are a worker," he said, "And it doesn't make any difference how much that wage is."

THE AVERAGE player's career in the football league is 4.2 years, he pointed out, but he has spent about 10 years getting there. So the average $300,000 he earns in league play really comes to about $30,000 a year.

"Now, while that is a lot of money," Garvey commented, "when he finishes that career he has no place to go. He has to go back and get a job and he doesn't have that future to build on like most people do in any other industry."

In addition, about half the players suffer a serious injury each year, and "it's a rare individual who makes it through a career . . . who has not undergone surgery."

HE CITED other grievances: artificial turf, which "causes about twice as many injuries as grass," the inability to leave one team for another, and the players' insistence on the right to get a second medical opinion from a personal physician without having it brushed aside in favor of the decision of the club doctor.

Noting that television contracts are escalating the football teams' revenues, Garvey recalled that when the AFL and NFL were separate leagues, players, were getting between 55 percent and 65 percent of all the money generated. That ratio has dropped, but he said the concept of the players having a stake in the net profits is one the owners "are going to have to swallow."

Garvey hailed the AFL-CIO for its decisive support of the union in fighting off an effort by the club owners—he calls them "promoters"—to gain exemption from the antitrust laws. That exemption, he said, would have resulted in the "promoters" taking the games off free television and putting them on pay TV.

"THE PLAYERS," Garvey said, "are saying: 'We are the game, and because we're the game, we want a stake in the industry.'

"The talent out there is the product. Those guys come out, they practice, they play, they put on the game, and that's what you turn on the television set and watch."

House Rejects Reagan's Veto Of Funding Bill

President's funding request and below congressional budget ceilings.

Reagan's objection, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison noted, was that Congress was setting its own priorities by including funds for social programs instead of rubber-stamping the Administration's demands.

THE HOUSE had originally passed the $14.1 billion supplemental appropriations bill by a bipartisan 348-67 vote, and House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., appealed to Republicans to "stay with your conscience" on the override vote.

House Republican Leader Bob Michel called on his troops to support the President. He termed the vote crucial to "sustaining the momentum of that monumental task we set out to accomplish 20 months ago," when Reagan took office.

FUNDS FOR student financial aid, mass transit and highways were among the provisions that brought on the veto.

The veto would have cut off funds that allow some 54,000 low-income persons 55 or older to work up to 20 hours a week at modest salaries in day care centers, hospitals and in programs providing services to homebound aged and handicapped persons.

The vetoed bill also included money to meet both military and civilian payrolls, to start-up the newly-enacted federal extended benefits program, and to provide economic aid to Caribbean Basin nations.

Some government workers were furloughed without pay because of the veto. And while money to pay the new extended benefits could be temporarily borrowed from the Unemployment Insurance Trust Fund, there was no money to cover the administrative costs of receiving and processing the claims.

Potential Candidates Speak

Sheet Metal Delegates Focus on Jobs, Politics

New York—The 36th convention of the Sheet Metal Workers endorsed a series of programs to combat unemployment, non-union competition and anti-labor political policies.

President Edward J. Carlough, in his keynote address to the 650 delegates, said the "non-union problem continues to be the single most overriding problem facing construction unions."

CITING THE convention's slogan, "progress through innovation," Carlough said the challenge "cannot be met by using traditional ideas and traditional methods." He outlined a series of steps being taken to strengthen the union sector of the industry and to promote the creation of job opportunities.

Carlough said that at the same time he senses "an increasing awareness among our membership that there are problems that affect them . . . that can only be resolved in the political arena."

In line with that emphasis on political action, the convention heard major speeches from six leading Democrats, all possible presidential contenders, and a leading Republican.

THE DEMOCRATS, while each concentrated on particular issues, were strongly critical of the Reagan Administration's economic and budget programs. The Democratic speakers were Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Sen. Ernest F. Hollings (S.C.), Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.), Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (N.Y.), former Vice President Walter Mondale, and Sen. John Glenn (Ohio).

Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.) discussed the merits of the 1982 tax bill, of which he was a prime sponsor, and the future financial problems of social security.

Carlough, in explaining the unusually long array of political speakers, said that 1968, when Hubert Humphrey was the nominee, was the "last year when the Democrats nominated a candidate our members felt right with." The delegates, he said, were being given an opportunity to "hear all the mainstream Democrats so they could make their judgment down the road."

THE UNION gave strong support to a series of programs undertaken in recent years to strengthen the sheet metal industry, develop new lines of work, provide for the upgrading of craft skills to meet the needs of new technology, and to improve the living standards and job security of its members.

More than 10,000 retired members are receiving pensions from the National Pension Fund, whose assets have tripled in four years to over $400 million.

SASMI—the Stabilization Agreement for the Sheet Metal Industry—which is financed in those locals that adopt the plan by a 3-percent payment on payroll, has paid out over $56 million in under-employment benefits to members who are jobless or working only part-time, and another $16 million has been expended for travel, health and welfare payments and "dividends" to the fully employed.

THE NATIONAL Training Fund, financed by payments of 4 cents an hour, now provides standard curricula and audio-visual training materials for apprenticeship and upgraded journeyman training in every U.S. local and many in Canada. It has taken a leading role in preparing training materials for solar technology, and is developing new special programs for energy auditing and retrofitting.

A new project, undertaken jointly by the union, the employers and the National Training Fund, is a non-profit National Energy Management Institute. With grants from the U.S. Dept. of Energy and the state of California, it is embarked on an ambitious program to encourage necessary work to make energy systems more effective in schools, public buildings and commercial structures.

More than a thousand Sheet Metal Workers are already enrolled in special courses in California, and the joint labor-management "selling program" is due to start in California later this year.

THE DELEGATES re-elected Carlough and Sec.-Treas. Cecil Clay without opposition as well as 11 general vice presidents.

Without dissent, the convention approved a series of per capita increases for the next four years. For construction workers, the increases amount to $2.25 effective Oct. 1, 1981, and additional 75-cent increases effective at the beginning of 1984, 1985, and 1986. For non-construction workers, the increases amount to an initial $1.25 plus 25 cents more in 1984, 1985 and 1986.

The convention paid special tribute to President Emeritus Edward F. Carlough, who celebrated his 79th birthday during the convention. The senior Carlough retired in 1970.

Another convention highlight was an audio-visual presentation on the union's history and activities.

Ticker Tape Parade

Unfair Is Unfair

ONE ACCUSATION made against the Administration which seems to strike a sensitive nerve is the claim of "unfairness." The AFL-CIO has used the charge time and again as have other organizations concerned about human rights.

The White House has made various public relations gestures to evade the stigma of being perceived as unfair, but the charge keeps coming back to haunt the Reaganites. They simply cannot hide from the facts.

Federal Judge Charles Richey in recent weeks added two more examples to the long list of unfair actions of the Administration.

IN ONE CASE, brought by two organizations in behalf of 11 indigents, Judge Richey ordered the Agriculture Dept. to distribute food aid to 47,000 poor women and children in the states of New York and Georgia. He found that the department had failed to distribute surplus assistance from states that did not need the help to states that did need it.

When a departmental lawyer tried to excuse the failure of Agriculture Sec. John R. Block to make the reallocation, the judge cut him off with these remarks:

"I don't think the Secretary of Agriculture ought to have any excuse. Let him wash the blood off his own hands and get it done. This is a very heart-rending allegation here."

MORE RECENTLY, Judge Richey stepped in to protect the rights of migrant farm workers hired to harvest apples in West Virginia. He found that the Labor Dept. had failed to live up to its own regulations for setting piece rates for the apple pickers.

In a characteristic action, the Labor Dept. had approved a reduction from last year's piece rate. The NAACP filed suit on behalf of a group of farm workers.

The department, in addition to simply playing cheap with workers whose earnings are little more than a pittance, was also trying to open the way for the hiring of non-Americans in the orchards. The law says foreigners can be hired if Americans cannot be found to work at the set piece rates.

JUDGE RICHEY put the pay back to last year's piece rates and said no grower can hire foreign migrants until Americans have been recruited.

These attempts to deprive more disadvantaged Americans of simple justice fit a pattern that was put in place by the Reagan Administration. It is called being unfair to people unable to protect themselves.

Unfortunately, there isn't much that even the best intentioned of judges can do about the unfairness of Reagan Administration actions that are within the discretion of the Executive Branch. It is outrageous, but not illegal, to appoint officials hostile to the laws and programs they are supposed to administer.

NOR CAN the judiciary deal with the unfairness of actions sanctioned by Congress, such as budget decisions that slash programs for the poor but give new subsidies to the wealthy.

The remedy for these types of unfairness must come from the voters. And it will.

Problems of Displaced Worker Demand Special Aid Programs

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMONG THE NATION'S more than 12 million unemployed, there are those who are variously called the long-term unemployed, or the displaced worker, or the dislocated worker.

Displaced workers differ from other jobless workers in having been employed in an industry that was declining even before the current recession threw millions onto the street.

Unlike those recalled to their jobs as the economy recovers, these workers will not be rehired because their jobs no longer exist.

They probably were part of a big layoff. Their plants may have been shut down because of inability to compete with modernized plants in Western Europe or Japan.

Or their jobs may have been moved to the Sunbelt or exported to a low-wage country.

Or they may have been replaced by industrial robots or another form of microelectric technology. It is estimated that the spread of this technology could cause the loss of 3 million jobs by the end of the decade—or 15 percent of today's manufacturing workforce.

DISPLACED WORKERS are likely to be experienced, in their 40s, with family responsibilities and strong community ties. They are most likely to live in a Northeast or Midwest state and to have worked in a traditional manufacturing industry—steel, auto, rubber, garment, textiles—in which employment has been shrinking.

Because of the declining demand for their skills, they may be out of work for several months or more than a year. If they find another job, they will probably be in another line of work and at lower pay.

These problems of displaced workers and possible solutions are outlined in a recent study by the Congressional Budget Office. The 56-page report is titled "Dislocated Workers: Issues and Federal Options."

The CBO study found that "no existing federal programs are targeted specifically toward dislocated workers, whose numbers appear likely to increase."

NONE OF THE current programs for the jobless—the Employment Service, Unemployment Insurance (UI), and the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA)—is "well-suited to meeting the needs of today's dislocated workers," the report said.

The CETA program, largely decimated by Reagan Administration cuts and scheduled to expire Sept. 30, had been aimed mostly at disadvantaged and minority youth.

UI benefits often lapse before the displaced worker can secure another job and usually amount to less income than that received by other jobless workers in relation to previous earnings.

State employment services are strained by growing caseloads, reduced staff and job lists that seldom match the skills of the displaced.

The non-partisan CBO stops short of advocating specific action or legislation and notes that opponents of a federal role (an obvious reference to the Reagan philosophy of government) would rely on "natural market forces" somehow to cure the problem.

BUT THE CBO report does offer "options" for Congress to consider, and notes that legislation is pending.

Federal aid to displaced workers, said the study, could take the form of skill training programs and other kinds of "readjustment services to help workers adapt to changed labor markets." Such services might include skill testing, computer-aided job search help, and job clubs for mutual aid.

Further, "Congress might consider benefits of longer duration or more generous in amount," it suggested. "Relocation assistance" could help those forced to move.

Such special benefits, it said, would help cushion "the financial impact of dislocation so that individuals could participate in job training or other adjustment programs."

The Trade Adjustment Assistance (TAA) program, begun in the early 1960s to aid workers displaced by liberalized trade agreements, offers a precedent for the more comprehensive programs needed to help today's dislocated workers, the report said.

The number of those unemployed from declining industries, plant closings and mass layoffs will total about 880,000 in early 1983, even assuming an economic recovery, it estimated.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Countdown to End of Congress: Let's Work To Stop the Balanced Budget Amendment in the House

Trade unionists are gearing up to prevent the right wing from emasculating programs such as Social Security through a Constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget. The Republican-controlled Senate already has passed the amendment, and its backers are pushing for a vote in the House.

Unions' Washington lobbyists are contacting every "persuadable" member of Congress, and grass-roots activists across the country are backing them up. A TV satellite link-up allowed the AFL-CIO ad hoc committee led by AFSCME President Gerald McEntee to bring the battle to union members in 14 key cities. Labor's local legislative action committees pressed the issue in meetings with their Representatives during the Labor Day recess.

The AFL-CIO has taken newspaper and radio advertisements to show the public how the balanced budget amendment would cost them money and hurt their programs. The ads tell the readers and listeners the name of their Representative, and urge action to stop the balanced budget amendment now, while it can be stopped.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Congress may adjourn as early as Oct. 2. The next few weeks are critical. Continue to urge your Representative to oppose any balanced budget Constitutional amendment.

See the Aug. 28 AFL-CIO News for an assessment of where every member of Congress stands on the balanced budget amendment. Correction: A previous Alert! listed Rep. William Coyne (D-PA) as a cosponsor of the balanced budget amendment. Rep. Coyne is not a cosponsor.

Dole Wants to Cut Social Security--After Election Day

Certain Social Security benefits already have been cut due to Reagan program slashing. Those cuts could become much more severe after this November's election.

Sen. Robert Dole (R-KS), chairman of the Finance Committee, which oversees Social Security, has called for a special "lame-duck" meeting of Congress to consider cuts in Social Security. Dole knows that cutting Social Security is impossible before the election, because the American people, who want Social Security kept intact, would "throw out the bums" who cut it. But Dole thinks Congress can gut the program after the election. "Between Thanksgiving and Christmas is a perfect time; even politicians aren't very political then," he said.

To give you an idea of the kinds of cuts Sen. Dole may have in mind: the special Social Security commission created by President Reagan, on which Dole serves, is considering:

(1) Raising the retirement age for Social Security benefits from 65 to 68, and

(2) Capping Social Security cost-of-living adjustments (COLA) at less than the inflation rate--which would mean that the elderly would gradually lose their buying power. The longer they live, the more they slip into poverty.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Don't let Congress cut Social Security in the dark of night. Ask your Representative and Senators now, before the election, for a commitment to oppose any cuts in Social Security benefits, and to oppose a "lame duck" session of Congress.

'Flat Tax' Schemes: Another Way To Boost Your Taxes But Cut Taxes for the Rich

Last year's Reagan tax cut was a "trickle-down" tax cut, with most of the savings going to the wealthy and big business. Very little has trickled down to low- and middle-income Americans. Instead, the Reagan policies have increased the federal deficit, kept interest rates high and destroyed more than 2 million jobs.

Nevertheless, the trickle-down advocates in Congress and the White House want even more trickle-down, less fairness in the tax code. Now they are pushing a scheme called "flat-tax" rates. What it means is more taxes for you, and more big tax cuts for the wealthy (see chart, right).

The flat tax scheme is receiving quite a bit of attention in Congress. At least six members have introduced flat-tax bills. President Reagan is "highly sympathetic" to the idea and may include his own plan in next year's budget, according to Budget Director David Stockman.

The flat-tax schemes are winning support of members of Congress who should know better, because (1) the unfair flat tax rate is combined with (2) closing of some tax loopholes.

It is true that the current tax code is overly complicated and riddled with many questionable and inequitable exemptions, deductions and exclusions. And it is unfair that the wealthy are the principal beneficiaries of the loopholes.

The proponents of flat-tax schemes would begin by changing the federal income tax from a progressive (gradually increasing) rate structure to a flat rate for all taxpayers, no matter how rich or poor. On top of this they promise the "sweetener"--closing of some tax loopholes--though in the end many loopholes might still remain. The Congressional friends of the wealthy promise a deal: some closed loopholes in exchange for a flat rate.

It's a bad deal. On balance, the wealthy would gain much more from the flat rate than they would suffer from closing of loopholes. With the wealthy paying less tax, the rest of us would have to pay more.

If Congress wants to close loopholes and thus increase tax revenues, it can do so without cutting any deal. There is no need to combine loophole-closing with another expensive and unfair tax cut for the wealthy.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative and Senators to oppose flat-tax and modified flat-tax legislation, including such bills as H.R. 6944 in the House and S. 2817 in the Senate.

Grassroots Lobbying in Massachusetts: It Works

AFL-CIO Legislative Action Committees were active during the Labor Day recess, meeting with their Representatives and urging support for labor's agenda in Congress. The LAC in the 4th district of Massachusetts has developed a very close relationship with their Representative, Barney Frank (D). The LAC arranges personal meetings with Frank almost every month, and also uses the telephone and mail to keep Frank informed of workers' concerns. As a result, LAC members were able to thank Rep. Frank for his correct position on every key vote so far this year.

The LAC has received a firm commitment from Rep. Frank in opposition to the balanced budget Constitutional amendment. In addition, he has cosponsored H.R. 5133, the domestic content bill, H.J. Res. 562, the jobs and training bill, and H.R. 6124, the credit control bill.

House Approves Emergency Funds For 250,000 Jobs

By James M. Shevis

A $1-billion emergency funding bill to provide some 250,000 public-sector jobs for the hard-core unemployed cleared the House and went to the Senate, drawing organized labor's praise as a measure that could "help ease the enormous suffering and economic waste now taking place in the nation."

With joblessness officially at 10.8 million workers and unofficially at 17 million, the legislation "makes good economic sense," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said in a letter to each member of the House.

THE HOUSE adopted the measure 223-169 after rejecting a weak Republican-sponsored substitute. Thirty-two Republicans joined 191 Democrats in supporting the bill while 28 Democrats and 141 Republicans voted against it.

The bill, an urgent supplemental appropriations for the Labor Dept., sets funding at 5 percent of the total cost of the nation's unemployment compensation, or about $1 billion off a current total of $20.7 billion. If the measure becomes law, the money would be provided immediately through Dec. 31 even though the 1982 fiscal year ends Sept. 30.

Temporary jobs provided under the bill would involve work in the repair, maintenance and rehabilitation of public facilities, public safety and health activities, and other actions essential to community welfare, including road and bridge repair and maintenance, fire hazard inspections, water systems improvements, security for schools, and other needed services.

ABOUT 140,000 of the jobs are earmarked for unemployed adults, the remainder for those between the ages of 16 and 21. Participants would be limited to working no more than six months and could be paid no more than $5,000 during that time.

Before the House action, Speaker Thomas O'Neill (D-Mass.) told a news conference: "We gave the President his program last year . . . but we're not going to sit back while unemployment goes higher and higher." The Administration opposed the bill's passage, with House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel of Illinois ridiculing it as a "flimflam."

In the debate over procedural action that preceded the House vote, O'Neill answered Michel's charge by pointing out that unemployment in the GOP leader's home district is 16 percent, and that county officials there say four bridges do not qualify as safe and need repair work that could be performed under the Democratic bill.

HOUSE MAJORITY Leader Jim Wright (D-Texas), describing the jobs bill as "the centerpiece of this week's effort," predicted Senate passage of the measure, a view shared by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Senate Minority Leader Robert Byrd, who introduced identical legislation.

"This Congress, this Administration can-

Reagan Set Back

Veto Override Reflects Resistance to New Cuts

The congressional override of President Reagan's veto of a $14.1-billion supplemental appropriations bill shows that the American people "have reached the limit, and have said no to callous, coldblooded destruction of essential services," the AFL-CIO declared.

The immediate beneficiaries of the override are those unemployed workers who have exhausted their unemployment benefits, the federation's legislative director, Ray Denison, pointed out. The congressional action provides funds for staff to handle the newly enacted extension of jobless benefits. Also saved are older worker programs, education for the disadvantaged, student financial aid, mass transit, highway and other programs.

"UNDOUBTEDLY, the reason for the override was that more than 100 members of the President's own party in Congress rejected his claim that the bill was a 'budget buster,'" Denison said. "The spending bill put into effect by the Congress is $1 billion less than the President originally requested. It simply put the money where the need is."

The measure provides money for federal agencies and programs to continue operating through the 1982 fiscal year, which ends Sept. 30. It includes $6 billion the government needs to meet its payroll this week. Many federal workers would have faced layoffs if the veto had been sustained and agreement on a new bill could not be reached.

If the President's veto had stuck, it would also have cut off funds that allow some 54,000 low-income persons 55 or older to work up to 20 hours a week at modest salaries in day care centers, hospitals and in programs providing services to homebound aged and handicapped persons.

PRESIDENT JACOB Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens praised Congress for its "magnificent bipartisan" action in overriding the veto—a stinging defeat for the President—and observed: "Compassion still lives in America."

"Our hopes are buoyed by the sterling defense of Title V of the Older Americans Act in both houses," said Clayman. "These senior aides transport the elderly to places they cannot reach on their own, carry

Chrysler Accord Moves Toward UAW Parity Goal

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached tentative agreement with the Chrysler Corp. on a new contract that UAW President Douglas Fraser said would achieve "our principal goal to start the Chrysler workers on the long, long road back to parity with workers at General Motors and Ford."

The agreement, which must yet be ratified by union members, came six hours after the deadline for settlement had passed. UAW agreements with the nation's third largest auto maker expired at 12:01 a.m. Sept. 15, but the two sides extended negotiations for another 24 hours.

THE ACCORD covers 43,200 active Chrysler workers in the United States, plus another 40,000 on indefinite layoff. Complete details were not available, but Fraser told a press conference following the settlement the agreement would reduce wage differences between Chrysler workers and workers at General Motors Corp. and

14-Month-Old Recession Drags On

A slew of bleak government reports on the economy dashed any hopes for an early recovery from the 14-month-old Reagan Recession.

The latest monthly report on factory production showed another decline of five-tenths of 1 percent—the 11th monthly falloff in the past 13 months. Arrayed alongside this dreary report from the Federal Reserve Board were others reflecting rising inventories, a slump in retail sales, plunging new-car sales, and continued high unemployment and business plans to deepen capital spending cuts.

MEANWHILE, interest rates—still historically high—marked time. After falling 3 percentage points in less than two months, the key prime lending rate that big banks charge their best corporate customers has held at 13.5 percent for nearly four weeks. Many observers attribute the current recession and the economy's apparent inability to bounce back to the high rates generated by the Federal Reserve Board's tight hold on monetary aggregates.

Hardest hit by the downturn is the auto industry. The Fed's August report on factory production showed that the auto industry reduced its assembly rate more than 16 percent to an annual rate of 5.5-million vehicles. At about the same time, the industry reported sales of domestic new cars plunged 29 percent in the first 10 days of September from last year's levels.

"We have more inventory on our hands than we would like to have at this point," observed Robert Cook, general sales manager of General Motors' Chevrolet division. "Customers just aren't biting to the extent we had hoped."

Other significant details of the central bank's report on August industrial output were a further slide of 1.4 percent in business equipment production and a 1.2 percent drop in consumer goods.

Another reflection of the slack economy was seen in a Fed report that U.S. factories last month used only 69.4 percent of their capacity, the lowest operating rate since March 1975 when the country was emerging from another severe recession.

ALSO TELLING were two separate Commerce Dept. reports on business plans and activities. One showed business inventories edged up one-tenth of 1 percent in July as sales declined and interest rates stayed high. The other said that a government survey of U.S. businesses taken in late July and early August showed that American firms plan to spend 4.4 percent less on new plant and equipment this year than in 1981. In an April-May survey,

Asbestos Bankruptcy Move Assailed

By Press Associates, Inc.

While more than 8,000 workers die every year from cancer caused by exposure to asbestos on the job, industry and government are busy pointing fingers of blame at each other over the responsibility.

Organized labor faults both for failing to resolve the issue through tougher occupational health regulations and an overhaul of the workers' compensation system to make industry assume its responsibility.

OPERATING ENGINEERS President J. C. Turner, who chairs the AFL-CIO standing committee on occupational safety and health, said problems raised by the bankruptcy claim of the Manville Corp. to escape liability for asbestos exposure are only "the tip of the iceberg" for substances causing occupational disease.

Turner said Congress must take a "hard look at the whole workers' compensation and product liability systems and make some determination that will deter industry from exposing workers to toxic materials, ensure that workers will be compensated fairly and adequately, and that employers and manufacturers will be held accountable."

"It would be inequitable to permit Manville to escape its responsibilities," Turner said. "It would be outrageous to bail out Manville and ignore millions of American workers who have been and continue to be exposed to toxic substances without a much needed solution to the issue of compensation for occupational diseases."

THE LATEST round of blame-shifting occurred at oversight hearings by a House Labor Standards subcommittee on bankruptcy filings by Manville Corp., the world's largest asbestos producer, and the smaller UNR Industries, Inc.

Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) said Congress and asbestos victims are "understandably skeptical" when a company like Manville claims to be "in good shape" while filing for bankruptcy due to asbestos liability suits.

"Let none of us be confused further by industry's allegation that much of the blame for the bankruptcies is due to the failure of government to meet its financial responsibilities," Miller said.

"The government, in fact, is paying millions of dollars a year to hundreds of asbestos victims who were federal employees, and for whom we are responsible." He said the government cannot accept potentially billions of dollars in liability for victims who are the responsibility of private industry.

MILLER SAID witnesses at earlier hearings on his proposed compensation law estimated the government also pays over $3 billion annually through social security, Medicare, veterans' benefits and other programs to occupational disease victims.

It would be "profoundly unwise" and would set a "dangerous precedent," Miller said, for the federal government to pay workers' compensation for private employees of industry confronted with large liabilities "which are of its own making."

The Reagan Administration insists that the government must not shoulder more than its share of the blame for asbestos exposure. J. Paul McGrath, assistant attorney general for the Justice Dept.'s civil division, said the Administration would continue to fight any attempt to use the U.S. Treasury as the first "deep purse" to dig into in asbestos litigation or compensation.

McGRATH SAID Justice has taken "strong exception" to allegations by the asbestos industry that the federal government knew about the hazards of asbestos and should assume responsibility for litigation by shipyard workers under contract by the U.S. government. Many of those shipyard suits stem from exposure during World War II.

The government's position is that if these workers were government employees, then they can file under workers' compensation law, McGrath said. If they are not, then the workers can sue private industry, which had control over most exposure situations, he said.

Manville's filing for reorganization under Chapter 11 of the Federal Bankruptcy Code, citing liabilities projected for pending and future asbestos litigation, further complicates the situation. McGrath called Manville's bankruptcy action an "extraordinarily unusual situation" because the company is solvent in other respects, but he would not comment on the legitimacy of the claim.

THIS WAS due in part to the current rewriting of sections of the 1978 Bankruptcy Act by Congress under order from the U.S. Supreme Court. Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), chairman of the Senate Judiciary subcommittee on the courts, called Manville's bankruptcy claim "dubious." He said his panel may address the issue as it rewrites the law before the court-appointed Oct. 4 deadline.

Manville Vice President G. Earl Parker told the House panel that the federal government is responsible for a substantial number of asbestos disease cases in "every moral, social and legal sense." He said the company's bankruptcy claim was "necessary," not only because of financial accounting requirements, but also to provide equitable compensation for present and future asbestos health claimants.

In addition to 16,500 pending asbestos-related lawsuits, Manville said a recent study contracted by the company shows it may face at least 32,000 future lawsuits through the year 2001, costing more than $2 billion. Parker said the Denver-based firm's $1.1 billion in assets could not meet that cost, and the study was the basis of its decision to file for bankruptcy.

THE STUDY, performed by Epidemiology Resources, Inc., of Boston, has been questioned by attorneys representing asbestos victims, who have announced they will fight bankruptcy.

UNR Industries of Chicago, whose representatives also appeared at the House hearing, filed for a similar bankruptcy in July. UNR President David Leavitt said the small company faces 17,000 lawsuits, compared to 4,000 in 1970. The company, like Mansville, currently is embroiled in litigation with insurance companies over workers' compensation coverage for asbestos-related diseases.

In a recent Labor Dept. report, Dr. Irving Selikoff of the Mt. Sinai School of Medicine in New York estimated that 21 million American workers have been exposed to asbestos over the last 40 years.

SELIKOFF estimated that 8,200 to 9,700 excess deaths occur annually from asbestos-related cancer, such as mesothelioma, a lung lining cancer caused only by asbestos, lung cancer and asbestos-related cancers in other body organs.

These estimates do not include deaths from asbestosis, a chronic lung disease. There is no known "safe" threshold for asbestos exposure, according to Selikoff, a leading expert in asbestos diseases.

Selikoff's study showed that only about half the asbestos victims filing for workers' compensation disability claims under the current system live long enough to collect benefits. Only about 15 percent of all disabled asbestos workers received workers' compensation benefits prior to their death.

Much of the litigation concerning asbestos-induced disease contends the industry has been aware of the hazards since the 1930s, when British studies revealed asbestos-related health hazards. Industry has denied this.

Manville's Parker testified that the firm has sought a "prompt and fair" compensation program for asbestos workers for several years.

This provoked an angry outburst from Rep. Phillip Burton (D-Calif.), an author of the Black Lung bill which set up a federal compensation program for miners to bail out the coal industry.

"You have taken the same position as the coal industry," said Burton. "I am unaware of any effort by Manville to protect workers or maintain their income. . . . Don't pretend you come here with clean hands because you don't."

BURTON pointed out that the panel had to hear this testimony while the Reagan Administration is cutting back Occupational Safety & Health Administration protection, thus compounding current problems in the future.

In a statement shortly after Manville announced bankruptcy filing, Sheldon Samuels, director of occupational safety and health for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., criticized industry and government. He said OSHA failed to upgrade its asbestos standard, the asbestos industry covered up asbestos hazards, and the federal workers' compensation system failed to "protect the legal and financial rights of workers and their families."

"The irony of the current situation," Samuels said, "is that the very mistakes Manville and other companies in the asbestos industry made in the past continue to be repeated. They still falsify the scientific evidence. The current OSHA standard, a weaker version of a similar British measure, continues to permit cancer and lung disease to be generated among workers and the general public."

Samuels charged that OSHA under the Reagan Administration, at industry's request, withdrew a proposal formulated in 1979 to strengthen the asbestos standard.

EARLIER this year, Rep. Miller proposed a workers' compensation bill for asbestos and uranium ore victims that would have paid benefits out of a fund created by industry contributions. The bill would have allowed presumptions that asbestos causes certain diseases—proof of which usually must be established in each lawsuit or disability case—and would have limited lawsuits by workers against asbestos companies or employers.

George H. R. Taylor, AFL-CIO safety and health director, said the AFL-CIO would continue to oppose any legislation that would deprive workers of their full legal rights to seek relief or which would let industry off the hook in taking responsibility for the costs of worker illnesses which it causes.

New York Delegates Demand Action to Stem Job Losses

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—Delegates representing New York State's two million union members denounced the Reagan Administration's economic program as a "fraud" and called for quick action to reduce the number of jobless throughout the state.

"American workers are being deceived by President Reagan and his policy makers," State AFL-CIO President Raymond Corbett charged in his keynote address. "Instead of prosperity and economic growth, Reagan has given us the highest unemployment since the Depression."

CORBETT ALSO denounced Reagan's "New Federalism" proposals to shift key federal programs to the states. He charged that the scheme would cost New York State $1.7 billion in lost revenue from Washington in the first year.

The 1,500 delegates to the State AFL-CIO's 22nd convention unanimously approved resolutions calling for improvements in the state's unemployment insurance and workers' compensation programs. New York currently ranks 40th in jobless benefits and 32nd in workers' compensation benefits.

Corbett urged delegates to press for a special session of the legislature for the purpose of improving benefit levels, which he noted are currently below the poverty level for a family of four.

Gov. Hugh Carey, who is leaving office in December after serving eight years, used his address to thank union members who had supported him as a member of Congress and as governor.

The convention endorsed Lt. Gov. Mario Cuomo in the Democratic primary and former U.S. Atty. Paul Curran in the Republican primary for governor.

Delegates also endorsed Democratic Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan for re-election, and the senator responded in an address to the convention, condemning "Reaganomics" and pledging their continued opposition to the Administration's economic policies.

AFL-CIO COPE Director John Perkins stressed the importance of labor's efforts in this year's elections "to elect friends of working people to the House and Senate in November."

Sec.-Treas. John Mara of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. urged the delegates to use the buying power of their union wages to promote union-made products and union establishments.

FOLLOWING Mara's address, the delegates unanimously approved a resolution condemning the recent purchase by the state's Metropolitan Transportation Authority of foreign-built subway cars. Other resolutions called on the state and its agencies to buy American-made products whenever possible.

Corbett and Howard Molisani of the Ladies' Garment Workers were unanimously re-elected as president and secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO. In addition, Ed Gray, a regional director of the Auto Workers, was elected to the Executive Council.

The mood of the four-day convention was summed up by one delegate when he said from the floor: "Reaganomics is no longer the case of the cure being worse than the disease. Reaganomics is the disease."

TOP OFFICIALS of the Egyptian Trade Union Federation visited AFL-CIO headquarters recently to become better acquainted with the American labor movement and to further mutual understanding between their country and the United States. Welcoming the group was Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, along with International Affairs Rep. Mark Anderson, left, and Gebresalassie Gebremariam, program officer for the African-American Labor Center, right. The visitors are, left to right, President Saaid Gooma of Egypt's Union of Metal Workers, President Ahmed Elemmaani of the Union of Oil & Chemical Workers, President Mokhtar Youssef of the Union of Education Employees and Galaad Zeeid, ETUF international affairs representative.

Chrysler Pact Step Toward Parity Goal

Ford Motor Co. from about $2.60 to about $2 an hour. The average hourly wage at Chrysler is $9.07.

Chrysler workers gave up a cost-of-living adjustment and a 3-percent annual wage boost last year to help keep the company from bankruptcy. The concessions were sought by the U.S. government before it guaranteed $1.5 billion loans to the troubled firm.

FRASER TOLD reporters the new Chrysler agreement calls for resumption of COL payments in December at the same rate that applies to GM and Ford workers. If inflation stands at 6 percent, workers will receive 16 cents an hour in the first quarter of 1983 and 17 cents an hour in each of the second and third quarters for a total increase of about 50 cents an hour by a year from now.

The parties also agreed to a wage increase linked to profits. Chrysler lost $3.27 billion from 1979 to 1981, but earned $256 million in the first six months of 1982. Under the new contract, which runs for one year, if Chrysler's profits in any quarter equal $20-$50 million, $4 million would be set aside for wage increases. If profits exceed $50 million, $8 million would be set aside.

Fraser said that if forecasts are accurate, there would be a wage increase payment in the fourth quarter of this year. He said also that workers will not have to pay part of their medical bills, a proposal that Chrysler had sought. The company had demanded modifications in health insurance coverage to make workers subject to copayments and deductibles.

THE UAW PRESIDENT characterized gains under the settlement as "modest," but added, "We couldn't have gotten anything better without a prolonged strike." The first step in the ratification process was scheduled for Sept. 17, when the agreement was to be put before the UAW's Chrysler Council.

Scattered strikes of workers occurred after the deadline extension passed at 12:01 a.m. Sept. 16, though the union had not called for a walkout.

SOUNDS OF SOLIDARITY DAY album recorded live includes musical entertainment and speeches from the historic march and rally last Sept. 19 in Washington, D.C. The album was produced for Worker Records by Joe Uehlein, an organizer for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. He presented a souvenir copy to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and said all proceeds from its sales will be donated to AFL-CIO COPE. Copies are available for $9.50 from Worker Records, 1233 Kearney St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20017.

Iowa Convention Focuses On Organizing for Election

Waterloo, Iowa—Delegates to the Iowa AFL-CIO's 27th annual convention focused on efforts to get labor-endorsed candidates elected in November as a referendum on failing Reagan Administration economic policies.

State Federation President James Wengert warned in his keynote address that labor's friends won't be automatically elected because of strong reaction to President Reagan's job-destroying policies.

"WE'VE GOT to organize with the same intensity we organized for Solidarity Day if Solidarity Day II—Election Day—is to produce victories for pro-labor candidates," he told the 225 delegates.

Wengert also warned that right-wing groups will resort to single-issue smokescreens and diversions in attempts to splinter labor's coalitions and "to hide the fact that their programs have wreaked havoc on the economy."

The convention gave a warm welcome to Democratic gubernatorial candidate Roxanne Conlin who will face Republican Lt. Gov. Terry Branstad in November. Charging that Branstad has a 10-year anti-labor, anti-people record, Conlin noted that her opponent has long been the "darling of the New Right in Iowa," although he now labels himself a moderate.

IN MAJOR convention action, delegates voted to switch to biennial conventions as a cost-cutting move with the first scheduled for 1984. COPE endorsing conventions will continue to be held in election years. Delegates also approved a cutback in the frequency of the Iowa AFL-CIO News to quarterly from eight times a year because of skyrocketing mailing costs.

In other action, the convention called for total implementation of the federal Humphrey-Hawkins full employment law, a reduction in the workweek without lowering wages and increased efforts to get unemployed workers registered for the elections.

Delegates also reaffirmed support for labor's boycott of Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., where the Food & Commercial Workers have been on strike for three months in protest against management's demand to slash wages.

THE CONVENTION called on Iowa trade unionists to join in food caravans with union members from Nebraska and South Dakota to aid the striking UFCW members at Dakota City, Neb. More than $60,000 in contributions was raised in three states for the effort.

Convention speakers in addition to Conlin included National COPE Director John Perkins, President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, AFL-CIO Regional Director James Freeman and Bob Anderson, labor-endorsed candidate for lieutenant governor of Iowa.

Court Rejects R-T-W Claim On Scope of Dues Rebate

Sacramento, Calif.—The U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals denied a claim by a group of Western Airlines employees covered by an agency shop agreement for a rebate of monies used by their bargaining representative for organizing, conventions, publications, litigation and other similar functions.

In a 2-to-1 decision, the federal appeals court endorsed the position of the Railway & Airline Clerks that these activities "are germane to the work of the union in the realm of collective bargaining."

In its ruling, the court rejected the position of the National Right to Work Legal Defense Fund.

THE MAJORITY decision also upheld BRAC's arrangement of rebating a portion of union dues to members who object to the use of funds to support "certain political and ideological causes not germane to collective bargaining."

BRAC President Richard I. Kilroy said the union was gratified by both parts of the appeals court ruling.

The case dates back to 1973 when the union-busting National Right to Work Fund challenged the union's expenditures of funds coming from dues and fees collected under the agency shop clause in the Western Airlines-BRAC collective bargaining agreement.

The suits were based on the theory that the plaintiffs could not be required to contribute to any union costs except the direct cost of negotiating and administering the Western Airlines collective bargaining agreement.

In 1975, BRAC instituted a retroactive voluntary rebate program for members who objected to the use of dues money for certain political and ideological activities not directly related bargaining.

UNDER THE rebate arrangement, approved by the District Court, protesting workers were returned $1 per year dating back to their original protest, except for 1975—when the rebate amounted to about $4.

The plaintiffs rejected that arrangement as inadequate and the U.S. District Court in San Diego ruled in favor of the dissidents, but the appeals court majority overturned that ruling.

IN WELCOMING the appeals court finding on BRAC's rebate plan, Kilroy said the decision "is a tribute to the men and women in our union who instituted that system precisely to ensure that objectors' legal rights are respected."

The decision is also significant, Kilroy said, in overturning the trial court and upholding the union's longstanding position that "under the Railway Labor Act, an employee who is covered by a union security agreement does have to share in paying for such typical international union activities as the regular convention, regular publications, and organizing the unorganized — all of which activities the court concluded are 'germane to the union's work in the realm of collective bargaining.'"

UTU Weighs Accord With Rail Carriers

Leaders of the United Transportation Union will meet next week to consider a tentative settlement with the railroad industry that would avert a possible strike.

UTU negotiators and bargainers for the nation's major rail carriers initialed a memorandum of agreement dealing with unresolved issues in a number of areas.

AT NEXT WEEK'S meeting in Chicago, on Sept. 24, UTU officials will decide to reject or ratify the new agreement. Attending the meeting will be some 250 UTU general chairmen and local chairmen as well.

Under the Railway Labor Act, the union would be free to strike the carriers on Sept. 20. The parties have been negotiating on recommendations made Aug. 20 by a presidential emergency board appointed a month earlier to study the issues in the bargaining dispute.

Still unsettled is a dispute between the railroads and the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers, who are free to strike Sept. 19. Both the UTU and the BLE are seeking to negotiate variations of the industry settlement agreed to by 11 other unions last year.

IN THE UTU talks, future utilization of cabooses on freight trains became the major negotiating issue. The presidential emergency panel said that some cutback in cabooses should take place over the next few years. UTU argued that eliminating cabooses could be hazardous to both workers and the public, and that any reductions ought to be handled on a carrier-by-carrier basis with each freight run evaluated.

The panel also said that meal allowances should be raised to reflect increases in the cost of living, and recognized the validity of certain other UTU arguments.

Public Employee Wages Rise 8.1% In '82 Contracts

State and local government workers covered by major collective bargaining contracts negotiated in the first six months of 1982 received first-year compensation gains averaging 8.1 percent, slightly higher than the 7.8-percent average gain for all of 1981.

Over the life of the contracts, the annual compensation gain also averaged 8.1 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. The figure compares with a 7.3-percent average gain in 1981 settlements.

WAGES ALONE rose an average 7.6 percent in the first contract year and 7.9 percent annually over the life of the agreements reached in the January-June 1982 period. The figures compare to 1981 gains of 7.4 and 7.1 percent, respectively.

The BLS figures are limited to bargaining units with at least 5,000 workers. There are 82 such units covering 1,010,000 employees, or about one-fourth of all state and local government employees under negotiated agreements. In the first six months of 1982, data were reported on 21 settlements covering 308,000 workers.

Morrell Strikers Gain 3-Year Pact

The Food & Commercial Workers reached agreement with John Morrell & Co. on a new three-year contract covering some 3,000 workers at the meatpacker's plants in Sioux Falls, S.D.; Estherville, Iowa, and East St. Louis, Ill.

The settlement resolved a 12-day strike against Morrell.

The pact follows the pattern in agreements with Armour & Co., Wilson Food Corp., and other major packers last December and earlier this year providing for a freeze in wages and cost-of-living adjustments in return for job security. The contract also provides improvements in pension and medical benefits.

In addition to agreement on the master pattern, negotiators resolved local issues, including Morrell's plan to close the Sioux Falls beef and lamb departments. The company agreed to rescind a notice on the closing issued last month. Some 600 workers would have been affected by the closing.

Both parties expressed satisfaction with the overall agreement, saying the settlement addressed the industry's "needs and realities."

Labor-Backed Candidates Do Well in Primaries

Sen. Howard Cannon of Nevada and former Gov. Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts were renominated in two of the most closely contested Democratic races as elections in 12 states brought the 1982 primaries near a finish.

Cannon had labor's endorsement in turning back a challenge from Rep. Jim Santini. Dukakis reversed the outcome of 1978 by beating conservative Democratic Gov. Edward King in what was billed as a test of Reaganomics because of King's close adherence to the President's policies.

PRIMARIES HAVE yet to be held in New York (Sept. 21) and Hawaii (Sept. 18), and runoffs are still ahead in Florida and Alabama.

Otherwise, the slates are set for November—when at least three of the Senate candidates nominated with little or no opposition will face theyear's biggest races in their bids for re-election.

Democrats Paul Sarbanes of Maryland and Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts have been targeted by heavy-spending conservative political action committees, and Salt Lake City Mayor Ted Wilson will face Republican Sen. Orrin Hatch, the chairman of the Senate Labor Committee who has a lifetime voting record of 90 percent wrong on labor's scorecard.

Sarbanes won over token opposition in Maryland, where Democratic Gov. Harry Hughes was also renominated. Sarbanes will face Larry Hogan, a former officer of the anti-union Associated Builders & Contractors, in November. All six of Maryland's incumbent Democratic House members were renominated, five of them with endorsement from COPE.

IN MASSACHUSETTS, Kennedy will face Republican Ray Shamie and Dukakis's opponent will be former Boston city councilor John Sears. Only two of the state's 10 Democratic House members had opponents in winning nomination and neither of the two GOP House members did.

Rep. Clement J. Zablocki of Wisconsin easily won renomination in what was touted as a close race, and the state's Democrats also renominated Sen. William Proxmire. The governor's seat, vacated by Republican Lee S. Dreyfus, will be contested between Democrat Anthony Earl and Republican Terry Kohler. A nuclear freeze was endorsed by voters in the nation's first state ballot question on the issue.

Gov. Richard Snelling of Vermont will face Lt. Gov. Madeleine Kunin, who won the Democratic nomination with the backing of labor. Republican Sen. Robert Stafford will face Democrat James Guest.

IN RHODE ISLAND, Democratic Gov. Joseph Garrahy and Republican Sen. John Chafee had no primary opposition.

In Nevada, Cannon's Republican opponent will be Chic Hecht, and COPE-endorsed candidates won both Democratic House nominations—Harry Reid for the seat Santini left and Mary Gojack for the state's new seat.

Sen. Henry Jackson of Washington was renominated for a sixth term, and his Republican opponent will be Doug Jewett. In House races, labor has endorsed all seven Democrats, five of them incumbents.

DEMOCRATIC governors Hugh Gallen of New Hampshire and Richard Lamm of Colorado were renominated in states which have few contested primaries. House speaker John Fuhur will oppose Lamm, and Tufts professor John Sununu will test Gallen in November.

Labor-backed candidates ran well in contested Democratic congressional primaries held a week earlier in Florida, Connecticut and Arizona, but just missed upsetting a "boll weevil" incumbent in Alabama.

Senators and governors seeking renomination in states that held Sept. 7 primaries won easily or were unopposed. The most widely watched gubernatorial primary was in Alabama, where George C. Wallace sought to regain the office he had held for 12 years. Wallace, still immobilized by the bullet that halted his presidential quest in 1972, led but fell short of a majority. He will face Lt. Gov. George McMillan in a Sept. 28 runoff.

FLORIDA, which picked up four House seats in the post-census reapportionment, renominated all but one incumbent seeking renomination. The exception was the 4th District, around Daytona Beach, where conservative Democrat Bill Chappell, Jr., was forced into an Oct. 5 runoff with Reid Hughes, a COPE-endorsed businessman who challenged Chappell's support of Reagan spending cuts.

In the new 9th District, COPE-backed George H. Sheldon defeated a conservative Democratic opponent, while his Republican opponent will be picked in a runoff. COPE-backed Democrats also won contested elections in three other open districts—Brad Culverhouse in the 12th, Dana N. Stevens in the 13th and Larry Smith in the 16th.

There was special interest in the 15th District, now represented by Republican E. Clay Shaw, Jr., who was helped by a redistricting. The Democratic nomination was won by COPE-supported Edward J. Stack, who served in the 96th Congress.

Only two Connecticut congressional districts had opposing candidates, and both Democratic winners were labor-backed. In the 3rd District, Bruce Morrison won an upset victory to face incumbent Republican Lawrence J. DeNardis in November. The 2nd District Democratic contest, for the seat that Toby Moffett is giving up to run for the Senate, was won by William E. Curry, Jr.

IN A NEW Arizona district, in the Tucson area, Jim McNulty won with COPE support over a primary opponent who called him "too liberal." He will face a close race in November against Republican Jim Kolbe.

In Alabama districts with contested House contests, COPE-backed Billy Joe Camp was nominated to face incumbent Republican William L. Dickinson in the fall. Conservative Democratic incumbent Richard C. Shelby won renomination against an unexpectedly strong challenge from COPE-backed Jack Kartus and will have no Republican opposition.

Wholesale Price Rise Continues Moderate Pace

Prices at the wholesale level rose another six-tenths of 1 percent in August, the same increase as the previous month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

Analysts found no signs of an economic recovery in the August report on producer prices, however, as key commodities continued to reflect weak demand. Construction materials at the intermediate level—one of the first areas to show strength in a recovery—fell by four-tenths of 1 percent last month, marking the largest drop since April 1980. Prices of crude nonfood items and nonenergy goods also were soft, declining six-tenths of 1 percent.

OVER THE YEAR, wholesale prices have risen a moderate 4 percent. Changes in producer prices are regarded as a harbinger of future consumer price changes.

The latest producer price report showed that among finished goods ready for sale to the consumer energy rose far less in price than in either June or July. On the other hand, food prices inched up after a sharp decline in July.

BLS said prices for capital equipment and goods other than food and energy increased somewhat more than in July. Prices of intermediate goods, or items that require further processing, edged down one-tenth of 1 percent in August, following three consecutive months of small increases. Crude material prices dropped six-tenths of 1 percent, their third monthly decline in a row.

PRICES OF finished energy goods climbed 1.2 percent, marking the smallest rise in the last three months. BLS said price increases "slowed markedly" for both gasoline and natural gas, and prices for home heating oil edged down. Energy prices jumped 4.1 percent in June and 5.7 percent in July at the wholesale level after falling during the first five months of the year. Over the year ended in August, finished energy prices were up by only three-tenths of 1 percent.

Producer food prices edged up one-tenth of 1 percent last month after falling by 1.5 percent in July. BLS said prices turned up for fish, fresh fruits, pork, and processed poultry.

Auto prices went up 2.4 percent in August, as factories provided only weak incentives to dealers to lower prices.

THE GEORGE MEANY wing of the Workmen's Circle Home and Infirmary for the Aged was officially opened Sept. 12 by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. The 30-bed addition to the Bronx, N.Y., facility contains a dining room, recreation area, and medical offices. The home for trade unionists cares for more than 500 residents, 171 of them between the ages of 91 and 102.

School Administrators Press Growth in Size, Influence

Kiamesha Lake, N.Y.—Delegates to the third convention of the American Federation of School Administrators reviewed the union's progress and achievements since it received its international charter in 1975, and mapped plans for the future.

In an address to the 92 delegates and 48 alternates, President Peter S. O'Brien pointed out that efforts in the organizing area have grown significantly, and that the union has made its presence known in state legislatures on matters affecting its members.

THE UNION represents middle-level school supervisors, including principals and vice principals, in 14 states and Puerto Rico.

O'Brien cited AFSA efforts to influence the California state legislature on the matter of equitable distribution of state funds, and the Michigan State Council's daily battles to ensure contract integrity and avoid layoffs in a state with the highest jobless rate in the country.

During the three-day meeting, delegates also elected officers, attended a number of professional conferences, and heard from several speakers.

O'Brien was re-elected to a three-year term. Also returned to office were Sec.-Treas. Ted Elsberg and Executive Vice President Martin Kalish.

The convention approved a phased-in dues increase. Monthly per capita payments will rise from the current $3 to $3.50 in 1983 and later to $4. Delegates also endorsed plans to relocate the union's headquarters from New York City to the Washington, D.C., area. Details of the relocation plan have yet to be worked out.

O'BRIEN OPENED the convention with an appeal to help make Solidarity Day II—Election Day, Nov. 2—the beginning of the end of the Reagan Administration. He also announced a number of new insurance benefits available through the union to members.

Speakers included President Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers; San Francisco Schools Supt. Robert Alioto; Pontiac, Mich., Schools Supt. Odell Nails, and Vice President Joyce Miller of the Clothing & Textile Workers, who is president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and an AFL-CIO vice president.

Montana Labor Girds for All-Out Effort in Election

Helena, Mont. — The Montana AFL-CIO is moving into the election campaign with membership at an all-time high and affiliates united in battle against Reagan Administration policies nationally and union-busters in the state legislature.

New affiliations and reaffiliations boosted the state federation's membership nearly 20 percent over last year, a gain that platform speakers and delegates alike attributed to a coming together in the face of adversity.

"Times are tough, but we're tough too," was the slogan on buttons worn by delegates and on a large convention banner.

RESOLUTIONS passed by the state federation's 26th annual convention reiterated labor's commitment to coalition-buildings with other progressive groups in the state and warned against the balanced budget constitutional amendment pending in Congress.

Delegates took note of increased activity by "right-to-work" forces in Montana and of pressure to repeal the state's "little Davis-Bacon Act," which requires prevailing wages on state-funded construction.

Montana is one of the few states without a state sales tax, and delegates strongly urged that it remain so. That will be one of the issues in the legislative contests.

The convention also urged enactment of legislation requiring advance notice of plant closing and endorsed an initiative that will be on the November ballot requiring that at least 25 percent of the state's coal tax trust fund be invested within the state.

A CONVENTION banquet was turned into a good-natured "roast" of James W. Murry, the state federation's executive secretary. The master of ceremonies for the surprise event was President Robert F. Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, who had been billed as the banquet speaker.

National COPE Director John Perkins and James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, were among the convention speakers.

Delegates endorsed incumbent Democrats John Melcher for the Senate and Pat Williams for one of the state's two House seats. Democrat Howard Lyman will have labor's support in running against incumbent Ronald Malenee for the other seat.

Organizing, Health Issues

UAW Sues Labor Dept. On Enforcement Failures

The Auto Workers have taken the Reagan Administration to court on charges of failing to enforce laws governing the reporting of anti-union activities and of concealing evidence on the cancer risk workers face from exposure to formaldehyde.

In one suit filed with the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia against Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, the UAW accused the Labor Dept. of neglecting to require Kawasaki Motor Corp. and its hired law firm to file reports under provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

ACCORDING TO the suit, Donovan rejected the UAW's complaint of noncompliance even though Labor Dept. investigators found that Kawasaki had engaged in a number of reportable activities during the union's organizing campaign in 1978 and 1979 at the company's Lincoln, Neb., plant. The suit also accuses the consulting law firm of Tate, Bruckner & Sykes of Lincoln, Neb., of anti-union activities that were not reported.

The suit notes that under the Freedom of Information Act the UAW obtained a Labor Dept. report which disclosed that the company had refused the department's requests to file the reports required under the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The anti-union activities that should have been reported, according to the suit, included spying on workers through planted agents, assistance in establishing an anti-union employee organization, training supervisors to sway workers against organizing, and payments for information about the UAW's history and activities.

SECTION 203 of the Landrum-Griffin Act requires an employer to file reports with the Secretary of Labor detailing any expenditures intended to directly or indirectly influence the organizing or collective bargaining rights of employees. Consultants hired to persuade workers to reject unionization are also required to file reports under the law.

The suit asks the court to order Donovan and Assistant Labor Sec. Donald L. Dotson, head of the department's labor-management relations division, to enforce the provision of the law.

In the formaldehyde suit filed earlier in the same federal court, the UAW asked that the Occupational Safety & Health Administration be ordered immediately to reverse its "bad faith" refusal to issue an emergency temporary standard to significantly lower permissible workplace exposure levels to the chemical.

THE UNION also asked the court to require OSHA to make public a number of documents containing evidence that formaldehyde exposure poses a high risk of cancer to workers. The UAW charged that OSHA had this evidence before it refused to issue stiffer exposure limits, but withheld it from the public record.

The union's action was sparked by OSHA's denial in January of a petition for a new standard initiated by the UAW in October 1981 and joined by the AFL-CIO and 11 other unions.

The current OSHA standard limits worker exposure to three parts of formaldehyde per one million parts of air (3 ppm), but the union has called for reducing permissible exposure to "the lowest feasible level." It cited new findings of the hazards posed by formaldehyde, including studies showing nasal cancer in animals exposed to formaldehyde vapor levels comparable to the current workplace limits.

OSHA'S REFUSAL to issue the emergency standard was "arbitrary, capricious, and not in accordance with the law," the union charged. UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said in a statement that the union has "excellent reason to believe that OSHA has withheld evidence in its possession that demonstrates the risks posed by exposure to formaldehyde."

The UAW said its attorneys have or have seen the documents known to be in OSHA's possession when the petition was denied, but the department has not complied with the Auto Workers' requests for copies of reports under the Freedom of Information Act.

Among the documents the UAW wants made public are studies of formaldehyde-related cancer cases, recommendations from the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health for lower exposure levels, an OSHA contractor's report assessing the regulatory impact of lowering exposure standards, and an OSHA staff analysis of risks based on reports of nasal cancer in workers exposed to the chemical.

An estimated 1.6 million workers are exposed to formaldehyde in more than 60 industrial categories, the union noted.

THE UAW said it was turning to the federal court for help with the suit filed against Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan and OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter because of OSHA's continued silence on the documents and its failure to respond to a July 15 appeal for a review of its denial of the original petition.

Fraser said "this is not the first time we have disagreed with the Reagan Administration over OSHA policy."

Rail Signal Union Approves Canadian Members' Spinoff

San Francisco—Nearly 300 delegates to the 42nd regular convention of the Railroad Signalmen approved the withdrawal of Canadian members into an autonomous Canadian union.

The delegates, representing about 14,000 railroad workers, also re-elected President R. T. Bates and Sec.-Treas. W. D. Best by acclamation along with the six vice presidents.

WITHDRAWAL OF the Canadian members to form a new national union in Canada was one of the first orders of business, and the convention unanimously approved a resolution calling for the transfer of jurisdiction and bargaining rights for signalmen employed on Canadian carriers.

Approximately 1,400 Canadian workers will now form the Canadian Signal & Communications Union with former BRS Vice President John Platt leading the group into a founding convention in November.

Delegates approved a series of bargaining goals and acted on a long series of resolutions. In the process, they turned back an attempt to alter the current per capita system which is pegged at one and one-third hours' pay per month at the prevailing signalman-mechanic rate.

IN AN ADDRESS to the delegates, Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.) called for Democratic alternatives to the Reagan Administration's cuts in job training programs, and help for the aged, the handicapped and "people shackled by discrimination and lack of education."

Fred Hardin, president of the United Transportation Union and chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, warned delegates they face a tough battle to save the Railroad Retirement System as it now stands and that they will get no help from management in that battle. But he further observed that rail labor has much to gain by working together for the common good.

Charles Chamberlain, former president of the union and now labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board, reiterated Hardin's warning on the retirement system.

"They think that if they can't dismantle us and abolish the system, they'll strangle it by reducing our personnel," Chamberlain charged. "Rail labor—and only rail labor—is doing the job on the legislative front to protect this system."

RICHARD I. KILROY, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks and executive secretary of the RLEA, emphasized that "to meet today's and tomorrow's challenges, labor must be more united than it ever was in the past. The enemy has grown in size, sophistication and money. We cannot match them in money. But together we can make a difference."

Other speakers included James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; Joseph Walsh, former BRS vice president and now administrator of safety for the Federal Railroad Administration; James Snyder, head of the RLEA legislative committee and national legislative director for UTU; Robert Liggett of the Seaboard Coast Line, and Richard Howard, secretary-treasurer of Labor newspaper.

Newspaper Guild, ITU Agree on Merger

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Special committees of international and local leaders of The Newspaper Guild and the Typographical Union capped talks spanning nearly five years by reaching agreement on a proposal to merge. The proposal is subject to ratification procedures within each union.

The agreement was wrapped up Sept. 10 at the ITU's headquarters here after a four-day meeting of the committees, which met for the first time in November 1977.

THE NEW UNION would be called the Media Employees International Union, ITU/TNG. It would be the largest union made up primarily of newspaper employees in the United States and Canada. The ITU currently has just over 47,000 active members and the Guild about 32,000. The vast majority work for newspapers.

In the Guild, merger must be approved by the international executive board, which will meet the week of Oct. 18, then by a special convention, probably in January, and finally by a membership referendum, probably in March.

In the ITU, the only further step required is approval in a referendum.

Leaders of the two unions have agreed that the membership of each will vote simultaneously on the proposal.

EFFECTIVE date of the merger would be next June 1. The new union's founding convention would be soon thereafter.

ITU President Joe Bingel called the merger proposal "an answer to the challenges" faced by both unions.

"As the new technologies continue to blur the lines of jurisdictional demarcation, the joining together of the two labor bodies into one dynamic, new media union, with not only the determination but the strength to represent its members and fight for their rights, would come at precisely the right moment," he said.

TNG President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., called the merger agreement "a workable blueprint for a viable, aggressive new union."

Headquarters of the new union would be in the ITU's facility here, at least for the first two years. There also would be Washington and Canadian offices.

BETWEEN annual conventions, the new union would be directed by a two-tier structure of leadership: a full-time executive council and a governing board, which would meet at least twice between conventions, as well as immediately before and after the session.

DURING A transition period, there would be nine members of the council, five from the ITU and four from the Guild. Thereafter there would be five council members, elected without regard to membership in either predecessor union.

In addition, during the first half of the transition period, the governing board would be made up of 14 regional and 15 at-large representatives, with membership divided evenly between the predecessor unions for the regional seats while eight of the at-large positions would be filled from the ITU and seven from the Guild. In the second half of the transition, the at-large seats would be reduced to nine—divided five and four. Thereafter there would be seven at-large positions and seven regional, all elected without regard to the predecessor unions.

Local mergers would be encouraged, but would be left to votes by majorities of each of the locals involved. Joint and coordinated bargaining by locals representing employees of the same employers also would be encouraged.

Labor Day

Wreath is laid at a Camden, N.J., memorial to Peter J. McGuire, the founder of Labor Day, which was first observed in 1882. Officiating at the ceremony were New Jersey AFL-CIO President Charles Marciante, left, and Camden AFL-CIO President George Norcross.

At New York's Times Square, more than two dozen unions beamed messages to the public during the holiday weekend.

Youngsters join in the festivities as they line up for hotdogs and drinks at a California picnic.

Marchers, floats and bands drew massive crowds in Chicago for the city's first Labor Day parade in 40 years.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue spoke in California at a Labor Day breakfast and later at a COPE picnic.

One of the many floats in the massive parade on New York's Fifth Avenue promoted the y—1982

In big cities and small communities across the country, the 100th anniversary of Labor Day was given the largest observance in many years by the nation's trade unions.

There were picnics, performances, concerts, demonstrations, marches, fireworks and speeches.

The speakers, marchers and bystanders carried a common message to the Reagan Administration: its policies have brought deep recession, soaring unemployment and misery.

In Louisiana, more than 13,000 workers joined in a solidarity march to the state capitol in Baton Rouge to protest the governor's failure to remedy the state's excessive unemployment rate, estimated at 15 percent.

As many as 40,000 New England trade unionists turned out with their families for a march through Boston to protest Reagan Administration economic policies. The Massachusetts AFL-CIO said the pre-Labor Day rally was the largest demonstration or parade ever held in the state.

In Denver, tens of thousands of persons attended a downtown parade as well as picnics and free concerts at the state capitol.

Even parade bystanders brought a message for President Reagan.

union label. The 100th anniversary celebration drew more than 400,000 persons.

Some 100,000 New Yorkers enjoyed a Sept. 5 street fair that featured entertainment provided by the Bread and Roses cultural program of District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

Detroit School Strike Centers On Pay Issue

Detroit's 10,000 teachers, angered by a school board demand for concessions, struck Sept. 13 as teachers in other towns and cities throughout the country found themselves in similar disputes.

President John Elliott of the Detroit Federation of Teachers predicted the strike would be a long one.

"Considering the board's attitude of the last few weeks and our suspicions that they wanted us out, we would predict that this might be a long strike," Elliott said. In 1979, the union struck for 17 days in a pay dispute.

THE DETROIT strike, the largest of a number of school labor disputes this fall, came when negotiators, including a state mediator, were unable to agree on an economic issue. The two sides had agreed to a three-month extension of the current contract while a panel appointed by the Michigan Employment Relations Commission examined the school board's finances to verify its reported deficit in the 1982-83 operating budget of between $38 and $60 million.

But the parties could not agree on the matter of paying the teachers for four scheduled days off with pay in the interim period. The board wanted to give the teachers compensatory time off for the days worked or defer cash payment until they retired. The union insisted on cash.

Elsewhere in Michigan, about 1,550 teachers in six other districts were on strikes, and teacher walkouts were under way in Illinois, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.

ABOUT 3,300 teachers were on strike in 17 Pennsylvania school districts. Teachers in three Illinois districts were picketing, but a weeklong strike in Palatine-Rolling Meadows District 15 ended in a tentative settlement. Teachers in the Cleveland suburb of North Olmsted ratified an agreement with the school board Sept. 12, ending a seven-day strike there.

Earlier, teachers in Chicago and Philadelphia settled their contract differences. In Philadelphia, agreement on an 18-percent wage increase over three years followed bargaining sessions attended by Mayor William Green.

Coors Beer Slates Layoffs As Sales Continue to Skid

Golden, Colo.—Coors brewery, drained by slumping sales and profits, announced plans to lay off 500 of its 7,000 workers by Oct. 1. Coors beer has been on the AFL-CIO boycott list since April 1977 when members of Directly Affiliated Local Union 366 went on strike.

The company reported back-to-back declines in sales for the first and second quarters of 1982 even though Coors sharply increased its advertising budget last year. In July, Coors disclosed that sales for the second quarter dropped 13 percent from the year-ago quarter.

Except for 1980, Coors sales volume has been below pre-strike levels. But the company's profits have been flat since 1976, the year before the strike. Last year, net income skidded to $51.9 million, compared with $76.4 million in 1976.

During the past year, Coors abandoned plans to build a brewery in Harrisonburg, Va., a further indication of lagging sales.

Social Security Financing Declared Basically Sound

Despite scare talk from the Reagan Administration about the "imminent bankruptcy" of social security, top officials of three previous administrations pronounced the system basically sound.

In a statement on behalf of Save Our Security (SOS), a coalition of 100 organizations, the four officials said that while social security faced short-term cash flow problems growing out of the stagnation of the economy, all signs—even forecasts by social security's Reagan Administration trustees—"point to a system which will remain healthy well into the 21st Century."

THE STATEMENT, marking the 47th anniversary of the signing of the Social Security Act, was issued by Wilbur J. Cohen, HEW Secretary in the Johnson Administration; Arthur Fleming, HEW Secretary under President Eisenhower; William J. Driver, Social Security Commissioner in the Carter Administration, and Charles Schottland, who held that post in the Eisenhower Administration.

The officials said that despite Administration efforts to paint a bleak picture of the future of social security, Americans continue to support the program in its present form. A recent Gallup poll, they noted, shows that Americans favor retaining the present benefit structure, even if it means higher employee and employer contributions.

Calling for a "reasonable, not a panic, approach" to social security's problems, the officials, on behalf of SOS, outlined a 14-point program to meet social security's cash flow problems and insure its financial stability. The program includes:

- Giving social security back-up authority to borrow money from the Treasury, if need be.
- Assuring continuation of Medicare and Medicaid benefits without requiring beneficiary payments beyond present requirements.
- Removing social security from the unified federal budget and restoring trust funds to the autonomous state they held prior to fiscal year 1969.
- Adding public members to the board of trustees.
- Restoring the minimum $122-a-month benefit for all future beneficiaries.
- Restoring the benefits "without qualification" for 700,000 college students.

Meanwhile, the Republican Party's controversial TV ad giving President Reagan credit for the July 1 cost-of-living increase in social security pensions has been popping up again around the country.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, an adviser to the latest White House Conference on Aging, said the President actually tried to kill the pension increase that the Republicans now claim he delivered.

"BUT SENIOR citizens won't be fooled," Seidman said. "They know they have been getting yearly cost-of-living increases since 1975. . . . And they won't forget that only a huge public outcry stopped Mr. Reagan from delaying this year's payment or drastically cutting it.

"The President's actions speak louder than the Republicans' words. President Reagan is no friend of social security—and he has no right to claim that he is."

New Reports Show Slump Dragging On

businesses said they planned to spend 2.4 percent less this year than last year.

If these forecasts are borne out, it would mark the first decline in real, or inflation-adjusted, capital spending since 1975. Capital spending increased by only two-tenths of 1 percent in 1981 and by nine-tenths of 1 percent in 1980, both basically flat rates of increase. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldridge said in a statement that he did not expect capital spending to pick up before mid-1983.

Reporting on the reduced spending plans, the Wall Street Journal said "the new figures underscore doubts about the Reagan Administration's economic program, which was designed to boost business investment, spur productivity, and create jobs."

EARLIER, the Commerce Dept. reported that sales by U.S. retail outlets fell nine-tenths of 1 percent in August, a much weaker performance than many analysts had expected. Store sales in July had risen 1.2 percent. Last month's decrease followed repeated forecasts by Administration officials that improving consumer confidence and the 10-percent cut in personal income tax rates that went into effect July 1 would head the economy on the road to recovery.

A consumer-led recovery is still some distance away, judging from several other economic reports, including a marked slowdown in consumer installment buying and a high savings rate.

The Federal Reserve Board said consumer debt grew a modest, seasonally adjusted $570 million in July, considerably off the $1.35-billion level in June. Installment debt figures are watched for possible trends in consumer spending.

Apparently pessimistic over the future of the economy, and uncertain about their jobs, Americans are saving what money they can get their hands on. Preliminary reports indicated that the savings rate for July was 8.1 percent of disposable income. Analysts agree that a recovery from the nation's eighth postwar recession will not come about until consumers reduce their savings rate and increase their spending.

FOR MILLIONS of Americans, however, spending is the least of their concerns. Hanging on to a job and making ends meet occupy more of their thinking. In the last week of August, the Labor Dept. said, 629,000 new claims for jobless benefits were filed—the second highest number since the recession began in 1981.

Unemployment, at 9.8 percent nationally, threatens to climb to 10 percent or above in September as industry after industry lets more people go. The depressed steel industry, for example, recorded another sharp job decline in July, the American Iron & Steel Institute reported.

Unions, Environment Groups Form Permanent Coalition

The OSHA/Environmental Network, launched as an experimental coalition of labor, environmental and health groups to fight Reagan Administration policies, has announced the formation of a permanent alliance.

At a Washington meeting, leaders of the network selected an executive committee to be co-chaired by Howard D. Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Joseph Fontaine, immediate past president of the Sierra Club.

"THE NETWORK was begun as an experiment and it has proven to be a complete success," Samuel and Fontaine said in a joint statement. "Now the experiment is over and we're assured that labor and environmental groups can work together on issues that have divided us in the past."

The first action of the new executive committee, which will serve as a formal policy-making body, was the adoption of resolutions on various job safety and health and environmental issues. These include occupational disease, clean air, clean water, pesticides, regulatory reform, toxic waste disposal and environmental research.

The coalition came together in February 1981 to fight anti-regulatory assaults by the Reagan Administration on the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Clean Air Act. Since then, the organization has grown into a 22-state operation.

THE NETWORK'S state organizations sponsored a series of "victims vigils," which focused national attention on the issues by picketing the White House, demonstrations at state capitols and lobbying of state legislatures and Congress.

Besides Samuel, labor members of the network's new executive committee include Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride; Allied Industrial Workers President Dominick D'Ambrosio; Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser; State, County & Municipal Employees Sec.-Treas. William Lucy; and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

Other members are former Sen. Gaylord Nelson, president of the Wilderness Society; Brock Evans, of the Audubon Society, Dr. Anthony Robbins of the American Public Health Association, Rafe Pomerance of the Friends of the Earth, and Frances Dumelle of the American Lung Association.

Retired Education Staffer Stuart Brock Dies at 65

Martinsburg, W.Va.—Stuart P. Brock, who retired from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education staff three years ago, died Sept. 8 at the Veterans Administration hospital here after a long illness. He was 65.

Brock had been on the CIO Dept. of Research & Education staff since 1946 before coming to the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education following merger. Survivors include his wife Mary and two children.

Rising Resistance to Reagan Revealed in Veto Override

meals to the elderly in their homes, and perform significant services in hospitals, schools and day care centers. To thousands of elderly, these aides are their contact to life and happiness."

Reagan initially claimed the inclusion of $211 million for jobs for senior citizens was excessive. Though he later relented on this issue, he continued to oppose the vetoed measure's provisions for $700 million for education of the handicapped, student loans and other social programs.

BY A LOPSIDED 301 to 117 vote, the House rejected the President's veto and sent the measure to the Senate, where Republicans have an outright majority. The Senate delivered the knockout blow on a 60 to 30 vote, precisely the two-thirds ballot needed to enact the bill. It was the first time in the Reagan presidency that attempts to override a spending veto had succeeded. The only other override was on a bill providing for changes in the copyright law.

WHAT LED to the defeat for Reagan was a breakdown in Republican unity. The votes took place shortly after a congressional recess during which many Republicans running for re-election took political soundings. As Sen. Mark O. Hatfield (R-Ore.), a leader of the move to override the veto, put it:

"The members of Congress have been home. They heard their constituents."

In the House, 81 Republicans joined 220 Democrats on the vote to override the measure. In the Senate, 21 Republicans sided with 39 Democrats to defeat the veto.

Administration Scheme Rejected

Fact-Finder Rebuffs Bid To Slash Wages at GPO

A federal fact-finder has recommended that Congress reject attempts by the Reagan Administration to slash the pay of Government Printing Office craft employees by bringing them under the federal wage system and abolishing their collective bargaining rights.

The findings of arbitrator Frederick U. Reel, which add up to another rebuff of Public Printer Danford L. Sawyer, were sent to the congressional Joint Committee on Printing for a final determination on a new agreement for some 6,000 GPO employees who have been working without a contract since June 18.

IN JULY, a federal court blocked an attempt by Sawyer to furlough GPO workers for six days without pay.

Reel recommended that the congressional committee institute a two-year agreement retroactive to June 18 that is patterned after wage settlements in the printing and publishing industries. The package would include an immediate cost-of-living adjustment of 3 percent, followed by additional COLAs every six months.

The recommended pay package falls below the wage improvements sought by the seven GPO unions, President William C. Boarman of Columbia Typographical Union 101 noted. The ITU local represents the largest number of GPO employees.

But Boarman stressed that Reel's rejection of Sawyer's proposal that the GPO be placed under the federal wage system is in total agreement with the union's position. Under Sawyer's proposal, the wages of GPO workers would be slashed by 22 percent.

SAWYER CONTENDED that work at the GPO is basically comparable to that of other federal government agencies. In his findings, Reel said that premise "is completely erroneous."

Any attempt to equate the operations of the GPO or "its wage structure with that of other existing federal printing facilities must be viewed as either ill-informed or unconcerned with the quality of GPO work and with its capacity to continue to furnish the service Congress has heretofore required of it," Reel said.

Sawyer has also sought repeal of the 1924 Kiess Act, which provides collective bargaining rights for GPO workers, unlike most other federal employees with the exception of those in the Postal Service.

For Sawyer to impose federal wage rates at the GPO, Reel suggested, could be viewed as a surrender of collective bargaining rights and "a violation of the most elementary principles of the nation's basic labor relations legislation."

REEL ALSO recommended rejection of Sawyer's proposal to slash evening shift differential pay from 15 percent to 7.5 percent and to 10 percent for night shift workers.

"Any such dislocation as GPO recommends might well cost more in terms of disrupting the morale or in necessitating other upward adjustments of rates than it would achieve in slight superficial economies," Reel declared.

Recession, Inflation Pushing More Families Into Poverty

The nosediving economy is pulling more Americans into poverty, and family purchasing power is also a casualty of recession and inflation, a government study of family income confirmed.

Between 1980 and 1981, the number of people below the government's statistical poverty line increased 7.4 percent from 29.6 million to 31.8 million, a jump of 2.2 million, according to the Census Bureau's study, "Money Income and Poverty Status of Families and Persons in the U.S. for 1981."

THE STUDY said factors contributing to the increase in poverty were "the recession that began in mid-1981 and the associated rise in unemployment."

One of every seven Americans lived below the poverty thresholds in 1981, the bureau said, adding that the nation's overall poverty rate rose from 13.2 percent to 14 percent over the period.

The thresholds for 1981 measures of poverty were set at $9,287 for a family of four, $7,250 for a household of three, and $5,917 and $4,620 for households of two and one, respectively.

These thresholds are used for statistical purposes, the Census Bureau said, and the government uses similar poverty measures for determining eligibility for a variety of aid programs.

MEDIAN FAMILY money income was $22,388 in 1981, up 6.5 percent in dollars over 1980, but after adjustment for the 10.4-percent jump in consumer prices, buying power actually declined 3.5 percent.

This was the second successive year that family income lost the battle to inflation, the study said. Purchasing power dived an overall 5.5 percent in 1980.

Black Americans were hurt worst, the data showed. In 1981, there were 21.6 million whites and 9.2 million blacks below the poverty line compared to 20 million whites and 8.6 million blacks the previous year.

BUT THE 34.2 percent of black people below poverty in 1981 was three times the percentage of whites in poverty, even though black Americans account for only about 12 percent of the total population.

In the 1980-81 period studied, poverty among whites increased 0.7 percent compared to a 1.8-percent increase among blacks.

The number of Hispanic Americans below the official poverty line, some 3.7 million in 1981, was virtually the same as in 1980.

Black families also fared worse in lost purchasing power compared to white or Hispanic households, the study showed.

Money income for black families was $13,267 in 1981. For whites, the median was $23,517, and for Hispanics the median family income was $16,402. After adjusting for inflation, this amounted to a drop of 5.2 percent for black families from 1980, compared to a decrease of 2.7 percent in purchasing power for white families. There was no significant statistical difference in real incomes of Hispanic families over the year.

ABOUT HALF of all families below the poverty line in 1981 were maintained by women with no husband present. For those families, purchasing power sank some 4.6 percent.

The data also noted that the number of elderly people in poverty, about 3.9 million or 15.3 percent of the 65 and older population, remained almost unchanged over the year.

The bureau suggested that this could be because most elderly people are already out of the workforce and are not as adversely effected by rising unemployment and because "the most important government programs benefiting the elderly, including social security and Supplemental Security Income, are indexed to reflect changes in price level."

National Industrial Policy Pressed to Reverse Slump

America needs a coherent policy to reverse the ominous economic trends of the 1970s and 1980s, the AFL-CIO told Congress.

The federation has proposed a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board with representatives from government, business and labor. It would oversee job-creating loans to private businesses as well as to state and local governments.

"AMERICA NEEDS policies, including an industrial policy, that meet the nation's needs for expanded, non-inflationary production and employment with fairness and equity," Henry Schechter told a House banking subcommittee.

Schechter, director of the office of housing and monetary policy for the AFL-CIO, said the need for a national policy is made more urgent by "growing evidence of retrenchment in investment for both private and public capital."

"This country is still the greatest economic productive power on earth, although our lead is decreasing," Schechter said. A common thread that runs through the economies of countries that are gaining on us, he noted "is their adoption of a coordinated industrial policy that systematically includes the views of labor, industry, and the public. By contrast, we have too long been at the mercy of a series of economic schools, each of which believes that it alone can see the unseen hand."

Citing unemployment figures that grew from an average of 4.8 percent in the 1960s to 6.2 percent in the 1970s and to 9.8 percent today, Schechter traced a boom-and-bust cycle that has recently brought too many downturns.

THE 1970s brought "an economy experiencing extended periods of high unemployment, massive layoffs, plant closings, increased inflation, a worsening balance of payments and a dwindling U.S. share of both domestic and international markets for manufactured goods," he said.

"In order to get out of the current economic impasse and restructure the economy to a path of increased productivity and growth," a needed first step is adoption of an industrial policy, he said.

not turn its back on the unemployed," Kennedy said.

In his letter to congressmen, Denison noted that the bill meets all the necessary criteria of helping both urban and rural communities in labor-intensive activities that can be put in effect quickly and targeted to "areas and individuals experiencing the greatest hardship."

Health Agency Scored on Bid To Drop Notice of Changes

The AFL-CIO has called on the Reagan Administration to drop plans floated by the Health & Human Services Dept. that would let the agency make significant changes in health and social security programs without any prior public notice or comment.

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, in a letter to HHS Sec. Richard S. Schweiker, said the federation "strongly objects" to the agency's proposal to widen its authority to exempt itself from legal requirements to give notice and gather public comment on changes the agency plans to make in the programs it administers.

SUCH A change would "greatly increase the possibility of arbitrary administrative decision-making by decreasing public input on controversial . . . far-reaching regulations," Seidman said.

Under the Administrative Procedures Act, proposed rule or regulation changes by federal agencies are exempted from notice and comment requirements under a narrow set of circumstances. Schweiker's proposal, Seidman said, would substantially widen the door because the agency wants to grant itself the exemption any time it determines that taking the time to get comments "would impair the attainment of program objectives or have other disadvantages that outweigh the benefits of receiving public comment."

This broad language, if applied, could be used by the Reagan Administration to avoid making public and seeking comment on rules changes for such programs as Medicare, social security, supplemental security income, disability insurance, hospital cost containment, or any other HHS program, and it would set a precedent for the same action by other agencies, the AFL-CIO said.

SEIDMAN URGED Schweiker to drop the proposed guidelines "which limit notice and public comment and thereby deprive the AFL-CIO and other concerned individuals and groups from expressing their views on important public policies and programs."

Already HHS has received more than 1,100 comments on the proposed change—all expressing opposition.

Study Offers Alternatives to Achieve Jobs Goal

A group of prominent economists headed by former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall blasted the Reagan Administration's economic program as both inefficient and regressive and proposed alternative policies based on full employment as the "preeminent goal."

There is "mounting evidence of the bankruptcy of Reaganomics," the group said in a study jointly published by the Full Employment Action Council and the National Policy Exchange.

IN A PREFACE by Council Co-chairs Murray H. Finley and Coretta Scott King, Reaganomics was characterized as a complete failure:

"Jobs, jobs, jobs. That's what President Reagan promised would result from his economic program of budget and tax cuts. Instead, the Administration's policies have produced the highest unemployment since the Great Depression as well as record high interest rates, record numbers of business failures and falling business investment.

"It is time for a full employment alternative . . . a meaningful job for every person able to work and maximum use of our material resources. That goal, which is embodied in the Humphrey-Hawkins law, is the cornerstone of a balanced economy and a just society."

The Full Employment Action Council is a coalition of religious, civil rights and labor groups. The National Policy Exchange is an economic research and educational organization headed by Marshall, now a professor at the Univeristy of Texas.

Among the economists endorsing the joint study are Robert Lekachman of the City University of New York, Sar Levitan of George Washington University's Center for Social Policy Studies, Charles Killingsworth of Michigan State University, Lester Thurow of Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Robert Eisner of Northwestern University, Richard Musgrave of Harvard University, Gar Alperovitz of the National Center for Economic Alternatives, and Leon Keyserling, who was chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Truman Administration.

Labor economists backing the study are AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy A. Oswald, Brian Turner of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Leslie Nulty of the Machinists, and James Smith of the Steelworkers. Some of the economists who endorsed the general thrust of the study did not agree with all of its specific recommendations.

"IT'S NO secret that supply-side economics is dead," said Howard D. Samuel, secretary-treasurer of the Full Employment Action Council and president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. "Even Wall Street recognizes that the supply-side approach is bankrupt."

The study charged that the bottom line of all the supply-side thinking is to shift income, government services and regulatory protections away from middle- and lower-income families toward higher income groups.

"The 'monetarism' approach of tight money and high interest rates," it said, "is directly responsible for the severe recession in interest-sensitive sectors such as small businesses, autos, and construction."

The alternative to Reaganomics proposed by Marshall and his colleagues includes a comprehensive set of measures aimed at controlling inflation and increasing productivity, thereby allowing the economy to move successfully toward full employment.

TO COORDINATE the new alternative economic strategy, they propose the creation of a national economic policy board and an industrial development bank to channel investment funds.

The national economic policy board, which would include representatives of labor, business and government along with independent experts, would be the primary vehicle for framing a national industrial policy.

Separate committees working under the board's auspices would seek to develop solutions for specific industry and regional problems.

The proposed industrial development bank would channel investment, with funding "largely by private resources with special consideration given to using pooled pension fund money."

A WORKABLE alternative to Reaganomics must be fully comprehensive and internally coordinated, "not just a string of band-aids and not a collection of contradictions such as massive tax cuts to spur investment and high interest rates that choke off investment," the study observed.

The Marshall group called for a close coordination of monetary and fiscal policy with a commitment to keep interest rates down to encourage investment, and spending programs for employment, training and rebuilding of the public infrastructure such as roads, railroads, bridges, ports and water systems.

The primary goal of monetary policy, the report said, should be interest rates that are stable and just a little above the rate of inflation.

In fiscal policy, the group called for a mix of spending for jobs and training, public works, and sharing programs whenever the unemployment rate rises above 6 percent.

"THE PROSPECT of 10 percent unemployment and the current disaster in the construction, auto, and other interest-sensitive industries painfully show the need to implement a more responsive and stimulative fiscal policy," the study said.

In fighting inflation, a targeted sectoral program designed to increase supply, reduce costs, and improve efficiency in inflation-leading sectors such as energy, housing, food, and health care should be given top priority, the group said.

But the key to a healthy overall economy, the group repeated time and again, is full employment. A full employment society is the most efficient route toward increased productivity and reduced inflation, it stressed.

"The proposed combination of coordinated general economic policies, targeted anti-inflation policies, consensus-building mechanisms, industrial policy, and active employment, education and training policies represents the most direct path to a full employment society," the study concluded. "It is a path that this country must take."

Unions View Reaganomics As Election Issue in Virginia

Roanoke, Va.—Depression level unemployment, record-high interest rates and other tragedies of Reaganomics were the central focus of the Virginia AFL-CIO's 22nd convention.

The retirement of ultra-conservative Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., last year's Democratic sweep of top state government offices, and the dogged support of most of Virginia's House delegation for the Reagan Administration's policies have raised hopes for a shift toward a more progressive congressional delegation in the November elections.

KEYNOTING the three-day session, President Julian F. Carper said "the decade from Watergate to Reaganomics has cast an ever-darkening shadow over the nation's factories, farms and job-sites, shattering the dreams and expectations" of workers, farmers and businesses alike.

Carper urged the delegates to redouble Virginia labor's 1981 political effort that was the edge in electing the first Democratic governor in 16 years. The convention responded with a cheering, unanimous endorsement of Lt. Gov. Richard J. Davis (D) for the Senate seat Byrd is leaving, and for Democratic nominees challenging hard-core pro-Reagan incumbents in eight of the state's 10 congressional districts.

MAJOR CONVENTION speakers included National COPE Director John Perkins; State Labor Commissioner Azie Taylor Morton; AFL-CIO Region III Director Walter Waddy; Daniel Mundy, legislative director of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.; Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services; former national COPE Director Al Barkan, and Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Carper won election to a new two-year term, as did Sec.-Treas. David L. Laws and Vice President Leander Lewis, both of whom were serving interim appointments. The delegates also elected a 30-member executive board.

Washington State Delegates Press Jobs, Justice, Agenda

Spokane, Wash.—Delegates to the Washington State AFL-CIO convention adopted a "jobs and justice" agenda, coupled with plans for a major trade union effort this fall to elect legislators committed to labor's goals.

Convention delegates took part in the 14-state teleconference held during the congressional recess to mobilize a grassroots campaign against a federal constitutional amendment to compel a balanced budget. But the issue was not a new one. The state's labor movement had been instrumental earlier this year in blocking a resolution in the legislature that would have added Washington to the list of states petitioning for a constitutional convention to act on the amendment.

RESOLUTIONS adopted included a call for tax reform—to raise revenue more equitably in a state whose resources have been depleted by massive unemployment and plant closings.

The labor proposal calls for shifting the tax burden from the state property tax and regressive sales taxes to a progressive state income tax, which Washington does not have. Enactment of an income tax would be coupled with a ceiling on property tax increases, a reduction in sales taxes and elimination of the sales tax on food.

Another goal is approval by the voters of an initiative that would roll back consumer credit rates in the states. Labor got the initiative on the ballot by collecting 180,000 signatures—50,000 more than needed.

THE MEASURE would reduce the maximum interest rate for all forms of retail credit to 12 percent or one percent above the federal discount rate, whichever is higher.

The convention marked the 25th anniversary of the state labor federation established by the merger of the former AFL and CIO central bodies, and State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams stressed a unity and solidarity theme in his keynote address.

"We must guard against single-issue politics," he urged, stressing that labor's strength "lies in our solidarity."

In addresses by other speakers:

- AFL-CIO Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler ripped the Reagan Administration's record of economic failures.
- Sec.-Treas. Judith Heh of the Pennsylvania State AFL-CIO stressed the importance of labor's involvement in every level of political activity.
- Boston College Prof. Barry Bluestone spoke of plant closure decisions and the impact of government policies on a corporation's decision to relocate in other countries.

The convention approved a five-cent increase in the per capita payment, from 45 to 50 cents, and delegates participated in four workshops held during the convention. Topics covered were taxation, mass transit, plant closings and health concerns in operating video display terminals.

Asbestos Union Maps Expanded Organizing Effort

Las Vegas, Nev.—Delegates to the 24th convention of the Asbestos Workers reelected President Andrew T. Haas and Sec.-Treas. William G. Bernard and mapped a program of expanded organizing efforts.

Haas and Bernard were unopposed for re-election. One at-large and eight conference international vice presidents also were elected to five-year terms.

The 386 delegates to the convention also approved a new per capita tax structure to help finance organizing campaigns by the Asbestos Workers and the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The organizing per capita tax of one cent per hour worked will go into effect next Jan. 1, and will increase annually one cent an hour until it reaches five cents an hour.

The delegates also gave enthusiastic endorsement to a decision by Haas to add three new general organizers to the Asbestos Workers' staff and to initiate an instructor training program at Ohio State University beginning this fall.

The View from Earth

NEARLY 11 MILLION American workers are unemployed, enough to form an unbroken line stretching 4,000 miles—from Los Angeles to New York and almost back to the Mississippi.

This is not what President Reagan promised us when he campaigned two years ago.

When he debated President Carter, he told the American people: "I don't believe the alternative to inflation is recession."

His Republican platform said: "We specifically reject the Carter doctrine that inflation can be reduced only by throwing people out of work."

A year later, when unemployment surged to 8.4 percent, the White House press secretary said: "This is the price you have to pay for bringing down inflation."

WHY DIDN'T Mr. Reagan tell us about this "price" during his campaign?

Instead he preached the virtues of "supply-side" economics. He promised that huge tax cuts for corporations and the wealthy would produce new investment in plant and equipment, new jobs, and a resurgence of economic growth.

Well, the corporations got their tax breaks, and last week the Commerce Dept. reported that business investment in plant and equipment will drop 4.4 percent this year—the first such decline since 1975.

What went wrong?

According to the Secretary of Commerce, "The business tax cuts were too large and so, rather than stimulating capital spending, they depressed it."

He went on to predict an investment upturn with "faster growth in consumer spending."

Are we to understand that the Administration is flip-flopping from "supply-side" economics to "demand-side" economics?

I WOULD LIKE to think that the Secretary has been reading the AFL-CIO's alternative economic program. Or perhaps he is on his way to the famous woodshed where David Stockman was spanked for publicly admitting the bankruptcy of the Administration's supply-side theories.

But if the President has any doubts about his program, he is keeping them to himself as he hits the campaign trail pleading for patience and promising pie in the sky in the sweet bye and bye.

Campaigning in Kansas last week, the President said, "Yes, recovery has been sighted."

I don't know what telescope he is using, or in what direction it is pointed, but here on Planet Earth, we see something different.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Convention, Sept. 14, 1982.

White House Shifts Underscore Bankruptcy of Reagan Policies

By Press Associates, Inc.

TWO RECENT developments—enactment of the $98.3 billion tax bill and the Federal Reserve Board's sudden relaxation of its tight money policy—underscore the bankruptcy of Reaganomics.

These moves represent dramatic reversals of the Reagan Administration's "supply-side" tax cut policy and the tight money tactics it has backed. The reversals, say experts, were the trigger for the record-breaking surge in the depressed stock and bond markets in recent weeks.

Unfortunately, all this doesn't mean that the Administration, or the Federal Reserve, has mended its ways.

President Reagan, who pushed the big tax hike bill to help stem the runaway deficits fed by his huge tax cuts, still clings to his philosophy. He favors the third phase of the income tax cut scheduled for July 1, 1983, as well as the tax indexing scheme set for 1984.

AND THE FED, which eased up on its monetary reins from fear that small bank failures would trigger bigger busts and an economic calamity, still seems to be mired in the monetarist dogma which brought on record-high interest rates and recession.

Reagan has continued to blame the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression on the policies of his predecessors, and asks the people to be patient. He has challenged his critics to come up with something better.

Organized labor long has offered sensible alternatives to the disastrous course of Reaganomics. Many of these proposals are contained in a new study by 34 noted economists, including labor experts.

THE 51-PAGE report, "An Economic Strategy for the 1980s—the Failure of Reaganomics and the Full Employment Alternative," is a thoughtful and comprehensive blueprint for an economic recovery based on solid principles rather than exotic theories and wishful thinking.

Moreover, "Economic Strategy" is based on principles of equity as opposed to supply-side's "trickle-down" approach, social program cutbacks, and the use of recession to fight inflation.

Instead of such simplistic nostrums as monetarism and "across-the-board" tax cuts, the report offers a package of proposals for the nation's complex economic problems—unemployment, inflation, low productivity growth, and "now, the need for rapid recovery from a deep recession."

ITS GENERAL economic policy proposals begin with a Fed policy geared to stabilizing and reducing interest rates to "just a little above the rate of inflation." This would spur capital investment and reduce deficits by lowering the interest payments—now over $100 billion annually—on the federal debt.

Fiscal and budget policies should be much more responsive to business cycles—not more rigid as advocates of the balanced budget constitutional amendment want it, the report says. This amendment would be an "automatic destabilizer" as opposed to the study's proposed "automatic stabilizers that directly create jobs" and which would be triggered when unemployment reaches a certain level, say 6 percent. Stabilizers would include public works and job training.

These general economic policies are not enough, but should be combined with policies targeted to those sectors with special problems such as energy, housing, food and health care, says the report.

THESE FOUR sectors account for most of our inflation and, instead of relying on the mythical free market or painful and costly recessions to curb inflation, the government should take direct action.

Finally, it proposes the kind of "coherent industrial policy" which has helped nations like Japan and West Germany gain competitive advantages.

A National Economic Policy Board (NEPB) composed of labor, business, government, and independent experts could coordinate a more efficient allocation of resources and deal with such problems as "inflation and the reconstruction of our aging and weakened industrial base."

THE WORK OF the board and its committees "should be augmented by an industrial development bank to channel investment into long-term economic development." Such a bank could use pension funds for productive investments.

The primary goal of this alternative economic policy is "a full-employment society," which best represents the practical unity of equity and efficiency."

MEMO FROM COPE

GOP Campaign Commercial—Presidential Race ... 1988

Exactly One Vote Does It!

Alvin Hinkle thought he'd wrapped up a six-vote 564-558 victory recently for Okfuskee County (Okla.) county commissioner.

His opponent, Ben J. Smith, figured it was close enough for a recount. Smith was right.

When the recount was completed, Smith was the winner by exactly one vote, 559-558. One vote counts!

The result in the 37th District Republican primary for the Virginia House of Delegates looks like a landslide compared to Smith's one-vote win, but it deserves comment. Stephen Gordy squeezed past incumbent John Rust 1,484-1,469, just 15 votes out of 2,953 cast.

GOP, Conservative PAC Money Tree In Full Bloom for Rightist Candidates

Republican campaign committees have—if there really is such a thing—an embarrassment of riches, and it's showing up in the reports of the party's candidates.

Through June, the Federal Election Commission reports, the three major party committees—the National GOP and its House and Senate campaign committees—had hauled in $146 million to the $19 million their Democratic counterpart committees attracted. That's a 7-1 bulge, plus some extra.

The GOP National Committee collected $66 million, its House and Senate campaign committees $45 million and $35 million respectively. For the Democrats, the DNC, House and Senate committees got $11 million, $4 million and $4 million respectively. In hard cash, it's no contest.

Put together with enormous sums flowing into corporate, trade and right-wing PACs, most of which are then funnelled to Republican candidates, these GOP funds provide comforting support for the party's candidates.

For example, through June, Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) had collected $1,368,500 for his re-election drive, $495,000 of this from PACs—Big Oil, other corporations, trade and right wing—and of course a good piece of change from the GOP.

The ratio of money to voters will be staggering by the time November rolls around, and Hatch's receipts will have ballooned. In 1980, only 580,000 persons voted in Utah in the presidential race. That number will diminish sharply, as it always does in non-presidential years. Hatch will likely wind up able to spend more than $5 per voter.

Ultra-conservative Sen. Harrison Schmitt already had $814,000 for his re-election campaign in New Mexico, where only 440,000 voters turned out in 1980. PACs provided $245,000 of it.

And in Wyoming, through June 30, Sen. Malcolm Wallop had collected $627,500. Of this $286,000 was PAC money. In 1980, only 172,000 citizens voted in the state.

In each of these three cases, Big Oil and other energy industry money has been plentiful, as has funding from corporations, trade groups and the right wing political committees.

Similarly, Rep. Paul Trible (R), running for the Senate in Virginia—who accused his opponent of taking "big labor boss' money—has been the beneficiary of healthy sums from corporate, trade and right-wing PACs—$4,800 from the medical association, $5,000 from the Auto Dealers, $3,000 from Amoco, and goodly sums from a batch of other PACs with a conservative bent.

Odds 'n Ends

NOW THEY'RE REALLY MAD at the President, "new right" leaders and supporters let it be known. Richard Viguerie's Conservative Digest just released results of its poll of readers, in which 75 percent oppose the notion of a second term for President Reagan if "a solid conservative" goes against him for the GOP nomination in 1984. More than 88 percent of rightist respondents complained Reagan had not delivered on his promises to them.

BEST LAID PLANS of Reagan Administration have gone astray. News comes that the dragging economy and continued high interest rates combine to keep businesses cutting plans they once had for expanding and modernizing. Continued reductions in planned business investment pour cold water on hopes for any early economic recovery and threaten recovery over the long term. This isn't the way Reagan and his deep economic thinkers planned it at all. They promised swift and strong recovery through huge increases in capital investment as a result of their "supply side" tax cuts of 1981. The latest report on capital spending shows a decline of 4.4 percent this year from 1981, the first real decline since the last GOP recession in 1975.

MORAL MAJORITY leader Rev. Jerry Falwell announces effort to register a million new voters in time for November 2 elections. MM claims three million members now in computer files, among them 82,000 clergy. MM says that in 1980, its first effort at campaigning, it registered 3-4 million voters. No question it had considerable impact two years ago, in league with "new right" PACs that did such heavy damage to pro-worker, pro-union Senators and gave huge boost to Reagan candidacy.

Good Summer for 'Administration With a Heart'

The Administration With a Heart has been at its best throughout the summer.

As the headline and partial story at right shows, the Administration With a Heart has decided it would be a kindly gesture to thousands of disabled persons to make them absolutely self-sufficient by taking away social security disability payments.

Shortly before that, the Administration With a Heart (hereafter AWH) had vetoed a money bill. One of its key complaints was that the measure provided $211 million for a community services program that employs 54,000 needy elderly Americans. In other words, they work for what they get (AWH believes in work, as its move to get disabled people to go out and work by depriving them of benefits demonstrates).

Too much social spending, AWH groused. That $211 million is budget-busting, it griped (AWH's budget is already $150 billion-plus in the red).

When Congress balked and a bitter fight to override the Reagan veto boiled up, AWH then held these 54,000 needy elderly hostage. Don't override the veto, it said, and we'll put the funding back in for the elderly. That's heart. The veto was overridden and the program retained, anyway.

An absolutely unnoticed bit of history back on July 29 showed AWH at its most gracious and most generous. As background to this, keep in mind that AWH grudgingly approved in the recent tax increase that Congress passed inclusion of fresh unemployment benefits funding for long-term jobless. It has since used this as evidence that it really cares.

On July 29, however, it didn't seem to care all that much. The Senate Finance Committee held a hearing on extended jobless benefits, to add 13 weeks to the 39 weeks now available to the unemployed in states with exceptionally high rates of idled workers.

AWH sent Assistant Labor Secretary John Cogan to represent its views. Cogan testified in so many words that the AWH was absolutely opposed to extended benefits, and the decision to oppose was made by the highest officials in the Administration, including the President himself.

Speaking for AWH, Cogan said: "We believe that 39 weeks of unemployment insurance is the maximum that should be provided. . . . We oppose the extension of benefits, because extending benefits is inequitable, ill-timed and costly. This determination was made by (a Cabinet group) and the President also agreed. . . ."

This question was put to Cogan: "So, the Administration has no proposal at all in terms of what we do with people who have run through 39 weeks other than for them to sit at home and wait for an economic recovery . . . or eventually deplete all their resources, sell their homes and so on, until they qualify for welfare assistance? What is the alternative that you are proposing?

► Cogan: "None, sir."

He was then asked: "Do you think we need some kind of adjustment program for dealing (with workers in) industries that are in transition?"

► Cogan: "Yes, sir . . . the Administration fully supports retraining for workers in our basic manufacturing industries."

► Question: "Now, we have nine million (the figure cited; actually the number at the time was nearly 11 million) people out of work.

"How much are we spending on worker retraining right now?"

► Cogan: "We have allocated about $25 million. . . ."

Response: "If I divide nine million workers into $25 million, I get $3 a worker. That's a little low, I think, for a really good retraining program. Three dollars will get you downtown and back if you live in a federally-subsidized mass transit area."

Despite all that went before, Cogan, later in his testimony, asserted: "The Administration is very concerned about long-term unemployment. . . ."

And so went the summer for AWH. What do you suppose autumn holds in store?

Eligible Recipients Losing Out

U.S. Gets Tough With Disabled

By Margaret Engel
Washington Post Staff Writer

In 1973, after lupus, an incurable crippling disease, forced her to stop working as a nurse's attendant, Mary Williams of Capitol Heights began receiving $366 a month in disability payments from Social Security.

Last year, under a speeded-up review of disability recipients ordered by the Reagan administration, the payments to Williams were stopped, and she was told to get a job, despite the fact that three government doctors had said she was totally disabled.

In August, after Williams had struggled for a year to pay the $203 rent on the apartment she shares with her teen-age sons, an administrative law judge ruled that she was eligible for the payments after all.

Her experience was not unusual. Since federal officials tightened eligibility standards and began closer scrutiny of the $18 billion disability program in March 1981, 157,980 people nationwide have been dropped from the Social Security rolls.

Aimed at weeding out the undeserving, the new procedures have in many cases imposed an unnecessary burden on thousands of disabled people who do in fact meet the government's strict standards. According to figures compiled by the Sen-

Auto Jobs Bill Pushed in House

WOMEN WORKERS can best achieve pay equity through union collective bargaining, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told a House subcommittee. He was joined in the testimony by federation economist John Zalusky.

Labor Asks Quick Action On Domestic Content Law

Organized labor pressed Congress to speed action on a bill to save American jobs in the auto and related industries before the lawmakers adjourn for the election campaign.

The domestic content legislation would require auto makers who sell large quantities of cars in the United States to produce a gradually increasing share in this country.

AUTO WORKERS President Douglas A. Fraser told a congressional panel the content bill would result in more than 700,000 jobs created or saved in U.S. auto production and supplier industries. The bill is a "very effective jobs bill, not only for the auto industry, but for the economy as a whole," Fraser said.

"This nation cannot have a healthy economy without a healthy auto industry," Fraser told the House Ways & Means subcommittee on trade.

Supporting Fraser's appeal for quick action on the measure were AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison and Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel. They noted that the United States remains the most open auto market in the world. While Japan-based auto firms have a $13-billion market here, over 97 percent of Japanese cars sold in the United States are made in Japan. Honda already builds some cars here.

A CONTENT law would simply require some of those cars to be made here with American parts, which would put thousands of Americans back to work, they observed.

Fraser told the panel the U.S. auto industry is in its worst shape since the Great Depression, with employment plummeting 28 percent since 1978. More shipments of Japanese cars will exacerbate the slump, he said.

Scores of witnesses were scheduled to appear before the trade subcommittee, clouding the bill's outlook for passage this session. The measure has 225 sponsors in the House, and a companion bill sponsored by Sen. Wendell H. Ford (D-Ky.) and 18 others is working its way through the Senate.

The bill cleared a major legislative hurdle Sept. 15, when it passed the House Energy & Commerce Committee with a large bipartisan vote, 25 to 16. Eight Republicans voted with the majority. The Administration adamantly opposes the bill, calling it a protectionist measure. If it clears the Ways & Means Committee, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.) has said he would expedite floor action.

INTRODUCED by Rep. Richard L. Ottinger (D-N.Y.), the bill would require both domestic and foreign auto makers to

Bargaining Cited as Key To Achieving Pay Equity

By Susan Dunlop

Collective bargaining is the key ingredient in a strategy to achieve pay equity for women workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue asserted at a House hearing on the issue.

"Collective bargaining offers the prime method for achieving pay equity, and that belief is based upon experience," Donahue said at joint hearings on pay equity and comparable worth held by three subcommittees of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee.

"BARGAINING FOR wage rates is, after all, something that we have been doing for decades," he pointed out, stressing that the AFL-CIO at its 1979 and 1981 conventions adopted strong resolutions endorsing the concept of equal pay for work of comparable value and urging affiliates to seek pay equity in negotiations and "by all other appropriate means."

Those means, Donahue said, should include legal action "as part of an integrated strategy" that also includes using administrative channels to remedy inequities.

"Comparable worth" is one of the "bedrock" principles of the labor movement, he said, because seeing to it that people in similar jobs are treated fairly is "what we are all about."

There is strong evidence that employers have for years paid women less for their work than men got for essentially the same jobs, he asserted, noting that "too often the determining factor for wage rates" has been whether men or women were likely to do the work. Women workers still earn an average of only 60 percent of what men make, he pointed out.

The labor movement believes there is no justification for paying a worker less for a job than any other worker because of "sex, age, race, religion or national origin," Donahue stressed.

He said the bias employers build into wage-making can best be removed by combining the knowledge and experience of a bargaining unit's members "with the power

Leaflet Day Set Oct. 19 to Build Election Turnout

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has announced a nationwide effort by the federation to increase voter turnout among trade unionists with a leaflet day at job sites to be conducted on Oct. 19, 1982.

Organized labor is concerned about low turnouts for the Nov. 2, 1982, elections. Voter turnout was only 36 percent of potential voters in the non-presidential years of 1974 and 1978 and only 54.4 percent in 1980.

THE OCT. 19 effort will enlist the services of AFL-CIO vice presidents, other international union presidents and a wide variety of union officers.

"We intend to do all we can to assure that the rightful interests and concerns of working people will be reflected in the outcome of these elections," Kirkland said. "Our opponents will outspend us many, many times. This election is going to be one of those historic contests between money and plain people."

Kirkland's announcement came on the first anniversary of Solidarity Day, Sept. 19, 1981, when 400,000 trade unionists and their allies opposed Reaganomics with the biggest political protest march ever

David Dubinsky Dies at 90, Built ILG into Strong Union

New York—David Dubinsky, an immigrant from Poland who devoted most of his life to building the Ladies' Garment Workers Union and strengthening the American labor movement, died Sept. 17 after a long illness. He was 90 years old.

Dubinsky was president of the ILGWU for 34 years before his reirement in 1966. He took over the reins of the nearly bankrupt union at the depth of the Depression in 1932 and fashioned it into an effective 450,000-member organization. Dubinsky also served as a vice president of the AFL-CIO for 14 years.

IN A MESSAGE to the ILGWU, Federation President Lane Kirkland said that Dubinsky helped write a vital chapter in the history of American trade unionism.

"We have lost a leader of national stature in all of the social and economic struggles of his time," Kirkland said. "He will live on most truly in the character of the union he loved and served so well. In the hearts of ILGWU members and in the hearts of those who had the luck to know and work with him—as I did—he will never die."

Dubinsky's devotion to the labor movement developed early in his life. As a master baker at age 15 in Lodz, Poland, he joined the bakers union. Within a year he was made assistant secretary of the union largely because of his ability to read and write Yiddish, Polish and Russian.

BEFORE HE was 17, Dubinsky was arrested twice for union activities by the czar's police in Russian-occupied Poland—once for leading striking bakers against his father's bakery—and marked for exile to Siberia.

Before escaping through the assistance of his father, Dubinsky was moved from prison to prison for 18 months.

"In an important way it was the richest part of my education," Dubinsky wrote in his autobiography, "for some of the czar's jails were kind of a labor college

LABOR DAY CROWDS turned out in force at parades and rallies in many cities to celebrate the labor movement's achievements and to protest the way the Reagan Administration and its supporters have mishandled the economy, slashed the federal budget and attacked many protections vital to workers. In Detroit, above, some 10,000 marchers joined the Labor Day parade, more than double last year's attendance. At a rally in Kennedy Square, Detroit AFL-CIO President Thomas Turner said the labor movement was determined to make Election Day "Solidarity Day II" with a "march to the polls" to elect candidates who support labor's goals. The Wyoming AFL-CIO organized its own "Solidarity Day" for the holiday, drawing 3,000 people to Cheyenne from around the state, the largest number ever to attend a labor rally there. A march to the state capitol grounds was followed by a family picnic in a nearby park.

'Means Test' Scheme For Medicare Hit

The AFL-CIO sharply criticized a proposal floated by the Reagan Administration to make some senior citizens pay for a larger share of Medicare benefits or lose the coverage altogether.

Karen Ignagni, an assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, said the idea, although not yet formally proposed, would penalize many older people and force them "to play 'Russian roulette' with their health while doing nothing to curtail soaring doctor fees and hospital charges."

The scheme, still under discussion within the Administration, would impose a "means test" for eligibility for Medicare under which older people above certain income levels would pay a much larger share of health care costs.

Another plan under consideration would deny any Medicare protection to those with incomes above a certain level. At least one Administration official has pointed out that because of the generally low level of income among senior citizens, the cut-off might have to be low as well to realize any savings if some kind of catastrophic illness coverage were offered in Medicare's place.

Ignagni emphasized that Medicare beneficiaries have paid for their health insurance through their social security taxes.

But while senior citizens would be ill-used by a means test, "the real villains in our medical care system are ignored," she said.

The means test scheme also was scored by the labor-supported Save Our Security Coalition chaired by former Health, Education & Welfare Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen. Arthur Flemming, who held the same post in the Eisenhower Administration, heads the SOS advisory committee.

In a joint statement, both experts said any reliance on an income test would destroy public confidence in the system, create a larger bureaucracy and more paper work and institute "a welfare-type system to replace one in which benefits are made available as a matter of right."

"Workers and their families build their entitlement on the basis of work and contributions, and there is no justification for tampering with this successful formula," they stressed. The SOS statement was made public in support of a "sense of the Senate resolution" introduced by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) opposing the means test concept.

David Dubinsky Dies at 90, ILG's Leader for 34 Years

where I could learn socialist principles and practice from men of great brilliance."

After fleeing Poland, Dubinsky came to the United States in 1911. Shortly after his arrival, he started to learn the cutter's trade in New York's women's apparel industry and joined Local 10 of the fledgling ILGWU.

DUBINSKY moved up quickly through the local's ranks to become chairman in 1920. He was elected an ILGWU vice president in 1922 and secretary-treasurer of the union in 1929. He later served as acting president of the union and was elected to the presidency in 1932. He held that post until he resigned in 1966 at the age of 74, but continued to serve on the AFL-CIO Executive Council for another three years.

Under Dubinsky's guidance, the ILGWU made a number of collective bargaining advances, including the first industry agreement for a 35-hour workweek in 1933, an employer-paid fund for workers' vacations in 1937, health and welfare funds in 1938, retirement funds in 1943 and severance pay in 1950.

Dubinsky fought as vigorously to wipe out corruption in the apparel industry and communist influence in the needle trades as he did to eliminate sweatshops.

HE ALSO served on the executive council of the AFL during the 1930s and '40s. In the interim, he worked with John L. Lewis to help found the CIO. He later was involved in the formation of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

In his political activities, Dubinsky in 1936 helped found the American Labor Party—forerunner of New York State's Liberal Party—and played a role in presidential politics and the Democratic Party dating back to the Roosevelt Administration.

Political action was a cornerstone of Dubinsky's trade union philosophy. He believed strongly that labor must concentrate on the drive for social progress just as intently as it does on negotiating improvements in workers' pay envelopes through collective bargaining.

Dubinsky served on many government boards and commissions. Among the numerous awards and citations he received was the Medal of Freedom, the nation's highest civilian honor. He also was awarded Britain's Medal of Service by King George VI as well as the Order of Merit of the Italian Republic.

THE CITATION on the Medal of Freedom presented by President Johnson read: "David Dubinsky is a national leader of foresight and compassion. He has advanced the cause of the workingman in America and the broader cause of social justice in the world with unfailing skill and uncommon distinction."

In the last paragraph of his autobiography, Dubinsky wrote:

"The challenges change. So do the tools needed to meet them. But one thing cannot change: the conception of trade unionism as morally clean in a way that no business is. Business is profit; the union is idealism, commitment, service. Without the faith of our members, we lose what we have built. That will not happen to our union."

Dubinsky's wife Emma died in 1974. He is survived by a daughter, Jean Appleton, wife of ILGWU Sec.-Treas. Shelley Appleton, and one granddaughter.

The ILGWU will hold a memorial service at the Fashion Institute of Technology in New York on Sept. 26.

Union-Fighting Stations Sign NABET Pact

Tulsa, Okla.—A year-long struggle with Leake TV, Inc. has ended successfully for the Broadcast Employees & Technicians in an agreement that will bring substantial back pay to fired union supporters and a first contract for employees at two company stations.

NABET International Rep. John J. Krieger said the settlement lifts a National Labor Relations Board complaint charging Leake with unfair labor practices at KTUL-TV here and KATV in Little Rock, Ark.

THE NLRB HAD charged that the company laid off 38 employees and fired, demoted or transferred eight others in July 1981 in reprisal for supporting NABET in the union's successful representation elections at the stations earlier last year.

The terms of the settlement, Krieger said, "met all of NABET's objectives." Back pay ranging from $6,500 to $15,000 will go to 28 employees, and a master agreement was reached covering KTUL-TV production, news and special events employees and KATV engineers.

The agreements provides for a 9-percent pay increase effective Aug. 1 and an additional $15 per week on May 1, 1983. Weekly minimums will range from $230 to $260 at KTUL-TV and from $300 to $380 at KATV.

THE CONTRACT also establishes jurisdiction, seniority rights, grievance and arbitration procedures, discharge protections and other rights at both stations. The contract for KTUL-TV includes an agency shop clause.

The agreement also provides for reinstatement of discharged employees who want their old jobs back.

Auto Workers' Chrysler Council Okays New Pact

Southfield, Mich.—The Auto Workers' Chrysler Council approved the union's new contract with the nation's number three auto maker, the first step in the process of ratifying the one-year pact.

After a five-hour meeting here, the council voted 262 to 248 in favor of the agreement. The voting was weighted according to the number of workers in each local unit represented in the council. Rank-and-file balloting on the settlement usually is held within a week to 10 days of the council vote.

Reached Sept. 16, the new contract restores cost-of-living adjustments given up by the workers last year, but ties pay increases to the company's future profits. The pact also continues full payment of medical benefits by the company.

In the Chrysler Council's debate on the settlement, UAW President Douglas Fraser said he was convinced that "we extracted from them the absolute limit in these negotiations"

Meanwhile, the UAW reached a tentative three-year agreement with the General Dynamics Corp., covering some 5,000 hourly workers. The union struck the St. Louis-based defense contractor Sept. 15.

Unionists, Fans Back Walkout

Striking NFL Players Pledged Solid Support

By John R. Oravec

National Football League players, rebuffed repeatedly by team owners in their efforts to gain an equitable contract settlement, went on strike with the overwhelming backing of union members and support of sports fans at large.

Resolutions endorsing the Players Association action were quickly adopted by AFL-CIO central labor councils in many cities that field NFL teams and were being drafted in others.

AMONG AFL-CIO central councils already voting expressions of support for the players in sanctioning the strike were Los Angeles, Cleveland, Baltimore, Chicago, San Diego, San Francisco and Washington.

Meanwhile, a nationwide public opinion survey by the Washington Post and ABC News showed that most fans sided with the players in their dispute with owners.

And AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland wrote NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey that the federation "has repeatedly expressed its support for the players' proposals for achieving equity in their profession."

HE CITED an Executive Council statement adopted in August that said in part: "The players are the game in professional football. It is their skill and courage which attract immense audiences from which the owners derive their income. . . . The football players receive the lowest average pay in professional team sports and are subject to the monopolist powers exercised by the franchised owners."

The annual salary of the average NFL player—whose career lasts less than five years—was $83,811 last year, according to a union study. This is substantially below the average salaries in other professional sports, such as baseball's $250,000, basketball's $215,000 and hockey's $115,000.

The NFLPA executive council unanimously voted to call the strike, effective Sept. 21, three days after the owners' management council flatly rejected the union's pared-down proposal, thus breaking off negotiations.

In announcing the union council's decision, NFLPA President Gene Upshaw said the impasse "has left us no choice but to use the only weapon we have to force management to bargain with us."

The union earlier had filed unfair practice charges with the National Labor Relations Board accusing the owners of failure to bargain in good faith and designating representatives without authority to negotiate an agreement.

"NO GAMES will be played until management abandons its unlawful course, engages in collective bargaining and executes a fair and equitable agreement," Upshaw stressed.

In its initial wage package proposal, the union sought 55 percent of the owners' gross revenues to be put into a fund for players' salaries. The union's revised four-year proposal called for 50 percent of league's lucrative contract with the major television networks as well as other revenues to be placed in the salary fund.

The league's new five-year TV contract is for more than $2.1 billion and will yield each owner at least $75 million. The owners will continue to receive payments from the networks amounting to about $30 million for at least two weeks even though games are suspended because of the strike, according to league sources.

THE PLAYERS are also seeking improvements in pensions, insurance, medical coverage including the right to be treated by other than team physicians, speedier grievance procedures and an overhaul of the league's restrictive rule on free agents.

The strike has the solid support of the NFLPA members, squelching speculation that team owners would attempt to stage games with cast-offs and pick-ups.

Dick Vermeil, coach of the Philadelphia Eagles, put a further damper on the speculation when he was quoted as saying, "I have no interest at all in coaching a scab football team."

STRIKE CALL is announced by President Gene Upshaw of the National Football League Players Association and Ed Garvey, right, executive director, following a unanimous vote of the NFLPA's executive council in New York.

Donahue Stresses Bargaining As Key to Gaining Pay Equity

for change that is represented . . . by the union at the bargaining table."

There is no specific legislation before the three panels, but Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) told an earlier session of the oversight hearings he intends to introduce legislation in this Congress to amend the Equal Pay Act to require equal pay for jobs of comparable worth as well as for equal work.

In other testimony, State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald W. McEntee said that his union, which represents 400,000 women "is appalled at the lack of interest, even the outright hostility, shown by members of the Reagan Administration in key policy areas affecting women workers."

HE CITED a list of the Administration's slips including attempts to downgrade some female federal workers, failure to pursue discrimination lawsuits, particularly when an employer stands to take an economic beating, and ignoring guidelines set under the Carter Administration for investigating wage bias charges.

McEntee urged Congress to exercise its power to compel federal agencies to "comply with the law and their own regulations."

He also noted the AFSCME has been active in its own right using bargaining, job evaluation, legislative action and even the 1981 strike of San Jose, Calif., city workers to win pay equity battles.

DONAHUE gave examples of other union's activism on fair pay issues, including:

- A joint study of job classifications and wages being done by the Communications Workers and the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers with AT&T.
- Collective bargaining and litigation efforts used since the late 1960s by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in negotiations with General Electric and Westinghouse.
- Use of bargaining by the Service Employees to win reclassification of occupations for Santa Clara County, Calif., employees.
- Legislation achieved by Minnesota public employee unions committing the state to the principle of equal pay for work of comparable worth and earmarking part of the state budget for the necessary adjustments.

THERE IS no single scientific method to job evaluation, one of the keys to deciding comparable worth, Donahue observed. But he stressed that the experience of unions has been "long and often bitter" when employers have used biased evaluations "not in the interest of workers," but to justify their pay practices.

Unions must be part of the process, he stressed, because "when both management and labor agree on using job evaluation, the product will be less biased and may be of real value" to both parties.

Donahue said the federal government "offers a peculiarly appropriate laboratory" for studying pay equity and comparable worth and proving what can be accomplished.

HE SAID that in the fall of 1980 the Federal Classification Task Force missed an opportunity when it did not act quickly on the recommendation of its labor members, including the AFL-CIO, that a federal wage study be made and a grievance system set up to take issues of differentials to binding arbitration.

Donahue also criticized the suggestion by the Office of Personnel Management (OPM) that over time, improved promotional opportunities for women would eliminate the problem.

"Such evasions are not the answer," Donahue said, since "the result of this simplistic suggestion would be that more female workers might wind up in occupations previously occupied by males, but undervalued, traditionally female jobs would still be undervalued."

Other labor representatives testifying included James Booe, Communications Workers executive vice president; Winn Newman, AFSCME special counsel; Ellen Wernick, director of the Center for Education & Research for the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and Karen Nussbaum, president of Service Employees District 925.

October Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

Four labor studies institutes will be offered at the George Meany Center in October. The subjects: effective speaking, labor law, advanced leadership skills and advanced arbitration techniques. In addition, AFL-CIO affiliates will use the campus for their own training programs during the month. The schedule:

Effective Speaking, Oct. 3-8—A workshop providing a variety of speaking experiences including selecting, preparing and delivering the message, use of visual aids, the art of listening and audience analysis.

Labor Law, Oct. 3-8—An institute to acquaint union leaders with laws governing union activities including elections, organizing, duty of fair representation and laws of equal opportunity, ERISA and OSHA.

Advanced Leadership Skills, Oct. 17-23—A "how-to" course covering public speaking, effective reading, clearer writing, parliamentary procedures and time management.

Advanced Arbitration, Oct. 24-29—A course with emphasis on the techniques for presenting grievance cases, examining witnesses and preparing briefs.

Unions using the Meany Center for their own training programs include the Service Employees, Oct. 3-8 and Oct. 84-29, and District 1199 of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, Oct. 17-23.

The AFL-CIO Departments of Education and International Affairs have scheduled a conference with the American Histadrut Cultural Exchange Institute, Oct. 12-14.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development will bring 40 union leaders from Latin America to the campus, Oct. 11, for six weeks.

Enrollment is now open for seven institutes set for November: White Collar Organizing, Nov. 7-12; Quality of Work-Life, Nov. 7-11; Negotiating Techniques, Private Sector, Nov. 14-19; Union Responses to Technological Change, Nov. 21-23; Introduction to Computers, Nov. 21-24; Union Communications, Nov. 21-24; and New Staff, Nov. 28-Dec. 10.

More information about these and other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephon 301/431-6400.

held in Washington. The AFL-CIO has designated election day 1982 as Solidarity Day II under the slogan, "last year we marched, this year we vote." The Oct. 19 events—13 months after Solidarity Day I—are part of labor's overall election activities.

Oct. 19 leaflet day will focus on races for governor and for federal offices. COPE-endorsed candidates for the Senate, House or governor will appear with union officers at some sites.

Kirkland said the job sites finally selected will total 60 or more. Among the cities are:

East: Vicksburg, Miss.; New Castle, Pa.; Clarksville, Tenn.; Birmingham, Ala.; Arlington, Va.; Delaware County, Pa.; Wilmington, Del.; Lake County, Ohio; New York City; Hackensack, N.J.; Staten Island, N.Y. Harrisburg, Pa.; Pittsburgh; Alexandria, Va.; Trenton, N.J.; Joliet, Ill.; Waukegan, Ill.; Madison, Wis.; Eau Claire, Wis.

West: Spokane, Wash.; San Francisco; Jefferson City, Mo.; Omaha, Neb.; Hayward, Calif.; San Bruno, Calif.; Salt Lake City, Utah; Portland, Ore.; St. Paul, Minn., Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

Business Failures Mount as Recession Deepens

By James M. Shevis

Mounting business failures and further deterioration in the key housing and steel industries pointed up the gravity of the nation's economic problems.

At the same time, two new polls showed Americans are fed up with the Administration's handling of the economy. A New York Times-CBS News survey of registered voters found 57 percent disapproved President Reagan's approach to the economy. And a Washington Post-ABC News poll also found the Republican Administration losing ground in voter confidence for its performance on the economy.

IN THE LATTER poll, the Democratic Party was widely seen as better able than the Republicans to cope with such problems as unemployment, fair taxation, and protection of the social security system.

Not since the Great Depression of the 1930s has the number of business failures been as high as in the past year, Dun & Bradstreet said. The credit-reporting service announced 657 businesses closed their doors in the week ended Sept. 16, the second highest level of the year. The highest level of failures occurred in the week ended Aug. 26, a total of 696 business firms folded.

So far this year, there have been 17,502 business failures. In the Depression era, 100 of every 10,000 businesses failed. If the current trend of failures should continue, Dun & Bradstreet said, about 80 of every 10,000 businesses could fail this year, compared with about 62 of every 10,000 last year.

DUN & BRADSTREET does not have weekly records from the Thirties, but based on annual rates from the Depression years it said the latest week's casualties bring the total so far this year to the highest level since 19,859 failures were reported in 1933.

Many analysts, after looking at the latest reports on the economy, figure that a recovery this year—if it should materialize—is likely to be slow and of short duration. Despite the July 1 cut in personal income taxes and recent declines in interest rates, they believe there have been no real solid indicators that the country is bouncing back from its eighth postwar recession.

While second-quarter "real" gross national product was revised upward this week from the 1.3 percent originally reported to 2.1 percent and the Commerce Dept.'s "flash," or advance, estimate for the current quarter indicates the economy growing at a 1.5-percent annual rate, the figures are far less than the 4-to-5-percent growth economists consider necessary to keep unemployment from worsening. The nation's jobless rate now stands at 9.8 percent, the highest in over 40 years.

Part of the reason for the revision in second-quarter real GNP was that business inventories were higher than thought previously. Real GNP is the value of the nation's total output of goods and services adjusted for inflation.

MUCH OF THE concern over the economy derives from the continuing housing slump. Detroit has been in a depression-like state for several years, and the steel industry's average operating rate is down to 42 percent, its lowest level since the 1930s.

New housing construction dropped 16.2 percent in August to an annual rate of slightly more than one million units, only the third month in the past year to top that level, the Commerce Dept. reported. Michael Sumichrast, chief economist of the National Association of Home Builders, said the August figures showed that interest rates must be brought down or the housing industry and the rest of the economy are headed for big trouble.

"THERE EITHER will be a change in the (tight-money) policy or the economy will take one deep breath and collapse, and it will be the end of us and everybody else," Sumichrast warned.

Other signs of a weak economy:

- Personal income grew by only three-tenths of 1 percent last month, the smallest gain since a rise of two-tenths of 1 percent last March and an indication of sluggish economic growth this fall. The 1-percent gain recorded in July was attributed largely to the increase in social security and other federal benefit payments.
- New claims for regular state unemployment insurance benefits jumped to a seasonally adjusted 658,000 in the week ended Sept. 4, an increase of 29,000 over the previous week, and the highest number since May 1980, when initial claims hit 675,000.

Labor Pushes Auto Content Bill in House

produce or buy components in the United States worth a certain percent of their sales in the country. The legislation would provide for a sliding scale—the greater the sales in the United States, the greater the percentage of domestic content required.

The Ottinger proposal would require 10 percent at sales of 100,000 units annually in model year 1986. The requirement would rise to 90 percent for producers with annual sales of 900,000 or more.

"The United States can no longer afford a passive industrial and trade policy toward the auto industry when all other major auto-producing nations are promoting their industries, pushing their exports and preventing increases in imports," Fraser said.

In his testimony, Denison warned, "We face an emergency situation involving an industry that is basic to our economy and whose fate could decide whether the nations will regain its productive health or slide into a depression."

DENISON URGED speedy adoption of the measure which he said "is based on the concept that multinational auto companies—U.S., French, German or Japanese—should provide the United States with jobs and production when they enjoy the advantages of the U.S. market."

Fear of retaliation, often cited in opposition to content laws, is unfounded, Denison said, since other nations have combinations of domestic content laws or policies, high tariffs, quotas and/or embargoes, subsidies, and requirements for auto exports.

The IUD's Samuel told the House panel the direct problem of Japan demands special attention.

"WHILE THE United States maintains an open market to the Japanese," he said, "Japan has erected an array of non-tariff barriers to restrict the number of American vehicles sold in Japan."

Samuel said the Ottinger bill is "critical to the survival of the American auto industry." There is nothing unsettling to world trade relationships in the measure, he said.

"It simply realigns the United States in a position that is on par with numerous other countries which implemented auto restrictions some time ago. By helping millions of workers keep their jobs," he said, "this legislation will greatly strengthen the American economy."

Under the legislation, foreign auto makers that did not meet the minimum domestic content requirements would be subject to mandatory import quotas.

LEGISLATION REQUIRING automakers to have a certain portion of American-made components in any vehicles sold in the United States is discussed at House hearings by Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) and AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison. Riegle is a cosponsor of the measure in the Senate.

Congress Slated to Return For Post-Election Session

President Reagan's call for a special session of Congress following the November elections to consider spending bills for fiscal year 1983 was reluctantly agreed to by congressional leaders who questioned the value of a "lame-duck" session.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.) warned that such a session also could consider measures other than the money bills, bogging down action on the primary legislation.

"EVERYBODY WHO has legislation kicking around here will want to bring it up," O'Neill warned, adding that attendance at special sessions is traditionally sparse.

Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr., of Tennessee told the upper chamber to be ready to return Nov. 29.

In a letter to congressional leaders, Reagan deplored what he called the practice of "attempting to run the federal government without a proper budget—with a series of temporary continuing resolutions." This "amounts to both bad economics and bad management," he said, urging Congress to resume its work after the elections "in a manner that fulfills the obligation of the budget resolution that Congress has passed."

REAGAN'S request came as Congress debated more than a dozen appropriations bill. Enactment of the measures, however, seemed difficult to realize by the start of the new fiscal year, which begins on Oct. 1. Congress plans to adjourn in early October to permit members to campaign for election.

One of the spending bills, an $11.2 billion transportation appropriation, passed the House even as the President's letter was on its way to congressional leaders. Passage came on a 268 to 119 vote despite a veto threat from Reagan.

Following approval of the transportation bill, the House passed a huge stopgap "continuing resolution" to fund all agencies for which Congress has not approved appropriations bills by Oct. 1. The resolution generally provides for funding at current levels or at House-approved levels, whichever are lower.

MEANWHILE, Senate liberals claimed a victory over conservatives by turning back four attempts to halt a two-week filibuster against a school prayer measure sponsored by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.).

The Helms amendment to a debt ceiling measure would remove the school prayer issue from the jurisdiction of the federal courts, including the Supreme Court, which have ruled that organized prayer in the schools violates the constitutional principle of separation of church and state.

"THE HELMS amendment attempts to deny the federal judiciary its appointed role in interpreting the Constitution," AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said in a letter to all members of the Senate.

"It seeks to do indirectly what its sponsor and supporters cannot do directly: to overrule Supreme Court constitutional decisions by a simple majority vote of Congress."

Rail Strikers Ordered Back By Congress

The nation's railroads were operating again after members of the unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers complied with back-to-work legislation approved by Congress and signed by President Reagan.

Some 20,000 BLE members struck the railroads Sept. 19, staying out four days before Congress acted. Other rail unions honored the engineers' picket lines, and traffic was halted or curtailed on more than 100 lines.

THE LEGISLATION signed by Reagan imposed on BLE the recommendations made a month earlier by an emergency board appointed in July by the President to investigate the union's longstanding contract dispute with the carriers. The measure carried 383 to 17 in the House and by voice vote in the Senate.

The emergency panel's recommendations included a 28.8-percent wage increase over the 39 months of the new contract, plus cost-of-living adjustments, and a moratorium on striking before June 1984, when the new contract would expire. Similar agreements were signed earlier by 12 other rail unions. BLE balked at the strike moratorium and rejected the proposed wage hike because it did not provide the differential the union contends its members should have.

THE WAGE differential was at the heart of the dispute, keeping BLE and management from reaching agreement. For working with reduced crews, the engineers receive extra pay. BLE members working without a fireman receive $4 extra per day plus 4 cents a mile for every mile above 100 covered in a single day.

Alone among the 13 rail unions that negotiate with the railroads, the engineers for the past seven years have not had a no-strike clause in their contracts.

The United Transportation Union, which represents other crew members such as conductors and brakemen, recently signed a memorandum of agreement that would establish a strike moratorium in its contract. The UTU, whose contract negotiations also came in for study by a presidential fact-finding panel, scheduled a meeting of the union's general chairmen in Chicago, Sept. 24, to consider ratification of the contract.

THE BACK-TO-WORK work resolution was the first to be adopted since 1971 when Congress, at the request of President Nixon, took similar action to end a nationwide walkout by rail unions.

Congress acted under emergency powers of the Railway Labor Act of 1926, which authorizes legislation terminating any rail strike that threatens to deny essential transportation services.

Pillard Hits Reagan Attack

IBEW Delegates Urged To Defend Gains at Polls

Los Angeles—A strong demonstration of trade union solidarity in the November elections is essential if organized labor is to preserve the gains it has made over the past 50 years, delegates to the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers were told.

IBEW President Charles H. Pillard warned that virtually every economic and social program beneficial to workers "is under attack from an Administration that has given new life to the extremists of the right—the very same forces that organized labor threw out of government 50 years ago."

PILLARD CITED the concerted efforts of the Reagan Administration and its conservative allies to undermine the wage protections of the Davis-Bacon Act, weaken occupational safety and health law, undercut unemployment compensation as millions of jobless seek work, and scuttle programs for retirees and the elderly.

But the primary target of the right wing is to destroy the labor movement, he stressed, "because they know that we are the driving force behind social progress, that we believe that people should share in the wealth that is made possible by their talents and skills."

Victory in November for labor-endorsed candidates will help preserve union rights, secure hard-won protections and widen opportunities for needed job-creating legislation, Pillard told the union's 32nd quadrennial convention.

SPEAKER AFTER speaker stressed the need to turn out a heavy vote of union members and their families on Nov. 2.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a convention address that President Reagan will be seeking a vote of confidence for his policies in November even as 10.8 million jobless Americans—victims of Reaganomics—search for nonexistent jobs.

Kirkland observed that in preaching the virtues of supply-side economics, Reagan promised that huge tax cuts for corporations and the wealthy would produce new investment and jobs along with a resurgence of economic growth.

"What went wrong?" Kirkland asked. "According to the Secretary of Commerce, lately enlightened, the business tax cuts were too large and so, rather than stimulating capital spending, they depressed it."

AND WHILE the millions of victims of Reaganomics yearn for work, the nation's bridges, streets, sewers, hospitals, ports and other public facilities are deteriorating, Kirkland pointed out.

"We are not calling for government handouts to welfare chiselers or meaningless make-work programs," he stressed. "We are calling for government programs to put people back to work that desperately needs to be done."

Reagan's policies also came under heavy fire from Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.), Gov. Edmund G. Brown, National COPE Director John Perkins, President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., and President Paul Burnsky of the Metal Trades Dept.

IN CONVENTION action, the 3,300 delegates voted a $1 increase in monthly per capita payments, which will rise to $5.20 next Jan. 1.

Delegates also re-elected Pillard, Sec. Ralph A. Leigon and Treas. Thomas P. Van Arsdale to new four-year terms in addition to relaxing the union's age 65 mandatory retirement rule for IBEW officers.

The amended bylaw permits incumbent officers to complete terms after turning 65. Pillard, now 64, was elected to a new term over C. R. Delgado of Galveston, Tex., by a vote of 548,384 to 64,292. Leigon and Van Arsdale were re-elected without opposition.

Eleven of the 12 district vice presidents were re-elected without opposition, as was the eight-member executive council. In the only contested race—for the eighth district vice presidency—Jon F. Walters defeated incumbent Larry Fornan. The district comprises Colorado, Montana, Utah and Wyoming.

DELEGATES ALSO adopted an "outsider" rule which prohibits candidates for union office from soliciting or accepting campaign contributions from nonmembers of the IBEW.

The convention voted to increase salaries of officers and senior representatives, their first raise since 1978. The president's salary rises to $120,000 a year from $97,500; the secretary's to $106,000 from $86,500; the treasurer's to $27,000 from $22,000; vice presidents to $74,000 from $60,000; executive council members to $23,500 from $19,000 and the council chairman's to $27,000 from $22,000. The salary of senior representatives was increased to $54,000 from $44,000.

In future years officers' salaries will be adjusted annually—keyed to 75 percent of the wage increases negotiated for IBEW members.

FUND-RAISING DINNER brought in more than $30,000 toward the purchase of the Botto House in Haledon, N.J., in efforts to convert it into a labor history museum. As the home of Pietro Botto in 1913, it was the meeting place for union organizers and striking silk workers. Seated from left are AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner; Bunny Kuiken, Botto's granddaughter; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; joined by Executive Vice President Scott Hoyman of the Clothing & Textile Workers; ACTWU Senior Executive Vice President Sol Stetin, also honored at the dinner, and ACTWU Vice President Joe Coponi.

20 Years of Success Hailed In L.A. Organizing Project

Los Angeles—American workers need bigger and stronger unions to deal with giant corporations and to protect them against the political and economic assaults of the Reagan Administration.

That was the message that AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland brought to the 20th anniversary celebration of the federation's long-running organizing campaign in southern California.

KIRKLAND COMMENDED the 750 union representatives attending the Los Angeles-Orange Counties Organizing Committee luncheon for their efforts in the project, which is credited with bringing 400,000 workers into unions.

"Organizing is an unending process," he stressed. "We did not enter the California scene for a couple of quick victories or fast headlines. We started this campaign to lay the foundation for a sound, progressive labor movement, and that is what we have done."

Citing the success of the campaign launched 20 years ago, Kirkland noted that the model created in California is being used with modifications in Houston in a coordinated effort by 28 federation affiliates.

"Houston's big employers, like those of southern California two decades ago have enjoyed a free ride until now," he said. "They have been able to short-change workers on money and fringes, offering free sunshine on the weekends in place of more money in the pay envelope and the security of a union contract."

Bigger and stronger unions are needed to engage the corporations and industries that control the nation's economy, Kirkland asserted. They also need to stand up against the attacks on workers' interests that were "launched when Ronald Reagan moved into the White House," he said.

Kirkland charged that "for the first time in a half-century, we have a President and an Administration dedicated to the ideology that government is the enemy."

IN THE process of undoing the progress toward social justice achieved over the last 50 years, "Reaganite Republicans have managed to drag this country into its worst recession since the Great Depression of the 1930s," Kirkland said.

Along with soaring unemployment, mounting bankruptcies and a bleak economic outlook, he said, "the list of Reaganomics' victims gets longer every day as this Administration cuts and slashes at the vital social programs that were built over several decades to protect the old and the sick and the deprived in our society."

In times of crisis, workers need the strength and the solidarity of unions, he observed:

"IT IS IN those industries hardest hit by the Reagan 'depression' that the union contract has proved its value. The organized worker is the one who is protected from discriminatory layoffs. It is free collective bargaining that allows workers—through their unions—to adjust working conditions to the changes in the economic atmosphere in a fair manner."

And when the economy recovers, it will be the unions that turn the givebacks into gains for workers, Kirkland stressed.

SEIU Drive Fights Social Security Pullouts

The Service Employees are cranking up an organizing campaign aimed at nonprofit hospitals that have filed notices to drop social security protections.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney said the drive will begin within 30 days and initially will concentrate on the Chicago area where 209 hospitals and health care facilities have filed withdrawal notices with the Internal Revenue Service.

While the Chicago area leads the nation in withdrawals, data obtained by the SEIU from the Social Security Administration show that more than 930 nonprofit health care organizations employing 375,000 workers have filed withdrawal notices—with some 100 filings made since June.

Sweeney said the SEIU is focusing on workers not represented by unions since they have little protection against the unilateral action their employers are taking to strip them of social security coverage.

"The continuing increase in withdrawals from social security by non-profit hospitals means they are becoming free-loaders on the U.S. health care system at a time when we are having trouble financing delivery of basic services," Sweeney charged.

"MEDICARE FUNDS, which are the bulwark of our health care system, come entirely from social security contributions, and withdrawals are damaging Medicare just as surely as they are undermining the solvency of the social security system."

Earlier, Sweeney asked Rep. J. J. Pickle (D-Tex.), chairman of the House subcommittee on social security, to conduct hearings in Washington and Chicago "so the public can know the full truth of the withdrawals and their potential damage to the solvency of the social security system and to health care funding."

Sweeney underlined the need for Congress to close the withdrawal "loophole" that allows non-profit organizations to pull out of social security after eight years of participation.

THE SEIU has successfully blocked the withdrawal of a San Francisco hospital by filing an unfair labor practice charge with the National Labor Relations Board. The issue is now before the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

In another area, Sweeney said the SEIU has asked Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to immediately implement a ban on reimbursing health care employers for anti-union activities from Medicare funds. That prohibition was spelled out in the tax bill recently enacted by Congress.

THE AMERICAN Hospital Association is strongly considering a court challenge of the provision.

"It is obscene for hospitals and nursing homes to finance anti-union activities with public funds," Sweeney declared. "As a union, we pay our own costs for conducting organizing campaigns, and the health care institutions should pay their own costs for trying to defeat us."

Jobless Rate Soars To 12.7% in Britain

Unemployment in Britain, where the Thatcher Conservative Party government hews to monetarist economic policies admired by the Reagan Administration, rose 49,000 to nearly 3,037,000 in mid-September. The jobless represent 12.7 percent of the work force.

Joblessness has increased steadily in Britain since July, when the number of unemployed workers for the first time exceeded the number registered at the height of the Great Depression in January 1933.

The grim economic news was announced the day before the British Trades Union Congress called a "day of action" to support increased pay for health care workers.

Flight Attendants Gain Alaska Airlines Accord

Flight Attendants reached a tentative agreement with Alaska Airlines on a new contract with the assistance of the National Mediation Board after 11 months of negotiations.

The AFA, an affiliate of the Air Line Pilots, represents 359 Alaska Airlines flight attendants. Details of the contract will be disclosed following membership ratification, the union said.

House Votes Funds for 250,000 Jobs

An emergency funding bill to provide some 250,000 public-sector jobs for the hard-core unemployed won House approval Sept. 16 by a 223 to 169 vote.

The measure, which had strong AFL-CIO support, now must receive approval in the Senate. Voting right (R) on the House rollcall ballot were 191 Democrats and 32 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 141 Republicans and 28 Democrats.

Numerals show congressional districts. A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong.

Robin Hood Inverted

WE ARE FACED today with a concerted effort by a national Administration to break us apart, to stir up an awareness of meaningless differences among us, to encourage us to overlook the fact that we are all working people and that our destiny and progress in America depends upon our mutual cooperation, understanding affection and respect for each other.

This Administration, increasingly, has given safe passage into national debate and into social policy to some of the worst elements of American life. The strategy represents no less than a head-on attack on the interests of working people in America.

The fact that we have ten million people unemployed in the richest nation on earth and that we are financing an obscenely huge military budget by taking money from poor people, unemployed people, working people, black, white, Hispanic, Asian and other peoples who are struggling to make it in America, is no accident.

IT IS A conscious attempt to respond to a particular constituency whose solitary commitment is to enhance the position of class, privilege and wealth in America.

Under this Administration, taking from the poor and giving to the rich—a kind of grotesque inversion of the Robin Hood story—has become a cornerstone of national policy. This policy cannot be sustained for long. For it contributes to the dehumanization of our people and in so doing, corrupts and diminishes us all.

—From commencement address of Joseph S. Murphy, Chancellor-designate of LaGuardia Community College, New York, Sept. 12, 1982.

A Lesson In Unionism

THE LIST OF Reaganomics' victims gets longer every day as this Administration cuts and slashes at the vital social programs that were built over several decades to protect the old and the sick and the deprived in our society.

The Reagan budget cutters gutted training programs and reduced unemployment benefits just as the demand for new skills was rising and old ones disappearing, and more and more workers were being thrown into the streets.

There is an important lesson to be learned from this period of crisis—in bad times, too, there is strength in solidarity. That's when workers need their union most of all.

It is in those industries hardest hit by the Reagan depression that the union contract has proved its value. The organized worker is the one who is protected from discriminatory layoffs. It is free collective bargaining that allows workers, through their unions, to adjust working conditions to the changes in the economic atmosphere in a fair manner.

It will also be the unions that will protect their members when the economic wheel turns again and prosperity returns—when the callbacks replace layoffs, and the so-called givebacks are turned into new gains for workers.

Reagan Refuses to Recognize Suffering His Policies Cause

By Press Associates, Inc.

AS PRESIDENT REAGAN crosses the nation in Air Force One, shuttling between the White House and his California ranch, he views a beautiful landscape unfolding below. But how long can he remain 35,000 feet above the nation's problems, seemingly unaware of the distress and suffering his policies are causing?

The President adamantly refuses to recognize, let alone accept responsibility for, the collapse of his grand design.

The huge tax cuts of 1981 were supposed to spur an economic boom. The $25 billion in social program cutbacks were supposed to release money for defense, free people from "dependence" on government and force welfare "cheaters" to look for work.

IN HIS State of the Union address in January 1982, Mr. Reagan called on the private sector to replace the government in funding and running social programs.

Working people by far give the greatest amount in voluntary contributions, about $39 billion in 1981, more than half to churches. Foundations gave $2.4 billion and business about $2.7 billion.

But loss of government funds has been crippling the work of the major human services agencies.

The Family Service Association of America surveyed its United Way agencies and found they had lost $6.7 million in public funding in 1982, 8 percent of total public funding. Efforts to increase private funding brought in only $334,000.

AN FSA OFFICIAL said she was disturbed by the survey findings. There is a tremendous interdependence between government and private groups, she said, and it was "naive" of the Reagan Administration to think that corporations could take up the slack.

LeRoy Robinson, Jr., the president of FSA, related poignant stories of people flocking to Oklahoma in search of jobs and families living in cars for lack of shelter. "Then there is the example of the working mother in Wichita, Kan., with two children 3 and 4 years old. After the state cut its day-care benefits, she was forced to bring her children to work each day and leave them in her car in the plant's parking lot. She was deeply upset by her plight, but had no other way to care for her children while she worked."

The Child Welfare League reported large increases in child abuse and deaths in areas of high unemployment. In Oregon, as the timber industry slumped and unemployment rose, cases of family stress and child abuse jumped 46 percent. Similar large increases were reported in South Carolina, Texas, West Virginia, Illinois and Michigan.

THE COUNCIL of Jewish Federations reported that because of Medicaid cuts, all hospitals, "including those like ours who truly care deeply for the human needs of the sick and poor, will reach a financial breaking point."

The Conference of Catholic Charities said its services were reduced because of public funding cuts while the number of people seeking help "increased dramatically."

Bishop J. Francis Stafford, chairman of the Commission on Marriage & Family Life of the U.S. Catholic Conference, became perhaps the first major church to criticize Reagan's policies. ciety are shaken.

"History has taught us that one of the most important functions of government is to protect the family," Bishop Stafford said. "When family structures are threatened, the foundations of society are shaken.

MANY MILLIONS of poor, low- and previously middle-income families are suffering from unemployment, the church leader said. "Joblessness has been solidly linked to the breakdown of family life," he noted, with unemployment related to rises in infant mortality, child abuse, alcoholism, suicide, heart disease and most crimes, including murder.

Bishop Stafford said that while he was not linking all the current economic woes to this or any other Administration, "the White House cannot escape responsibility for the policies it is prescribing."

On Sept. 9, 1982, President Reagan visited Topeka, Kan., and addressed a Republican luncheon. He said there was talk he had picked on the helpless, the needy, the poor. "Well, that is not true," he said. He then told a few anecdotes about people on welfare and social security and his audience laughed.

AFL-CIO LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

GOP Plans Cuts in Social Security After Election Day—Unless They Get a Message

President Reagan and his right-wing allies in Congress seem to think that Social Security and Medicare are fair game for their "slash and burn" policies. The nation's retirees, who know first-hand how much they depend on these life-support programs, have protested vigorously--and effectively. They have stopped many of the worst Reagan proposals in their tracks.

Loss of Faith Among Young Americans

Unfortunately, in sounding false alarms about Social Security's financing, Reagan has caused a loss of faith among the nation's young workers about federal retirement programs. Many now feel they will never receive the Social Security and Medicare benefits they are paying for, so they aren't protesting alongside the elderly.

Cuts in Social Security and Medicare affect all Americans, young and old. If your parents or elderly dependents are deprived of their full benefits, who will make sure they don't suffer? You, of course.

Social Security: More Than Just a Pension

Social Security is more than a pension for your retirement years. It provides important safeguards for families in their working years:

- It's also a disability insurance program, helping workers and their families if the breadwinner suffers injury and can no longer continue gainful employment.
- It's a life insurance program, providing income for surviving spouses and young children if the breadwinner dies.
- It's a health insurance program, helping retirees and the disabled meet skyrocketing hospital and medical bills.

The Politics of Cutting Social Security

1. President Reagan and right-wing members of Congress have never shown much support for Social Security and Medicare.
2. Only the threat of retaliation by angry voters has prevented Congress from making cuts in these programs even deeper than they already have.
3. That's why Social Security and Medicare face grave danger after Election Day 1982.

Vote on November 2 for a Better Congress

Make sure now that you are registered to vote, and take care on Nov. 2 to vote for those who have voted to save Social Security and Medicare, and against those who have rubber-stamped the Reagan budget cuts.

Social Security: Myth vs. Fact

MYTH: Social Security is going broke.
FACT: The alarm bells sounded by the Reagan Administration are meant only to frighten the public into accepting cuts in their Social Security benefits. Actually, Social Security faces a short-term problem, ironically, caused in part by the Reagan recession which has thrown more than 2 million Americans out of work, stopping their payments into the system.

The problem can be solved by:

1) renewing the authority to transfer money among the three Social Security trust funds (this authority is due to expire at the end of 1982), and

2) if necessary, borrowing from general federal revenues, as is currently being done for unemployment compensation. Preferably, actual contributions should be made from general revenues, as is done in other Western industrialized countries.

MYTH: President Reagan won't cut Social Security benefits.
FACT: President Reagan already has cut Social Security benefits by $18 billion over the next five years. And he has repeatedly called for much deeper cuts--as much as $82 billion over five years--only to be slapped down by Congress.

MYTH: Social Security is only an income supplement for the elderly.
FACT: Social Security is the No. 1 source of income for the elderly, with private pensions and savings far behind. Only 28 percent of the elderly have a private pension in addition to Social Security. For one retiree in four, Social Security provides 90 percent of their income.

GOP Leaders Speak Out on Social Security

President Reagan (regarding his proposal to delay Social Security cost-of-living adjustments): "Well, this is a slippage, but we're going to cut all pensions."

Budget Director David Stockman: (Use of scare tactics) "will permit the politicians to make it look like they're doing something for the beneficiary population when they are doing something to it."

Sen. Robert Dole (R-KS), on why he wants to cut Social Security after Election Day: "Between Thanksgiving and Christmas is a perfect time; even politicians aren't very political then."

Domestic Content Bill Is One Step Closer to a Vote

The domestic content bill, H.R. 5133, cleared a major legislative hurdle as it was approved 25-16 by the House Energy and Commerce Committee (see vote, below left).

The content bill would require auto manufacturers who sell large quantities of vehicles in the United States--primarily Toyota and Datsun--to produce gradually increasing portions of the vehicles here. It would restore an estimated 700,000 jobs in auto production and supplier industries.

The content bill has been referred to the Ways and Means Committee, which began hearings last week. The AFL-CIO and UAW testified in strong support of this jobs legislation.

WHAT YOUR CAN DO: Urge your Representative to cosponsor and support H.R. 5133, the domestic content bill. Particularly important now are members of the Ways and Means Committee.

Balanced Budget Amendment: Keep Up the Pressure

Time is running out on the program-slashing balanced budget Constitutional amendment. But President Reagan has demanded that Congress return for a lame-duck session after the election Nov. 2, and the backers of the amendment could try to bring it to a vote then.

Another problem: House leaders may bring to the floor a statutory version of the amendment. This would keep Reaganomics out of the Constitution, but it could include objectionable provisions, such as requiring a two-thirds "supermajority" to approve spending to bring the country out of recession.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Continue urging your Representative to oppose H.J. Res. 350 or any other version of the balanced budget amendment that would undermine majority rule.

Now Japan Wants To Build and Export Aircraft

In the 1970s, the United States watched idly as the Japanese government vigorously subsidized and promoted its auto industry, sending millions of vehicles overseas while restricting imports into Japan to virtually zero. Now the Japanese government has set its sights on another major industry: aircraft manufacture. The Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry is offering subsidies to get its industry involved in all phases--design, production, sales and service--of the next generation short-haul airliner. American companies, including Boeing and McDonnell Douglas, are actively courting the Japanese companies to help develop the aircraft.

Thus while Japanese companies are receiving government subsidies to develop their high technology and defense-related industry, American companies can't wait to move their operations abroad.

If the United States does not adopt a more realistic trade policy, the high-technology industries will be the next to leave the country.

Double blow staggers economy

Solidarity kickoff

Top officers of the National Football League Players Association, backed by player representatives from several NFL teams, field reporters' questions at AFL-CIO headquarters. At the microphones are NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey and President Gene Upshaw. Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue headed a team of AFL-CIO officials expressing labor's solidarity with the striking players.

New jobless claims surge, index slumps

By James M. Shevis

A double dose of discouraging economic news—a sharp spurt in new claims for unemployment insurance benefits and a steep drop in the government's closely watched index of leading indicators—disproves the Administration's claim that prosperity is just around the corner, the AFL-CIO charged.

"The clear message is that the Reagan Recession is deepening," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald declared. "Administration rhetoric is not enough. The unemployed need jobs."

Oswald decried a situation in which a Republican-controlled Senate rejected a House-approved emergency funding bill to provide jobs for the hard-core unemployed while millions of Americans are searching for work. That happened this week as the Senate defeated the measure, 60 to 37, that would have put people to work rebuilding the nation's deteriorating roads and bridges and other public facilities.

Reagan's defense

Reagan, who has been sighting recovery from the 14-month-old recession for months now, spent a good part of his most recent news conference defending his economic program. But the latest economic data and the prospect of grimmer news to come combined to undermine his credibility.

Many economists in and outside the Administration expect the nation's current official jobless rate of 9.8 percent to reach 10 percent or more of the work force when the next government report on unemployment is released Oct. 8.

In his Sept. 28 White House news conference, Reagan conceded that "it is possible that we might touch 10 percent" unemployment. Anticipating bad economic news, Reagan also said that, "This coming month when the figures are released, we think that August has been in a kind of doldrums and it may show a dip. But that'll be a glitch."

The drop of nine-tenths of 1-percent in the Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators in August, combined

Compromise on training moves through Congress

By David L. Perlman

A compromise employment training bill moved through Congress with bipartisan support, but there were stormy differences over other job-related legislation. And in a surprise move, the House planned to take up the controversial balanced budget constitutional amendment before adjourning for the election campaign.

The Senate defeated, 60-37, a labor-supported, House-passed bill that would have put more than 200,000 unemployed workers in temporary jobs to meet a backlog of local public works projects and neglected community services.

Temporary jobs aren't "meaningful," Republicans insisted.

"Recovery around the corner doesn't put bread on the table," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) countered as he urged adoption of the bill.

The Senate also defeated, by a closer 51-47 margin, an attempt to restore the extended unemployment benefits program that has been largely gutted by the cutbacks Congress enacted last year. (Related story, this page.)

The proposal, by Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio), would have restored the 13 weeks of extended unemployment benefits that is being wiped out by the new eligibility levels. It also would have continued the federal supplemental benefits of six to 10 weeks that Congress recently enacted as long as the national unemployment rate is 8.7 percent or higher. The emergency program otherwise will expire at the end of March.

Stopgap funding

Final action on a stopgap appropriations bill to continue funding for government agencies that have not received regular fiscal 1983 appropriations was expected to clear the way for adjournment of Congress, giving members seeking re-election a full month of campaigning time. A post-election "lame duck" session of Con-

Football players pick up yardage in NLRB action

By John R. Oravec

Striking National Football League players gained additional yardage in their dispute with team owners as a National Labor Relations Board law judge found management guilty of unfair labor practices. Even so, the league's management council gave no indication that it was willing to get down to serious bargaining.

The ruling came in the wake of a strong show of solidarity with the NFL Players Association by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates.

Meanwhile, the union pressed ahead with plans for a series of all-star games, starting Oct. 10, in an effort to fill the void for sports fans who suffered through the first gameless weekend during a regular season in NFL history. The union's all-star games will be beamed nationwide

Long-term jobless hit

New 'trigger' scuttling benefits

Despite high and rising joblessness, the extended benefits program that now provides 13 weeks of additional unemployment compensation eligibility in 23 states will be virtually wiped out in the weeks ahead.

The brunt of the cutback will be felt the last week in October, when at least nine and perhaps as many as 17 states will "trigger-off" the extended benefits program as a result of changes in the law that took effect Sept. 25. The changes were enacted by Congress last year at the urging of the Reagan Administration.

A new, temporary program of federal supplemental benefits that went into effect Sept. 10 will cushion the immediate impact for eligible workers in states that will be triggering-off the extended benefits program. But their total eligibility will nevertheless be reduced. The federal program, which will be discontinued at the end of March, applies in all states after a jobless worker's unemployment benefits have been exhausted.

Congress had previously abolished the national trigger for extended unemployment compensation, and Arleen Gilliam, an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, said the quirks of the new law threaten to cut benefits in come of the hardest hit states, including Michigan where joblessness has been near Depression levels.

Complex formula

Until Sept. 25 the trigger level that brought states into the extended benefits program had been set at an insured unemployment rate (IUR) of 5 percent, or both 4 percent and 120 percent of the rate for the same period of each of the past two years, measured over a 13-week period. The IUR is always significantly lower than the overall unemployment rate.

After the September deadline, the state trigger went up to 6 percent of the insured rate, or 5 percent if the rate is 20 percent higher than in the previous two years.

"Added to the craziness" of raising the triggers at the height of the recession when workers are most in need of benefits, Gilliam said, is another recent change that excludes from the calculations of the insured unemployment rate those workers who have already been jobless for more than 26 weeks.

In addition, the new law requires that workers who exhaust their regular benefits must have had 20 weeks of qualifying employment in the base period to

Florida per cap boost tied to expanded political action

Orlando, Fla.—The annual meeting of the Florida AFL-CIO adopted a three-level per capita tax increase keyed to stepping up the state federation's political efforts.

A five-cent increase in the monthly per capita payment of affiliates will take effect Jan. 1, 1983, followed by increases of 2.5 cents each on June 1, 1983, and Jan. 1, 1984.

State AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller told the 325 delegates that "one year ago, President Reagan and the right-wing in this country were riding high," but today "the promised gold of supply-side economics has turned to dust. The economy is mired in a deep recession. Unemployment is at its highest level since World War II, and the budget deficit for next year is predicted to go as high as $140 billion."

Florida's labor movement, Miller asserted, is building "a powerful and unified movement that can change the lives of the working people of this state."

The delegates acted on 38 resolutions, among them a call for an improved workers' compensation law for the state, support for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment, creation of a "Florida 'Bill of Rights' for Workers," and a "right-to-know" law regarding hazardous chemicals in the workplace.

Other resolutions opposed the merger of federal civil service pension plans with social security and favored federal appropriations to continue operation of Amtrak at current levels.

Delegates endorsed Election Day, Nov. 2, as "Solidarity Day II" and called on working people to "march to the polls" to vote for federal and state candidates who will help revitalize the economy and support labor's goals.

Florida Democratic Rep. Claude Pepper, an outspoken advocate of the elderly and a critic of President Reagan's economic and social policies, dubbed the current Administration "the worst I've seen in my 34 years in Washington, the worst in my 82 years of life and probably the worst in the entire history of America."

Reagan's cuts in social security, jobs programs, housing, food and education programs have shown "that this is an Administration of the few, for the few and aimed at helping the few," Pepper charged.

Among other speakers were Florida Gov. Robert Graham (D), former Democratic Gov. Reubin Askew, Food & Commercial Workers Sec.-Treas. Anthony J. Lutty, and Dorothy Shields, AFL-CIO education director.

Food, fuel costs hold down rise in price index

Falling food and gasoline prices held the increase in the government's consumer price index to three-tenths of 1 percent iin August.

The increase, the smallest monthly rise since April's increase of two-tenths of 1 percent, lifted the index to a level 5.8 percent higher than a year earlier.

As a result of the slowing price rises, real weekly earnings inched up one-tenth of 1 percent in August after falling two-tenths of 1 percent in July. Over the year, however, they were down 1.3 percent. Real earnings represent income adjusted for inflation and seasonal factors.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which compiles the monthly price figures, attributed much of the slowdown in August to a sharp deceleration of the increase in the index's transportation component and a decline in food prices. Medical care and housing continued to increase. Good weather and the bountiful crops it produced pushed food prices down three-tenths of 1 percent in August. In July, food prices held steady. Price declines were recorded over the month for meats, eggs, and fresh fruits and vegetables.

Oversupply factor

The world oversupply of oil turned gasoline prices back, with August gasoline one-tenth of 1 percent cheaper. New and used car prices rose five-tenths and nine-tenths of 1 percent, respectively, however, leaving overall transportation costs three-tenths of 1 percent higher.

Interest rate declines, a reflection of the ongoing recession, helped hold down mortgage interest rates with the result that housing rose a moderate five-tenths of 1 percent.

The sharpest increase in the August CPI was for medical-care costs, up nine-tenths of 1 percent.

'Trickle-down' policies hit

Steel delegates hang recession on Reagan

Atlantic City—The 3,400 delegates to the 21st constitutional convention of the Steelworkers sharply and unanimously condemned the Reagan Administration's policies as directly responsible for the nation's current economic plight.

The convention theme, "Union Now, More Than Ever," was underscored in resolutions dealing with major economic and social issues, particularly the unemployment crisis that has been particularly devastating to steelworkers.

USWA President Lloyd McBride credited the Reagan Administration with triggering massive layoffs with its adherence to disproven "trickle-down" theories.

"The despair and anguish suffered by victims of unemployment cannot be tolerated in a caring, democratic society," McBride said. "If unemployment of such vast measure resulted from a mysterious plague whose causes and cures were unknown. perhaps we could reconcile ourselves to our sorrows. . . . But the American economy is not something apart from ourselves. It is our own creation. And its failures are first of all failures of national leadership."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland drew a standing ovation when he defended the social progress made under Democratic presidents since 1933.

"We are still living off this capital created by federal programs that mobilized the nation's human resources to meet the nation's needs," Kirkland said. But he charged that today this human and financial capital "is being squandered by corporate buccaneers who move from market to market" around the globe.

'Boardroom buccaneers'

"They are depleting our common economic inheritance for short-term private gain, leaving behind a trail of exported jobs, deserted communities and broken lives," Kirkland charged. "Today these boardroom buccaneers, who fabricate golden parachutes for themselves, have their man in the White House and will continue their greedy ways as long as we let Reaganomics scatter our capital and erode our industrial base."

Kirkland said organized labor has "too great a stake in this land that labor built to idly watch the sapping of its skills, the erosion of its living standards and the unraveling of its social fabric—all in the interest of a narrow and mean-spirited ideology. Let us bend every effort to turn it around—on Nov. 2."

The delegates gave Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and former Vice President Walter Mondale rousing receptions when they accused the Reagan Administration of ushering the nation into the greatest economic calamity since the Great Depression of the 1930s.

Kennedy said the United States must take any steps necessary to "see that Americans in the 1980s and the 1990s will be buying American products made with American steel."

"At the same time," he stressed, "we must stop the ceaseless borrowing of tens of billions of dollars to pay for needless corporate mergers. There is something fundamentally wrong with a policy which permitted U.S. Steel to spend twice as much to buy Marathon Oil last year as it spent in the last five years for new plant and equipment in its mills."

Buying the election

Mondale struck a chord with the delegates when he charged that the huge campaign funds supporting conservative Republican candidates suggest an attempt to buy the election.

"Let's show them that the government of the United States is not up for sale," he urged. "It belongs to the people of this country and we intend to keep it in our hands."

A highlight of the convention came on the second day when the evening session was broadcast by Westar IV satellite. Delegates debated on the resolution dealing with the 1982 election before some 8,000 members gathered in 18 reception centers around the country. The telecast permitted employed and unemployed members along with retirees to look in on the convention.

Several unemployed members featured in a 13-minute film clip called in to McBride at the convention hall to relate their frustrations at being out of work.

The teleconference also aired pre-produced film segments that included an eight-minute presentation on Reagan's "broken promises" and individual four-minute messages from Kennedy and Mondale.

Commercial tap-in

Aside from the USWA pick-up stations at union halls, several commercial television stations, TV cable systems and radio stations carried part or all of the two-hour satellite teleconference.

Most of the business of the convention was devoted to debating and discussing policy resolutions and proposed changes in the union's constitution. Of the 66 resolutions acted upon by the delegates, 26 involved policy action relating to the restoration of the economy.

Convention by satellite

Steelworkers' delegates deliberate a resolution on the 1982 elections with the participation of USWA members from 18 sites across the country through a telecast from the Atlantic City, N.J., convention hall. The transmission via satellite and cable hookups permitted unemployed and retired members to air their views during the two-hour teleconference. The giant screen above the dais was backed up with TV sets on the convention floor.

Coalition asks safeguards in disability cuts

The Save Our Security coalition has urged major reforms in the Social Security Administration's procedures for reviewing the eligibility status of persons receiving disability benefits.

More than 150,000 persons have been dropped from the benefit rolls since March 1981, and the review process has drawn strong criticism for sacrificing fairness to the goal of cost-cutting.

The agency recently announced minor changes in its review process in response to the criticism, but the labor-endorsed SOS coalition said these would be mere "window-dressing."

"These changes will not adequately protect the rights of the disabled," the coalition said. "Failure to make substantive corrections in the program will mean that hundreds o fthousands more disabled people will be cut from the rolls within the next year."

Bipartisan panel

Speaking for the coalition on the issue was a bipartisan leadership group of two former Secretaries of Health, Education & Welfare—Wilbur Cohen and Arthur Flemming—and former Social Security Commissioners William Driver and Charles Schottland.

They urged both regulatory and legislative changes that would:

- Continue the benefits of persons disqualified by the Social Security Administration until the agency's determination has been reviewed by an administrative law judge.
- Ban termination of benefits unless there is "substantial evidence" that the individual's condition has improved.
- Slow down the review process significantly—more than has been proposed by the agency—so that there will be no railroading of people off the rolls.
- Assure uniform procedures at all levels of the review proces.

Reject Reaganomics

Call for voter rejection of President Reagan's economic policies and his attacks on social programs was the unifying theme at the Food & Commercial Workers conference on women's affairs, civil rights and political action. Keynoting the two-day conference, UFCW President William H. Wynn branded Reagan "anti-women, anti-union, anti-poor, anti-minority." Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), seated, told the 400 UFCW representatives that "we have only just begun to fight" for the 3 million jobs lost under Reaganomics.

Reagan recession deepens, new jobless claims surge with a recession-high 703,000 initial claims for state jobless benefits, seemed more than one-month aberrations to many observers, however.

The drop in the index, a closely watched signal of the coming ups or downs of the business cycle, was particularly discouraging because the benchmark figure rose in the four months preceding August.

The number of new unemployment insurance benefit claims was the highest since the Labor Dept. began keeping track of the data in their present seasonally adjusted form in 1967. The 703,000 new claims for the week ended Sept. 18 was an increase of 91,000 over the previous week.

The President's uneven record of forecasting the economy was further blemished by what Oswald found to be at least five misstatements by Reagan in his nationally televised press conference. These blunders included statements that his Administration has saved the nation from fiscal disaster, that joblessness grew faster under his predecessor's tenure, that "for four quarters we have seen a growth in the gross national product," and that there is a higher percentage of employed adults than under President Carter, and "an increase in real earnings" of workers.

The fact is that the federal budget deficit has nearly doubled in the past year, Oswald observed. And under Carter, unemployment fell from 7.8 to 7.3 percent in the last six months of 1980; since July 1981 under Reagan, the jobless rate has soared from 7.2 to the current 9.8 percent.

Instead of the four quarters of economic growth claimed by Reagan, real gross national product fell in two of the last four quarters, Oswald noted.

Reality distorted

As for a higher percentage of employed adults, there has actually been a drop since Reagan took office to 57.1 percent today, compared to 58.3 percent in January 1981 and 59.2 percent in January 1980. Instead of a rise, the government's latest report on real weekly earnings for non-supervisory workers showed a 1.3-percent decline in the past year.

The President "distorts reality," Oswald charged. "The AFL-CIO would like to keep the record straight."

In its report on August's leading indicators, the Commerce Dept. said five of the 10 measures reflected a negative performance. Led by a drop in building permits, they included a drop in raw materials prices, a shorter average workweek, higher claims for unemployment insurance, and a drop in new orders for consumer goods adjusted for inflation.

Indicators showing improvement were the pace of factory deliveries, stock prices, increases in orders for new plants and equipment, total liquid assets, and the money supply.

Kirkland stresses vital role of labor press in elections

Chicago—Labor editors have a crucial role in filling the gap left by the failure of the public press to expose the extremes of the Reagan Administration and its right-wing allies, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned.

Addressing the Auto Workers Editors Conference here, Kirkland said labor publications must explain to union members and their families how they have been targeted for Administration attacks.

Focusing on the coming November elections, Kirkland called on the 250 UAW editors to "hammer away at the truth with a sense of urgency, because the radical right has an agenda it wants to lock into place before the inevitable reaction from the mainstream of America sweeps them out of office."

Labor editors have to take on the added responsibility, he said, "because the public press has not subjected this Administration to the searching examination previous governments were given."

Kirkland noted that William Greider, who in 1981 exposed the folly of supply-side economics espoused by Budget Director David Stockman, recently wrote: "The tigers of the fourth estate, flattered and flimflammed by the President's media managers, are not really reporting what they daily observe about Ronald Reagan."

An achievable task

Although the task of the labor press is difficult, it can be achieved because of the labor movement's new spirit of unity, Kirkland said.

"We must mobilize our forces for direct action on Election Day, to turn out those who would do us in and fill Congress with men and women who will help us turn back the radical right."

Kirkland underlined the need to repel attempts of Reaganites to dismantle the social programs painstakingly developed over the last 50 years, citing their efforts to roll back social security benefits, prevailing wage rules, child labor regulations, job safety standards, and to reduce welfare and unemployment benefits while tolerating record-high joblessness.

Class divisions

"What is happening in this country is an attempt to create a class society—to divide working people from those who live on inherited wealth or speculation or on the stratospheric salaries and perquisites which management has voted itself," Kirkland asserted.

He noted that the labor movement has protested these policies since the Reagan Administration took office, even when that position was unpopular.

"But today, with record-high unemployment, with record-high bankruptcies among small businessmen, and with farmers holding penny auctions to avoid foreclosures, more and more voices are joining the chorus of opposition," he observed.

Over the years, Kirkland noted, too many Americans have gotten the feeling that the trade union movement and hard-won social progress were immune from the political attacks of the far right.

"Some forgot that the program of the radical right can be wrapped in pretty rhetoric and delivered in dulcet tones that will leave the unwary mesmerized," he said.

"In a real sense, this is a battle over communications. This is a struggle to see just how much distortion and deception can be delivered to the American people before they start rejecting it."

Hill approves training bill compromise

gress is planned for late November, to complete action on appropriations and consider other pending bills.

A House vote over the constitutional amendment was anticipated for Oct. 1, after the conservative coalition mustered the 218 signatures needed on a discharge petition to take the amendment away from the House Judiciary Committee and bring it to the floor. Various alternatives were to be considered by the House at the same time.

The amendment, which has already passed the Senate, requires a two-thirds vote to pass.

Constitutional scholars and leading economists are almost unanimous in regarding the amendment as an affront to constitutional principles and a potential disaster to the economy. But White House strategists see it as a political gamesmanship to divert voters from the failure of Reaganomics and allow Republican candidates to attack Democrats who "vote against a balanced budget."

Helms gambit

Labor did win a clearcut victory as the Senate blocked an attempt by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) to curb political action by unions.

Helms sought to make the Federal Election Commission responsible for seeing that dues collected under a union shop contract aren't used "for any political or ideological purpose."

The Senate squelched his proposed amendment to an appropriaitons bill by a vote of 62-37.

The job training bill that was near final approval as the AFL-CIO News went to press replaces the expired Comprehensive Employment & Training Act.

Unlike the earlier measure, it has no provision for public service employment. It earmarks 70 percent of funds for training, with 15 percent allowed for administrative costs and 15 percent for supportive services, which under some circumstances could include payments to trainees based on need. Governors would have a bigger say in the program, service areas would be communities with a population of 200,000 or more or a combination of smaller communities, and programs would be overseen largely by Private Industry Councils (PICs), to be headed by local business leaders with representation from other community groups. Funding levels are left to the congressional appropriations process.

Reagan embrace

The Administration had initially pressed for a more restrictive, smaller-scaled training bill. But as the recession crisis deepened, it bent somewhat to congressional pressures, and President Reagan embraced the final version warmly at his news conference.

As Congress prepared to break for the election campaign, House and Senate Democrats scored two moral victories on non-binding resolutions. The House voted its opposition to Administration efforts to shift to the states responsibility for federal child nutrition programs, including school lunches. And the Senate voted 70-29 to oppose any need test for Medicare benefits, an idea reportedly being explored by the Reagan Administration.

Michigan rate still tops

Unemployment rates increased in 48 states and the District of Columbia between July 1981 and July 1982, the Labor Dept. reported.

Michigan, with 14.7 percent, and Alabama, with 14.5 percent, reported the highest jobless rates in the nation. The lowest rates were reported by South Dakota, with 4.5 percent, and North Dakota, with 4.6 percent.

Of 214 metropolitan areas reporting, 93 had unemployment rates equal to or above the national average over the year. The highest jobless rates were reported in Rockford, Ill., with 19.3 percent and Duluth-Superior, Minn., with 19.1 percent.

Caravan for Iowa strikers

Heavily armed Nebraska state troopers guard the strike-bound Iowa Beef plant at Dakota City as a horn-honking caravan of vehicles carrying trade unionists from five states arrives. They brought food and contributions of money from Iowa, Minnesota, South Dakota, Missouri as well as Nebraska in a demonstration of support for 1,500 members of the Food & Commercial Workers who have been on strike since June. More than 1,000 persons joined in a rally in nearby Sioux City spearheaded by the Nebraska AFL-CIO.

Striking NFL players gain yardage in Labor Board case against league over a satellite-cable television hookup.

In ruling against league management, NLRB Administrative Law Judge Julius Cohn held that owners violated federal labor law for refusing to furnish the union with copies of individual player contracts and with copies of the nonmonetary terms of NFL contracts with the three major TV networks.

Cohn ordered team owners to post notices of the findings with promises to provide the contract documents sought by the union.

NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey described the decision as a significant victory for the union. It will have added importance, he said, if the NLRB affirms the judge's findings and rules favorably on the union's other charges against owners, as well as declaring the union's action an unfair labor practice strike.

In that event, the club owners could not hire permanent replacements for the strikers.

In another development, an NLRB regional director issued a formal complaint against the Seattle Seahawks for violating labor law by cutting player representative Sam McCullum because of his union activities.

Bargaining sessions

Two collective bargaining sessions have been held since the strike began Sept. 15. The NFLPA contract with the league expired July 15.

Although the NFL management council contended the law judge's ruling was insignificant, it announced its intention to appeal.

Garvey first requested copies of the individual player contracts and TV contracts from the league in May 1981, saying that they were essential for the union's collective bargaining preparations.

After repeated refusals by management to release the documents the union filed the unfair labor practice charges in August 1981. Cohn heard arguments on the case last June.

The broad showing of support for the NFLPA's effort to negotiate a fair contract settlement came at a televised press conference at the AFL-CIO headquarters. Pledges of labor solidarity were delivered by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Executive Council members William H. Wynn and John J. Sweeney, as well as President Howard Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept.

Representing the players union were NFLPA President Gene Upshaw, Executive Director Garvey and player representatives from several NFL teams.

Tom Condon, player representative for the Kansas City Chiefs, said that many of his teammates who were newcomers to the labor movement received a lesson in union solidarity and sacrifice by walking a picket line with members of the Ladies' Garment Workers who had been on strike for 10 weeks.

"The AFL-CIO is the backbone of our resolve in this battle," Condon said. "You have shown us how to conduct ourselves in negotiations and in a strike, and we won't let you down."

Players prepared

Upshaw and Garvey reported that from all indications they have received from management's refusal to participate in serious negotiations, it could be a lengthy strike. They said, however, that the NFLPA members are fully prepared for it.

The NFLPA also expressed concern that the dispute could be prolonged by owners since they are receiving millions of dollars in payments from the TV networks without having to provide games.

The first of the union's 20 all-star games would be played at Robert F. Kennedy Stadium in Washington the second Sunday of October and the conclusion would be a championship game scheduled Dec. 19 at Aloha Stadium in Honolulu.

Sec.-Treas. Brig Owens of the Professional Athletes, the parent union of the NFLPA, is serving as the commissioner of the players' league. It is made up of one team from each of the NFL's six divisions.

Bill backed to develop data for capital spending budget

The AFL-CIO registered strong support of a bill before Congress that would develop comprehensive data on existing public-sector capital, the level of investment, and public capital needs.

Adoption of such a measure would allow a more rational approach to public capital spending by providing the basic data needed to set priorities at different levels of government AFL-CIO Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor told a Public Works subcommittee headed by Rep. James Oberstar (D-Minn.).

Furthermore, Cantor said, the data-gathering would provide an objective assessment of the state of the nation's network of public facilities.

While there have been many studies on the nation's deteriorating public works, Cantor said, "we don't have a fully comprehensive inventory of public facilities and capital needs. The fragmentary evidence that does exist demonstrates that the nation's capital stock is on the verge of collapse."

Since the late Sixties, there has been a steep and prolonged decline in public-sector investment, he observed. Not only has this neglect of public construction reduced the services that flow directly from public facilities, but it has contributed to the underutilization of human resources, he said.

The 1981 trough in public construction expenditures coincided with the peak for total construction unemployment at 15.7 percent, he noted.

"A capital budget, as proposed in this legislation, would answer some of the misunderstandings of government spending by highlighting the fact that many so-called expenditures are in fact essential investments in the nation and represent national assets that generate a continuous stream of services of real value to the economy," Cantor stressed.

Wage, fringe pattern set in cotton accord

New York—The Clothing & Textile Workers ratified a new three-year agreement providing wage and fringe benefit gains for more than 25,000 employees in the shirt, pants, and cotton garment industry.

The settlement with two employer groups representing the major firms in the industry is expected to set the pattern for agreements with other companies involving an addiitonal 60,000 workers.

The new three-year contract, which provides a total of 85 cents in hourly increases over the length of the pact, replaces an agreement that expired Aug. 31.

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman termed the new contract "a fine settlement that meets many of the needs of the members, yet permits the employer to weather the bad conditions. This is a contract that is specially good when all the adverse Reaganomic factors are considered."

Ratification vote

Ninety-two percent of the workers in all sections of the country covered by the pact approved its terms. The settlement was the second major agreement negotiated by ACTWU this year. In March, the union approved a 38-month contract covering 70,000 workers in the men's and boys' clothing industry, raising their hourly wage $1.05 over the term of the agreement.

In the cotton garment pact, ACTWU negotiators retained a cost-of-living provision calling for maximum annual adjustments of 10 cents an hour in January 1983 and in January 1984.

Other contract improvements provide for increases in weekly sickness and accident benefits from $75 to $85 in the first year of the agreement, to $95 in the second year, and to $105 in the final year.

The new contract also provides jury duty pay for the first time, expands the categories of relatives for whom three days' bereavement pay will be given, liberalizes eligibility rules for pensions, and establishes a provision for voluntary political deductions from employees' paychecks.

Revised 'trigger' killing extended jobless benefits be eligible for the extended compensation.

In the case of Michigan, where the overall rate was reported at 14.7 percent in July, the insured rate—recently dropped from 6.02 percent to 5.98 percent. Yet the state is far below the 120-percent requirement that would allow extended benefits to be paid with a 5 percent insured rate.

The temporary program of federally-funded supplemental unemployment benefits provides 10 weeks of eligibility for persons who have exhausted their benefits in states that have paid extended benefits at any time since June 1, even if the program has since triggered off.

Qualifying states

By that criteria, 36 states plus Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands have qualified for the full 10 weeks.

Of the remaining states, those with an insured unemployment rate of 3.5 percent or higher for the 13 weeks preceding the start of the program were entitled to eight weeks of federal benefit payments. New York, Wyoming and the District of Columbia were in this category when the program went into effect.

The other states, which will provide only six weeks of federal benefits, are Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Hawaii, Nebraska, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Texas and Virginia.

The AFL-CIO American

Federationist

VOL. 89, NO. 7 OCTOBER 2, 1982

Americans will go to the polls on Nov. 2 for the first time since the election that put Ronald Reagan in the White House and elected so many of his supporters to Congress.

For the trade union movement, it is Solidarity Day II—the followup to the massive demonstration just a year ago that first signalled the dissatisfaction of ordinary Americans with the course their government was taking. The unemployment lines had already begun to lengthen. Labor standards and safety-health programs were being undermined. Trickle-down economics was enshrined as national policy.

Since then, unemployment has climbed to catastrophic levels, not seen since the Great Depression. But the conservative tilt of Congress and the veto power of the President have blocked effective measures to get America back to work and to relieve the spreading hardships of joblessness and poverty.

That's why the labor movement sees this "off-year" presidential election as so important.

THE ARTICLES in this pre-election issue of the Federationist examine realistically some of the facets of House and Senate contests and the unequal matchup of campaign funds.

The discussions of some key Senate and House contests are not intended as a handicapping chart, for the benefit of the political dilettante. The election is not a horse race.

To the labor movement, the halls of Congress and of the state legislatures are extensions of the bargaining table. The men and women workers elect to represent them in Congress will, collectively, have a lot to say about whether this nation has an economy that provides decent jobs or whether American industry will continue to wither away.

Will a healthy workplace be considered cost effective? Will a half-century of progress be rolled back?

That's what elections are about, as the labor movement sees it.

GOP Counting on Cash in Close Contests

By Ben Albert

In this election year, the media provides as much coverage of political cash as of political candidates. Small wonder. There is too much of it around to ignore. Not noticing the flood of political money would be like standing on the river bank and being unaware of the Mississippi.

Example: In California, two candidates contesting in a primary race for nomination to the state assembly poured out more than a million dollars between them, and one candidate for the Republican gubernatorial nomination in the state shelled out $5.44 million and lost.

The California election commission predicts total spending for all state offices will exceed $100 million by the time Nov. 2 rolls around—and while outlays in California will be perhaps untypically high, political spending in the other 49 states has soared since the 1980 elections.

Throughout the nation, U.S. House races costing $1 million are expected to be common this year (10 years ago, the average spent by a candidate for the House was in the range of $100,000). U.S. Senate campaigns in large population states will reach in combined cost to the candidates $7-$10 million, and gubernatorial contests in such states will hit the same levels.

IN MONEY TERMS, politics has become one of the nation's few growth industries, unaffected by the drag of Reaganomics on the rest of the economy. This year, total cost of all politicking for all offices at all levels will leave the billion dollar barrier far behind as a relic of campaigns past. Indeed, if California campaigns alone generate $100 million in spending, this year's overall total could surge well past $2 billion.

To what extent will it affect elections? Those most familiar with, and most awash in, political money—the Republicans—are counting on it to bail them out in many key congressional districts where their incumbents face marginal re-election situations.

GOP political strategists theorize that a vast funding differential between one candidate and his/her opponent will mean at least an additional two percent of the vote for the beneficiary of the big bucks. Because they're the ones who've got the money, the theory delights them.

Translated into campaign activities, money margins of such magnitude will provide three or four times as much TV-radio time and news-ad space; three or four times as much in the way of printed materials, of polling, of canvassing, of targeted get-out-the-vote efforts, and of other vote-getting election pursuits.

But even two percent actually adds up to a four percent differential—add two for the well-heeled candidate; subtract two from his less well-funded opponent. Since in almost any election year, 50 or more of House and Senate races are decided by 52 percent or less of the total vote (there were 55 in

THE HOUSE:

POCKETBOOK ISSUES ENHANCE DEMOCRATIC PROSPECTS

By David L. Perlman

If Americans vote their pocketbooks in this recession-ravaged election year, effective control of the House of Representatives will slip away from the bipartisan conservative coalition that has rubber-stamped most of the Reagan Administration's economic program.

There are signs that the coalition is already fraying. Its success rate this year has been markedly lower than in the first session of the 97th Congress, when President Reagan's popularity was at its height and unemployment lines were shorter.

But mainstream Democrats still need a significant gain in House seats on Nov. 2 to compel the White House to deal with an opposition party in the shaping of legislation. A standoff, leaving the Democratic majority close to its present 243-192 margin, would shore up the alliance of Republicans and their boll weevil Democratic allies.

America's economic collapse has wiped out whatever faint hope Republicans may have had for breaking precedent and winning a majority of House seats in this mid-term election.

Republicans haven't controlled the House since the first years of the Eisenhower Administration, but that goal didn't appear totally out of reach in the warm afterglow of the 1980 election returns. That was the election that put Ronald Reagan in the White House and gave the Republicans a controlling majority of the Senate and a pickup of 33 House seats.

IN THE FIRST session of the new Congress, Reagan's legislative program moved through the titularly Democratic House as smoothly as in the Republican Senate. During 1981, according to Congressional Quarterly calculations, the conservative coalition triumphed 88 percent of the time when it was pitted against the Democratic mainstream in House votes.

The Republican political euphoria during 1981 wasn't just based on expectations of the President's continued popularity. It rested, more practically, on a congressional reapportionment that shifted seats from the industrial North to the more conservative Sunbelt and western states. And it assumed, with the rapid growth of corporate political action committees, that almost unlimited campaign funds would be available for Republican candidates.

Reapportionment should have been a Republican plus, with a shift of seats away from the industrial states of the North and from traditionally Democratic cities to more conservative suburbs. But Democrats proved at least as adept as Republicans in reshaping congressional districts—not just in the 10 states that lost a total of 17 House seats and the 11 states that gained one or more, but in states where boundary lines had to be changed to reflect population figures from the 1980 census.

OVERALL, the political pluses and minuses seem to balance out. Thus, Republicans who control the Indiana legislature were able to turn the state's loss of one of its 11 House seats into a probable two-seat loss for the Democrats. But the equally partisan redistricting by California's Democratic legislature may help elect four or five new Democrats in a state that gained just two House seats.

A Minnesota realignment, drawn up by a three-judge federal court with scrupulous adherence to population equality rather than the protection of incumbents, should add at least one, possibly two, seats to the Democratic column.

Each party controls one house of the New York legislature, and the state's reapportionment reflects that reality. The five-seat loss is likely to result in the elimination of two Democratic and two Republican congressmen, with one contest a tossup.

And sometimes economic realities intrude on political gamesmanship. Take Pennsylvania, which loses two House seats. The Republican legislature adopted a plan that on paper should have eliminated two Democratic seats and endangered others. In fact, the defeat of two Democratic incumbents was ensured by putting them in the same districts as two other Democratic incumbents. But Pennsylvania has taken a battering from Reaganomics. Given the state of the economy, there's at least a chance that Republicans could end up with a loss of three seats and the Democrats emerge with a one-seat gain.

THE BIGGEST question mark, obviously, is the extent to which voter unhappiness with the depressed economy will be reflected in the election returns.

Polls have shown a high degree of apathy and cynicism to Congress, and the turnout isn't likely to exceed the 36 percent of the voting age population that participated in the last two mid-term elections. Even in the 1980 presidential year, only 54 percent of Americans bothered to cast ballots. That's why all politically active groups put such stress on get-out-the-vote campaigns.

While ticket-splitting is common, Reagan's presence on the ballot obviously did help bring additional Republicans to Congress. Early polls show that Democrats who supported Reagan two years ago are switching back in large numbers to traditional loyalties.

Against this must be balanced the very strong advantage of incumbency. Most party switches come in districts where incumbents are not seeking re-election. And first-term representatives, who start running for re-election the day they take office, have actually proved less vulnerable than senior members of Congress lulled by a string of easy re-elections.

As in every election, there will be factors unrelated to national issues that will determine the outcome. Two years ago, several "safe" Democratic seats were lost to Republicans because of Abscam indictments or convictions. And a conservative Republican from Maryland considered certain of re-election lost his seat after a sex solicitation arrest.

THIS YEAR, there are other local issues that could upset computer predictions. In the "safely Republican" 43rd district of California, for example, a liberal Democrat could benefit from Republican unhappiness with their own candidate—a wealthy young businessman who pumped $592,000 of his own money into an abusive campaign that gave him a victory in a 10-candidate primary with 17 percent of the vote—and made him a lot of enemies. The runner-up in the GOP primary is waging a write-in campaign, and thus far has resisted pressure to abandon it. But in the same state, the author of the Democratic reapportionment plan, the staunchly liberal Philip Burton, is in a much tighter contest for re-election than anticipated.

Even in the more turbulent election years, most of the 435 House seats are safe for incumbents, regardless of party.

Only about 150 congressional districts are listed by COPE—the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education—as either marginal or in the "to be watched" category, where the progress of a campaign could reveal one candidate as unexpectedly vulnerable or another as surprisingly strong.

Some of the preliminary battles have already been fought in primaries, especially in Democratic contests involving incumbents under fire for their support of Reaganomics.

In Ohio, incumbent Ronald Mottl was beaten by labor-supported Edward F. Feighan who challenged his votes for the Reagan budget last year. The general election will determine whether the liberal pickup will be permanent.

In Georgia, boll weevil Democrat Billy Lee Evans was upset in his bid for a fourth term by COPE-backed J. Roy Rowland, who hit hard at the incumbent's support for Reagan's economic program.

TO TOP IT OFF, Rowland will get a free ride in the general election. Republicans, assuming that Evans would be renominated, did not run a candidate of their own.

In the South especially, the black vote is potentially a significant factor both in electing more progressive candidates than the region normally sends to Congress and in bringing even the more conservative candidates to a more moderate political position.

Normally, the voting records of Mississippi Democrats and Republicans have been only marginally different. But that changed in a special election last year when COPE-endorsed Wayne Dowdy won a previously Republican seat with strong support from the district's 45 percent black population.

On 11 key votes in the first session of Congress, Dowdy had eight "right" on COPE's scorecard, by far the best of the Mississippi delegation. His re-election appeared threatened this year by the candidacy of a black who is running as an independent. But the district's black leaders have strongly endorsed Dowdy, and polls are encouraging.

There will be a national spotlight also on Mississippi's 2nd congressional district, where a labor-endorsed black state legislator, Robert Clark, won the Democratic nomination in a racially divided district. That's another case where the political tilt of the House could be affected without a change in parties.

WHILE Democratic-Republican contests are not always liberal-conservative matchups, party switches will nevertheless be the measuring rod for this election and will shape public perception of the outcome.

Mid-term elections are expected to result in at least a modest gain by the party that does not hold the White House, although historically the shift has been less in the first election after a new president has taken office.

Certainly, a single-digit Democratic pickup would be seen as a Reagan victory. A gain of 10 to 15 seats would be regarded as a normal off-year pattern, and it would take an analysis of the changes to determine whether it would leave the conservative coalition significantly weakened. A gain of more than 20 seats would send a clearer message to Congress; the bigger the pickup, the louder the message.

As was demonstrated in the two sessions of this Congress, the size of the conservative coalition fluctuates with the perception by a swing group of moderate-to-conservative Democrats and the more liberal-leaning Republicans of public opinion in their districts.

DURING REAGAN'S first months in office—a honeymoon period extended somewhat by the reaction to the wounding of the President in an assassination attempt—election-jittery House members were reluctant to challenge him.

House Democrats time and again sought to stave off defeat by proposing tax and budget alternatives that were almost as far from the concept of fairness

THE SENATE

STRENGTH OF INCUMBENTS MAKES MAJOR SHIFT UNLIKELY

By Rex Hardesty

The arithmetic of the 1982 Senate races favors the Republicans. The GOP has only 13 seats to defend to 19 for the Democrats, diminishing Democratic chances of a dramatic gain like recapturing Senate control which would require winning 24 of the 33 races.

But there's not much reason to expect further Republican gains, either. The lofty Republican forecasts of late 1981 and early 1982 have faded as the Reagan Recession has deepened.

This class of 33 senators is where the Republican takeover of the Senate started with the defeat of five Democratic incumbents in 1976. Five more were ousted in 1978 and eight in 1980 as the GOP total grew from 38 seats to 54.

In 1976, Democratic incumbents were ousted by S. I. Hayakawa of California, Harrison Schmitt of New Mexico, Orrin Hatch of Utah, Malcolm Wallop of Wyoming and Richard Lugar of Indiana. Democrats have mounted a reasonable 1982 challenge for all of those seats and aren't conceding the seats held by less conservative Republican incumbents like John Danforth of Missouri and David Durenberger of Minnesota.

THE CHALLENGE is especially strong in Utah, where Salt Lake City Mayor Ted Wilson trails Hatch by only 10 percent, a lead an incumbent should have on Oct. 1, even without the heavy expenditures Hatch has already made on advertising. Similarly, Democratic Rep. Floyd Fithian is gaining in Indiana as Lugar, like a lot of Republicans, has trouble explaining his party's and his President's position on social security.

Democrats Jeff Bingaman in New Mexico, Rodger McDaniel in Wyoming, Harriet Woods in Missouri and Mark Dayton in Minnesota are in struggles that are as uphill as normal against incumbents.

In addition to California, only New Jersey and Virginia have races without an incumbent.

In New York, the upset win by COPE-endorsed Mario Cuomo in the state's Democratic gubernatorial primary should provide momentum for Nov. 2, with Cuomo and Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan providing a strong pair of proven vote-getters.

Delaware also has a strong pair of labor-endorsed Democrats. Democratic Senate nominee David Levinson, a homebuilder, is running against Sen. William Roth, co-author of the Kemp-Roth tax theory, and is making the most of it. The House nominee, also running state-wide, is Thomas Carper.

The New Jersey Senate nominee is Frank Lautenberg, another Democratic businessman disillusioned with Reaganomics. Lautenberg is the son of a Paterson silk mill worker, has strong labor backing, and will be in one of the nation's most watched Senate races because the Republican nominee is 72-year-old Millicent Fenwick, who has had President Reagan in to campaign for her. The National Organization of Women (NOW) endorsed Lautenberg.

In Maine, labor's candidate, Democratic Sen. George Mitchell, has an opponent in Rep. David Emery who the polls say was ahead early, but labor observers are convinced the race will be near even by Nov. 2 because of the effective campaign being waged by Mitchell.

For Sen. Edward M. Kennedy in Massachusetts, the only question appears to be whether his margin over Republican Raymond Shamie will be big enough to have national impact.

IN CONNECTICUT, the labor verdict was no endorsement, narrowly, in the state COPE voting. So Sen. Lowell Weicker and Democratic Rep. Toby Moffett will each have some unions supporting them.

The other two New England seats are held by Republicans Robert Stafford of Vermont and John Chafee of Rhode Island.

Julius Michaelson, labor attorney before he was attorney general, brings impeccable labor credentials to his race against Chafee, who has put some distance between himself and the White House on economic issues.

Former Sec. of State James Guest is the labor-endorsed Democrat against Stafford in Vermont. Stafford is favored, but Guest is keeping it close.

Election night returns on Senate races from the eastern time zone states of Virginia and West Virginia could give early indications of the national referendum on Reaganomics.

In Virginia, very conservative Democrats and a growing number of Republicans had dominated the election results until last year, when Gov. Charles S. Robb and Lt. Gov. Richard Davis won handily. Now, Davis is running for the Senate, with labor's backing, against GOP Rep. Paul Trible.

WEST VIRGINIA, by contrast, had one of the nation's most progressive congressional delegations until two years ago when two conservative Republicans won House seats. One of them, Cleve Benedict, is now running for the Senate against Minority Leader Robert Byrd.

Maryland has one of NCPAC's earliest targets, Sen. Paul Sarbanes. Using a "too liberal for Maryland" tag, the right wing has poured money into the state against Sarbanes, whose 97 percent "right" record on the labor scorecard is the nation's best. He has risen to the challenge with a spirited and effective counterattack. His opponent is Larry Hogan, a former officer of the bitterly anti-union Associated Builders & Contractors.

Two other Democratic incumbents with labor records above 90 percent are Howard Metzenbaum of Ohio and Don Riegle of Michigan.

Metzenbaum's opponent is Paul Pfeifer and Riegle's challenger is former Congressman Phil Ruppe.

In early 1982, when a confident White House was predicting a gigantic takeover of the Senate because of the top-heavy number of Democratic seats to be defended, liberals like Sarbanes, Metzenbaum, Riegle and William Proxmire of Wisconsin were obvious targets. But as the campaigns started, all four were favored to be re-elected.

THE 11 STATES of the Confederacy have only four Senate races. For labor and liberals, the stakes are the biggest in Tennessee, where Democratic Sen. Jim Sasser faces his first re-election bid. His opponent, Rep. Robin Beard, is one of the state's most conservative figures.

Other southern Senate seats were being defended by Democrats Lloyd Bentsen in Texas, Lawton Chiles in Florida and John Stennis in Mississippi. Age will force Stennis, 81, to run one of his first real campaigns in decades, but it would take a major upset to oust any of the three.

Senators Quentin Burdick of North Dakota, Howard Cannon of Nevada, Edward Zorinsky of Nebraska, Dennis DeConcini of Arizona and John Melcher of Montana are part of a diminished breed. The current Republican edge in the Senate can be traced directly to 1978 and 1980 defeats of Democrats in the plains and mountain states.

No such clear-cut routing of Democrats is likely this time. Cannon may be in the closest race but his general election opponent, Chris Hecht, is not expected to be any tougher than the primary, when Cannon beat conservative Rep. Jim Santini by 3,000 votes with major help from labor. DeConcini and Melcher have labor's backing in what appears to be strong re-election bids. Labor made no endorsement in Nebraska.

TWO OF LABOR'S strongest allies are in the Far West—Henry M. Jackson of Washington and Spark Matsunaga in Hawaii. An upset of either would be of earthquake proportions.

The California campaign went into October with Democratic Gov. Jerry Brown reported by the Los Angeles Times poll to have moved from 17 percentage points to only four behind his GOP opponent, San Diego Mayor Pete Wilson. Wilson, too, is having trouble explaining the Republican Party's record and his own position on social security.

The 1982 Senate Elections

Incumbents not seeking re-election are Republicans Hayakawa of California, and Brady of New Jersey, and Independent Byrd of Virginia.

GOP Counting on Cash in Close Contests

1980), the virtues of a money-bought four-point advantage are obvious.

But, then, so are the vices, and this is one reason for all the whoop and holler this year about campaign financing. But there are others, chief among them the sheer quantity of cash pouring into the whole campaign process.

Three Republican party committees alone—the national committee and the GOP House and Senate campaign committees—originally set 1982 budgets totaling among them $100 million for their party's candidates. They exceeded that figure long ago. By June 30, the Federal Election Commission reports they had raised $146 million.

In addition, corporate, trade group, and right-wing PACs will shovel some $75 million into the campaigns of their favored candidates—mostly conservatives and ultra-conservatives. Not all of this will be in the form of direct contributions to the candidates. As much as $10 million will be spent on so-called "independent expenditures" campaigns, a legal political tool primarily used by right-wing PACs to discredit incumbents on their "hit lists."

(The tactic was used with devastating effect in 1980, when independent expenditure smear campaigns by rightist PACs helped unseat such long-time incumbent friends of workers and unions as Senators Frank Church, Birch Bayh, John Culver, George McGovern.)

The kind of money that's floating around this year provides GOP Sen. Orrin Hatch, for example, $1,368,500 in receipts through June 30 (with much more to come) to campaign for re-election in Utah, where only 580,000 persons voted in the 1980 presidential race and far fewer will vote this year.

It allows for $814,000—again just through June 30, with more coming—to Sen. Harrison Schmitt (R) to run for re-election in New Mexico where only 440,000 persons voted in 1980.

Also through June 30, $627,550 flowed into the re-election campaign of Sen. Malcolm Wallop in Wyoming, where only 172,000 voted in 1980.

FOR EACH of the three right-wing incumbents, PAC money makes up roughly a third of total receipts—Hatch, $495,000; Schmitt, $254,000; Wallop, $286,000.

Placed alongside the GOP campaign committees and their corporate, trade group and right-wing support PACs, in the funding end of politics, the Democrats and labor PACs are as midgets to mammoths. If the Democratic National Committee and its House and Senate campaign committees are able to scrub up as much as $20 million for their candidates, no one will be more surprised than they.

Labor PACs in aggregate should reach the $16-$17 million range, a healthy but not breathtaking increase from the $14.3 million contributed to endorsed candidates in 1980.

The explosion in political money was detonated largely by election law changes in the mid-1970s that encouraged formation of corporate and non-party, non-candidate PACs. The latter have been mainly right-wing political committees.

Once given the green light, corporations hit the accelerator and from a standing start six years ago have organized 1,520 PACs. They will contribute about $30 million to candidates this year. The figure probably will be matched by the more than 600 trade association PACs.

Also from scratch, some 400 right-wing and single-issue PACs have been organized in the past six years. While their direct contributions to candidates won't match the corporations or trade groups, their "independent expenditures" campaigns—which are as good as direct contributions—plus their donations, will fall into the $15-$20 million range.

Labor committees number 372. Only a relative handful of them can generate substantial assistance to a large number of endorsed candidates.

The funding margin between labor PACs and opposition PACs can only grow. While unions can and will increase collections of voluntary political contributions by members through check-off, they will not keep pace with the increased numbers of opposition PACs or with their burgeoning receipts.

Political funding is expanding geometrically. Large segments of the public and many political figures and commentators are concerned that elections are being converted into auctions. Others fear that candidates are being "bought" by PAC money, and if not the candidates, then the seats they're seeking.

Long before the time when corporate, trade and right-wing PACs burst past labor PACs in the money chase, the AFL-CIO urged that rational steps be taken to prevent money from becoming decisive in politics.

For years, the AFL-CIO has urged that House and Senate campaigns be financed from federal funds, as presidential campaigns now are. As an interim step, the AFL-CIO supported lowering maximum allowable contributions by PACs to candidates (currently $5,000 for a primary and another $5,000 for a general election) and severely restricting the aggregate total any candidate may accept from PACs.

IN 1973, the AFL-CIO told Congress: "We want the Congress to put the AFL-CIO out of the business of making campaign contributions. We would be delighted if the AFL-CIO never had to raise another dime for a candidate."

One of these years—but not this one—public revulsion over the magnitude of the sums being spent on elections and the implications of such spending will coincide with a Congress and President willing to do something about the matter.

Until this happens, union PACs will simply have to try to cling at least close enough to the corporate, trade and right-wing political committees in funding to keep endorsed candidates competitive with their lavishly bankrolled opponents.

But more importantly, union political programs—which are based on people, anyhow, and not on money—will have to move forward apace to offset the insurmountable money margins opposition candidates can count on. In the end, it's people—not cash—who pull the levers in the voting booths across the land.

And in people—not cash—union political strength resides.

and equality of sacrifice as the Republican approach. Labor-supported budget and tax proposals were beaten by two-to-one margins that year.

But in 1982, as unemployment climbed to 10 million and polls showed the president's popularity sagging, the conservative coalition victory ratio dropped to 55 percent, as tallied through mid-September.

The membership of the House hadn't changed. But the sensitive political antennae of its members were picking up a different message from their constituents.

Suddenly, the President who could do no wrong was overridden on two vetoes. And support for such right-wing panaceas as a constitutional amendment to compel a balanced budget shrunk visibly against the reality of record deficits generated by the economic policies of the amendment's chief advocate.

Some five weeks before the Nov. 2 election, the political signposts point to a Democratic gain large enough to make the new 98th Congress more than a carbon copy of its predecessor.

Full employment goal

Labor stresses need for industrial policy

The United States cannot write off major industries, as the Reagan Administration is doing, without paying for it dearly in the future, the AFL-CIO warned.

"Nor can whole cities and regions of the country be allowed to decay without serious social and economic consequences," Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald told a House Banking subcommittee.

Oswald stressed that the nation must remain a diversified industrial country and said that this can best be accomplished through the active participation of government, labor, and industry in a major reindustrialization effort.

"It is time for the United States to formulate a national industrial policy and abandon the irrational attachment to policies that threaten to bring about the wholesale condemnation of entire industries and regions," Oswald declared in testimony before the Economic Stabilization subcommittee chaired by Rep. James Blanchard (D-Mich.).

Oswald said the AFL-CIO rejects the Administration's attempt to cast government as the whipping boy, attacking government spending, government deficits, government taxes, government borrowing, and government employees.

"They are not the cause of every problem that can be identified as the Administration would have the people believe," he said. "The solution to America's problem is not to hamstring the federal government by cutting its programs and its sources of income and weakening or undermining its laws, regulations, and standards used to protect health, safety, civil rights, and the environment."

Rather, what the country needs are policies, including an industrial policy, that meet the nation's needs for full employment and expanded non-inflationary production, he said.

"Reaganomics, instead of providing the promised instant economic recovery, has plunged the nation into the worst recession since the Great Depression," Oswald pointed out.

Crucial role

"In the headlong drive to bestow massive tax cuts upon private business, while cutting government capital programs, the Administration is ignoring the crucial importance of the nation's infrastructure to private sector productivity," he added.

"The deterioration of public facilities must therefore be reversed if we are to be able to rebuild our industrial base."

With that objective, he noted, the AFL-CIO has proposed creation of a tripartite national reindustrialization board made up of representatives of labor, business, and government. Its mission would be to develop a balanced program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities, while at the same time encouraging the development of new industries with promise for the future.

Private pension funds could be encouraged to make investments in such financing arrangements to support and expand industrial employment in the United States.

Legislation

Oswald said the AFL-CIO's proposed industrial policy could be implemented through the combination, with some modification, of three bills that have been introduced in Congress.

One, by Rep. Joseph G. Minish (D-N.J.), would establish a National Development Bank. A bill introduced by Rep. Frank J. Guarini (D-N.J.) would re-establish a Reconstruction Finance Corp.

A third measure, introduced by Rep. Stanley N. Lundine (D-N.Y.), should be broadened to provide for a National Industrial Development Board, with appropriate authority to effectively recommend overall as well as specific industrial policies for the country. The board, of about 15 members, would consist of members from government, business, and labor.

Kirkland condemns massacre in Beirut

The brutal massacre of Palestinian men, women, and children in Beirut last month is "another chapter in the continuing tragedy of civil strife" which has claimed 100,000 lives in Lebanon over the past decade, the AFL-CIO said in a statement condemning the act.

"The worldwide revulsion it has evoked must be turned against the vicious terrorism that has been the special hallmark of the conflict in the Middle East, and that has been openly espoused as an appropriate tactic by the Palestine Liberation Organization and its supporters," Federation President Lane Kirkland said.

An objective and impartial investigation of the Beirut massacre is needed, Kirkland said. But what is more important if such tragedies are not to recur, he stressed, is rapid progress toward the reconstruction of Lebanon and the creation of an independent and stable central government capable of maintaining order.

Kirkland noted that the AFL-CIO Executive Council had called on the U.S. government to assist the Lebanese in this task "in every way possible."

"We urgently renew that call," he said.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale is welcomed to Minnesota AFL-CIO convention by David Roe, president of the state federation.

Mondale hits Reagan stand, spurs big Minnesota turnout

Duluth, Minn.—Warning that 1982 is not just another election year because "we are confronted with a radical Republican Administration," former Vice President Walter Mondale urged workers to vote Nov. 2 for candidates who oppose President Reagan's policies.

Mondale told the 799 delegates to the annual Minnesota AFL-CIO convention here that the Reagan Administration is "radical" in its failure to establish a working relationship with organized labor and in its pursuit of economic policies that have boosted unemployment and federal budget deficits to intolerable levels.

The convention endorsed the formation of job councils to deal with the immediate problems of the unemployed, organized and unorganized, and to explore the feasibility of a coordinated organizing project in Minnesota, along the lines of the AFL-CIO project in Houston.

Plant closings

The delegates reaffirmed support for national and state legislation dealing with plant closings, and problems associated with successor employers and for domestic content requirements for automobiles sold in the United States. In other action, the delegates supported extension to cities, counties and school districts of the Minnesota Buy American law that now governs purchases by state agencies.

By unanimous vote, a Democratic statewide slate was endorsed for the November election. It includes former Gov. Rudy Perpich; Sec. of State Joan Growe; State Sen. Hubert H. Humphrey III, candidate for attorney general; Paul Wellstone, candidate for state auditor, and Mark Dayton, who will oppose incumbent Republican Sen. David Durenburger

The delegates also endorsed incumbent Democratic Representatives Bruce Vento, Martin Sabo and Jim Oberstar and Democratic challengers in four of the state's remaining five Congressional districts, Tim Penny, Jim Nichols, Gerry Sikorski, and Gene Wenstrom.

President Dave Roe reported on the State AFL-CIO's lawsuit to block the State Commissioner of Public Welfare from enforcing guidelines that for all practical purposes would bar general assistance for unemployed workers who had "marketable skills," defined as a history of employment or a certificate from a vocational school or even completion of a high school course of a vocational nature. Subsequently, a judge issued a temporary injunction allowing counties to use their own definition of marketable skills until the Welfare Dept. properly issues new rules after a public hearing process.

Central issue

In his address to the delegates, Mondale stressed that a central issue in the 1982 elections "is the free trade union movement," at a time when certain factions seek a union-free environment.

Pointing to convention banners demanding that the Polish government free Lech Welesa, the imprisoned Solidarity leader, Mondale recalled seeing such banners at every labor convention he has recently attended.

"Show me a nation that doesn't permit unions," he said, "and I'll show you a nation living in slavery. Show me a nation where unions are free and I'll show you a nation living in liberty and freedom."

Among candidates addressing the convention were Perpich, Dayton and Humphrey. Other speakers included AFL-CIO Region I Director James Freeman; Cy Carpenter, president of the Minnesota Farmers Union; David McIlwaine of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Marianne Christianson, president of the Twin Cities chapter of the Coalition of Labor Union Women; Gleason Glover, executive director, Minneapolis Urban League; Atty. Gen. Warren Spannaus; State Rep. Harry Sieben, Jr., Speaker of the House; State Senate Majority Leader Roger Moe; and Matthew Stark, executive director, Minnesota Civil Liberties Union.

Union volunteers help swing N.Y. election

New York state's labor movement made its impact felt in a Democratic primary that resulted in an upset victory for COPE-endorsed Mario M. Cuomo in the gubernatorial primary.

Cuomo, who credited his victory to the traditional "Democratic coalition of labor union, minority groups and liberals," defeated New York City Mayor Edward I. Koch, who had been heavily favored in almost every poll.

A massive get-out-the-vote campaign, staffed primarily by union volunteers, was credited with achieving an unusually high turnout that enabled Cuomo to carry 54 of the state's 62 counties.

Labor's other endorsed statewide candidate, Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan, easily won renomination with 85 percent of the vote. He trounced a little-known opponent with ties to the erratic and demagogic Lyndon LaRouche movement.

Endorsement of Cuomo and Moynihan at the State AFL-CIO convention less than four weeks before the election unleashed a trade union organizational effort that was credited with overcoming the substantial financial advantage of the Koch campaign.

AFL-CIO central bodies in cities throughout the state organized phone banks in support of labor's endorsed candidates as COPE's cadre moved into action.

Two big unions with both statewide and New York City strength—the Teachers and the State, County & Municipal Employees — conducted large-scale phone bank operations of their own, took part in door-to-door canvassing in targeted precincts, and with other cooperating unions helped boost the Democratic primary turnout to 1,270,000—substantially higher than past patterns.

Record turnout

In New York City, 44 percent of registered Democrats went to the polls—a record for statewide primaries.

Just last year, Koch had been re-elected mayor with 74 percent of the vote. The former liberal congressman had been increasingly perceived as a neo-conservative, and Cuomo—who is New York's lieutenant governor—made political capital of words of mutual praise spoken by Koch and President Reagan. Publicized debates between the two primary opponents also helped offset the heavier spending for television commercials of the Koch campaign.

Cuomo will be at an even heavier financial disadvantage against the winner of the Republican gubernatorial election, Lewis E. Lehrman, a wealthy conservative businessman who spent $7.1 million in the GOP primary, more than half of that his own money. But the GOP primary turnout was less than half the Democratic primary vote, and Lehrman is clearly to the right of the Rockefeller-Javits wing of the Republican Party that had proved a winning combination in New York. He defeated Paul J. Curran, who had labor's endorsement in the Republican primary.

In the November election, Cuomo and Moynihan will also be the nominees of the Liberal Party; Lehrman and the GOP senatorial winner, Florence M. Sullivan, will have the Conservative Party designation.

Moynihan, who won his first term in 1976 with 54.2 percent of the vote, has broad popularity throughout the state and will go into the election campaign a strong favorite. Moynihan compiled a 93 percent "right" COPE record through the first session of this Congress. His November opponent was the most conservative candidate in the GOP senate primary, winning with a plurality over two moderates.

Pilots at Metro Airlines vote 99% for ALPA

Houston—Pilots of the Houston-based Metro Airlines voted to join the Air Line Pilots.

More than 99 percent of the voting Metro pilots chose ALPA in an election supervised by the National Mediation Board. As of the election date, 168 Metro pilots were eligible for ALPA membership.

IUE organizing award

President David J. Fitzmaurice of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers presents a special award at the IUE convention to Harold Morrison, right, for organizing achievement. Offering congratulations is Sec.-Treas. William H. Bywater, who has headed the IUE's organizing efforts for the past two years.

ILG's Dubinsky eulogized as 'champion of democracy'

New York—Veterans of trade union struggles, friends, family and many who knew him only by his achievements came to say farewell to David Dubinsky.

Dubinsky died Sept. 17, at age 90, some 16 years after he had given up the leadership of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

History will remember other great trade union leaders, ILGWU President Sol C. Chaikin told the 800 persons attending the memorial service at the Fashion Institute of Technology, "but who could match his devotion to social democracy and the welfare of working people everywhere?"

While other men served the ILGWU with genious and creativity, "Dubinsky remains singular in a long list of firsts that he was able to accomplish," Chaikin said.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland remembered Dubinsky as a man of many dimensions: a romantic revolutionary . . . a civilizing missionary . . . an iron-willed autocrat, as well as a "champion of democracy who drove communists from his union and gangsters from his industry."

Nobody ever questioned which side Dubinsky was on, Kirkland said.

Tough bargainer

"He was the toughest, hardest bargainer the employers in his industry ever faced, and he became the most trusted friends and adviser they had.

"He saw that if ILG members were to get anywhere, they needed employers who knew how to cooperate and work together for their own good.

"It was the union, under Dave Dubinsky—not the professors of business administration—who showed the manufacturers where their common interests lay and taught them how to pursue those as an industry, rather than as a collection of cut-throat competitors."

Kirkland noted that Dubinsky's pioneering efforts extended the scope of trade unionism. Under Dubinsky's leadership, the ILGWU broke first ground on pensions, programs for health, education and culture, as well as legislative activities and political action.

Also participating in the memorial service were Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute; A. H. Raskin, who helped write the Dubinsky autobiography, and ILGWU Sec.-Treas. Shelley Appleton, son-in-law of the late labor leader.

Six unions post major gains at 11 GTE plants

Through a coordinated bargaining effort, workers represented by six unions at 11 General Telephone & Electronics Corp. plants have reached agreement on a new three-year pact that includes wage, benefit and job security improvements.

The settlement covers 3,000 workers at GTE Sylvania lighting plants, mostly in the Northeast. The bargaining was coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., one of 80 such efforts the IUD is assisting.

The agreement provides an immediate 8 percent pay raise, effective Aug. 23 for unions that ratify by Oct. 1. In the second and third year, the raise will be 7 percent with cost-of-living adjustments of one cent for each 0.2 percent rise in the Consumer Price Index above 7 percent.

Average hourly pay was $7.93 under the old contract.

The union bargaining committee said it successfully fended off attempts by GTE to cut back on the unlimited sick leave privilege for workers with 25 years of service, freeze shift differential pay and increase health care deductions.

Instead, medical benefits were improved and monthly pension benefits were raised to a range of $13-$16 per year of service in the first year and $13.25-$17 in the second year.

Unions involved in the coordinated bargaining effort were the Machinists, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the Auto Workers and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers and Teamsters.

Reagan draws heavy fire

IUE delegates expand organizing program

New York—Delegates to the Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers convention committed the union to an expanded organizing program and called for a massive effort to defeat the Reagan Administration's allies at the polls.

Rank-and-file delegates lined up at convention floor microphones to second the remarks of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, former Vice President Walter Mondale and other speakers who called for an end to Reagan programs that reward the rich while destroying the livelihoods of workers and denying assistance to the needy.

In his keynote address, IUE President David J. Fitzmaurice said the pattern-setting contracts that IUE recently negotiated with General Electric and Westinghouse have given a boost to other unions during a year of concessions and have helped IUE locals deal with other management attempts to obtain contract concessions.

Sec.-Treas. William H. Bywater, who has been leading the union's organizing department for the last two years, told the convention that over that span the union has gained more than 7,600 new members. Special awards were presented to three IUE international representatives for outstanding achievement in organizing.

Content bill pressed

Kirkland, in his address to the convention, called for an end to "free trade" economics and a return to "what's happening in the real world." He called particularly for domestic content legislation to aid the depressed auto industry and "say to all of America's trade partners that if you want to market here, then invest here and create jobs."

Kirkland criticized President Reagan as "being high on thespian skills and low on veracity" and accused the President of "opening the doors to the federal treasury to the rich and to his corporate friends while running the deficit to a peacetime high."

He renewed the AFL-CIO's call for a Reconstruction Finance Corp. to rebuild the nation's industrial base along with a program to upgrade deteriorating public facilities.

"While millions of workers can't find jobs," Kirkland observed, "half of our bridges are in dangerous disrepair."

Mondale told the delegates that the Reagan White House is different from other Republican Administrations because it is not moderate or even conservative, but radical. The Administration's anti-labor attitude has been taken up by the business community which wants to force what it calls a "union-free environment" upon the country, Mondale noted.

He stressed that the U.S. government and management must start working with labor again and urged renewal of the tripartite committee developed in the Carter Administration.

Another speaker, Eula Bingham, former head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, charged that OSHA under Reagan has issued no new standards, has watered down existing ones and cut back on inspections, fines and training programs.

NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks accused the Reagan Administration of widening the gap between rich and poor and charged that it is not interested in "the truly needy, but in the truly greedy."

Hispanic allies

Dr. Louis Nunez, president of the National Puerto Rican Coalition, described the explosive population growth taking place in the Hispanic community in the United States and asked union members for greater sensitivity to the problems of Spanish-speaking Americans. Labor and community groups must make coalitions with each other in working to reach mutual goals, he said.

The convention unanimously adopted a resolution supporting the auto content legislation now before Congress. Many delegates, including the chairman of the IUE-General Motors Conference Board, Robert Livingston, described the intensive job loss in the auto industry which is also hurting steel, glass and rubber. A third of all IUE-GM workers are laid off, Livingston reported.

In other resolutions, the convention pledged the union to constant vigilance over the introduction of new technology and called for membership support of striking National Football League players.

In other action, the convention:

- Elected Elizabeth Taylor, president of IUE Local 123, as chairperson of the trustees. She will be the second woman on the union's executive board.
- Approved formation of a committee to review the union's dues and finances and make recommendations by the 1984 convention.
- Unanimously approved a constitutional amendment permitting the entry of new locals or new units of amalgamated locals under a reduced dues schedule that would reach the full level over a four-year period.

Labor protests HUD shift of low-income housing aid

The AFL-CIO has protested an Administration decision to allow cities receiving federal community development grants to divert funds from projects that help low-income and moderate-income families.

A 1974 law that set up the $3.5 billion-a-year program specifies that the "primary objective" of the grants is to improve housing, community facilities and economic opportunity "principally for persons of low and moderate income."

Regulations of the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development have enforced that obligation, but HUD's new regulations would drop any such requirement.

Legislative Director Ray Denison, in letters to the chairmen of House and Senate committees that have jurisdiction over the program, protested that HUD's actions "are contrary to the law" and urged Congress to disapprove the regulations.

Apart from the issue of legality, Denison said, "the proposed changes are also undesirable as social policy. They would represent a further dilution of aid and assistance to lower-income people from an Administration which day by day shows its insensitivity to the less well-off."

Without any enforcement by HUD of the intent of Congress, he warned, cities could divert funds from lower income neighborhoods to "politically powerful, higher income neighborhoods."

He protested also the haste of the Administration regulatory change to make it effective for the Oct. 1 start of the new fiscal year.

Sweeney details SEIU campaign for pay equality

Labor's bargaining strength is bringing women workers closer to the goal of pay equity but government leadership is still needed to eradicate sex-linked wage differentials, Service Employees President John J. Sweeney said.

Three House subcommittees are holding joint hearings on pay equality and comparable worth issues, and union witnesses have stressed labor's determination to eliminate wage inequities.

Sweeney testified that the SEIU has struck, when necessary, to bring up the "abysmally low wages" that are the legacy of "years of pay discrimination" against women workers. It has also used the bargaining table to shape union-management programs to upgrade jobs, create new career ladders and ban sex-biased job assignments, Sweeney said.

The inequalities have persisted, he noted, "despite passage of the Civil Rights Act, the Equal Pay Act and years of litigation." Organized labor is devoting an increasing share of its resources to ending the inequities, Sweeney testified. But employers have opposed pay equity "because wage discrimination and the exploitation of workers is profitable" just as they have opposed child labor laws, shorter hours and the minimum wage.

As for the government, "federal efforts to ensure pay equity have all but ceased under the Reagan Administration," Sweeney charged.

Presidential Buck-Passing

OF COURSE there is a need for job training legislation to replace the now-expired CETA program.

There is a continuing need to help young people acquire the skills they will need to hold decent-paying jobs. And there is a pressing need for measures that would help workers whose jobs have been wiped out by plant closings move into new fields of employment.

The compromise legislation that Congress is sending to the White House is a pale shadow of what is needed. But it is, at least, an improvement over the Administration's earlier position and the bill's weaknesses are the price of averting a veto.

But President Reagan's belated embrace of the legislation as a cornerstone of America's economic rebound is an obvious attempt to fool the public into thinking that this will create jobs.

The President, at his Sept. 28 news conference, dug up again the myth of vast numbers of jobs going unfilled. As one reporter noted, just the previous day, more than 4,500 applicants turned up to apply for 300 job openings in a new hotel in a New York suburb. Many of them were what a hotel spokesman termed "highly overqualified" for the available jobs, and some stood in line for nearly eight hours to put in their applications.

So much for Mr. Reagan's assumption that there are large numbers of jobs going unfilled because workers qualified to take them can't be found.

THIS WAS President Reagan's first press conference in two months, but on domestic issues the same questions met with the same evasions.

The festering unemployment crisis was clearly the responsibility of his predecessors in office, the President insisted on both occasions, while claiming credit for the reduction in the inflation rate.

On Sept. 28 as on July 28, the President was asked when the promised economic upturn would be perceptible. It's a question reporters had been patiently asking for a long time. A promised upturn failed to materialize last spring, but in June, Reagan termed economic recovery "imminent."

At his July 28 news conference, he was looking for "an improvement in the second half of this year."

Now, the President assures us, the economic forecast is for "a solid recovery in the year 1983."

IN AN especially astounding bit of buck-passing, the President said at the start of the news conference that "Congress can spur recovery," even though White House veto threats and a Republican Senate have repeatedly blocked measures that would fund programs to put unemployed persons to work at fair wages on jobs that need doing.

And even an election setback won't be a repudiation of the Reagan Administration policies, the President insists. But members of Congress are likely to see it differently.

Supply-Side in Action

SO BENDIX CORP. bought control of Martin Marietta Corp., while Martin Marietta bought control of Bendix and somehow United Technologies—or was it Allied Corp.—bought up everyone. Anyway, that was supply-side economics in action.

There was money aplenty, it seemed, to invest in the Wall Street takeover game—with all sorts of tax incentives and writeoffs involved.

As one steel company executive admitted to the Wall Street Journal:

"Maybe there's something wrong with our system when these four companies can line up large amounts of money in order to purchase stock, when it doesn't help build one new factory, buy one more piece of equipment, or provide even one more job."

There sure is.

Million U.S. jobs at stake in domestic content fight

By Press Associates, Inc.

During the past three and a half years, more than a million Americans who worked in auto manufacturing and its supplier industries have lost their jobs.

The job loss has resulted both from a weakened economy and from a growing influx of foreign car imports, particularly from Japan.

To stem further erosion of jobs and of an industry to which at least one out of six jobs is linked, a "domestic auto content" bill was introduced in Congress earlier this year.

By requiring foreign and U.S.-based automakers to use minimum percentages of American parts and labor in the cars they sell here, the bill would spur the Japanese to put their money where their market is—to build auto plants here and purchase U.S. auto parts.

Top priority

By the same token, the Fair Practices in Automotive Products Act would place limits on U.S. automakers' increasing use of foreign-made auto parts in cars sold here.

It's not hard to see why the auto content bill, H.R. 5133, is the number one legislative priority of the United Auto Workers. The bill has picked up 224 House co-sponsors, a House majority, and recently cleared the House Commerce Committee.

But in spite of the urgency, the bill faces tall hurdles. Even if it passed the House in the remaining weeks of this year's session, the Republican-controlled Senate and President Reagan are likely to be impassable roadblocks.

Reagan Administration officials and other opponents of domestic content legislation list various reasons for their stand.

First among these is that it would violate the principle of "free trade" and "open markets," and would invite trade retaliation by other nations.

This criticism ignores the fact that U.S. trade with Japan, especially in autos, has been one-sided. With high tariffs, the Japanese kept out auto imports until the early 1970s. Since then, they have replaced tariffs with an array of non-tariff barriers. In the past five years, the U.S. auto trade deficit with Japan has totalled $47 billion.

Skilled negotiators

The Japanese have proved to be skillful negotiators whose hallmark is appearing to make concessions while actually giving up little or nothing. For example, despite the "voluntary" restraints in auto exports to the U.S. they finally agreed to last year, the U.S. market share of Japanese cars hit new records this summer, rising to 27 percent.

European auto companies, led by Volkswagen and Renault, have been investing where their market is. The equity of having Japan do the same is strengthened by the fact that Japanese auto union officials have been among the advocates of such a policy.

Where critics of a content requirement raise the specter of trade retaliation, advocates note that Japanese and U.S. automakers would be the only ones affected by the measure.

Retaliation unlikely

It is also pointed out that 31 other nations have restrictions on auto imports or content legislation much stronger than the bill before Congress. Japan has not retaliated against these nations, and there's no reason to think it would retaliate by abandoning the lucrative U.S. car market or freezing out needed U.S. imports.

Labor experts estimate that passage of a content law would create or preserve more than a million jobs by the end of the decade. This includes 200,000 auto jobs, 500,000 supplier jobs and over 300,000 jobs in related industries.

The Impact of Reaganomics

Damage Report—Autumn '82

A look at the economic landscape 20 months into the presidency of Ronald Reagan and one month before Solidarity Day II, election day, November 2.

► Unemployment . . . in 10 percent range, highest in more than 40 years.

► Entire industries suffering depression-level joblessness; no industry untouched by its spreading epidemic.

► More individuals jobless now than at height of Great Depression.

► 11 million out of work, three million more than when President Reagan took office.

► An additional 1.4 million long-term unemployed, "discouraged" workers who've given up job search in despair.

► Another 3.1 million relegated to part-time jobs who want and need full-time work.

► "Real" unemployment 13 percent-plus . . . (includes "discouraged" and involuntary part-time, neither of whom figure in "official" government unemployment).

► Throughout "Reaganomics Recession," around the clock, every single hour of every day, every week . . . 300 American workers thrown off the job.

► Allowing two feet of standing room for every jobless American, a line starting at Reagan White House will stretch to Reagan ranch near coast of California and double back across country to Illinois, more than 4,100 miles.

► Projections that before 1982 ends, one-fourth of the entire U.S. workforce—some 30 million workers—will suffer an episode of joblessness (an "episode" averages 14-16 weeks).

► Unemployment comp exhausted for more than 2.5 million jobless; another three million expected to run out in 1983.

► Food stamps and Medicaid denied or reduced for hundreds of thousands of needy Americans.

► Thousands of young Americans—many of them the children of working people—forced to discontinue, or unable to begin, their college education because of federal loan slashes.

► Millions of working poor—3.5-4 million of them—denied supplemental welfare benefits that, together with their small earnings, enabled them to subsist.

► More than 150,000 medically disabled . . . with doctors' certificates to prove it . . . robbed of their disability benefits and told to go out and get a job.

► Business failures at the highest level since 1932 . . . 24,000 expected this year alone.

► Mortgage foreclosures at post-1930s highs. More than 5.5 percent of all mortgages, representing 1.5 million home-owners, in default. Half of these expected to lose their homes.

► Tens of thousands of family farmers, crushed by high interest rates, forced from their land.

► Industrial production down; non-farm payroll employment down; real personal income static, expected down; business sales down; housing permits down; new orders for consumer goods and materials down.

► Initial claims for unemployment compensation up to highest levels in months.

► Persons and families living in poverty up.

Documenting the jobs crisis

Television spots focusing on the nation's unemployment crisis are screened on monitors at the AFL-CIO's Labor Institute of Public Affairs. The five-minute and 60-second spots will be shown in nine major metropolitan areas as well as on national cable. Reviewing the spots are Institute Executive Director Larry Kirkman, seated, and Associate Directors Gwenn Kelly and Nick DeMartino. (Story, Page 2.)

Labor hails defeat of balanced budget amendment move

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan is trying to turn the defeat of the Administration's badly-flawed balanced budget constitutional amendment into a political life preserver for Republicans in the Nov. 2 congressional elections.

The 236-187 House vote for the amendment was 46 short of the two-thirds majority needed to send it to the states for ratification. (Rollcall, Page 15.)

Labor had waged a nationwide campaign against the amendment, warning that it would endanger social security benefits, leave Congress helpless to deal with recession, and inject dubious economic theory into the Constitution.

House members who voted against its adoption "earned the thanks of the nation," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

But Reagan was reading from a different political script when he went before television cameras at the White House just moments after the amendment's defeat. His clear goal: to divert the election campaign spotlight from the issues of rising unemployment and a deepening recession.

Reagan called for the defeat of House members who opposed the amendment, most of them Democrats.

He called on voters to elect representatives "who will support the amendment when we propose it again" next year.

Largest deficit

And he shrugged off with evasions questions from reporters who wanted to know why the President didn't simply submit a balanced budget to Congress instead of lamenting the rejection of a constitutional amendment that would compel it.

Reagan's first budget, which Congress adopted almost intact, resulted in the largest deficit in the nation's history. And the budget he proposed at the start of this year projected an even larger deficit—one substantially higher than the version Congress subsequently enacted.

The constitutional amendment, which had been approved by the Republican-controlled Senate last August, would have required Congress to adopt a balanced budget each year except in time of war or when three-fifths of the full membership of both the House and Senate agreed to an exception. It would also have limited government spending and revenue, so that budget deficits couldn't be averted by raising taxes above a specified level.

Its enactment has been a longstanding goal of the right wing. But until the election of Reagan, it had been pushed primarily at the state level through resolutions petitioning for a constitutional convention to enact a balanced budget amendment. Few took the issue seriously until the number of state legislatures climbed to 31, three short of the number required. One of the arguments made for action by Congress was that it would forestall the untested mechanism of a constitu-

Anti-union maneuvers squelched by Senate

An alert Senate squelched an attempt by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) to ally the Federal Election Commission to the goals of the National Right to Work Committee and also defeated a move to write into law the Labor Dept.'s court-blocked regulations weakening the Davis-Bacon Act.

Both anti-labor maneuvers were made during the rush to adjournment of Congress, when the Senate was considering a catchall resolution to fund most government agencies until mid-December. Congress is scheduled to return Nov. 29 for a post-election session to complete action on appropriations and pass whatever other bills it can agree on.

Defeat hailed

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison hailed the decisive 62-37 defeat of the Helms Amendment, which would have directed the Federal Election Commission to issue and enforce regulations to curtail union political and get-out-the-vote activity. (Rollcall, Page 13.)

The wording of the amendment included puzzling instructions for the commission to act "consistent with the decisions of the United States Supreme Court holding that dues, fees and other monies required as a condition of employment may not be used by a labor organization on behalf of political candidates or for other political or ideological purposes."

In fact, no Supreme Court decision comes close to fitting such sweeping language, and Denison suggested that the clear intent of the Helms proposal was "to muzzle the freedom of speech of union members and thwart voter education and get-out-the-vote efforts."

The military rulers of Poland would applaud such tactics, Denison said.

The attack on Davis-Bacon came in an amendment introduced by Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), the very conservative chairman of the Senate Labor subcommittee.

In addition to writing into law the controversial regulations that the AFL-CIO and its building trades unions charge would virtually repeal the 50-year-old prevailing wage law, it would have exempted entirely from the law government contracts under $100,000. The existing contract threshold is $2,000.

The Senate tabled and thus killed the Nickles amendment by a 50-48 vote. Thirty-seven Democrats and 15 Republicans were in the majority. Seven Demo-

Democrats look for gain in control of governorships

By James M. Shevis

The Democratic Party, which currently holds a 27 to 23 edge over the Republicans, is likely to increase its margin of control of the nation's governorships in the 1982 elections.

With just over three weeks of campaigning ahead, the Democrats sense a deepening GOP vulnerability, particularly in the industrial Midwest where Reaganomics has done a number on thousands of workers in auto, rubber, and steel factories.

Going into the Nov. 2 elections, Republicans occupy eight of nine midwestern state houses. A Christian Science Monitor survey of GOP professional party workers shows the Republicans view themselves clearly ahead in just two farm states, Iowa and South Dakota, with a slight edge in another, Nebraska, and with two races even, Illinois and Kansas. That could spell Democratic victories in Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

El Salvador murder plot detailed

Outrage at the failure of El Salvador's authorities to fully prosecute persons involved in the murder of two AFL-CIO union advisers and a Salvadoran union leader has led American labor officials to divulge details of the case for the first time.

Disclosure of the maze of events and implication of individuals involved in the Jan. 3, 1981, shootings of the trio in a San Salvador hotel restaurant followed the confessions of two Salvadoran National Guard corporals who swore the murders were ordered by a politically influential lieutenant, an army captain, and a wealthy Salvadoran businessman.

While the lieutenant remains in jail as the investigation continues, a Salvadoran judge ruled Oct. 1 that there was "insufficient evidence" to hold him. The army captain, Eduardo Alfonso Avila, has fled to Guatemala and the businessman, Hans Christ, is now in Miami.

The scenario of events leading to the quickly hatched plot to assassinate Michael Hammer of Potomac, Md., Mark Pearlman of Seattle, and Jose Rodolfo Viera, director of the Salvadoran government's Institute for Agrarian Transformation graphically unfolds in an AFL-CIO document released this week.

The brief is based on court testimony, extrajudicial testimony to investigative officers, and interviews with witnesses by U.S. labor officials involved in the case.

The evidence shows that the three men were gunned down on orders from Lt. Isidro Lopez Sibrian to his bodyguard, former Corp. Jose Dimas Valle Acevedo, a National Guardsman, and another Guard corporal. Lopez formerly was a security aide to rightist leader Roberto d'Aubuisson.

Dimas, accompanied by former Corp. Santiago Gomez Gonzalez, the bodyguard of another officer, pumped bullets into the three men as they sat at a table in the restaurant. The confessions of the guardsmen had been expected by U.S. officials in Washington and El Salvador, as well as by leaders of the AFL-CIO's American Institute for Free Labor Development for which Hammer and Pearlman worked, but the judge's decision was not.

Embassy dismayed

Angered by that decision, AIFLD released details of the murders to the press, and the U.S. embassy in San Salvador reacted to the judge's ruling, saying: "We're dismayed and incredulous."

William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of AIFLD, said the case gives the government of El Salvador a chance "to prove

Teachers win settlement in Detroit strike

Detroit—A lengthy strike by Detroit teachers came to an end Oct. 5 and the bargaining atmosphere cleared because of scattered settlements elsewhere, leaving only Pennsylvania with major disputes.

In Detroit, the nation's seventh largest school district, tentative agreement was reached between the board of education and some 11,000 teachers represented by the Detroit Federation of Teachers who had been on strike since Sept. 13.

The DFT voted to return its members to the classroom and send 15 unresolved issues to binding factfinding. Details were not announced, but union president John Elliott told the teachers, "We've got what we think is a pretty good agreement."

The Detroit settlement came a day after Detroit School Supt. Arthur Elliott threatened to seek a court injunction to force the teachers back to work. The DFT is a local of the American Federation of Teachers. Its 17-member executive board, with the backing of the majority membership, had refused to accept any pay concessions.

Pennsylvania disputes

Teachers in two Pennsylvania school districts returned to classrooms, but educators in a Montgomery County, Pa., district walked off their jobs, bringing to 21 the number of teachers' strikes in the state. One of the largest walkouts was in Hazleton, where teachers struck Oct. 6.

In Illinois, a settlement was reached in the Chicago suburb of Bremen, where classes resumed Oct. 5 following an 11-day teachers' walkout. That left three other strikes in the state still in progress.

In Deer Park, N.Y., teachers reached a tentative contract with the school board Oct. 5, ending a weeklong strike.

State fed leaders map stepped-up legislative drives

Top officers of 30 AFL-CIO state federations attending a three-day conference explored ways of stepping up efforts to win state legislation that workers vitally need to offset the impact of Reaganomics.

Discussions in general sessions and workshops at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies focused on developing effective legislation to improve state unemployment benefits and workers' compensation. Participants also reviewed the needs of public employees in collective bargaining and job safety programs.

Tied closely to the state legislative activities were discussions on labor's expanded political action efforts to elect candidates favorable to AFL-CIO programs, both on the staff and national levels.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland briefed the 46 state federation officers on the AFL-CIO role in the November elections and on procedures to consider early endorsement of a presidential candidate in 1984.

Better communications

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue outlined the AFL-CIO's efforts to better coordinate legislative and political activities with state federations by improving communications and operations at the national, regional and state levels.

And as the proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget moved to the House floor, conference participants were bused to Capitol Hill to lobby their state congressional delegations for defeat of the proposal. The House vote on the labor-opposed measure, 236-187, fell far short of the two-thirds majority needed, despite a last-minute appeal from the White House.

The conference workshops were led by AFL-CIO staff specialists in state legislative matters and economics. Reports were also presented by departmental directors.

crats and 37 Republicans supported the Nickles moves.

Before adjourning, the House joined the Senate in passing a compromise job training bill, and Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill joined Rep. Augustus Hawkins (D-Calif.) in a news conference challenge to President Reagan's attempt to claim Administration credit for the measure.

It was a bipartisan measure that the Administration only belatedly and reluctantly agreed to, O'Neill noted.

"We must ensure that job openings will exist for the trained workers that this program will provide," he declared.

The House also passed before adjournment a bipartisan bill to strengthen the law covering registration of farm labor contractors and spell out obligations for vehicle safety, housing and health care for migrant workers. The AFL-CIO had testified for the bill at House hearings. It now must await Senate action.

Pending bills

A number of other measures of interest to labor are candidates for post-election consideration, including Senate-passed bills to toughen penalties against corrupt union officials and modifying the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act.

An immigration reform bill has passed the Senate—in a form that left few groups completely satisfied—and the House Judiciary Committee has drafted its own version.

House leaders are expected to clear the way for a vote on the labor-supported automobile domestic content bill, which the Administration opposes, and on a housing program of temporary mortgage subsidies that cleared both the House and Senate but was part of an appropriations measure vetoed by the President.

Institute's TV spots focus on jobs crisis

Organized labor's concern for the victims of mounting unemployment and its efforts to reverse unfair economic policies form the theme of a series of television spots to be shown in nine major metropolitan areas as well as on a national cable network beginning in mid-October.

The five-minute and 60-second spots are the first TV project by the AFL-CIO's new Labor Institute of Public Affairs, which became operational earlier this year.

Each of the spots—a combination of documentary scenes, a catchy original ballad and a political narrative—draws parallels between the bread lines of the 1930s and the plight of today's more than 11 million jobless workers. The spots stress labor's call for a shift to job-creating national policies and programs.

In addition to the TV spots, the Public Affairs Institute is making available to affiliates 60-second radio tapes for distribution through their own sponsorship. Larry Kirkman, executive director of the institute, said the radio spots have been edited to allow affiliates to dub in their signatures before releasing the tapes to radio stations.

New jobless

In focusing on the nation's jobs crisis, the spots depict the frustrations and anxiety of a young laid-off worker in a futile attempt to find new work. Instead, he finds long unemployment lines and more jobless workers, reminiscent of the Great Depression.

Most of the TV spots will be aired during the week of Oct. 18-23.

The institute also has contracted for advertising space in weekly television magazines in San Francisco and Columbus, Ohio, to promote the five-minute spots before they are put on cable in those markets.

The schedule for the five-minute spots is:

Lansing, Mich.—WJIM (CBS), Oct. 19, 4:55, and Oct. 23, 11:30 p.m.

Providence, R.I.—WJAR (NBC), Oct. 16 and 23 during the noon to 4 p.m. movies.

Washington, D.C.—WTTG (Group W), Oct. 23, 9:55 p.m.

San Francisco—KFTY (Ind.) Oct. 21, 7:55 p.m., and Gill Cable, Oct. 18-20, 7:35 p.m.

Columbus—Warner Cable, Oct. 18-22, 7:30 p.m.

Pittsburgh—WPGH (Ind.), Oct. 22, 11:30 p.m.

Sixteen TV stations in the nine markets and the USA Cable Network will carry the one-minute spots. The schedule is:

Lansing—WILX (NBC), Oct. 18-21 and WJRT (ABC), Oct. 18-21.

Salt Lake City—KUTV (NBC), Oct. 18, 20 and 22, and KTVX (ABC), Oct. 18, 20 and 22; KSL (CBS), Oct. 25, 5 p.m., and Oct. 30, 6:30 p.m.

Providence—WLNE (CBS), Oct. 18, 20 and 22.

Washington—WDVM (CBS), Oct. 19 and 21; WRC (NBC), Oct. 18, 19 and 21, and WJLA (ABC), Oct. 18 and 20.

San Francisco—KRON (NBC), Oct. 18, 19 and 21; KPIX (CBS), Oct. 20.

Albuquerque, N.M. — KGGM (CBS), Oct. 20 and 22; KOAT (ABC), Oct. 18-21.

Houston—KTRK (ABC), Oct. 18-21.

Columbus—WTVN (ABC), Oct. 18, 20 and 22; WBNS (CBS), Oct. 18, 20 and 21; WCMH (NBC), Oct. 15, 19 and 21.

Pittsburgh—WTAE (ABC), Oct. 18, 20 and 22; WPXI (NBC), Oct. 18-22.

The USA network will carry a total of 19 spots at various times Oct. 18-22.

Kirkland protests unfair tilt of nation's defense burden

New York—The American labor movement will continue to support a strong national defense, as it has in the past, but only so long as the defense burden is fairly distributed among all segments of the society, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared in a speech here.

"We cannot accept a policy that places the burden of defense on those least able to bear it, while giving a free ride to those who have benefited the most from our system," Kirkland said at a dinner honoring him for his contributions to the maritime industry.

"We cannot understand a policy that, with one hand, takes money out of the taxpayers' pocket for defense and, with the other hand, gives cheap credits to the Soviet Union so it can devote more resources to its military buildup," he said.

"If our bankers stopped financing the Soviet military buildup with credits and technology, our members wouldn't have to pay for an American military buildup. It is time we asked the bankers: which side are you on?"

Kirkland was honored by the United Seamen's Service, which presented him its 1982 "Admiral of the Ocean Seas" award.

In his remarks, Kirkland drew attention to a bill introduced in Congress by Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.) to restore America's bulk shipping capacity. He said the measure would do more to strengthen the U.S. national defense and economy than any other single proposal now before Congress.

"It would provide jobs for seamen and shipbuilders, Minnesota iron miners and Michigan steelworkers, and for marine supply and support industries in 26 states," Kirkland said.

"It would produce bills for the federal treasury and stimulate the economy right across the board. And it would require labor and management in all sectors of the industry to work together—in the spirit represented by the United Seamen's Service."

Kirkland pledged the AFL-CIO's strongest support for the Boggs bill.

Reagan beaten on budget amendment

tional convention and the uncertainties over such a body's powers.

Some senators who voted for the constitutional amendment in August freely admitted in private conversations that it would be at best unworkable and at worst deeply damaging to the nation. But they counted on the House to bottle it up.

The Senate's action, Kirkland said at the time, amounted to "political cowardice."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, in session when the Senate acted, was not taking anything for granted.

Objections spelled out

It followed up a resolution spelling out labor's objections to the amendment with the appointment of a six-member subcommitte headed by Vice President Gerald W. McEntee to coordinate a national grassroots campaign.

The first goal was to slow and if possible block an attempt to pry the amendment out of the House Judiciary Committee through a discharge petition signed by 218 representatives—a majority of the House. House Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.) has been a staunch foe of the amendment.

If the measure should reach the floor, labor's lobbying goal would be to have more than one-third of the House firmly committed to voting against it.

Washington lobbyists targeted some 100 key congressional districts, and labor's grassroots effort was concentrated on the congressional recess period, from late August through Labor Day.

Labor's campaign, which was launched with a 14-state satellite television conference, stressed personal visits by delegations from unions and allied groups, and included in many localities radio and newspaper advertisements along with postcard mailings from workers in factories, offices, hospitals, stores and construction sites.

Not until Sept. 29, shortly before Congress was to adjourn until after the election, did the petition reach the required 218 names—and then only after intensive personal lobbying by Vice President Bush at the White House's request.

Since House rules provide for a waiting period before the discharge of a committee takes effect, the expectation was that Republicans would use the issue as best they could for political campaign advantage and the showdown would take place in the lame-duck session that will convene on Nov. 29.

Gamble worked

But House Democratic leaders gambled instead on disposing of the issue immediately and devised a strategy that would make it easier for fiscal conservatives, mostly from the South, to vote against the amendment on the showdown.

The rule adopted for consideration of the amendment called for a vote first on a substitute sponsored by Rep. Bill Alexander (D-Ark.). The Alexander proposal would have required the President to submit a balanced budget but would allow Congress to make an exception by a simple majority vote, instead of the three-fifths required under the Administration proposal.

The Alexander alternative was beaten, 346-77. But most of those who voted for it, having cast a vote for the concept of a balanced budget, then voted against the Administration measure.

The strategy had worked.

Impressive debate

Apart from the political maneuvering, the debate was impressive and at the end some staunch conservatives balked at the radical step of a drastic amendment of the constitution to achieve a momentary political gain.

A former Republican leader of the House, John J. Rhodes of Arizona, who is retiring this year after 30 years in Congress, voted against the amendment. So did Rep. Jack Kemp, who broke with his right-wing colleagues to urge that so serious a matter as amending the constitution not be treated as a political tug of war.

For the most part, though, liberal and moderate Democrats and Republicans provided the votes to block the two-thirds needed to adopt the amendment and send it to the states for ratification.

Whether it is revived as a serious issue in the new Congress will depend to a large extent on the election outcome.

NFL players okay mediation to counter league's stalling

By John R. Oravec

Striking National Football League players will accept private mediation in their current dispute with team owners, if that's what it takes to get the NFL Management Council to abandon its stalling on negotiations.

In announcing the proposal in the third week of the strike, NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey said the union still feels that the best approach toward a settlement is through face-to-face negotiations.

Meanwhile, the union gained a partial victory in a federal court decision that bars owners from filing suits in state courts to block the NFLPA's all-star games. The ruling, however, will permit the owners to file their challenges in federal court.

Because of the litigation, the NFLPA postponed the first scheduled all-star game, which was to have been played Oct. 10 in Washington.

Bargaining stressed

Garvey noted that the union's experience with federal mediation had not been beneficial in the settlement of past disputes with owners.

"We need bargaining," Garvey stressed. "We need people with open minds. No mediator can force management to bargain in good faith."

He charged that in 1974, management continued to violate the labor law while using the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service as a shield. For that reason, he said, the union has ruled out the use of the FMCS in the current dispute.

Instead, the Players Association proposed a list of nine private mediators, including four former Secretaries of Labor, for the league management to consider.

No blackouts

"The only condition of our acceptance of mediation is that both parties continue to have open access to the media so that our members and the public are always aware of progress or the lack of it," Garvey said.

The four former Secretaries of Labor on the list are John T. Dunlop, Ray Marshall, Willard Wirtz and Arthur Goldberg. Others include Archibald Cox, a former solicitor general; Rev. Theodore Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University, and Arthur Flemming, a former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare.

By agreeing to the management's call for mediation, Garvey and NFLPA President Gene Upshaw said, the union will expect owners to begin serious contract talks.

The union's wage scale is not the only issue that the management council has refused to address, Garvey and Upshaw said. They pointed out that there has been no movement on the union's call for improving grievance procedures or the players' right to be treated by their own physicians, as well as overdue improvements in insurance coverage and pensions for retirees.

On economic issues, the union had originally sought 55 percent of the owners' gross revenues to be put into a fund for players' salaries. Management flatly rejected the proposal. The union's revised proposal is for 50 percent of the league's revenues coming from the lucrative contract with major television networks.

The league will collect $2.1 billion over the next five years from the networks, which have been making payments to team owners during the three-week strike.

R.I.P. Datsun

Remains of a crushed Datsun rest in an oversized coffin near the U.S. Capitol, reflecting reaction to the tide of imported cars and the resulting destruction of American jobs. It's all a part of a "Buy American" campaign launched earlier this year in Kentucky by the Ashland Area AFL-CIO. Within a few months, the campaign has picked up support in nearby communities, including parts of Ohio and West Virginia. Describing the growth of the campaign for reporters at a Capitol Hill press conference is Ashland Area AFL-CIO President Michael E. Blevins, who was accompanied by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), in white cap. Blevins said the campaign will be climaxed by shipping the Datsun back to Japan.

Archbishop sees strong unions as hope for Brazil

International labor solidarity could go a long way toward relieving Brazilian workers from the injustice of official repression, company blacklists, and other obstacles to basic union rights and justice, the head of the world's largest Catholic archdiocese said at a luncheon given by the AFL-CIO.

"Our unions are not free," Dom Paulo Evaristo Cardinal Arns, archbishop of Sao Paulo, Brazil, observed. But with solid international trade union support, "we could accomplish great things."

The Sao Paulo archdiocese has 12 million members. It has been the scene of repeated labor battles with Brazil's military government and the hundreds of U.S. and other multinational companies operating there.

Attending the luncheon hosted by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue were Executive Director William C. Doherty Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Michael Boggs, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs.

Leo Goodman dies, former staff member

Leo Goodman, a former AFL-CIO staff member, died Sept. 27 of cancer at the age of 72. Goodman also served on the staffs of the CIO, the Auto Workers and the Industrial Union Dept. During the mid-1950s, he was secretary of the federation's standing committee on nuclear energy and natural resources.

Goodman also had been a member of the United Shoe Workers and the Newspaper Guild. Survivors included his wife Elizabeth and three children.

OSHA sued by steel union on change in lead standard

Philadelphia—The Steelworkers, in a suit filed in the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals, accused OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter of illegally modifying the federal lead exposure standard.

The USWA asked the court for a full review of Auchter's actions in twice postponing a deadline for employers in three lead industries to submit detailed plans on how they would reduce worker exposure to the hazards of lead.

The original deadline for primary and secondary smelters and battery manufacturers was June 29. But at the request of the three industries, Auchter pushed back the effective date to Aug. 30, and has subsequently deferred the deadline to Nov. 15.

OSHA has initiated similar rollbacks during the past month on the cotton dust and noise control regulations.

The USWA suit charges that Auchter modified the lead standard without going through proper rulemaking procedures. The lead standard, issued during the Carter Administration, would sharply reduce worker exposure to the metal.

Excessive exposure to lead can cause damage to the kidneys and nervous system, serious blood disorders and death. More than 800,000 U.S. workers are exposed to high levels of lead on the job, according to federal estimates.

Earlier, the Auto Workers asked the federal court for the District of Columbia to direct OSHA to issue an emergency temporary standard that would lower the level of worker exposure to formaldehyde, a suspected carcinogen.

The UAW suit charged that OSHA has withheld evidence on the hazards of formaldehyde.

Teachers win settlement in Detroit strike

Detroit—A lengthy strike by Detroit teachers came to an end Oct. 5 and the bargaining atmosphere cleared because of scattered settlements elsewhere, leaving only Pennsylvania with major disputes.

In Detroit, the nation's seventh largest school district, tentative agreement was reached between the board of education and some 11,000 teachers represented by the Detroit Federation of Teachers who had been on strike since Sept. 13.

The DFT voted to return its members to the classroom and send 15 unresolved issues to binding factfinding. Details were not announced, but union president John Elliott told the teachers, "We've got what we think is a pretty good agreement."

The Detroit settlement came a day after Detroit School Supt. Arthur Elliott threatened to seek a court injunction to force the teachers back to work. The DFT is a local of the American Federation of Teachers. Its 17-member executive board, with the backing of the majority membership, had refused to accept any pay concessions.

Pennsylvania disputes

Teachers in two Pennsylvania school districts returned to classrooms, but educators in a Montgomery County, Pa., district walked off their jobs, bringing to 21 the number of teachers' strikes in the state. One of the largest walkouts was in Hazleton, where teachers struck Oct. 6.

In Illinois, a settlement was reached in the Chicago suburb of Bremen, where classes resumed Oct. 5 following an 11-day teachers' walkout. That left three other strikes in the state still in progress.

In Deer Park, N.Y., teachers reached a tentative contract with the school board Oct. 5, ending a weeklong strike.

State fed leaders map stepped-up legislative drives

Top officers of 30 AFL-CIO state federations attending a three-day conference explored ways of stepping up efforts to win state legislation that workers vitally need to offset the impact of Reaganomics.

Discussions in general sessions and workshops at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies focused on developing effective legislation to improve state unemployment benefits and workers' compensation. Participants also reviewed the needs of public employees in collective bargaining and job safety programs.

Tied closely to the state legislative activities were discussions on labor's expanded political action efforts to elect candidates favorable to AFL-CIO programs, both on the staff and national levels.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland briefed the 46 state federation officers on the AFL-CIO role in the November elections and on procedures to consider early endorsement of a presidential candidate in 1984.

Better communications

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue outlined the AFL-CIO's efforts to better coordinate legislative and political activities with state federations by improving communications and operations at the national, regional and state levels.

And as the proposed constitutional amendment to require a balanced budget moved to the House floor, conference participants were bused to Capitol Hill to lobby their state congressional delegations for defeat of the proposal. The House vote on the labor-opposed measure, 236-187, fell far short of the two-thirds majority needed, despite a last-minute appeal from the White House.

The conference workshops were led by AFL-CIO staff specialists in state legislative matters and economics. Reports were also presented by departmental directors.

The league will collect $2.1 billion over the next five years from the networks, which have been making payments to team owners during the three-week strike.

Archbishop sees strong unions as hope for Brazil

International labor solidarity could go a long way toward relieving Brazilian workers from the injustice of official repression, company blacklists, and other obstacles to basic union rights and justice, the head of the world's largest Catholic archdiocese said at a luncheon given by the AFL-CIO.

"Our unions are not free," Dom Paulo Evaristo Cardinal Arns, archbishop of Sao Paulo, Brazil, observed. But with solid international trade union support, "we could accomplish great things."

The Sao Paulo archdiocese has 12 million members. It has been the scene of repeated labor battles with Brazil's military government and the hundreds of U.S. and other multinational companies operating there.

Attending the luncheon hosted by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue were Executive Director William C. Doherty Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Michael Boggs, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs.

Leo Goodman dies, former staff member

Leo Goodman, a former AFL-CIO staff member, died Sept. 27 of cancer at the age of 72. Goodman also served on the staffs of the CIO, the Auto Workers and the Industrial Union Dept. During the mid-1950s, he was secretary of the federation's standing committee on nuclear energy and natural resources.

Goodman also had been a member of the United Shoe Workers and the Newspaper Guild. Survivors included his wife Elizabeth and three children.

R.I.P. Datsun

Remains of a crushed Datsun rest in an oversized coffin near the U.S. Capitol, reflecting reaction to the tide of imported cars and the resulting destruction of American jobs. It's all a part of a "Buy American" campaign launched earlier this year in Kentucky by the Ashland Area AFL-CIO. Within a few months, the campaign has picked up support in nearby communities, including parts of Ohio and West Virginia. Describing the growth of the campaign for reporters at a Capitol Hill press conference is Ashland Area AFL-CIO President Michael E. Blevins, who was accompanied by Rep. Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.), in white cap. Blevins said the campaign will be climaxed by shipping the Datsun back to Japan.

OSHA sued by steel union on change in lead standard

Philadelphia—The Steelworkers, in a suit filed in the U.S. 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals, accused OSHA Administrator Thorne G. Auchter of illegally modifying the federal lead exposure standard.

The USWA asked the court for a full review of Auchter's actions in twice postponing a deadline for employers in three lead industries to submit detailed plans on how they would reduce worker exposure to the hazards of lead.

The original deadline for primary and secondary smelters and battery manufacturers was June 29. But at the request of the three industries, Auchter pushed back the effective date to Aug. 30, and has subsequently deferred the deadline to Nov. 15.

OSHA has initiated similar rollbacks during the past month on the cotton dust and noise control regulations.

The USWA suit charges that Auchter modified the lead standard without going through proper rulemaking procedures. The lead standard, issued during the Carter Administration, would sharply reduce worker exposure to the metal.

Excessive exposure to lead can cause damage to the kidneys and nervous system, serious blood disorders and death. More than 800,000 U.S. workers are exposed to high levels of lead on the job, according to federal estimates.

Earlier, the Auto Workers asked the federal court for the District of Columbia to direct OSHA to issue an emergency temporary standard that would lower the level of worker exposure to formaldehyde, a suspected carcinogen.

The UAW suit charged that OSHA has withheld evidence on the hazards of formaldehyde.

Carpenters' top apprentices

Scientists buttress union challenge of OSHA retreat on cotton dust curb

The Reagan Administration's second review of the cotton dust standard as part of its deregulation offensive has crashed into a scientific roadblock.

The chief of the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) has bluntly told the chief of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA) that the allegedly new scientific evidence is "crude" and "meaningless." NIOSH does the scientific research on which OSHA standards are based.

The conflict between the two Reagan appointees surfaced at a House Science & Technology panel's hearing on OSHA's review of the 1978 cotton dust standard. Some 600,000 workers are affected.

The panel, chaired by Rep. Albert Gore, Jr. (D-Tenn.), reviewed analyses of recent cotton dust studies performed by the textile industry. OSHA cited these studies as its reason for reopening the standard last February. The first time around, shortly after taking office, the Administration asked the Supreme Court to let it do a "cost-benefit" analysis on the cotton dust rule, and the high court slapped it down.

During the hearing, Dr. Donald Millar, head of NIOSH, recalled that he had notified OSHA last March that there was no scientific basis for reopening the standard.

However, OSHA chief Thorne Auchter, who did not appear but submitted testimony, indicated his agency would continue the review. Auchter, citing several studies that came under fire during the hearing, said the review is "now in its final stages, and a proposal will be published in the near future."

Clothing & Textile Workers Vice President Scott Hoyman told the panel that even though many member companies of the American Textile Manufacturers Institute have met the cotton dust standard, ATMI is making "a last-ditch effort to protect the financial interest of those companies which have neglected their responsibility to invest in modern technology."

Deregulation bet

"Those company executives who have yet to commit the necessary capital are engaging in more than purely financial calculations. They are also betting on President Reagan and Mr. Auchter to accomplish what they have promised—the 'deregulation' of American industry," Hoyman said. "In this gamble, they have been plainly encouraged by the ATMI's repeated submission of spurious studies which claim to show the lack of necessity for strict exposure limits."

Hoyman said that, rather than a "burden," the cotton dust standard has worked as a "stimulant" for textile companies which have invested in new equipment and met requirements to lower dust exposure levels to 200 micrograms per cubic meter of air. The new equipment, while lowering dust levels, also has increased productivity to make these U.S. companies competitive with low-wage foreign manufacturers, he said.

In addition to larger companies, such as Burlington and J. P. Stevens, medium and smaller companies also have met the standard and profited, Hoyman said.

The studies cited by Auchter which were questioned in the House hearing included two mail surveys by ATMI which supposedly show that lung disease among textile workers is much less prevalent than demonstrated by earlier studies.

In the March NIOSH report submitted to the panel, the agency recommended to OSHA "that these surveys be disregarded as credible scientific investigations of lung disease in the cotton textile industry." NIOSH called the industry surveys "crude" and "meaningless" compared to "earlier, scientifically valid studies."

Another study by the National Academy of Sciences questioned the evidence linking acute and chronic effects of cotton dust exposure and urged further research. However, Dr. Jerome Kleinerman, who chaired the NAS National Research Council panel which issued the report, agreed there currently is not enough scientific evidence to change the cotton dust standard and concluded it would be better to err on the side of protecting workers when research is conducted.

Link affirmed

In fact, three out of four scientists appearing before the House panel strongly reaffirmed the link between cotton dust exposure and lung disease, whether "brown lung" byssinosis—or other types. They also questioned the validity of the ATMI's surveys, particularly in terms of methods. The lone dissenter was Dr. Harold R. Imbus, who had carried out the studies for ATMI.

In his testimony, Dr. Millar also addressed the question of substituting respirators for engineering controls in the cotton dust standard. OSHA officials have said this is one part of the standard being reviewed for "cost-effective" considerations.

"In my view," Millar said, "the use of respirators is an adjunct to, and never a substitute for, engineering controls."

Sheet Metal union launches nationwide legal services

The Sheet Metal Workers' new employer-paid legal services program is in operation providing comprehensive coverage for union members in the United States and Canada.

The prepaid legal plan is part of a master agreement the union negotiated last spring with the Sheet Metal Contractors Association, which also agreed on establishing a union-wide prescription drugs plans.

Under the national agreement, employers signing local contracts pay 15 cents for each hour worked by SMW members into a dual trust fund to finance the operating costs of the two programs.

Others due

SMW President Edward J. Carlough reported that the legal services plan has been put into effect in a number of local agreements and that others will be signed soon.

"Together with an accompanying national prepaid program for prescription drugs and maintenance medicines, the SMW legal program is a step toward relieving Sheet Metal Workers of potential heavy, even crippling, out-of-pocket costs," Carlough said.

Last month, the legal trust fund signed an agreement with Hyatt Legal Services as the exclusive provider of services in the 25 cities where Hyatt has offices. In other communities, Hyatt will arrange for services from selected law firms, while some members will retain their own lawyers.

The program is designed to provide comprehensive coverage for SMW members, spouses and dependents. Services include the writing of wills and handling of probate matters, divorce and other domestic law problems, real estate transactions, consumer disputes, and defense of both civil lawsuits and criminal charges.

The union reported that negotiations are continuing for the implementation of the prescription drugs program under which members would submit receipts to the trust fund for reimbursement.

Shoe industry, unions join in imports fight

A coalition of shoe industry and labor officials, joined by more than 150 members of the House and Senate, have asked the Reagan Administration to press other nations to open their markets to shoes that have been funneled increasingly into the United States since trade barriers were lifted last year.

The plight of the U.S. footwear industry and its workers was described at a Capitol Hill conference by Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley, Food & Commercial Workers Vice President Arnold Mayer, George Q. Langstaff, president of the footwear industry's association, and several members of the House and Senate.

Lost jobs

Since the Administration permitted the import relief program on nonrubber footwear to expire in June 1981, some 22,000 shoe workers have lost their jobs and "many thousands of others are on short workweeks," said Finley.

He said gains by the domestic shoe industry made during the four years import controls were in effect "have been totally wiped out by the tremendous import growth since then."

Mayer, who read from a statement by UFCW President William H. Wynn, said that "at the end of 1981, imports had captured 51 percent of our market; they now control over 60 percent. Footwear unemployment is over 18 percent at a time when domestic consumption of footwear is up."

Mayer noted that those employed in the footwear industry usually are low-paid workers in small towns who, "when the shoe plant boards its doors, have no place else to go." He added that "many are minorities and many are women."

New approach

Mayer criticized a trade policy that permits "unrestricted and relentless footwear imports into the U.S. market—imports which should be going elsewhere, but do not because other countries have shut them out." He said his union's demand that other nations open their markets to allow genuine free trade "is a totally new approach for us."

The labor-industry coalition—the Footwear Import Action Committee—plans soon to file a petition with U.S. Trade Rep. William E. Brock requesting action against the import barriers of other nations which divert imports into the U.S. These countries will probably include Brazil, France, Britain, Italy, Japan, Korea, Spain, Taiwan, and the European Community.

In addition to this petition under Section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, new countervailing duty cases will be filed against nations that subsidize footwear exports.

Performers seek compensation for homemade tapes

Performers are entitled to fair payment for their talents, and unauthorized audio and video taping takes money out of their pockets, the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees testified.

DPE Director Jack Golodner, testifying at House hearings, urged enactment of legislation in the post-election session of Congress that would legalize home taping for non-commercial purposes and provide compensation through fees paid by manufacturers and importers of recording devices and blank tapes.

He displayed to the House Judiciary subcommittee a popular portable recorder with radio and tape deck units, along with copies of advertisements citing the opportunity to "duplicate a favored tape for a friend or copy a borrowed cassette."

Without effective copyright protection, Golodner said, such recording devices are "burglar tools."

A REPORT ON CONGRESS

By Lane Kirkland

EACH YEAR the AFL-CIO analyzes the voting record of every member of Congress on issues that affect the lives of working men and women. The hundreds of legislative decisions by the House and Senate are boiled down to those votes which show most clearly whether a legislator votes for or against the interests of working Americans and their families.

In 1982, economic issues continued to dominate the congressional agenda. President Reagan and his Republican allies in Congress pushed for ever-deeper cuts in programs from pensions and unemployment compensation to job training and education. The Administration also insisted on maintaining the 1981 windfall tax cuts for the wealthiest families and most profitable corporations. Combined with a tight-money policy that kept interest rates high, this economic formula produced the Reagan recession, the worst since the 1930s.

In 1982, Congress slowly put aside the rubber stamp it used on Reaganomics in 1981. As, month by month, the economy skidded deeper into recession, Congress began to reassert its lawful role in setting economic policies:

- When the President demanded a constitutional amendment that would force future presidents to balance the federal budget, regardless of its damage to the nation or its defenses, the House saw through the sham. If in place today, such an amendment would prevent Congress from taking any action to end the recession and would decimate social security and other programs. The House voted the amendment down, over the President's objections.

- President Reagan increasingly resorted to "government by veto," but on two occasions he overplayed his hand, and both the House and Senate came up with the two-thirds majorities needed to override a veto. The first came on legislation to maintain century-old protection of U.S. printing industry workers. In overriding the veto, Congress saved 367,000 jobs that would have gone to factories in the Far East. The second veto came on an appropriations bill which included funds for key programs and came in under budget. In overriding this veto, Congress rescued new unemployment benefits and jobs for the elderly.

- Taking their cue from the Administration, key Senate Republicans tried to sneak through another $40 billion cut in social security benefits. Senate Democrats put a stop to it immediately.

But stopping Reaganomics is not enough. Much more needs to be done if Congress is to lead the nation out of the Reagan economic disaster. In February 1982, the AFL-CIO proposed an alternative economic program that included job-creating investments, rebuilding of troubled industries, housing construction, a fair trade policy designed to stop the outflow of U.S. jobs to foreign nations, restoration of programs that benefit working people, and genuine tax reform based on ones' ability to pay—not a reward to the wealthy.

Portions of that program, including job training, extended unemployment benefits, and certain tax reforms, were passed in 1982. Other provisions, including legislation to require auto importers to produce a share of their vehicles in the United States, industrial revitalization, and lowering of interest rates, made progress.

Fifty years ago, America's economy was in chaos. American workers rejected a President who urged patience while the nation suffered. They elected a new, compassionate President and a supportive Congress to bring about recovery with strong action, not slogans.

The programs created in that era—the Works Progress Administration, Reconstruction Finance Corp., Tennessee Valley Authority, Public Works Administration, National Recovery Administration, Civilian Conservation Corps, and many others—helped restore health to the economy, and gave the necessary push to get America's economy rolling again.

The challenges facing America today are as difficult as in the Great Depression. And once again a President says, "Do nothing, wait for recovery, it's just around the corner." But jobless workers cannot wait any longer. They need action now. And the key is in the Congress. The charts on the following pages will show you where your legislators stood in 1982 on issues that offered a clear choice between economic revival and economic stagnation.

Congress can take the lead in bringing recovery. Congress will get the message if American workers study the record and elect legislators who will vote in the interest of all Americans, not those who profit from a stricken nation.

This special section carries labor's 1982 report card on Congress tabulating the votes on major issues of concern to the AFL-CIO in the second session of the 97th Congress. House members have been judged on 13 and senators on 18 key issues—"R-right" or "W-wrong" on the basis of the position the AFL-CIO took on the legislation. The tables also include the cumulative voting record and cumulative "right" percentage of each member since election to the House or Senate. With the voting records are brief descriptions of the issues—what the vote was about and its importance to the labor movement and the nation. Issues of prime importance to labor are the first 8 votes in the House and the first 10 votes in the Senate.

Two important votes occurred too late to be included in the voting record—the rejection by the House of the balanced budget constitutional amendment and the Senate's rejection of a proposal by Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) to prohibit unions from using funds to communicate with their members on political issues or voter registration drives. Rollcall votes on these issues are listed separately in the Oct. 9 AFL-CIO News.

1. Halting Attempts to Export U.S. Jobs

Even though Reaganomics already has caused unemployment to rise above 10 million, President Reagan offers no program to produce new jobs and, in fact, has taken action to directly wipe out existing jobs. Reagan cast a veto that his own Labor Dept. estimated could cost another 367,000 workers their jobs, causing Republicans and Democrats to wonder about his professed commitment to the jobless. Congress wisely overrode the Reagan veto.

The veto came on a bipartisan bill to extend the century-old law requiring that books and periodicals written by Americans and published by U.S. companies be printed and bound in America in order to gain full copyright protection. The Labor Dept. showed that failure to extend the law could cost the United States 172,000 jobs in printing and another 195,000 jobs in supplier industries, due to the move-out of the U.S. printing industry to Far Eastern countries. Congress passed the extension by wide margins, and when Reagan vetoed the extension bill, the House overrode him 324-86 on July 13.

2. Restoring Mine Safety and Health Protections

In 1981, conservatives in Congress stripped the Mine Safety & Health Administration (MSHA) of its authority to enforce worker health and safety rules at stone, sand and gravel surface-mining sites. In taking this action, Congress ignored AFL-CIO protests that 134 workers died in those industries in 1978-80. Congressional action left these workers without any federal safety protection. Fortunately, in 1982 Congress reversed itself and restored MSHA protections to the 40,000 affected workers.

The key vote came during consideration of an appropriations bill which included language restoring protections of the law to these workers; Rep. John Rousselot (R-Calif.), who led the anti-worker forces last year, attempted to delete the MSHA language. The House rejected the Rousselot amendment 186-220 on May 12.

3. Targeting Defense Contracts to Ease Pain of Unemployment

In 1982 the conservative-dominated Congress took remarkably little action to ease the hardship of the Reagan recession on more than 10 million unemployed Americans. But one show of concern came during consideration of the Defense Dept. authorization bill, when the House approved an amendment by Rep. Samuel Stratton (D-N.Y.) directing the Secretary of Defense to continue a test program in which certain contracts for goods and services are directed toward areas of the country with especially high unemployment. Thus jobs are provided to workers who have little likelihood of finding work in their communities. The Stratton amendment passed 237-170 on July 28.

4. Food Stamps for the Jobless

During consideration of budget reconciliation for agriculture programs, Rep. William Wampler (R-Va.) proposed deeper cuts in the food stamp program than those already in the bill. The Wampler amendment would have ended emergency food stamps for families that have recently lost their source of income. Thus, if a head of a household were laid off unexpectedly, the jobless family would have been denied food stamps for up to 30 days, even if it had no money to buy food in the meantime.

The House rejected the Wampler amendment 181-210 on Aug. 10.

5. Improving Worker Productivity with Job Training Programs

Labor Dept. programs, especially jobs programs, have taken a disproportionate share of the Reagan budget cuts, with the public service job-creation program completely wiped out. But as the Reagan recession caused joblessness to rise above 10 million, Congress became increasingly concerned about the unemployed, and the question was no longer whether to provide job training but how it should be handled.

Rep. John Erlenborn (R-Ill.) attempted to make training programs one-sided, with virtually total control by management. The Erlenborn amendment would have given management veto power over any provision of a job training program, while worker representatives would have no such power. The AFL-CIO urged that the law provide for a fairer partnership among management, labor and local government officials in designing and managing the training programs. The House rejected the Erlenborn amendment, but Rep. Eugene Johnston (R-N.C.) moved to recommit the bill to committee in order to add the Erlenborn language. The House then rejected the Johnston motion 189-218 on Aug. 4.

6. Defending Davis-Bacon Prevailing Wage Protections

Anti-worker members of Congress seize every opportunity to tear down America's labor laws, including the 50-year-old Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of locally prevailing wages to workers on federally financed construction projects. It assures local contractors who uphold community labor standards a fair chance to compete for government projects without being undercut by outside firms using cut-rate labor. It also protects the government from fly-by-night operators seeking to win federal contracts by paying wages too low to attract competent craftsmen.

Stymied in their efforts to gain outright repeal of the Davis-Bacon law, anti-union lobbies and their congressional allies repeatedly have tried to eliminate the law piecemeal by removing its coverage from various types of government contracts. One such attempt came during House consideration of Economic Development Administration grants. Rep. Tom Hagedorn (R-Minn.) offered an amendment to weaken Davis-Bacon protections on these local development grants for distressed areas of the country. Once again the House supported Davis-Bacon, rejecting the amendment 140-237 on Aug. 12.

7. Maintaining Pensions for Retired Federal Workers

Congress so far has rejected President Reagan's attempts to slash cost-of-living adjustments in social security, but the separate pension system paid into by federal workers has proved more vulnerable to political attack. During consideration of the civil service budget, Rep. Edward Derwinski (R-Ill.) tried to slash $3.2 billion from the measure in order to impose a 4-percent "cap" on the federal pension COLA. Assuming an inflation rate of 7 percent, this would mean that pensioners would lose 3 percent of their purchasing power. The Democratic-controlled House rejected the Derwinski motion by a 160-236 vote on Aug. 3. (But the GOP-dominated Senate approved the unfair 4-percent cap, as did the House-Senate conference committee which forged a "compromise" between the House and Senate bills.)

8. Fighting Recession with Jobs Legislation

As the Reagan recession worsened in 1982 and the unemployment rate edged toward 10 percent, Congress finally began to consider legislation to restore jobs. On Sept. 16 the House voted 223-169 to pass a bill creating approximately 250,000 jobs for the hardcore unemployed. The jobs would involve repair and maintenance of deteriorating public facilities, such as roads and bridges, water systems, and school security systems. (Unfortunately, the Republican-dominated Senate defeated an attempt by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) to enact this job-creating legislation.)

9. Defending Federal Programs that Help People I

The fiscal year 1983 budget submitted by President Reagan contained program cuts so unfair that both Republicans and Democrats in Congress rejected it out of hand. Congress then set about writing its own outline for government programs. Of the seven budget plans that came to a vote in the first round of debate—all of which were rejected—only one was designed to reverse the Reagan recession. This was the proposal by Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.). The Obey budget would have rescued programs such as unemployment compensation, public service jobs and training, veterans' benefits, education and transportation programs, as well as scientific research programs designed to improve America's productivity. The Obey budget would have financed these programs by reversing portions of the unfair Reagan tax cuts, restoring the full windfall profits tax on oil companies, and closing other tax loopholes.

The Obey budget would have restored an estimated one million jobs, and would have produced a smaller federal deficit than the other budget plans. Nevertheless, conservatives in the House, eager to provide Reagan with another round of program slashes, rejected the Obey budget 152-268 on May 24.

10. Defending Federal Programs that Help People II

After rejecting seven budget plans, the House began work again on a First Budget Resolution. This time the choice was simpler—a Democratic package offered by Budget Committee Chairman Jim Jones (D-Okla.) or the Reagan-endorsed Republican plan of Rep. Delbert Latta (R-Ohio). The AFL-CIO endorsed the Jones budget, which included creation of jobs in housing construction and in repair and maintenance of public buildings and other facilities, restoration of unemployment compensation in 25 states that were forced to "trigger off" extended benefits because of previous Reagan budget cuts, and allowance for tax reforms to help pay for programs such as Medicare.

Unfortunately, Reagan budget cuts won out over people's needs. The Jones budget lost 202-225 on June 10.

11. Defending Federal Programs that Help People III

Shortly after rejecting the AFL-CIO-endorsed Jones budget, the House passed another installment of Reagan budget cuts, introduced by Rep. Delbert Latta (R-Ohio). The cuts included an $11 billion cut in Medicare over three years, which will force the elderly to pay higher out-of-pocket costs for their health care. Also slated for additional cuts: trade adjustment assistance, the special unemployment compensation for those who lose their jobs due to government policies that encourage imports; college student loans; nutrition programs; veterans' programs; and virtually all other non-defense programs. The House approved the Reagan-backet Latta budget cuts by a 220-207 vote on June 10.

12. Providing Funds for Housing and Other Programs

On June 24 Reagan sent a message to nearly a million unemployed construction workers and to families eager to buy a home but unable to pay exorbitant interest rates. The message: Don't look to me for sympathy—or help.

On that date Reagan vetoed an urgent supplemental appropriations bill because it included a $3 billion program of subsidies to bring down home mortgage interest rates. The bill would have lowered interest rates for 210,000 home mortgages and would have restored more than 480,000 jobs. It had broad bipartisan support in Congress. It also included necessary stopgap funding for most government agencies pending enactment of regular appropriations bills.

The House, in a 253-151 vote, failed to come up with the two-thirds majority needed to override the Reagan veto. Ironically, 75 Republicans voted for the housing program but then voted against overriding the Reagan veto of it.

13. Reasserting Congressional 'Power of the Purse'

By the summer of 1982, as Reaganomics produced deepening recession and ever-higher unemployment, Congress was beginning to tire of Reagan vetoes of its appropriations bills. On Aug. 28 Reagan pushed Congress too far, as he vetoed a carefully crafted supplemental appropriations bill that included funds for the Labor Dept. to process payments under the recently enacted extension of unemployment compensation, a popular program that provides part-time jobs for the elderly, and funds for college loans and education for the handicapped.

In vetoing the measure, Reagan called it a "budget-buster," a charge resented by House members who knew the bill totalled nearly $2 billion less than Reagan had requested. Actually, Reagan vetoed the bill because it didn't spread the money among programs he preferred. The House overrode the Reagan veto, 301-117 on Sept. 9. (The Senate also overrode the veto, and the measure became law.)

Labor's Stand on Major Issues in the Senate

Industrial Union Dept. delegation briefed on critical issues by Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.).

1. Providing Emergency Funds for Unemployment Compensation

In times of recession, Congress traditionally has acknowledged its responsibility to those who have lost their jobs through no fault of their own by approving additional weeks of unemployment compensation. In the spring of 1982, as the Reagan Recession worsened and unemployment jumped toward levels unseen since the Great Depression, the Democratic leadership in the Senate began working to pass such extended unemployment benefits. A key vote came during consideration of the First Budget Resolution for fiscal 1983, as Sen. Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) offered an amendment to increase unemployment funding in order to provide for 13 additional weeks of benefits in states suffering from very high unemployment levels. Sen. Robert Dole (R-Kan.), took the lead and—with the help of 45 other Republicans and six Democrats—killed the Byrd amendment 52-42 on May 21. (Extended unemployment compensation later was passed by Congress as part of a tax bill.)

2. Restoring Mine Safety and Health Protections

In 1981, conservatives in Congress stripped the Mine Safety & Health Administration (MSHA) of its authority to enforce worker health and safety rules at stone, sand and gravel surface-mining sites. In taking this action, Congress ignored AFL-CIO protests that 134 workers died in those industries in 1978-80. Fortunately, in 1982 Congress reversed itself and restored MSHA protections to the 40,000 affected workers. But this effort suffered a setback when Sen. Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.) offered an amendment to delete language in an appropriations bill restoring MSHA protection to these miners. The Bumpers amendment was passed 52-38 on May 27, making it necessary for the Senate to return to the issue later.

3. Preventing Illegal Immigration and Protecting Wage Standards

In 1982 Congress attempted to pass a much-needed overhaul of U.S. immigration laws. The AFL-CIO pushed for compassionate legislation to stem the flow of illegal immigration and end the undermining of U.S. wage and labor standards by the exploitation of illegal workers. During Senate debate on the reform bill, Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) offered an amendment to prevent expansion of the "H-2" program by which foreign workers, particularly migrant farm workers, are allowed to work in the United States on a temporary basis. At a time when more than 10 million Americans are jobless, the need for a program to encourage the importation of foreign workers can only benefit greedy employers. Recognizing that an expanded "H-2" program was simply a new name for the discredited "bracero" and "guestworker" programs of the past, Kennedy tried to stop its expansion. Unfortunately, the Kennedy amendment was defeated 28-62 on Aug. 13.

Americans. But one small show of concern came during consideration of the Defense Dept. authorization bill, when the Senate approved an amendment by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) directing the Secretary of Defense to continue a test program in which certain contracts for goods and services are directed toward areas of the country with especially high unemployment. Thus, jobs are provided to workers who have little likelihood of finding work in their communities. The Moynihan amendment passed 48-45 on May 13.

5. Saving the Eight-Hour Day Standard

Not even America's oldest labor standard—the eight-hour day—is sacred to the Reagan Administration. During consideration of legislation to allow flexible work scheduling on federal contracts, Sen. William Armstrong (R-Colo.)—with the support of the Administration—offered an amendment to allow 10-hour days without payment of overtime. The proposal would have given an edge in contract bidding to non-union employers who could escape the overtime pay the unionized workers enjoy. The Senate wisely chose not to use federal dollars to gouge wages, and approved a motion by Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska) to kill the Armstrong amendment by a 49-46 vote on June 30.

6. Saving Railroad Retiree Pensions

In 1981 President Reagan vetoed a railroad retirement funding bill, causing abrupt cuts in monthly retirement checks for 400,000 railroad pensioners. In 1982 Senate conservatives sought to make additional cuts in railroad pensions. Because railroad retirees paid into both social security and the railroad pension system, they are entitled to benefits under both retirement systems, as promised in the 1974 rail retirement law. The railroad pension system is funded not by general federal revenues but by contributions from employers and employees, so Congress has no business slashing benefits in order to reduce the federal budget deficit.

The key vote came when Sen. Jim Sasser (D-Tenn.) offered an amendment to the First Budget Resolution to provide 7.4 percent cost-of-living adjustments in order to keep these retirees apace with inflation. Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) offered a substitute amendment providing for only a 4 percent COLA in 1983, which would cause retirees to lose their real purchasing power. Fortunately, the Senate approved a Sasser motion to kill the Domenici substitute, 53-44, on May 21.

7. Protecting Federal Workers' Pensions

Retired federal workers are just as vulnerable to the effects of inflation on their pensions as those who receive social security or railroad retirement, but Congress seems more willing to inflict hardship on federal retirees by "capping" the inflation adjustments in their pensions at levels far below the inflation rate. During consideration of the First Budget Resolution for fiscal 1983, Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.) offered an amendment to provide funding for a modest 6.6 percent inflation adjustment for federal pensions in 1983, and 4 percent in 1984 and 1985. Even at these levels, retirees would gradually lose some of their purchasing power to inflation, but Senate conservatives wanted no cost-of-living increases for retirees, so in a 47-43 vote they approved a motion by Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) to kill the Riegle amendment. (Later, the resolution agreed upon in House-Senate conference contained a 4-percent inflation adjustment.)

8. Saving Union Publications from Accelerated Postage Rate Hikes

In 1970 Congress decided to end the subsidy of postage rates for publications of non-profit groups, including labor unions and charities. The subsidy was to have been phased out over 16 years, resulting in gradually increasing postal rates for these groups.

In 1981 the Reagan Administration upset that schedule, cutting the postage subsidy far more than the non-profit groups had been prepared to adjust to under the original schedule. Scores of church journals, education magazines and union publications were forced to fold. In 1982, during consideration of the First Budget Resolution, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) offered an amendment to restore the non-profit postage rates to the original schedule of increases. The Senate rejected the Moynihan amendment 34-57 on May 21.

9. Assisting Airline Employees Made Jobless by Mergers

In 1982 the House and Senate passed legislation requiring termination benefits from the companies for employees who lose their jobs due to the merger or sale of airlines. As the airline industry gradually is being deregulated, Congress recognized the need to provide a measure of protection for airline employees until they are able, through their unions, to negotiate such benefits in collective bargaining. The House-Senate conference committee, charged with ironing out the differences between the House and Senate bills, reported a favorable compromise; but the Senate, in a 59-38 vote on Aug. 12, sent the bill back to conference to have protective provisions removed.

10. Keeping Reaganomics Out of the Constitution: Stopping the Balanced Budget Amendment

A balanced federal budget—in which federal tax revenues are at least as great as federal spending—is a goal that can be achieved over time through an appropriate combination of tax policies, spending policies, Federal Reserve Board monetary policy, and healthy economic growth. There is nothing wrong with a balanced budget, but there is a lot wrong with a constitutional amendment that would force Congress to pass balanced budgets every year.

The AFL-CIO objected to the proposed balanced budget amendment on three basic principles: (1) The U.S. Constitution, the most basic law of the land, was designed as a framework for lasting government, not a dumping ground for transient economic doctrines. (2) Such a constitutional straitjacket would prevent Congress from using its taxing and spending authority to end depression, natural disaster or other emergency. (3) The three-fifths majority required by the amendment to pass a deficit budget undermines majority rule, handing the congressional power of the purse to a two-fifths minority.

As a practical matter, passage of the balanced budget amendment would force enormous cuts in all programs that help working Americans—including social security. Medicare, unemployment compensation, job safety and health enforcement, education programs, highways and public transportation facilities, and every other program would face cuts much more severe than those already approved.

But the Senate, hoping to distract voters from the Reagan budget it had approved with its record-high budget deficit, played politics and approved the balanced budget constitutional amendment by a 69-31 vote on Aug. 4.

11. Preventing GOP-Threatened Cuts in Social Security

Ignoring the wishes of the American people, who in many public opinion polls have stated emphatically that they want social security benefits left intact, the Republican-controlled Senate Budget Committee called for a $40 billion reduction in the 1983 deficit through changes in social security. In order to nip these social security cuts in the bud, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) offered an amendment to a military authorization bill rejecting the proposed $40 billion social security "deficit reduction." But Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.), playing politics with America's retirees, moved to kill the Moynihan amendment. The Senate agreed to the Baker tabling motion by a 51-44 vote on May 11.

12. False Budget Economy Hurts Working People

In 1981 Congress adopted the Reagan economic program with no questions asked. By spring 1982 it was obvious that the Reagan package of tax cuts for the rich and program cuts for everyone else was not spurring economic recovery but rather was causing the worst recession since the 1930s. Nevertheless, Senate Republicans, in passing a new budget resolution for fiscal 1983, closed their eyes to the damage they had done, and instead of taking strong action to end the recession and bring down the unemployment rate, approved yet another round of the policies that brought the disaster.

The new GOP First Budget Resolution included more cuts in federal programs, including programs that train uneducated workers for new jobs and put them to work on such projects as highway and bridge repair; compensate workers who lose their jobs because of government policies; provide health care for the elderly and poor (Medicare and Medicaid); educate children, including the handicapped and underprivileged, and help working families put their children through college; help injured war veterans adjust to a new, tougher life; clean up the nation's air and water; prevent hunger in infants and children; and provide other vital services. Once again, the Republican budget slashed most programs, from railroad retirement to housing, from unemployment compensation to job safety and health. The GOP First Budget Resolution was passed 49-43 on May 21.

13. Defending Medicare and Medicaid from More Cuts

During consideration of the First Budget Resolution (see Vote 12), Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) offered an amendment to protect the health care programs for the nation's elderly and poor—Medicare and Medicaid. The resolution under consideration included a $5.8 billion cut in these programs—a cut that would mean higher out-of-pocket costs for the elderly, who already pay a hefty 43 percent of the costs of their health care. Noting that last year's Reagan budget cuts in these programs already were forcing many of the elderly to choose between eating and going to the doctor, the backers of the Moynihan amendment urged that $1.8 billion be added to the bill to lessen the cuts. But this modest proposal failed, as the Senate rejected the Moynihan amendment 39-60 on May 19.

14. Investing in America's Future: Better Education Programs

A cornerstone of the American goal of "equal opportunity for all" has always been a quality education for all young Americans. Recognizing that not all school districts are financially able to fulfill this goal, Congress has created special education programs for the handicapped, the underprivileged, and those who are qualified to go to college but who cannot afford today's high tuition costs.

The Reagan First Budget Resolution for fiscal 1983 made more drastic cuts in these programs—compromising America's future in order to achieve short-term budget savings. Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) offered an amendment to restore funding to maintain education programs at current levels. But Senate conservatives rejected the Bradley amendment 44-54 on May 19.

One example of what this means: America's colleges and universities are becoming more exclusively institutions for the rich. Because the Senate rejected the Bradley amendment, approximately 500,000 students will lose modest sums, averaging $900 per student, which help academically qualified but financially strapped young Americans go to college.

15. Averting America's Worsening Housing Crisis

The housing industry, a linchpin of the American economy, is in deep trouble. In 1981, fewer new homes were built than in any year since 1946—less than half the number needed to provide for new households and to replace old housing. Nearly a million construction workers are now unemployed.

In 1982 Congress tried to reverse the housing disaster, but President Reagan stopped all action, with vetoes and threatened vetoes of any legislation that included needed housing funds. During consideration of a supplemental appropriations bill, Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.) offered an amendment to provide $3 billion for subsidies of home mortgage interest rates. The Riegle amendment was a bipartisan effort, cosponsored by Sen. Richard Lugar (R-Ind.). It would have resulted in lower interest rates for 210,000 homes and would have restored more than 480,000 jobs.

But Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.), in order to comply with the demands of Reagan Budget Director David Stockman, moved to table the Riegle amendment. The Senate did so in a close 48-44 vote on June 29.

16. Raising Workers' Taxes to Pay for '81 Tax Cuts to Wealthy and Corporations

The Reagan/GOP First Budget Resolution called for $21 billion in tax increases in fiscal 1983. The Republican-controlled Senate Finance Committee recommended a package of tax hikes that included substantially higher taxes on working Americans, including higher federal taxes on telephone use, airline tickets and tobacco products, and tighter restrictions on tax deductions for medical expenses and casualty losses, such as burglary of one's home. The committee bill also included major cuts in Medicare.

Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) argued that it was unfair to raise taxes on working Americans, because it was the 1981 Reagan tax cuts for wealthy individuals and corporations that caused the budget deficit. Bradley offered an amendment that would have eliminated or eased the unfair tax hikes mentioned above by restricting the 1983 tax cuts to those who earn less than $46,500 per year, postponing the 1983 tax cut for the wealthy. But Senate conservatives chose to put a portion of the higher tax burdens on working people, rejecting the Bradley amendment 45-54 on July 21.

17. Guaranteeing All Americans the Right to Vote

Major provisions of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 required its renewal in 1982. One of the most successful civil rights laws in U.S. history, this law prevents poll taxes, "literacy tests" and other tactics that prevent minority citizens or the poor from voting. Congress eventually voted to renew and strengthen the act, but not without a struggle from a handful of arch-conservatives. Sen. John East (R-N.C.) tried several times to weaken the law and make enforcement difficult. Under one East amendment, if federal law enforcers cited a state or other jurisdiction for violation of the Voting Rights Act, that jurisdiction could file suit against the government in local courts, rather than in the District of Columbia, thus bringing a hodge-podge of court decisions and weakening enforcement. Wisely rejecting this and other East amendments, the Senate voted to retain uniform enforcement of the law by the D.C. Circuit Court, by a 31-65 vote on June 17.

18. Putting a Stop to the Damage of Reaganomics

For a year and a half Congress bent over backward to comply with each and every whim of the Reagan Administration regarding economic matters. But on Sept. 10 the Senate joined the House in handing the Administration a major defeat—overriding Reagan's veto of an appropriations bill by a 60-30 vote.

The Reagan veto would have killed funds for staff to make payments to jobless workers under a recently enacted extension of unemployment benefits. Also slated for termination by Reagan were funds for college student loans, jobs for the elderly and education for the handicapped. Reagan had called the bill a "budget buster;" actually, it came in at nearly $2 billion less than the presidential request. Senators understood that Reagan vetoed the measure only to pacify extreme right-wing pressure groups. Congress, finally concerned about the harm Reaganomics is causing and resentful that the President was playing politics with some of the most unfortunate Americans, said "No" to Reagan by a two-thirds vote.

Democrats look to gain in state houses

The Monitor poll also surveyed Democratic professionals who saw the party ahead in 27 of the 36 gubernatorial races slated this year, with the GOP ahead in seven and two contests even. The Republicans put the Democrats ahead in 25 races, themselves out front in seven others, with four contests in a dead heat.

Of the 36 governors' races, incumbents are running for re-election in 24 states—14 of them Democrats, 10 Republican. State AFL-CIO organizations have made endorsements in all but two states, Georgia and South Carolina, and are backing the Democratic candidates in all of them.

Republican chances appear best in the Far West, where President Reagan's appeal generally runs strongest. Even so, Democrats are leading in Alaska and Nevada and have strong prospects in both Oregon and California.

The GOP would dearly love to break through in the Rocky Mountain region, where Democrats hold the governors' offices in six states on a line from Idaho and Montana southward through Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah to the desert states of Arizona and New Mexico.

GOP outlook

Governors' races are scheduled in four of these six states this year, but the Republicans are given a solid chance only in Idaho, where the Democratic incumbent, John Evans, and his opponent, Lt. Gov. Philip Batt, agree that the race right now is too close to call.

Elsewhere, three former Democratic governors—Rudy Perpich of Minnesota, Michael Dukakis of Massachusetts, and William Clinton of Arkansas—are on the comeback trail and look like winners.

In the Deep South, where Democrats currently have a lock on six of the nine state houses, the Republicans are pouring in money in an effort to capture the Alabama governorship for Montgomery Mayor Emory Folmar. But his Democratic opponent, three-time former Gov. George C. Wallace, who is making the state's 14.2-percent unemployment rate the main issue, is rated a slight favorite.

The state-by-state outlook:

Alabama—Republicans have not elected a governor in Alabama since the Reconstruction and, if for no other reason, Wallace has to be given an edge. His rival, Folmar, is a former Democrat who was state chairman for the Reagan-Bush ticket in 1980. Analysts see the race as a test of support for Reaganomics in the Cotton South.

Alaska—Democrat Bill Sheffield, a hotel owner from Anchorage, is favored over former state House Speaker Thomas Fink, a Republican also from Anchorage. Fink backs two controversial proposals—to move the capital from Juneau to Willow and to repeal the priority fishing and hunting rights of Eskimos and Indians. Also vying for the conservative vote is Libertarian Party candidate Richard Randolph, who is expected to weaken Fink's chances. Current Republican Gov. Jay S. Hammond is constitutionally barred from seeking a third term.

Arizona—Democratic Gov. Bruce Babbitt, 44, is expected to win a second term over State Senate President Leo Corbet, 45. A Republican from Phoenix, Corbet has never run in a statewide contest, yet is running a vigorous campaign. Keeping the state as pristine and open as possible is an issue of deep concern to voters.

Arkansas — The Democrats have a strong contender in former Gov. Bill Clinton, 35, who is seeking to oust the man who unseated him in 1980, incumbent Frank D. White, 48. White espoused President Reagan's supply-side economic program and may be in re-election trouble for that reason. Unemployment in the state has soared to about 11 percent.

California—Three recent polls showed Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley ahead of his Republican opponent, Atty. Gen. George Deukmejian. If Bradley, 64, pulls it off, he will become the nation's first elected black governor. Incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., is running for the Senate.

Colorado—Republicans and Democrats alike agree that Democratic incumbent Richard D. Lamm likely will win big in his bid for a third term. He is opposed by former State House Speaker John D. Fuhr, a Republican.

Connecticut—The favorite here is Democratic Gov. William A. O'Neill, who assumed the governorship on the last day of 1980 when the late Ella T. Grasso resigned because of her illness with cancer. O'Neill's Republican challenger is former State Sen. Lewis B. Rome.

Florida—Robert Graham, a Democrat, ought to win re-election over Rep. L. A. (Skip) Bafalis, who is not well known outside his south-central 10th District.

Georgia—State Rep. Joe Frank Harris is favored to beat Republican State Sen. Robert H. Bell. Democratic Gov. George Busbee was ineligible for a third term.

Hawaii—In a three-way contest, Democratic incumbent George R. Ariyoshi is a slight favorite to win a third term. His chief rival, former Honolulu Mayor Frank Fasi, opposed Ariyoshi both in 1974 and 1978. Fasi is running as an independent. The GOP candidate is former State Sen. D. G. (Andy) Anderson of Kaneohe.

Idaho—A close race is shaping up between incumbent John Evans and his longtime opponent, Republican Lt. Gov. Philip Batt. Evans's lead in the polls has slipped in recent months, and all signs point to a photo finish.

Illinois—A few months ago, Republican Gov. James Thompson was the widely acknowledged underdog in his bid for an unprecedented third successive term. Recently, he has picked up ground against his Democratic challenger, Adlai E. Stevenson III. Analysts note money is a big factor in the campaign, with Thompson outspending Stevenson two to one.

Iowa—Popular Gov. Robert Ray, a Republican, is not seeking re-election, but another Republican, Lt. Gov. Terry Branstad, is given the edge as of now over Democrat Roxanne Conlin, former U.S. attorney for Iowa's southern district. The economy, including the state's growing deficit, is the chief issue.

Kansas—Analysts view this one as a tossup between incumbent Democrat John Carlin, who is seeking a second term, and Republican Samuel Hardage.

Maine — Democratic Gov. Joseph E. Brennan is a strong favorite to win re-election over Republican Charles Cragin, a Portland lawyer.

Maryland—Elected to a first term in 1978 with 71 percent of the vote, incumbent Democrat Harry R. Hughes is well ahead of his Republican opponent, Anne Arundel County Executive Robert A. Pascal, and ought to finish first.

Massachusetts—Former Gov. Michael S. Dukakis, who lost out to conservative Gov. Edward King in the 1978 Democratic primary, turned the tables this year and is ahead in his campaign against GOP candidate John W. Sears.

Michigan—With Republican Gov. William G. Milliken retiring, Democratic Congressman James J. Blanchard is favored to knock out the Republican contender, insurance executive Richard Headlee. A supporter of the state's depressed auto industry, Blanchard is running a strong campaign.

Minnesota—Another ex-governor, Rudy Perpich, is given the edge over Republican candidate Wheelock Whitney, a Minneapolis business executive. Perpich ran ahead of the Democratic ticket in seeking a full term as governor in 1978, but got caught in the Republican tidal wave that swept the state. Current Gov. Albert H. Quie is retiring.

Nebraska—Political novice Robert Kerrey, who lost a leg in Vietnam and received the Congressional Medal of Honor, is running a strong campaign against incumbent Republican Gov. Charles Thone, but Thone is the favorite right now.

Nevada—Democratic Atty. Gen. Richard Bryan is given a solid chance to block Gov. Robert List's bid for a second term.

New Hampshire—The question of taxes figures as the main issue in the race between incumbent Democratic Gov. Hugh Gallen and his Republican opponent, former State Rep. John Sununu. New Hampshire has no sales or income tax, and while Sununu has pledged himself to preserve that state of affairs, Gallen has not. Gallen is still rated to win, despite a strong negative campaign against him by the state's largest newspaper, The Manchester Union Leader.

New Mexico—With Democratic Gov. Bruce King ineligible to seek re-election, former Democratic Atty. Gen. Toney Anaya is favored to push aside former GOP State Sen. John Irick, a conservative cut from the Reagan mold. New Mexico gubernatorial races tend to run close, with margins of 3,000 votes or less, however, and this one might run to form, also.

New York—Lt. Gov. Mario Cuomo, who had strong labor support in defeating New York City Mayor Edward Koch in the recent Democratic primary, figures to beat Republican drugstore executive Lewis Lehrman. Lehrman has money behind him, but has never run for office. Gov. Hugh Carey did not seek a third term.

Ohio—Democratic candidate Richard Celeste is well known across the state after a term as lieutenant governor and has strong labor backing. He is favored to defeat Republican Congressman Clarence Brown. Current Gov. James A. Rhodes is ineligible for a third consecutive term.

Oklahoma—Gov. George Nigh, seeking a second term, is favored to win over Republican Thomas Daxon, even though no other Oklahoma governor has been elected to two consecutive terms. Daxon's campaign has plenty of money behind it.

Oregon — Republican Gov. Victor Atiyeh is getting a strong run from Democratic State Sen. Ted Kulongoski, who ties Oregon's depressed economy to the failure of Reaganomics. Right now, the race is considered too close to call.

Pennsylvania—Republican Gov. Richard L. Thornburgh is heavily favored to gain a second term in his contest with Rep. Allen Ertel. Thornburgh's handling of the 1979 nuclear crisis at Three Mile Island and his downhold on taxes have enhanced his standing with the voters.

Rhode Island—Gov. J. Joseph Garrahy seems headed for a fourth term in this strongly Democratic state. His opponent is Republican Vincent Marzullo.

South Carolina—No South Carolina governor has ever served two four-year terms in a row, but Democratic incumbent Richard Riley seems almost certain to make it in his race against Republican William Workman.

South Dakota—Republican incumbent William Janklow is favored to win re-election over Democratic State Sen. Michael O'Connor.

Tennessee—Republican incumbent Lamar Alexander should win a second term over Democratic Mayor Randy Tyree of Knoxville.

Texas—The advantages of incumbency, plus buckets of money from the Republicans, are helping Gov. William Clements in his race for a second term, but his Democratic opponent, Atty. Gen. Mark White, is running a determined campaign to overtake the abrasive governor.

Vermont — Republican Gov. Richard Snelling is seeking a fourth term over Democratic Lt. Gov. Madeleine Kunin. Snelling's personal popularity is high, and he is rated the favorite.

Wisconsin—Republican Gov. Lee Sherman Dreyfus opted out of a re-election bid, leaving the field to Democrat Anthony Earl, former secretary of the state department of natural resources, and Republican businessman Terry Kohler. Despite Kohler's big bucks, Earl is favored.

Wyoming — Democratic Gov. Ed Herschler is well liked in this conservative state and figures to defeat his challenger, Republican oilman Warren Morton.

Senate vote on Helms move to restrict use of union dues

Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) tried to tie an anti-labor amendment to an appropriations bill but was beaten on a 62-37 vote. The Helms amendment would have directed the Federal Election Commission to make sure that dues collected under a union shop contract aren't used for "political or ideological" purposes.

The 62 senators who voted to table and thus kill the Helms amendment on Sept. 29 were in accord with the AFL-CIO's position.

House rollcall on budget amendment

A balanced budget constitutional amendment, which the AFL-CIO warned would leave the nation helpless against recessions and unemployment, was rejected by the House on Oct. 1. The 236-187 vote for the proposed amendment was 46 short of the required two-thirds majority.

Right votes (R) against the amendment were cast by 167 Democrats and 20 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 69 Democrats and 167 Republicans.

Numerals show congressional districts. A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong.

A Haunting Image

The following is excerpted from an article by the Most Rev. J. Francis Stafford, auxiliary bishop of Baltimore. It appeared first in the commentary section of the Baltimore Sun:

RECENTLY, I have been haunted by the image of a school lunchroom. Two-thirds of the children in the room are eating lunch; the rest are only allowed to watch.

It is a painful image. But what is most disturbing is that in addition to being taught reading, writing and arithmetic, the well-fed children are learning to eat without concern for those who can not.

I wish the image were fantasy. Unfortunately, because of federal budget cuts, at least 500,000 children lost the right to a free or reduced-price school lunch this year. If this continues, many more will lose that and many other benefits.

Yet the decimation of the school lunch program is, I fear, only a symbol of the growing lack of a consistent policy for families on the part of the federal government. The government will allocate $1.4 million for the veterinary care of pets on military bases yet cut an even larger amount earmarked for immunization of poor children; $1.4 million would restore service to 35,000 of these children who otherwise will do without immunization.

IN THE UNITED STATES today, many millions of poor, low-income and previously middle-income families are suffering from unemployment. Yet, when they look to the federal government for help, they are met with cutbacks in financial assistance, the elimination of job training programs and very high interest rates that shackle economic growth. In return, they are offered tax cuts on salaries they only wish they could earn.

Joblessness has been solidly linked to the breakdown of family life. Social scientists have generated data showing that increases in unemployment are associated with rises in infant mortality, child abuse, alcoholism, suicide, heart disease and most crimes, including murder.

To lose one's job strikes at the very heart of what it means to be human.

MANY ARGUE that assistance to the poor has been too costly; advocates for the poor argue that the cuts are too severe. But even without focusing on the level of assistance, it is safe to say that:

- Most families affected by the cuts have low incomes or none at all;
- Little transition has been provided them to cushion the loss of these benefits;
- The cuts have occurred when the need is greatest, that is, when unemployment is high and few affected have the option of finding a better job or even any job.

The government promises that these persons will benefit eventually from its policies, that these policies need time to work. Yet those promised benefits have not arrived, even as the government has repeatedly pushed back the date of their arrival.

An Artful Dodger

CAN ANYONE take seriously President Reagan's expression of outrage when he went on television to call for the defeat of House members whose votes killed a horrendous balanced budget amendment that would have sullied the Constitution and put the economy in a straitjacket?

As the President started to walk away, a television reporter called out the obvious question, "Sir, what's unfair about the Democrats' assertion that if you want a balanced budget, you should submit a balanced budget?"

"Sam," the now genial President replied, "I shouldn't take any questions, and I'm not going to, but I'm going to answer that one because . . ."

At the end of the rambling response, came the insistent follow-up from the reporter: "That wasn't my question. You answered a question I didn't ask."

And it still hasn't been answered.

Reagan's failed policies undermine basic values

By Press Associates, Inc.

It seems that almost everyone in America recognizes that President Reagan's economic policies have failed—except the President himself.

The failure has been documented in elaborate detail by the well-regarded Urban Institute, a non-partisan, largely corporate-funded research organization.

The institute has released a 530-page study, "The Reagan Experiment," funded mainly by a $3 million Ford Foundation grant.

Although cast in scholarly language by its 27 authors, the message comes through loud and clear: The Reagan program not only is unfair, it hasn't worked and isn't likely to work in the future.

Failed theory

"From the start, it was doubtful that the performance of the economy could accommodate the goals of increasing defense, reducing taxes, and balancing the budget" at the same time, the study says.

Despite the "inconsistency of these goals," Reagan "disarmed his critics with optimistic projections based on supply-side theories," it continues.

"But the application of the theory failed to produce either the expected short-term recovery or the additional revenues needed to finance tax relief and military spending," it notes.

"The Reagan experiment with economic policy," it concludes, "has clearly not worked in the short run and is unlikely to live up to the Administration's expectations for the long run."

The study is clear in fixing responsibility for the recession. While "there was no supply-side miracle leading to economic recovery, the tight monetary policy endorsed by the Administration led to a recession."

But instead of job-creating government policies used since 1946 to cushion the impact of recession, a "fundamental change in economic policy was the Administration's rejection of any use of countercyclical stabilization policy," it points out.

As for programs needed for long-range economic growth, "programs aimed at developing human resources (education, training and social services) and improving public infrastructure (highways, mass transit and economic development) were disproportionately cut rather than maintained or reformed."

Building deficit

Meanwhile, the main result of the Reagan supply-side tax cuts "has been to enlarge future deficits." These deficits contribute to high interest rates, which dampen business investment and economic growth, the study notes.

Skyrocketing deficits also force choices of either reducing social programs, cutting military spending plans, increasing taxes, or a combination of these, it points out.

As for the question of fairness, it says the Reagan program not only aids the affluent at the expense of the poor and working poor, but also widens the gulf between richer and poorer regions of the nation.

Contrary to stated goals, the Administration's cuts in such income-related programs as welfare and food stamps "create major work disincentives for the near-poor and working poor," increasing their "vulnerability to economic dependency."

Regionally, the study says Reagan's tax and budget policies, combined with military spending increases which are "concentrated mainly in a few areas," will widen the economic gap between the richer Sunbelt states of the West and Southwest and the high unemployment Frostbelt states, especially the Midwest.

Conservatives tied to world's economic ills

Brighton, England—Western industrial democracies are in economic crisis and the brunt of that crisis is being borne by working people, AFL-CIO Vice President John J. Sweeney told delegates to the 114th convention of the British Trades Union Congress here.

"Inflation, unemployment, high interest rates, and low economic growth are endemic to nearly every western democracy," said Sweeney, a fraternal delegate to the meeting representing the American labor movement.

In Britain and the United States, Sweeney observed, much of the economic difficulty can be traced to conservatives "armed with theories which they confidently promised would lead us to recovery and prosperity."

Disastrous result

"I leave it to you to assess the consequences of your government's policies," said Sweeney, who is president of the Service Employees. "As for the United States, the consequences have been disastrous."

A jobless rate of nearly 10 percent, underutilized factory operating capacity, mounting business failures, and falling profits make clear the message, Sweeney declared:

"Trickle-down economic theory—with its reliance on the magic of the free market and massive tax cuts for the wealthy—has not worked in my country any better than it has in yours."

Under the Thatcher Conservative Party government, unemployment in Britain has soared to 12.7 percent of the workforce, with more than 3 million workers out of jobs, the highest number since the height of the Great Depression in 1932.

Dignity of work

Speaking on Labor Day in the United States, "the one day in the year when the entire nation stops and celebrates the importance of working people," Sweeney stressed the dignity that work brings, and bringing dignity to humankind is what unions are all about, he observed.

Labor's interest in human dignity extends beyond national borders, Sweeney noted. Common bonds unite working people, and the needs of workers are the same no matter what the political or economic system.

While hospital workers were walking picket lines in England, their American cousins were doing the same at hospitals all across the United States, he said.

"The one lesson that both our movements have learned over these years is the one being learned by workers all over the world—the struggle never ends," he said.

"We in the free trade union movement support the struggles of workers wherever they are—in Great Britain or the United States, in Poland or South Africa, in El Salvador or Northern Ireland," Sweeney declared.

Salvador killings detailed, judge's decision denounced to the world that it has both the desire and the ability to control the right-wing death squads that have murdered not only our American trade unionists but thousands of innocent Salvadoran citizens as well. This is the first time that military officers have been unequivocally implicated in the murders."

Investigation of the killings has been painstakingly slow and shrouded in secrecy largely because of El Salvador's tangled judicial system and also because of the involvement of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the State Dept.

Hammer, an expert on agrarian affairs, went to strife-ridden El Salvador the day he was killed to assure Viera that he had the full support of the AFL-CIO in carrying out the country's land redistribution program.

During Christmas 1980, Viera had voiced concern to Americans about the pressures on him to quit his government job because of bitter political opposition. Pearlman, a consultant to AIFLD, was in the country to work on new regulations for implementing the agrarian reforms.

According to AIFLD, the night of the murders Lopez drove to the home of businessman Christ and the two of them later got in touch with Capt. Avila, whose uncle is a ranking figure on the Salvadoran Supreme Court. Lopez was accompanied by Dimas, his bodyguard.

Court testimony revealed that Lopez and Christ, their wives, and Avila went to the coffee shop of the Sheraton Hotel in San Salvador, where Viera, Hammer, and Pearlman later showed up also. Because the coffee shop was crowded, the three labor officials took a waiter's advice to go instead to the hotel restaurant nearby.

Avila told investigators Christ muttered a curse about Viera, got up and followed the three men into the restaurant to see where they were seated. Testimony revealed that after 11 p.m., Lopez, Avila and Christ went into the hotel parking lot, where Lopez told Dimas: "You are going to kill them." Lopez then ordered Gomez, the bodyguard of Maj. Mario Denis Moran, a National Guard officer, to help Dimas carry out the "job."

When Moran's bodyguard demurred, saying he was working for the major, Lopez walked back into the hotel, and returned moments later to say that Moran had said it was all right for Gomez to assist Dimas. Moran has denied giving such approval and has not been directly implicated in the murders.

Lopez gave a gun to Gomez, while Avila gave one to Dimas, testimony showed. The corporals told the court that Christ then led the two gunmen into the restaurant, and pointed out the victims.

Southern Labor School slates El Paso sessions

The 1982 AFL-CIO Southern Labor School will be held Nov. 14-16 in El Paso, Tex.

The school, sponsored by the federation's Dept. of Education, is designed for full-time state and local central labor body staff members and full-time national and international union representatives in Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas and Virginia.

Discussion topics will include the impact of the results of the 1982 elections on labor, immigration problems, civil rights, the erosion of safety and health protections, an analysis of the Reagan Administration's policies, new industry in the South and Southwest and legislative issues.

Details are available from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006, Tel. 202-637-5146.

Panel widens union rights in OSHA cases

A federal review commission has widened the right of unions to intervene in settlements made by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration on employer violations.

The OSHA Review Commission ruled in a 2-to-1 decision that the Allied Industrial Workers could present evidence and have its objections heard on an OSHA settlement with Whirlpool Corp.

In welcoming the decision, AIW Safety Director Milan Racic noted that it "broadens the grounds" for unions to intervene in OSHA cases.

Earlier commission rulings, Racic observed, had permitted unions to intervene in settlements only on matters involving the amount of time an employer is given to correct a violation.

The new decision upholds an administrative law judge's ruling that a union can contest any part of an OSHA settlement, including the amount of the penalty and whether the settlement is appropriate for the violation.

Lung hazard

The case stems from a 1978 complaint filed by AIW Local 370 that workers at Whirlpool's plant in Fort Smith, Ark., were being exposed to excessive levels of TDI gas—toluene di-isocyanate—which causes severe irritation to workers' respiratory systems and is suspected of causing lung damage.

After receiving the findings of a hired consultant, OSHA agreed to a settlement with Whirlpool that reduced the violation against the company from "serious" to "other than serious."

The AIW, which intervened in the case, refused to sign the settlement and appealed to the review commission.

In filing the appeal, AIW asked OSHA to release information from the consultant's findings. OSHA refused, claiming the information was confidential.

In its order, the review commission sent the case back to the administrative law judge to consider the union's request for the information and other objections, as well as for a determination on whether to overturn the settlement.

Ruling in favor of the union's position were Commissioners Timothy F. Cleary and Bertram R. Cottine. Chairman Robert A. Rowland dissented.

Bargaining order scores hospital on union-busting

Milwaukee—Management at St. Francis Hospital here has been ordered to bargain with a unit of the Federation of Nurses & Health Professionals, after a three-member panel of the National Labor Relations Board in Washington upheld an NLRB administrative law judge's finding of numerous labor law violations by the hospital.

The union, a division of the American Federation of Teachers, had lost a representation election Oct. 26, 1979, by five votes. In the campaign, the hospital hired the management consulting firm of Modern Management, Inc.

An NLRB administrative law judge found that the loss was due to numerous anti-union tactics by the hospital, including promises of benefits to employees to encourage them to vote against the union, interrogation of employees, and threatening pro-union workers. The judge ordered the hospital to recognize and bargain with the union.

"From the very day that the union filed its election petition with the board's regional office," the NLRB said, "the hospital embarked upon a course of retaliatory unfair labor practices . . . (a) course of unlawful conduct designed and calculated to erode union support."

$5 million pay award hits HoJo

The Howard Johnson restaurant chain has agreed to repay more than $5 million it chiseled from workers by violating overtime pay provisions of the wage-hour law.

The settlement came in a consent judgment issued by the U.S. District Court in Massachusetts against the company's Howard Johnson's and Ground Round restaurants.

The suit, filed by the Labor Dept. during the Carter Administration in 1980, charged that the violations occurred at 900 restaurants around the country dating back to 1977.

More than 5,000 current and former workers whom the company classified as "assistant managers" and "management trainess," who earned less than $250 a week or were paid hourly wages are due the back pay.

The consent decree, signed by Federal Judge Walter J. Skinner, prohibits the company from further overtime and record-keeping violations under the Fair Labor Standards Act. Skinner also ordered the company to pay the Labor Dept.'s litigation costs.

The law requires the payment of overtime wage rates for all hours worked beyond 40 during any workweek.

The Labor Dept. described the $5 million back pay settlement as one of the largest on record.

Vice President John C. Kenneally of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees said the wage-hour violations would not likely have occurred if Howard Johnson's workers were better organized. Describing the company as having a long record of anti-unionism, Kenneally said that fewer than 5 percent of its establishments are under union contracts.

Howard Johnson's is a subsidiary of a British-based international conglomerate, Imperial Group.

10.1% joblessness tied to Reagan

AFL-CIO President Kirkland tells jobs rally 10.1 percent unemployment is the "price of Reaganomics."

Double-digit rate highest since 1940

By James M. Shevis

Organized labor and its allies called for emergency legislation to put America back to work and for the election of a new Congress Nov. 2 to curb the Administration's "economic madness" as the nation's unemployment rate hit 10.1 percent with nearly 11.3 million people out of work.

The jobless rate in September was at its highest peak since 1940. Not since the country was emerging from the Great Depression have there been so many Americans out of work.

"These tragic figures reflect the terrible price of Reaganomics," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged. "They should surprise no one.

"Double-digit unemployment is the expected, inevitable result of the policies the Administration has pursued in defiance of reason and in disregard of human suffering since the day it took office."

Protest rally

It is not as though there is no work to be done, Kirkland told a Lafayette Park rally across the street from the White House. Noting that the nation's bridges and highways are crumbling, its dams and sewage systems aging, and its railroad track beds and mass transit systems deteriorating, Kirkland declared:

"There is plenty of work to be done—and plenty who want to work. But as the misery mounts, we are told to 'stay the course.'

"We say: No. Change the course."

"Our challenge is clear," Kirkland said. "We must elect a new Congress, a Congress that will look out into the real world, and address the nation's need for jobs now."

Other speakers representing the elderly, civil rights, labor, religious and student groups joined Kirkland at the rally in denouncing the high unemployment as a national disgrace. The groups belong to the Full Employment Action Council, chaired

Solidarity ban

Kirkland calls on U.S. to halt Polish credits

The AFL-CIO renewed its demand that the U.S. government declare Poland in default of its debts for outlawing that country's free trade union, Solidarity.

Federation President Lane Kirkland, who also urged an end to the flow of credit to the Soviet Union and its other East bloc satellites, said the Polish government "has broken its solemn compact with the Polish people" in suppressing the free trade union movement.

"By replacing Solidarnosc (Solidarity) with a fragmented local union structure, with no national center, the Polish government has laid bare its intention of depriving Poland's workers of any voice in the nation's economic and political life," Kirkland said. "It has thus taken Poland another step down the road to social misery and chaos."

Broken commitment

A government which breaks its solemn commitment to its own population cannot be trusted to honor its commitments to its foreign creditors, Kirkland declared.

Later, on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation," Kirkland said a U.S. halt of credits is "the only way I know of to stop this constant financing of the Eastern bloc, the financing of the buildup of military power, and the enforcement of police-state measures."

"We're financing it as it stands now," he said. "Western banks are pouring credits into Eastern Europe at favorable rates of interest."

The outlawing of Solidarity Oct. 8 by Poland's parliament sparked strikes by thousands of angry Polish workers at shipyards in Gdansk, where the independent trade union sprang into life in August 1980, as well as in Wroclaw and the Krakow suburb of Nowa Huta. Workers in Gdansk chanted, "free Lech," a reference to Solidarity's imprisoned leader, Lech Walesa; "Solidarity, Solidarity," and "Pope, Pope, Pope." Polish-born Pope John Paul II has followed events in his native land closely, and has planned a visit there.

The law passed by the Polish parliament banishes all trade unions formed before 1982, sharply restricts the ability of any new unions to conduct strikes, and effectively bars broad-based trade unions representing workers from many different industries.

In a radio address to the nation Oct. 9, President Reagan condemned the ban as an "outrage" and announced steps to suspend Poland's "most-favored nation" trading status. The suspension will increase

OSHA hit for plan to narrow access to data

By John R. Oravec

A 1980 federal standard giving workers and unions the right of access to data on exposure to toxic substances and medical records kept by employers should be broadened, not narrowed as the Occupational Safety & Health Administration proposes, the AFL-CIO said.

Testifying at OSHA hearings, federation Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor warned that the proposed modifications would sharply reduce coverage and the scope of the access rule, with millions of workers being stripped of protections and regulations dropped on some 35,000 dangerous substances.

"There is no evidence supporting the modifications and restrictions proposed by OSHA," Taylor charged. "The only outcome of these changes will be to diminish worker protection."

Even though OSHA's experience over the past two years shows that the standard is feasible and workable, Taylor said, the federal job safety agency's motivation for the changes is based on complaints of "a

Fear, anguish described

Gates closing on older workers

Unemployment among older workers is rising faster than among younger age groups, and union witnesses told the House Select Committee on Aging what that statistic means in terms of people's lives.

A committee report noted that a rising tide of plant closings is wiping out the jobs of older workers whose seniority had spared them from earlier layoffs.

Unemployment among workers 55 and over has jumped 24 percent since January, the report noted, and is at a postwar high of 771,000. Some 1.7 million workers 45 and older are unemployed, with hundreds of thousands of others not counted because they gave up a futile work search in discouragement.

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride told the committee, headed by Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), of the "anguish" of older workers who face "the very real prospect of never being called back."

The permanent damage that has been done to the steel industry is far deeper than the cyclical periods of layoffs and recalls that workers experienced in the past, McBride stressed. The newly unemployed older workers must re-enter the job market to "compete with younger workers for a dwindling supply of jobs."

Harsh impact

Ron Friess, president of USWA Local 1212, which represents workers at the doomed Midland, Pa., plant of Crucible Steel Co., gave the committee a first-hand account of the plant closing impact.

The Crucible plant, which just a year ago employed nearly 5,000 workers, has been the community's principal employer and the mainstay of its tax base. Those who lost their jobs in earlier waves of layoffs are still largely unemployed. There is virtually no hope of jobs for those now becoming unemployed.

A section of the committee report noted also that older workers who do find other employment normally take a bigger pay cut in their new jobs than do younger workers. They are also out of work longer, with the duration of their unemployment averaging 23 percent above that of the workforce average.

McBride said the economic program the Reagan Administration has followed is "sapping the strength and morale of the nation."

He cited the vast backlog of "work that needs to be done" to repair and rebuild roads, ports, railways, airports, bridges, waterways and other deteriorated national resources.

"I know of no better time to begin rebuilding the infrastructure than now when we have so many idle but willing hands," McBride urged.

"What will be a burden later is an opportunity now," he stressed.

Kirkland cites federal role in progress

Hanover, N.H.—America's unions look on government as a vehicle for progress, not as the burden perceived by the Reagan Administration, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told a Dartmouth College audience.

Kirkland explained why in an address to more than 2,000 students, faculty and union members assembled at Dartmouth's Thompson Arena.

He spoke of "the filters of experience" that color his generation's view of the problems of today, and drew a picture of America before the New Deal, "when the federal presence was remote . . . and what business wanted, business got."

Before social security, there were county poorhouses. Communities were isolated by unpaved roads, farmhouses were lit by kerosene, and diseases of the poor were endemic until the federal government "got on our backs," Kirkland recalled.

Erosion wasted large tracts of America until federal programs "restored the land for the ultimate benefit of private industry as well as society at large," he pointed out.

Social revolutions

And democratic government steered the nation through social revolutions that bridged the gap "from a not-too-distant day of local lynch law and a pattern of racial apartheid every bit as brutal as that of South Africa."

Kirkland's address to a collegewide audience, and to a number of trade unionists from nearby New Hampshire and Vermont communities who came to hear him, was the centerpiece of a two-day participation in Dartmouth activities under a fellowship program established by the Dartmouth Class of 1930.

Kirkland spoke and answered questions in classrooms and seminars, at informal gatherings—and in a breakfast session with college employees arranged by the Service Employees local that represents them.

In his Thompson Arena address, Kirkland noted the parallel between the Hoover Administration that held office when the Class of 1930 left college and the Reagan Administration of the present day.

Then, too, he noted, "the man in the White House argued, with the most persuasive sincerity, that recovery was just around the corner if we but held the course and gave him more time at the helm." And then too, he said, people in both parties were advocating balanced budgets, reduced spending and lower taxes as "sure-fire cures for the nation's ills."

Concern on human affairs

Kirkland addressed with special concern what he termed "the central, enduring issue" of the times, "the dual nature of the state in human affairs."

A totalitarian state, unchecked, becomes "a deadly engine of oppression . . . a vortex sweeping hordes to concentration camps or Gulags," he said.

But when "held within democratic bounds by free citizens," the state "is the indispensable instrument of human progress."

It is not the function of the state to impose a "rigid view of appropriate patterns of private behavior," Kirkland said, although that is "an urge that Marxists-Leninists share with the apostles of Sen. Jesse Helms and the self-designated Moral Majority."

He suggested that defining the proper bounds of state power, in this country and abroad, is "the central task of this era" and one in which the trade union movement is deeply involved.

Democracy's strength

The strength of democracy is not that people can't be wrong or that voters always make the wisest decisions, Kirkland stressed. "Rather, the saving grace is that the process is self-correcting over time. There is always another chance, and no proposition can long escape the test of lively opposition."

Lane Kirkland addresses Dartmouth audience. At left is the chairman of college's trustees, Richard D. Hill, and at right, Prof. John H. Copenhaver, Jr., of the committee that brought Kirkland to the campus.

These safeguards, he said, make possible the advocacy of governmental authority for constructive goals. The labor movement is equally committed "to steadfast resistance to the abuse of state power and the vigorous advocacy of democratic solutions to our national problems through political and legislative action."

Kirkland spoke of the trade union movement's accomplishments through collective bargaining and through legislative endeavors—in terms of a better life for America's workers, and "the democratization of privilege"—the opportunities for education, travel, health care and "other advantages for centuries reserved to the few."

He spoke of the peril of the weakening of this country's industrial base and urged "the cooperation of labor, management and government in the development and execution of a sound national industrial policy."

America's youth, he suggested, must have "brighter prospects than employment in the servicing of Atari games or the dispensing of junk food."

He spoke of the tasks still to be done, among them the full achievement of equal rights for women and the repair of the nation's decaying infrastructure. "Must rotten bridges collapse under loaded school buses before work can begin?" he asked.

Gompers's credo

Kirkland read to the gathering what Samuel Gompers, the founding president of the American Federation of Labor, had expressed as labor's goals.

Not just "more" as is commonly quoted, Kirkland stressed, but "more schoolhouses and less jails . . . more constant work and less crime . . . more justice and less revenge."

As the audience, which had punctuated his speech with applause rose in an ovation, Kirkland concluded, "On that, I am willing to stand."

Viewing events through 'filters of experience'

Following is the text of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's remarks at Dartmouth College, Hanover, N.H., Oct. 4, 1982.

I have been graciously invited here through the providence of the Dartmouth Class of 1930, a class that sallied forth to a world of harsher lessons than any conveyed to them in these halls.

As we stand today on eroding economic ground, edging toward a chasm whose distance and depth we cannot reckon, I shall not resist the temptation to draw certain parallels. The invitation did, after all, suggest that it would be in order for me to foretell the past and reminisce about the future.

Recently, following a lengthy meeting with then-Secretary of State Haig, I was asked by a reporter if I had learned anything new. I replied that I have learned nothing new about the world since the Great Depression, Munich, the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact, and Pearl Harbor.

Price of experience

I was not being facetious, but simply using verbal shorthand to describe the filters of experience through which I am obliged to view events. If that is a crippling affliction of myself or my generation, be not proud. You will get yours, I pray at a lesser price.

Today, among journalists, politicians, businessmen and ordinary folk, there seems to be an obsession to perceive events long before they transpire. Political and economic soothsayers prosper and thousands of lovely trees are felled each day for the paper on which their divinations are inscribed. The coming dimensions of the money supply, the ever-receding arrival date of "recovery," the prospective turnover of congressional seats, and many other lines of inquiry reveal the degree of our impatience with the future.

The one forbidden answer for those who traffic in these matters is, unfortunately, the only correct one: "I do not know." Some may believe that to wise and knowledgeable souls coming events have a higher level of visibility and inevitability than that, but the record strongly suggests otherwise. Of the shattering events after 1930 that shaped our destiny, none was anticipated or even regarded as possible by the general wisdom.

Parallel of the '30s

Nineteen-thirty was a year, like today, when the man in the White House argued, with the most persuasive sincerity, that recovery was just around the corner if we but held the course and gave him more time at the helm. Candidates for the presidency from both major parties were about to run on platforms calling for balanced budgets, reduced spending and lower taxes as the sure-fire cures for the nation's ills.

The infallible pundit of the day, Walter Lippmann, was soon to write that Mr. Hitler was a reasonable man; that his needs and aims were limited and modest, and would surely be satisfied by the Sudetenland.

You can look it up.

Nazism and communism were, as all but fools knew, so antithetical that any notion that they might join in fraternal amity to draw and quarter Poland was inconceivable. And, of course, Japan was so notorious for shoddy goods as to be incapable of building a battleship that did not capsize on launching.

The point of all this is that nothing in the conventional wisdom, no shadow in the crystal balls of the day, no element of the dogma or doctrine of national leadership prepared the nation for its ordeal.

I suggest that there has been no real change in that essential circumstance. Yesterday, today and tomorrow, administrations are overtaken and driven by events outside their design, events which figure not at all in their campaigns for office.

Lyndon Johnson had his Vietnam; Richard Nixon his Watergate; Jimmy Carter his Khomeini; and Ronald Reagan should—but doubtless will not—profit by their example. Yet the judgment of history rests, not upon the design but the response to the trespass of reality.

My doubts arise not only because this Administration has shown no capacity to anticipate events, but because it misrepresents events that have long since transpired and are on the record.

In the case of his budget deficits, the President seeks scapegoats in the past. Yet, in fact, during the last years of the Johnson Administration, economic debate revolved around an emerging issue then termed "fiscal drag"—that is to say, the consequences foreseen of a mounting federal surplus that most economists then projected. The Heller-Pechman plan for revenue-sharing with the states was mainly a response to that concern.

And does no one remember that just two and one-half years ago, in the spring of 1980, Jimmy Carter sent to Capitol Hill a balanced federal budget?

Assessing the blame

President Reagan would have you believe that the financial problem currently facing the social security system is the product of past Democratic profligacy on behalf of the undeserving poor and elderly. Yet, in fact, the problem stems from a plan designed by conservative Republicans during the Nixon Administration—congressmen such as Byrnes of Wisconsin and Conable of New York—to limit statutory benefit increases and remove the issue from politics by the adoption of an annual automatic cost-of-living increase formula. That step, coupled with unemployment, gave rise to the problem that we must now proceed to solve.

Administration spokesmen continue to spread the smoke screen of free trade rhetoric, while our international competitors steal our industries and markets and close their own through the practice of rampant mercantilism.

While Western banks continue to finance Soviet arms and adventures and flagless corporations expose the soft underbelly of freedom to our adversaries, the President clings to the quaint notion that the issue between East and West is not the human rights of plain people, but Free Enterprise versus Communism.

Economic peril is not obsolete. Neither safety nets nor sophisticated computer models render us immune from the prospect faced by the Class of 1930.

Reagan's deficits

Economic mythomania of the kind that has now given voodoo a bad name, that has stripped the public coffers and brought a deficit that will exceed in Reagan's four years that of the previous twenty, may yet exact its full prcie.

Is there really any reason to safely assume that a Drysdale or a Penn Square are singular aberrations from the business norm, when note is taken of the august institutions which catered to their madness or their infidelity?

Could not a Drysdale doubled, or a Penn Square squared, trigger the kind of mindless panic that aborts transactions and wipes out values and concepts of values?

In such a case, mere facts and figures, whether from a computer or an abacus, point no sure road to salvation. Then one may begin to see the truth in Chesterton's claim that it is not poets, but mathematicians, who end up in madhouses.

If an impression can be drawn from the first two of these Reagan years, it is that

Steelworkers, industry press dumping curb

The Steelworkers and the U.S. specialty steel industry made an urgent appeal to President Reagan to use his authority to curb the dumping of illegally subsidized specialty steel imports into the United States.

Following a press conference, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, officials of local unions and top officials of the specialty steel industry marched together to the White House to deliver a letter to Reagan.

The joint union-industry letter said the nation's specialty steel companies and their jobless workers cannot afford further delay by the government in enforcing international trade agreements to stem the growing influx of specialty steel products.

The letter noted that unemployment in some specialty steel companies, which produced such high-tolerance products as stainless and tool steel, has soared to more than 50 percent.

The letter also requested a meeting with the President and noted that the dumping problem has become far worse than when union and industry officials requested meetings last spring to no avail.

Complaints justified

Last December, the union and the industry filed a joint complaint charging illegal subsidies of imports against six European countries. Although the U.S. International Trade Commission found the complaints to be justified, the Commerce Dept. so far has delayed taking the necessary follow-through action.

At the Oct. 7 news conference, McBride announced that Britain had been added to the list of countervailing duty complaints because of allegedly illegally subsidized exports of flat rolled stainless steel.

McBride said that on Oct. 15, specialty steel mills around the country would blow their whistles to bring public attention to "workers denied jobs through no fault of their own, but through unfair imports."

On that "national day of mourning," McBride said a specialty steel plant in Midland, Pa., formerly employing 5,000 men and women, is set to shut down. "We are asking churches in our plant communities to toll their bells," he said.

Steel dumping assailed

Labor-industry appeal is made to President Reagan to curb the dumping of illegally subsidized steel in U.S. markets. President Lloyd McBride of the Steelworkers and Adolph J. Lena, left, of the Specialty Steel coalition delivered the message to the White House following a press conference.

ILO chemical parley stresses right to establish true unions

Geneva—Frank D. Martino, president of the Chemical Workers, hailed as a "marvelous breakthrough" the clear distinction won at the International Labor Organization between free and independent trade unions and the so-called workers' representatives who often serve as government or company stooges.

Martino noted at the close of a ten-day session of the ILO's chemical industries committee that the victory was achieved in a unanimous resolution affirming the right of chemical workers "to be represented by freely elected, independent and democratic unions of their own choosing."

The worker, employer and government delegates of 21 industrialized and developing countries confirmed in the resolution workers are entitled to establish such unions "without influence and interference" by governments or management, whether of state-owned or private enterprises.

The insistence that the term "trade unions" be used in the conference's documents instead of only "workers' representatives" was needed to provide a "very serious distinction" between the West's free labor unions and those controlled by governments, as in the communist countries, or by corporations, Martino said.

He and Lewis C. Moore, vice president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, were the worker members of the U.S. delegation. Frank Lunney, international affairs director of the Steelworkers, completed the AFL-CIO team as an adviser.

Key development

Lunney concurred with Martino in viewing the recognition of the need for free trade unions as the "most important outcome of the session."

The adoption of the resolution on the issue of free trade unions was at the same time an "automatic rejection of company unions, yellow unions and unions dominated by governments or companies," Lunney said.

Strong employer objections to the distinction drawn between free trade unions and "workers' representatives" had to be overcome in the conference's committee on industrial relations, where the main battle was fought. Martino helped chart the strategy of the free workers as a member of this committee.

Employer opposition to the stand of trade unionists was weaker in the conference's committee that dealt with manpower training for the chemical industries in the developing countries, Moore reported.

Moore, who served on this committee, said there was less confrontation because the employers appreciated that their contributions to manpower training "benefit them as well by assuring more efficient operation of their plants."

The worker delegates, Moore said, emphasized the need for multinationals that operate in the Third World to give the same importance to the training of workers in the areas of safety and health as to making them more productive.

Martin J. Ward dies at 64, led Plumbers, Pipe Fitters

Martin J. Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters since 1971 and an AFL-CIO vice president for the past decade, died Oct. 9 after a heart attack.

Ward, who was 64, also had been an adviser to the U.S. worker representative to the International Labor Organization since 1974 and served as chairman of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's standing committee on international affairs.

Ward developed a deep interest in international labor matters as he rose through the ranks of his union—the United Association of Journeymen & Apprentices of the Plumbing & Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States & Canada—known among its members as the UA.

"In the far-flung parts of the world, generations of workers yet unborn will fare a little better because Marty gave so unstintingly of himself in pursuit of free trade unionism," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

"In the UA, in the federation and in unions around the globe, Marty's work will truly live after him," Kirkland and Donahue said. "No one could have a better eulogy."

Ward was born into the piping trades, beginning his apprenticeship in 1937 with the same UA Local 597 in his native Chicago in which his father was a journeyman fitter. Ward became a journeyman in 1942. He served in the Navy during World War II.

After returning to his trade, Ward served as an apprentice instructor and later became business representative of Local 597. He became assistant business manager in 1952 and business manager of the local in 1952.

The UA elected him assistant secretary-treasurer in 1958 and its secretary-treasurer in 1966. He was appointed assistant president in 1969.

The union's executive board made Ward acting president in June 1971, and he was unanimously elected president at the UA convention in August of that year.

Ward also has served since 1971 as a vice president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades and Industrial Union Departments.

Among his numerous Executive Council assignments, Ward served on the COPE operating committee, economic policy committee, housing committee and civil rights committee. He also was on the boards of trustees of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, African-American Labor Center, Asian-American Free Labor Institute, Human Resources Development Institute and the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust.

Survivors include his wife, Winifred, seven sons and nine grandchildren. A funeral mass was said Oct. 13 at St. Matthew's Cathedral in Washington, and burial was at the Gate of Heaven Cemetery in Silver Spring, Md.

The UA executive board was to meet shortly to select a successor. Ward's term would have expired in 1986.

Auto Workers resume talks with Chrysler

Detroit—The Auto Workers and the Chrysler Corp. agreed to meet Oct. 15 to resume talks on a new contract covering the firm's 45,000 production workers.

Unofficial results of the union's rank-and-file ratification vote on a tentative agreement reached Sept. 16 showed UAW members rejecting its terms by a vote of about two to one. Balloting was scheduled to end Oct. 14.

The proposed contract would have restored cost-of-living adjustments Chrysler workers gave up last year to help the company solve its financial problems. It also called for quarterly wage bonuses through next summer if Chrysler were profitable enough. But UAW members, who have not had a raise for nearly two years, wanted an immediate wage increase.

'Clear message'

UAW President Douglas Fraser told a news conference here: "It should be apparent to Chrysler that the economic provisions of the agreement aren't up to workers' expectations. That message is clear."

The UAW summoned its national Chrysler bargaining committee—nine representatives of the rank and file and the presidents of its 54 U.S. Chrysler locals—to meetings before the opening of new talks to lay strategy.

Meanwhile, the union continued its strike against the Caterpillar Tractor Co., where talks involving 36,000 workers broke down. Negotiations continued between the union and John Deere & Co., involving 29,000 employees. Contracts with both companies expired Sept. 30. The union agreed to extend the agreement indefinitely with Deere while bargaining proceeds. In the Caterpillar negotiations, the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has scheduled a new meeting Oct. 27.

In other bargaining, UAW members ratified a new early contract with Rockwell International, covering some 5,200 workers at 10 plants in six states.

Endorsements focus of Vermont state convention

Burlington, Vt.—Delegates to the 28th annual convention of the Vermont State AFL-CIO endorsed candidates in this fall's elections and drew up an agenda for the coming year.

For the U.S. Senate, the convention endorsed Democrat James Guest. For the House of Representatives, the 100 delegates gave their backing to Democrat Mark Kaplan. Democrat Madeleine Kunin was favored for governor and Republican Peter Smith received endorsement for lieutenant governor.

Speakers at the three-day meeting included retired national COPE director Al Barkan; President Joyce Miller of the Coalition of Labor Union Women; James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; Pat Porter of the Committee for a Secure Israel; Frank Myers, assistant director of AFL-CIO Region VII, and author Studs Terkel.

Richard Gammell, president of Steelworkers Local 5518, was elected to the post of executive committeeman at large. Marian Pierce, who had held the office the past 14 years, retired this summer. She was presented a plaque by State AFL-CIO President Robert E. Clark. Regional COPE Director Madeline Matchko presented her a watch and pin in recognition of her volunteer time to COPE.

Among the resolutions approved by the convention were measures calling for an equal rights amendment to the Vermont constitution; support for the Vermont Coalition for Health, a labor-business group formed to hold down health care costs, and support for improvements in the state workers' compensation law.

'We shall win!'

Poles demonstrate in support of the Solidarity trade union in the old town section of Gdansk, the birthplace of the independent labor organization, and in protest against the government's new trade union law which effectively outlaws Solidarity. The banner set on a barricade bore the legend, "Solidarity—we shall win."

Double-digit jobless rate decried as 'terrible price' of Reaganomics

by Clothing & Textile Workers President Murray H. Finley and President Coretta Scott King of the Martin Luther King, Jr. Center for Nonviolent Social Change.

King told the assembly that Reagan's extremist, conservative economic policies are setting new records not just in the numbers of unemployed, but also in the number of home mortgage foreclosures, business and bank failures, and in the size of the federal budget deficit. She said the coalition is determined to press Congress for an emergency jobs-creation bill.

President Dorothy Ridings of the League of Women Voters, saying "we refuse to accept the Administration's excuses for its continuing disregard for human suffering," called for a long-term plan to get Americans working again, millions of them women forced to work because of deteriorating economic conditions.

Auxiliary Bishop Eugene Marino of the Catholic Archdiocese of Washington said America cannot afford the destructive impact that joblessness has had on families nor other social costs of continued high unemployment such as rising crime, infant mortality, disease, and suicide rates.

Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Washington office of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, observed that "despite what President Reagan believes, God has not ordained supply-side economics." He said economic programs are man-made inventions, and Reagan's have "failed utterly" to advance America's best interests.

Spreading joblessness

For vast numbers of American workers, double-digit unemployment is nothing new. Twelve states and 72 major metropolitan areas have experienced joblessness of 10 percent or more for at least three months. Among black workers, the unemployment rate is a record 20.2 percent, a rise of 1.4 percent in September alone.

Joblessness among blue-collar workers rose also by 1.4 percent to 15.6 percent last month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said in its monthly report on employment and unemployment. Among major industry groups, jobless rates for construction workers jumped 2.3 percent to 22.6 percent and 1.7 percent to 13.8 percent for factory workers. The rate for service workers inched up from 10.6 to 10.7 percent.

As Kirkland noted, the official government figures badly understate the facts. BLS reports but does not count among the unemployed the 1.6-million so-called "discouraged" workers who have given up searching for jobs that do not exist. It also ignores the fact that 6.9 million of those it counts as fully employed are working only part time because full-time jobs are not to be had.

"Adding the first group and half of the second to the official total of 11.3 million unemployed gives a total of 16.3 million jobs that are needed," Kirkland said. "The true unemployment rate is not 10.1 percent. It is 14.5 percent."

Using just the official statistics, the 11,260,000 people out of work last month was an increase of 450,000 since August and more than 3 million in the last 12 months. The increase pushed the September jobless rate to its highest point since the 14.6 percent recorded for the year 1940. Last month's 10.1 percent rate compares to 9.8 percent in both July and August.

Adults hit hard

While all sectors of the labor force have suffered from the Reagan Recession that began in July 1981, adult males have been hit particularly hard. Their rate of joblessness climbed from 8.9 to 9.6 percent in September. The latest BLS report also shows that more than 60 percent of those without work last month were over 25 years of age. Three years earlier, when the overall jobless rate was 5.8 percent, those over 25 accounted for only half the total.

Among black men, the unemployment rate has climbed from 12.7 to 19.8 percent since the recession began 15 months ago. Among white workers, the jobless rate has risen from 5 to 8.6 percent over that period.

Faces at Washington jobs rally reflect anxiety over double-digit unemployment.

In testimony before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood noted that manufacturing has been set back sharply by the recession, with durables industries such as autos and machinery especially hampered by high interest rates.

The service-producing sector of the economy, which employs about three of every four American workers, is generally less affected by economic downturns than the goods-producing sector, Norwood observed. Even so, service sector payrolls have declined by about 190,000 jobs since July 1981. And retail trade employment, which usually expands in September, dropped by about 45,000 jobs last month.

"There has been a weakening in employment on almost every front and there are a number of signs that are quite worrying," Norwood said. One of these worrisome indicators was a further decline in the length of the average factory work week, which dropped four-tenths of an hour to 38.6 hours in September, the second monthly decline in a row.

The factory work week, which is now below the 1973-75 recession level, is discouraging for what it has to say about possible future trends, Norwood said. Businesses usually begin to add hours to their work week before adding employees, as they gear up for increased production.

Reaction brisk

Following announcement of the official government figures on unemployment, demonstrators gathered at Lafayette Park for the Join Hands for Jobs rally sponsored by the Full Employment Action Council. President Howard D. Samuel of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., who is secretary-treasurer of the council, introduced the first speaker, council cochairperson King, with each speaker in turn introducing the next "witness" to the tragic toll of high joblessness on American society.

Speakers included Stephen Brobeck, director of Consumer Federation of America; Jacob Clayman, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens; Craig Livingstone, vice president of the U.S. Student Association; Leon Shull, executive director of Americans for Democratic Action; Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP; Mine Workers President Sam Church, Jr.; Dr. John R. Houck, general secretary of the Lutheran Council in the U.S.A.; M. Carl Holman, president of the National Urban Coalition; Tony Bonilla, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens, and Service employees President John J. Sweeney.

Stiff sanctions urged against Polish rulers

tariffs on manufactured goods imported from Poland but will not have any immediate effect. The United States now takes only about 2 percent of Poland's total exports, State Dept. figures show.

While Reagan warned that he is "prepared to take further steps as a result of this further repression in Poland," Kirkland called the President's action "a relatively weak response to a situation that is of enormous importance."

Meanwhile, underground Solidarity leaders in Poland called for a four-hour nationwide strike on Nov. 10 to protest the ban on the union. In a statement signed by four Solidarity leaders, the union appealed to "all working people, no matter to which unions they belong, for a massive nationwide protest against lawlessness and poverty."

The statement called for the strike on the second anniversary of Solidarity's registration by a Warsaw court.

"Solidarity exists and will exist, no matter if someone likes it or not," said the statement, signed by members of the union's National Coordinating Commission.

Kirkland charged that the action outlawing Solidarity dissolution was a "blatant violation" of the International Labor Organization's Convention No. 87 guaranteeing freedom of association and pledged that the AFL-CIO, in cooperation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, would demand "an accounting by the Polish government at the ILO and in every international labor forum in which we participate."

Only legitimate voice

"We shall not waver in our support for Solidarnosc—the only legitimate voice of Poland's workers," Kirkland said.

In Geneva, where the ILO is headquartered, Director-General Francis Blanchard released the text of a cable sent Oct. 8 to the Polish military government charging that the new Polish law on trade unions is contrary to ILO Convention No. 87. Blanchard said the United Nations specialized agency would formulate its conclusions on the new law when its Governing Body and Freedom of Association Committee meet Nov. 7.

Solidarity's rapid rise two years ago to a mass organization of 9.5 million members was an attempt to introduce pluralist institutions into a totalitarian state. It was the first time that independent trade unions had been allowed to exist in a communist-ruled nation. Polish authorities suspended the union 10 months ago when they imposed martial law.

Hotel union picks Herman Leavitt to fill key vacancy

Los Angeles — Herman Leavitt was elected secretary-treasurer of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees at the union's executive board meeting here. He will serve the four remaining years of the term which became vacant when John Gibson retired in May.

Leavitt has been HERE organizing director since 1980. Earlier, he served as vice president at-large and administrative assistant to President Edward T. Hanley.

The HERE board chose Vice President Paul McCastland as the union's new organizing director and elected Alvero Gonzalez of Miami to the fourth district vice presidency left by McCastland. Gonzalez has been secretary-treasurer and business agent of Local 355 since 1979.

In other action, the board elected Florence Farr as third district vice president to succeed Herbert R. Triplett, who retired. Farr is secretary-treasurer of Local 24 in Detroit.

Toxic substances standard

OSHA scored on bid to curb access to data few employer groups that have never learned to live with the regulation."

The Chemical Manufacturers Association argued in its testimony that unions should not have the automatic right of access to employer-maintained records on worker exposure to toxic substances, contending that such access is subject to collective bargaining.

Taylor said the federation's prime concerns on OSHA's attempt to weaken the access rule focus on:

- Changing the definition of the terms "toxic substance and harmful physical agent," thereby narrowing the scope of covered chemicals from 39,000 to 3,500. If implemented, employers would no longer have to maintain records on 90 percent of the substances now classified as toxic or harmful.
- Excluding from coverage workers who are not directly involved in the manufacture, processing and handling of toxic materials, such as service and maintenance employees.
- Eliminating exposure and medical records dealing with chemical identity and biological monitoring.
- Reducing the time employers are required to retain exposure and medical records, particularly those of short-time employees and construction workers. Under the current rule, records must be kept for at least 30 years.
- Permitting employers to withhold the identity of certain chemicals they deem a trade secret. This means that employers would be given the sole authority to determine what is a trade secret.
- Restricting union access to records, a right recently upheld by the National Labor Relations Board in a decision being appealed by employers.

In urging the federal safety agency to leave the 1980 access rule intact, Taylor said "it is high time that OSHA under the Reagan Administration realizes that protection of workers—not business interests of employers—is the agency's primary responsibility."

Undermine gains

The National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health also took issue with the proposal to reduce record-keeping time. The change "could seriously undermine the improvement of the epidemiological base used to identify occupational illnesses and injuries," NIOSH said in its testimony.

NIOSH insisted that the current regulation does not impose an extra burden on most industries, stressing that the longer retention period for medical records is needed by researchers for studies on occupational diseases and illness.

Additional testimony opposing OSHA's proposal to weaken the access standard was delivered by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., Building & Construction Trades Dept., the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Auto Workers, Chemical Workers, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Paper Workers, Steelworkers, the State, County & Municipal Employees, Clothing & Textile Workers, and the Painters.

Salute to railroaders

Monument topped with a five-foot steam whistle is dedicated to railroad workers at Miller Park in Bloomington, Ill. Retired railroaders Harry Rhoads, 93, Railway Carmen; Joe Fellenz, Sr., 90, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Joe Penn, 84, Machinists, cut the ceremonial ribbon. The monument, adjacent to a retired steam locomotive, was built by the Bloomington-Normal AFL-CIO with a CETA grant. The whistle is a relic from the old Chicago & Alton Railroad shops that was used to signal shift changes.

Supreme Court thwarts challenge to agency shop

The Supreme Court refused to consider an appeal supported by the National Right to Work Committee that challenged a Minnesota law authorizing agency shop fees from public employees who choose not to join the unions that bargain for them.

Minnesota's highest court had upheld the obligation of a teacher to pay a "fair share fee" to a local of the American Federation of Teachers in lieu of dues. The unsuccessful appeal to the Supreme Court was based on an assertion that federal constitutional rights were infringed by the agency shop requirement.

Most of the initial actions of the Supreme Court, which began a new term after its summer recess, involved denial of review—which lets a lower court decision become final but does not of itself establish a precedent for future cases.

One of the more important denials of review also involved the Teachers—and the important labor issue of seniority rights in a contract covering public employees.

The Boston Teachers Union, supported by the parent AFT, had sought Supreme Court review of a federal judge's order that layoffs not reduce the percentage of minority teachers in the Boston school system and that black teachers be given absolute preference for recall until a 20 percent quota of black teachers is achieved.

AFT President Albert Shanker said he still hopes the Supreme Court will take up the issues involved by granting review to one of several similar cases now moving through the court system.

The union's concern, he stressed, is to protect "the integrity of our contracts and the time-proven system of color-blind, race-neutral seniority."

1,100 layoffs

The AFT noted that the layoff formula devised by the district court in Boston had resulted in the layoff of more than 1,100 tenured white teachers, some with as many as 18 years of seniority, while no tenured black teachers lost their jobs.

One potentially significant case was dismissed by the court—as most attorneys had expected—as "moot" or no longer of practical significance.

It involved an appeal by the National Organization for Women from a ruling by a federal district judge in Idaho that a state could rescind its ratification of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment any time before the amendment was ratified by the required three-fourths of the states. The ruling held also that Congress lacked the power to extend the time for ratification beyond the original seven-year deadline.

The Supreme Court vacated the lower court ruling, thus diminishing whatever influence it might have as a precedent.

The Supreme Court did agree to review an appellate court decision holding that employer payments to union health and welfare, pension and training funds are part of a worker's average weekly wage in the determination of death benefits under the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Compensation Act.

Both the Labor Dept. and the employer are challenging the interpretation of wages adopted by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Football bargaining resumes after agreement on mediator

Management representatives sat down at the bargaining table with striking National Football League players after agreeing to a private mediator to help resolve the sticky contract dispute.

Sam Kagel, a veteran mediator and arbitrator from San Francisco, accepted the task of bringing the two sides to productive face-to-face negotiations as the strike entered its fourth week. No negotiations had been held since Oct. 2.

Although owners had rejected all nine private mediators in a list proposed by the NFLPA, the management council acceded to the proposal of Kagel by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

NFLPA President Gene Upshaw and Executive Director Ed Garvey welcomed the selection of Kagel, who has served as an arbitrator in handling the union's grievance procedures.

However, Upshaw and Garvey cautioned against the assumption that the presence of a private mediator would automatically bring a settlement.

Start of talks

"We see this as the beginning of negotiations, not the end of the strike," they said. "We are hopeful that Sam Kagel will be able to get management to address the major issues so that rapid progress toward an agreement can be made."

A key issue in the dispute is the union's proposal for a wage scale funded largely by the league's television contract revenues, expected to bring owners $2.1 billion over five years.

Immediately after bringing the management council and union negotiators together for talks in the Baltimore suburb of Cockeysville, Kagel imposed a news blackout. Both sides have expressed a willingness to negotiate around the clock.

While the league announced the cancellation of games for the coming weekend, the union was making final preparations for the first in a series of all-star games Oct. 17 in Washington.

Barring a federal court injunction, the game will pit the league's National Conference eastern division against the American Conference eastern division. Team owners have sought to block the games through litigation.

The games will be televised nationally by Turner Broadcasting of Atlanta as well as 100 commercial stations around the country.

The western division of the NFC and AFC will play Monday night, Oct. 18, in Los Angeles. The union has drawn up plans for an 18-game series.

Stage Employees reach pact with Hollywood producers

Los Angeles—The Theatrical Stage Employees reached agreement with the Alliance of Motion Picture & Television Producers on a new contract providing for a 26.2-percent wage increase over three years.

The pact, which affects about 20,000 workers, must now be ratified at IATSE membership meetings through mail ballots within 10 days. The agreement came after IATSE announced that its members had voted 84 percent in favor of a strike.

IATSE represents industry employees who work behind the cameras, such as property craftsmen, studio grips who assist the cameramen, studio projectionists, photographers, film technicians, costumers, editors, illustrators, sound technicians, and others.

The producers' group represents the seven major Hollywood motion picture studios, film processing labs, and small and large independent producers.

The 23 Hollywood IATSE locals covered by the settlement also signed individual agreements with the producers, but these are subject to the basic agreement between the union and the alliance.

The new agreement raises major medical plan benefits from $2,500 to $5,000. Also, the contract provides additional health insurance protection for disabled persons, increased employer contributions to a dental plan, and an additional paid holiday.

The agreement also calls for a 10-percent increase in retirement benefits for current and future retirees, and allows for early retirement at age 62 with full benefits.

Meanwhile, the Motion Picture Screen Cartoonists, Local 839 of IATSE, voted to end its nine-week-old strike against the producers and return to work.

The local's 1,600 members, who are covered by the new pact with the Alliance of Motion Picture & Television Producers, had struck to retain a contractual provision limiting the amount of animation work sent outside the United States. While negotiations on this issue will continue with at least two major producers, the restrictions are not included in the new agreement.

The union had previously signed new contracts with eight small production companies that retained the restrictions on runaway work.

Conference to explore impact of technology

Indiana, Pa.—The impact of economic and technological changes on northern industrial states will be explored at a three-day conference sponsored by Indiana University of Pennsylvania.

Discussions will focus on solving the problems of unemployment, productivity and communities. Speakers at the Oct. 21-23 conference, titled "The Industrial North: the Future of Jobs, Productivity and Community," will include Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers and President Julius Uehlein of the Pennsylvania AFL-CIO.

Viewing events through 'filters of experience'

an Administration whose policies are guided so doggedly by myth and fallacy will be undone by its own legislative victories. It has now found itself reduced to retromingency, passing the buck backward to its predecessors—including those of the President's own party.

Yet none of these unforeseen events and circumstances of our time are accidents of chance or the random whims of fate. They flow from the central, enduring issue of this day and this century: the dilemma and contradiction posed by the dual nature of the state in human affairs.

Power of the state

The state embodies and magnifies the frailties of man and his capacity for good or ill. The state, unchecked and unopposed, is a deadly engine of oppression in its extremes, a vortex sweeping hordes to concentration camps or Gulags. The state, held within democratic bounds by free citizens, is the indispensable instrument of human progress.

To embrace the former attribute of the state as a shortcut to the goals of the latter, as they define them, is the fatal temptation common to radicals of the left and right. It is an urge that Marxists-Leninists share with the apostles of Senator Helms and the self-designated Moral Majority, who crave to invoke central state power to legislate intolerance and to enforce their rigid view of appropriate patterns of private behavior.

To suppress and dismantle the benign functions of the latter by raising the specter of the former aspect of the state is the temptation of the political agents of private privilege. That is the apparent thrust of an Administration which has taken it as a mission to remove the federal presence from any substantial role save the raising of armies, and overseeing the detaxing, deregulating and unleashing of private business enterprise.

Business, thus unleashed, has responded with a general collapse, corporate cannibalism, and the fabrication of golden parachutes by and for the executives thus engaged. So much for the doctrine of risk as the grounds for gross rewards.

The definition of the proper bounds and uses of the constructive channels of state power is the central task of this era, here and abroad. The free trade union movement must and does accept its share of that common responsibility.

In Poland, the issue is posed in starkest relief today, and Solidarity, the free labor movement now underground, is the custodian of the struggle for its humane resolution. Hundreds have died and thousands rot in jail for their faith and courage in that cause.

From its birth, Solidarity has been enriched by the close support of intellectuals and students who organized chapters at their universities. That is a natural alliance, for the freedom to think, to speak and to write as one wills is inevitably linked to freedom of association, the essence of trade unionism, which fosters and defends those rights.

Academia's responsibility

Besides, those who dwell in academia and deal in ideas, exposition and argument should, like other workers, have some responsibility for and exposure to the consequences, wholesome or otherwise, of their endeavors.

John Maynard Keynes put it best when he wrote, in 1936, that:

> ". . . The ideas of economists and political philosophers, both when they are right and when they are wrong, are more powerful than is generally understood. Indeed, the world is ruled by little else. Practical men, who believe themselves to be quite exempt from any intellectual influences, are usually the slaves of some defunct economist. Madmen in authority, who hear voices in the air, are distilling their frenzy from some academic scribbler of a few years back."

The founders of this nation were certainly not immune from the ideas of "academic scribblers of a few years back." They derived from philosophy the notion of the existence of government as a badge of lost innocence and a constant threat to the natural rights of man. They wrote elaborate checks and balances into the Constitution, one of which—the requirement of a two-thirds vote in both houses of Congress to initiate an amendment—has just saved the country from an act of outrageous political folly.

They left us a system where the elected are constantly re-examined. The strength of this democracy does not lie in the notion that the people can't be wrong or that the voters always do the right or the wisest thing. If one believed that, he would quit the struggle after his first defeat.

Rather, the saving grace is that the process is self-correcting over time; there is always another chance, and no proposition can long escape the test of lively opposition.

These safeguards make us free to promote the benign uses of the state as an instrument of constructive ends. That pursuit is just as vital to our future as is constant vigilance against the dark side of authority. The trade union movement of America is equally committed both to steadfast resistance to the abuse of state power and the vigorous advocacy of democratic solutions to our national problems through political and legislative action.

Today, we have an Administration devoted to the attrition of the positive and the emphasis of the negative aspect of governance. The avowed aim is to "get government off our backs," and to turn civic responsibility over to private enterprise or to the various states. The old Pledge of Allegiance to "one nation, indivisible . . . with liberty and justice for all" is apparently subject to further amendment or qualification.

Nation's memory bank

Such a program must rely heavily upon the assumed exhaustion of the nation's collective memory bank, from which the delinquencies of the glorified past need to be from time to time recalled. Enduring free institutions such as trade unions and universities share a duty to maintain that memory bank and to draw upon it when these questions arise.

Let me do so briefly now and note what it was really like for many before the New Deal, when the federal presence was remote, when the states had every chance to address any problem, and what business wanted, business got.

Old folks were not universally sheltered in the bosom of a warm and loving family. If they couldn't work until they dropped, the county poorhouse awaited. Then, a federal social security system came along and tore those poorhouses down, liberating both young and old from dependency.

Regions of the country were stripped of trees, and gullied by erosion, until the Forest Service, the Soil Conservation Service and the Civilian Conservation Corps reforested and restored the land, for the ultimate benefit of private industry as well as society at large.

Most roads were unpaved and often impassable until a federal highway program developed the infrastructure on which the automobile and trucking industries depend.

Farmhouses were isolated and lit by kerosene until the federal REA electrified and humanized them, to the great advantage of the appliance industry.

Pellagra, hookworm, malaria and other diseases were endemic in much of the country, until the federal Public Health Service got the resources to eliminate them, to the vast improvement of our productivity and vitality as a nation.

Kirkland answers questions from members of a senior honor society.

That list of real national and human problems that were answered only when the federal government got "on our backs" could be extended at tedious length, but let it just be noted that while they profited handsomely from federal action, neither the states nor private industry rose to meet those occasions.

Over the years between then and now, democratic government has safely steered this nation through social revolutions that no other nation has managed peacefully or so well. From a not-too-distant day of local lynch law and a pattern of racial apartheid every bit as brutal as that of South Africa, we have approached the goal of full and equal rights and opportunities. The American people should be proud, rather than contemptuous, of the role of their government in that achievement.

Rise of free unions

In those same years, the rise of free trade unionism has effected another quiet but profound revolution, one that has enhanced—in ways perhaps unrecognized—the lives of all of you here. The students of this college may well be part of the first generation in the history of man on earth for whom the necessity of working for somebody else will occupy the lesser part of your total lifespan.

I do not mean to scorn the work ethic or to suggest that it has waned. But let us not glorify it unduly. As a friend of mine in the Caribbean trade union movement once put it: "If hard work were really such a great thing, the rich would have kept it all to themselves."

Largely through trade union collective bargaining and legislative endeavors, working hours have been reduced, paid leisure time gained and expanded, family incomes raised, educational opportunities broadened, and earlier pensions gained. As a consequence, the average age of entry into the workforce has been delayed significantly and the time of voluntary exit advanced.

The evolution of trade unionism in my lifetime has brought about the democratization of privilege—that is to say, of education, leisure, travel, good health care and housing, and other advantages for centuries reserved to the few—to an extent previously unknown in history. That process, in turn, has created new industries, services, markets and opportunities for enterprise.

Unquestionable advances

Can anyone reasonably hold that these advances, these revolutions of our time, have impaired rather than enhanced the capacity of man and woman to stand free and independent before the state or any other stronghold of power?

These are no mean achievements. They ought not to be undone.

This is no time for retreat from the struggle for human betterment. Urgent new challenges and tasks await the prudent and measured invocation of the federal instrument.

Equal rights for women, especially those now so rapidly swelling the workforce, is a goal whose time is long past due.

Concerted attention to the decaying infrastructure that supports our economic and community life must be organized and applied. Must active national concern await a string of tragedies? Must rotten bridges collapse under loaded school buses before work can begin?

If we are to preserve a measure of independence from coercion by foreign cartels and offer our youth brighter prospects than employment in the servicing of Atari games or the dispensing of junk food, the broad industrial base of this country must be reconstructed and modernized. That task must call for the cooperation of labor, management and government in the development and execution of a sound national industrial policy.

If I have talked a little treason here, excuse me, but it goes with my territory.

Labor's pursuits

Before I leave you in peace, let me address a canard that has dogged American labor for many years. It has found its way into textbooks, learned papers and baser prose, and may be no stranger here. That is the legend that our founder, Samuel Gompers, when asked what labor wanted, responded simply: "More." That has become a synonym for our alleged innocence of ideals, if not unbridled avarice, in the accepted wisdom.

A university group from the University of Maryland recently completed the task of copying and indexing all of Gompers' recorded papers and works. I asked them to find that quote and was informed that it did not exist. The only source from which it could have been derived was an item dated 1893, when Gompers declared:

> "What does labor want? . . . We want more schoolhouses and less jails; more books and less arsenals; more learning and less vice; more constant work and less crime; more leisure and less greed; more justice and less revenge . . ."

On that, I am willing to stand.

'Solidarity Is Alive!'

SO CHANT thousands of striking workers in the Lenin shipyards at Gdansk, where Solidarity was born. And so much for Gen. Jaruzelski's "normalizing" of Poland with docile, factory-based union substitutes. The coffin is empty, and the communist pallbearers confront a secular resurrection.

Solidarity is kept alive by the forces that created it: abiding discontent with a bankrupt system, a frustrated nationalism and identification with the Catholic Church. Poland won't know social peace until Soviet and Polish communists come to terms with these indigenous sources of unrest.

When he imposed martial law 10 months ago, Gen. Jaruzelski pretended that Solidarity was only "suspended" and its leader, Lech Walesa, merely "detained." He must have reckoned that Poles would weary of crisis and that the rest of the world would lose its fascination with the first genuine workers' rebellion in a Soviet-style workers' state.

He guessed wrong about Poland. It is still bankrupt and still boiling with protest. Once again taking his putschist orders from Moscow, the general had to give legal color to the cancellation of his state's many solemn obligations to Solidarity. Only on one count could he claim some success: the Western response has been faint-hearted and ill-coordinated.

IN AN OVERHEARD aside, President Reagan called Solidarity's persecutors "a bunch of lousy bums." But they are also a bunch of bankrupt debtors. They owe the West nearly $30 billion, yet claim to be independent, unaccountable to world opinion and free to disregard even their own socialist norms of conduct. To respond, as Mr. Reagan also did, with another token trade sanction, is pathetic; depriving the dwindled Polish imports of equitable tariffs will affect nothing.

The need for a firmer response should be obvious. The Polish suppression is wrecking the foundations of East-West stability in Europe. Human rights and commercial arrangements alike are being sacrificed to a barren ideology. Yet Western bankers, fearing an accounting crisis, intend to go right on subsidizing these hollow policies. And timid Western leaders refuse to chase the banks from the diplomatic field. They should be nationalizing the Polish debt and talking tough strategic terms to Moscow and its strapped European confederates.

Though outlawed and hounded, Solidarity's strikers are still able to synchronize some protest. Solidarity's foreign well-wishers communicate only disarray.

A Message from Midland

THE DISTINCTION between recession and depression continues to diminish as the unemployment rate moves into double digits.

Plant closings continue. Hardly a day passes without new waves of layoffs. The lines of the jobless lengthen, even though the government stops counting the discarded workers who have given up looking for non-existent jobs. They are no longer part of the workforce—because there is no work for them.

The safety nets that kept past recessions from developing into recessions are badly frayed.

Yet the Republican National Committee mocks us with its expensive television commercials calling on Americans to "Stay the Course," to stick with the President's program until somehow, sometime, it will start working.

When President Reagan addresses the nation on the state of the economy, he can come up with nothing better than that same message.

The President praised the "quiet, patient courage" of America's jobless.

But patience is running out in communities like Midland, Pa., where even as the President spoke the steel mill that was the area's principal employer was completing its closedown.

The message from the Midlands of America is not "stay the course."

It is "change the course."

'Stay the Course!'

Child food program cuts add to burdens on needy

By Press Associates, Inc.

It should be obvious by now that the Reagan Administration will use any excuse to eliminate child nutrition programs as a national responsibility, however illogical, false or cruel.

The latest outrageous example comes from the Food & Nutrition Service of the Agriculture Dept. Among the agency's budget-cutting ideas for next year is a proposal to index the cost of reduced-price school lunches so "near-poor children bear a fair share of inflation."

And more money could be saved, the FNS said, by eliminating meal subsidies for orphaned, abandoned, mentally retarded or handicapped children in residential institutions. The agency also again proposed ending summer lunches for 900,000 poor and near-poor children.

The Administration's moves against child nutrition began soon after it took office in 1981. The attack escalated when nutrition programs were tentatively targeted to be turned back to the states as part of President Reagan's "New Federalism."

However, Congress rejected the worst of the budget-cut proposals. And, just before the current election recess, the House passed a resolution with strong bipartisan support opposing any turnover to the states. A similar resolution, offered by Senators Robert Dole (R-Kan.) and Patrick Leahy (D-Vt.), is pending in the Senate.

Administration sabotage

At a House Education & Labor subcommittee hearing on the resolution, experts sharply criticized the Administration's apparent desire to sabotage child nutrition programs — either through severe budget cuts, giving them to the states or weakening nutritional standards.

Dr. Julius Richmond, a professor of health policy at the Harvard Medical School, told the House panel that school lunch and breakfast, summer lunch, women's, infants and feeding, child care food and food stamp programs represent a "small investment in our future citizens."

Richmond, a former U.S. Surgeon General, pointed out that the programs' costs are small compared with the long-term, preventive benefits, like fewer low-birthweight babies, infant deaths and permanent learning disabilities. He cited a study which estimated that the program's success in reducing newborn intensive care produced savings in the first year alone three times greater than the cost of the program.

Dr. Alvin Maurer of the American Academy of Pediatricians stressed that poverty is the "single greatest factor" leading to malnutrition in North America."

"These programs aid the most vulnerable of society during the critical development period," Maurer said, preventing "permanent adverse effects" of malnutrition and undernutrition, such as stunted growth and intellectual malfunctions.

Costly consequence

The costs are "nominal compared to the otherwise tragic, incalculable costs" of poor nutrition, he said.

Other witnesses told the panel that states cannot run the programs more efficiently, as the Administration claims. States also will not or are not able to pick up the tab for the programs, they said.

Gene White, representing the American School Food Service Association, said she would "seriously question" whether any state could afford to pay for child nutrition programs.

White, who directs California's Child Nutrition Service, pointed to last year's budget cuts of $1.5 billion in child nutrition as an example. Not one state moved to pick up the slack, she said, and 1,500 schools dropped the school lunch program, affecting more than 3 million children.

MEMO FROM COPE

Whole Page of 'One Vote Counts'

Do you get the message?

(Wherein it is demonstrated with convincing evidence that those who gripe that one-vote-doesn't-count-so-why-bother are grievously in error.)

Those Who Run for President Know It

Presidential candidates know that one vote counts.

James Garfield won the presidency over Winfield Hancock in 1880 by a margin of only 1,898 out of 9,210,420 votes cast.

In 1960, John F. Kennedy topped Richard Nixon by less than one vote per precinct nationwide.

Nixon turned it around in 1968 when he beat Hubert Humphrey by fewer than 350,000 votes out of more than 73 million votes cast.

Though Jimmy Carter won the popular balloting in 1976 with 51.8 percent of the vote, a switch of fewer than 10,000 votes in just two states—Ohio and Hawaii—would have given Gerald Ford a 270-268 electoral vote victory and the presidency.

...And Those Who Run for the Senate Know It

This is the story of the longest permanent floating Senate election in recent times—an election that was finally settled 11 months after it took place . . . by a second election.

In November 1974, John Durkin (D) lost the New Hampshire U.S. Senate race to Louis Wyman by fewer than 600 votes out of more than 220,000 votes cast.

Or so he thought. But he demanded a recount, anyway.

Out of the total 221,838 votes recounted, Durkin wound up on the happy side of a 110,924 to 110,914 count. He had won by 10 votes. Or so he thought.

After mulling it, Wyman decided to appeal the recount to the state ballot law commission.

The commission disqualified a few ballots here and a few ballots there, and Wyman was declared the winner by two votes. Or so he thought.

Durkin brought the whole mess before the U.S. Senate itself. The Constitution says the Senate is the final judge of who shall sit in it.

The Senate Rules Committee diddled around for months, couldn't break tie votes on key questions and on challenged ballots.

In August 1975, Durkin gave up in disgust, asked the Senate to send the question back to New Hampshire. The Senate did.

Nearly 11 months after the first Wyman-Durkin confrontation, New Hampshire voters went to the polls once more. This time, Durkin won big—by 27,000 votes. But he had learned the lesson: One vote counts!

And Those Who Run for the House Know It

South Dakota See-Saw

It was a see-saw election for Congress in South Dakota in 1978, pitting Democrat Tom Daschle against Republican Leo Thorsness.

The election night results gave Thorsness the House seat by just six votes. An official canvass then turned it around, putting Daschle out front 64,661 to 64,641—20 votes out of 129,302 votes cast.

Thorsness called for a recount. Final result: Daschle by 105 votes.

Call Me 'Close-Call Paul'

To Rep. Ron Paul of Texas, a landslide is the 5,645-vote margin that re-elected him in 1980 out of 207,887 votes cast. He was already known as "Close-Call Paul" even before that.

He first won his congressional seat in a special election in April 1976 over Bob Gammage. The following November, Gammage turned the tables, beating Paul by 236 out of 193,000 votes cast. Two years later, Paul won back the seat by only 1,056 out of 107,436 votes cast.

So, adding it all up (not counting the special election) three elections in which Paul was a candidate were settled by an aggregate 6,937 votes out of 608,423 votes cast.

Then There's 'No-Flab Ab'

There was no flab in Abner Mikva's U.S. House race victories, either.

In 1978, he won re-election with an edge of only 1,241 out of 177,795 votes cast, following up his 1976 victory of just 201 votes out of a 213,407 total.

Thus, in two elections, Mikva won by a combined total of only 1,442 out of 391,302 votes cast.

And a Whole Lot of Folks You Never Even Heard of Know It

Heart By-Pass, Vote By-Pass

Frank Wageman of Manchester, N.H., was hospitalized for heart by-pass surgery on primary election day in 1980. He had neglected to file his absentee ballot in the race for GOP state senate nomination.

The balloting wound up in a tie, 2,438 votes for each candidate. The challenger was Eleanor Podles. The incumbent? State Sen. Frank Wageman. (Follow-up: Wageman lost the recount by seven votes.)

One Roll Counts!

A roll of the dice settled a Democratic primary election for district attorney in Virginia City, Nev., in 1978.

At first count, Marshall Bouvier beat Leonard Howard by two votes. A recount made Howard the winner by three, but a judge then invalidated five ballots, four of them Howard's, one Bouvier's, creating a tie.

It was decided the candidates would have a roll-out with dice. Bouvier cast a five. Howard went him one better with a six. (One dot, like one vote counts.) In the end, all the counting, recounting, etc. didn't do Howard much good. He lost the general election . . . by just 38 votes.

Holy Foul-up

Good old Batman . . . he really loused up a city commission election in Gainesville, Ga. Someone wrote in Batman's name rather than vote for either of the listed candidates, who were left stuck in a tie at 674 votes each. Two months after the election, they were still tied. The city never had a tie before and had no provision for a run-off. The Memo never found out how it was settled. Moral: Don't fool with Batman . . . and don't vote for him, either.

Wanna Fight?

November 1980. New Mexico. A 2,436-2,436 tie for the state legislature between Richard Minzner (D), C. A. Bowerman (R). Elections officials wanted to decide it by the flip of a coin. The candidates balked. Someone suggested duelling. Bowerman nixed it, said "I'm too big a target." Bowerman said let's wrestle. Minzner said "I'm too small." They agreed on a single hand of five-card poker. But it never took place. A recount made Minzner the winner by 16 votes.

A Trio of One-Voters

In 1964, Julius Lippman of New Hyde Park, N.Y., was elected judge of the Third District Court by exactly one vote out of 106,641 votes cast. His tally was 53,371 to his opponent's 53,370.

In 1976, Lawrence Merman was elected judge of the Monroe County (Mich.) probate court by exactly one vote—13,228-13,227. That figures out to a winning percentage of 50.001890001.

In 1979, Jack McLaughlin was elected to the Havre de Grace (Md.) city council over Wardell Stansbury, 595-592. But when all absentee ballots were counted, it slimmed down to a one-vote victory on the button. McLaughlin picked up eight absentee votes, his opponent 10. Final result: 603-602.

The Perils of Andrew Slivka

A flip of the coin more than a month after the Nov. 3, 1981, election finally settled the Garfield Heights (Ohio) race for municipal judge in favor of Andrew Slivka over James Shipan. Until the climactic flip, through counts and recounts and re-recounts, Slivka had been declared the winner twice, Shipan once, and twice the contest had been called a tie.

Going all the way back to the Nov. 3 election, Shipan had been named the winner. Six days later, the election board declared a tie. Next, the official count made Slivka the winner by one vote after uncounted ballots were found in the board's computer room.

A subsequent recount by hand turned up a tie again. Another recount, which included 11 ballots incorrectly punched by voters, wound up with Slivka the winner 11,654-11,653—one vote.

Finally, election board workers discovered they had counted one of Slivka's votes twice, so it was all tied up again at 11,653 each.

At that point, they all threw up their hands and decided to let a coin flip settle it.

And Now You Know It . . . One Vote Counts

On Election Day . . . Use Yours!

Leaflet day opens drive for heavy voter turnout

Baltimore workers get handshake from AFL-CIO President Kirkland, COPE leaflet from Mrs. Kirkland, warm welcome from Sen. Paul Sarbanes and Representatives Parren Mitchell and Barbara J. Mikulski.

Labor takes message to plant gates

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates launched labor's get-out-the-vote campaign Oct. 19 with a nationwide leaflet day that began with early morning plant gate distributions and concluded with rallies and marches.

Its message was that the election of labor-endorsed candidates on Nov. 2 can "turn around" the Reagan Recession and get Americans back to work.

"The Number One issue in the Nov. 2 election is jobs. . . ."

That's what it said on the leaflets that AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and his wife, Irena, were passing out at 6:30 a.m. to the shift coming to work at a Baltimore factory.

It was the message Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn carried on his early morning leaflet assignment at a Columbus, Ohio, warehouse.

Seafarers President Frank Drozak was at the first of six Delaware locations he would cover that day; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue was spreading labor's message in New England.

In Pennsylvania, State, County & Municipal Employees President Gerald McEntee began the day passing out leaflets at a state government building in Harrisburg, while Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride was working plant gates and an employment office in Carnegie. Later they would come together for a rally near USWA headquarters in Pittsburgh.

Wide coverage

In Oregon, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger covered five cities. And Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser began the day leafleting a Bendix plant in South Bend, Ind., and ended it at an Indianapolis rally.

Railway & Airline Clerks President Richard I. Kilroy handbilled in Omaha, Neb.; Paperworkers President Wayne Glenn was at a Tennessee pulp and paper plant.

Chemical Workers President Frank Martino was in Nevada with one group of labor-endorsed candidates, while Ken-

New job loss seen likely as economy sags

Unemployment is likely to increase in the months ahead because of the sharp slowdown in the rate of economic growth from the second to the third quarter of 1982, the AFL-CIO warned.

Real gross national product, or the inflation-adjusted value of the nation's total output of goods and services, grew at an anemic annual rate of eight-tenths of 1 percent in the July-September quarter, a marked contrast to the minor growth rate of 2.1 percent in the previous quarter, the Commerce Dept. reported.

Henry Schechter, AFL-CIO deputy director of economic research, said real GNP must grow at a 3 percent annual rate to hold the unemployment rate even.

"A 3-percent rate is needed just to accommodate new job seekers in the market without touching the millions of individuals who have been seeking work for many weeks and months," Schechter pointed out.

'True' joblessness 14.5%

Official joblessness hit a post-Depression high of 10.1 percent last month. The AFL-CIO estimates that "true" unemployment is 14.5 percent, or 16.3-million jobless persons, including the 1.6 million who have given up looking for jobs and one-half of the 6.6 million forced to work part-time because full-time jobs were not available.

Schechter said the slowdown in real GNP growth in the July-September quarter was "marked by continuing decreases in business investment and casts doubt on President Reagan's claim that a meaningful economic recovery has begun."

Schechter said the slow growth in real GNP and the high September unemployment level make the Reagan Administration claims no more valid than they were in late 1981 and early 1982 when Treasury Sec. Donald Regan first began to tout "recovery."

Real GNP dropped 5.1 percent in the first three months of this year, following a 5.3 percent drop in the fourth quarter of 1981.

Jobs outlook grim

The Commerce Dept. report on economic growth followed other depressing news pointing up the fragility of the recession-wracked economy, and predictions by a group of leading economists that unemployment will rise in the next few months, perhaps as high as 11 percent.

"There is no economic recovery at this stage," Donald Ratajczak, director of the Risk to social security

Reagan stand on funds threatens benefit cuts

President Reagan's "adamant" opposition to increasing the social security system's revenues threatens reductions in benefits to America's elderly and disabled, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman warned.

Seidman termed recent White House statements on social security funding a reflection of the "callous approach" of Council of Economic Advisers Chairman Martin Feldstein.

In a "working paper" written shortly before his appointment as the President's chief economist in August, Feldstein viewed the social security system as a drain on the economy. He found it useful only as a source of retirement income "for those who lacked the foresight to provide for themselves."

This harsh assessment was the conclusion of a paper titled "The Welfare Cost of Social Security's Impact on Private Savings," which Feldstein wrote for the National Bureau of Economic Research, which he headed at the time.

In a companion paper in the series, he strongly suggested keying social security benefits to need, through a means test, instead of continuing it as an earned entitlement.

In considering "how the level of social security benefits should be changed in response to temporary changes in the rates of growth and productivity," Feldstein suggested "it would be good to relax the assumption that benefits are to be provided uniformly and without reference to accumulated assets." He proposed considering "the appropriate role for means-tested benefits" as among the options.

More bluntly, in an earlier interview with U.S. News & World Report, Feldstein said President Reagan "can help himself by working up the courage to cut spending on entitlement programs, such as social security."

Revenue hike rejected

In an Oct. 18 appearance on CBS television's Face the Nation program, White House Counselor Edwin Meese said President Reagan is "adamantly against increasing social security taxes."

The Administration had earlier rejected using general revenues to supplement the payroll tax—the course advocated by the AFL-CIO—and Meese was asked about Reagan's views on scaling back future social security benefits.

IUD presses national policy to revitalize U.S. industry

Detroit—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. called for a tripartite labor-business-government effort to establish a national industrial policy that would revitalize America's deteriorating manufacturing base.

A resolution adopted by delegates to the IUD's 15th biennial convention warned that "America's future as an industrial power is in danger," citing these ominous trends:

- In the past 20 years, America's share of the world market for manufactured goods has shrunk from one-quarter to less than one-sixth.
- Over the same period, the U.S. share of its own domestic market has fallen from 95 percent to 65 percent. In the auto industry, for example, the United States has lost 35 percent of its own market at a cost of 900,000 jobs. In steel, 22 percent of the U.S. domestic market—representing another 150,000 jobs—has been lost to foreign manufacturers.
- Between 1950 and 1980, workers in manufacturing dropped from 34 percent of the workforce to 21 percent.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel outlined the department's recommendations for developing a national industrial policy in his keynote address to the convention He said the "virus of decline" that has afflicted industries such as auto, steel, shoes, rubber, glass and many other older

Job toll mounts

Joblessness rose in every state but one between August 1981 and August 1982, reaching the highest levels in Michigan, 14.5 percent, and Alabama, 14.2 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. The only state where the jobless rate did not rise during the period was South Dakota, where it was essentially unchanged.

Of 221 reporting metropolitan areas for which data were available, 98 had unemployment rates that equaled or exceeded the national average. Youngstown, Ohio, with a rate of 20.9 percent, had the highest.

The data reflect "unadjusted" figures that do not take into account seasonal factors.

Rallying the voters

AFL-CIO's Leaflet Day found top union leaders at job sites in cities throughout the country pushing labor's message of Election Day support for COPE-endorsed candidates. The theme was to send a message on Nov. 2 that America's workers want to change a Reagan Administration course that has led to depression levels of unemployment, plant closings, bankruptcies and mortgage foreclosures.

At Silver Spring, Md., outside a Heidi bakery, BCTW President John DeConcini addresses a Leaflet Day rally. Former Vice President Mondale was on hand to join in urging the re-election of Sen. Paul Sarbanes and Rep. Michael D. Barnes.

At Carnegie, Pa., plant of Teledyne Corp., Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride and Rep. Doug Walgren greet workers.

Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz distributes leaflets in Detroit with congressional candidate Sander Levin.

At Bendix plant, in South Bend, Ind., UAW President Douglas Fraser boosts labor-backed candidates.

Machinists President William Winpisinger handbills workers in Oregon during long day of campaigning.

Health cost curb plan wins support

A labor-supported plan to stem the rise in health care costs so as to preserve medical services threatened by budget cutbacks picked up support on Capitol Hill, setting the stage for a major legislative effort in the new Congress.

Shortly before Congress adjourned, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) organized a well-attended briefing for his colleagues on the two-phase program drafted by the Health Security Action Council.

The new plan, dubbed HALT, steers away from some of the more controversial elements of earlier health security proposals and concentrates on cost containment for both the public and private health care sectors.

HALT's initials stand for Health Action to Limit Takeaways, a reference to the cutbacks in Medicaid, Medicare and other government-funded health services over the past two years.

Missionary effort

The Health Security Action Council, which is headed by Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, drew up the outlines of the plan earlier this year, and the briefing session marked the start of the missionary effort being undertaken to gain congressional sponsors.

Council Director Melvin A. Glasser was joined by Harvard Medical School Prof. Rashi Fein and James Moorfield, president of the Health Insurance Association of America, in the briefing.

Rangel recited the concerns that brought representatives of some 50 congressional offices to the briefing.

"Over a million people have been cut from Medicaid," he said. And some 11 million U.S. workers "have lost their jobs and the health insurance that go with them."

While Congress has cut federal funding for health care block grants to the states by 20 percent, Rangel noted that it has yet "to pass a law forbidding people from becoming ill when they don't have the resources to pay for care."

Another concern is the high cost of medical care. Doctors' and hospital fees have been among the fastest-rising components of the government's consumer price index.

The HALT plan outlined at the briefing would be implemented in two phases.

Price curb

The first step would be a curb on permissible price increases for hospital and nursing home care, outpatient services and physician charges. These increases would be for the most part limited to a cost index formula.

After two years of relative price stability, the second phase would stress pre-budgeting of hospital and health provider costs, under federal guidelines administered by state agencies.

Sponsors of the HALT plan readily acknowledged that it does not meet the full need for assuring that quality health services will be available to millions without such protection. Nor will it help the elderly pay for the prescription drugs they need.

Its goal is more limited—and more immediately achievable, they pointed out.

First step

The AFL-CIO took part in the shaping of the proposals, and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue holds the same post in the Health Security Action Council.

Donahue said when the HALT proposal was first unveiled that "the AFL-CIO remains convinced that the only way to assure all Americans access to quality health care they can afford is through the enactment of universal, comprehensive national health insurance."

But the federation is pressing for immediate adoption of the more limited program because the Reagan Administration alternative "would diminish already inadequate health care protection" for millions of Americans, Donahue said.

Wholesale index dips as recession dampens demand

Prices at the wholesale level fell a seasonally adjusted one-tenth of 1 percent in September after increasing six-tenths of 1 percent in July and August.

While the decline in prices was welcomed for its likely impact on the inflation rate, the drop stemmed largely from the ongoing Reagan Recession which has put millions out of work and dampened demand.

About two-thirds of the slowdown in the government's producer price index for finished goods was caused by discounts on slow-selling 1982 model cars and trucks, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said.

Also contributing to the decline were reduced food prices and smaller increases in energy prices. Capital equipment prices fell four-tenths of 1 percent after rising seven-tenths of 1 percent in August.

Labor launches drive to turn out heavy vote neth Young, executive assistant to Kirkland, covered an industrial complex with another group.

Bakery & Confectionery Workers President John DeConcini and Firemen & Oilers President George Francisco covered Maryland and Virgina areas. Office & Professional Employees President John Kelly handbilled members in New Haven.

Top officers and executive board members of these and many other unions were at garment shops in New York state, rubber plants in Ohio and New Jersey, farm equipment plants in Illinois at plants and shops in Texas, Alabama, Missouri, North Dakota, California, Utah, Idaho, Massachusetts, Illinois, Minnesota . . . a long and incomplete list constantly being updated as reports from across the country reached the AFL-CIO News.

The COPE leaflets carried the names of the endorsed candidates in the area and a "damage report" on the Reagan recession in terms of unemployment, business failures and mortgage foreclosures.

"Workers are hurting. The needy are hurting. The nation is hurting," the leaflets read.

In most of the locations, no reminder was needed. Those still working were the survivors.

At the Koppers Co. plant in Baltimore, where Kirkland began his day, a sign in the employment offices tells jobs seekers: "Due to present economic situation, we are not and do not foresee taking any applications now or in the future."

The VIP handbilling was the symbolic start of the final two weeks of an election campaign in which labor's goal is to get the largest possible turnout of union members.

Thousands of union volunteers have been staffing phone banks; computer records have helped locate unemployed union members and retired members to be recruited for election assignments; personalized mailings have gone to the homes of members.

"Turn it around" is the message. "Vote Nov. 2."

National policy pushed to revive U.S. industry industries is spreading into higher technology fields.

"We've lost much of the global market for aircraft, and our domination of the entire civilian aerospace field is seriously threatened," Samuel warned. "Even microchip manufacturers have begun to feel the impact of advanced models exported from Japan."

A strong industrial base in this country is essential to national defense, Samuel said. "If we have to rely on foreign producers, we increase our vulnerability and reduce our ability to mobilize and to replace depleted stocks in time of conflict," he told the delegates.

Samuel called for a two-pronged set of policies: making the federal government "a full partner in assuring economic growth and full employment" and targeting "specific incentives toward specific industrial sectors to meet their specific needs."

National industrial policy

He pointed out that the United States is "almost alone in its resistance to a national industrial policy. Free markets have in most countries been replaced by markets closely monitored and supported by government," he said.

The call for a national industrial policy also was taken up by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

"We are fighting for the full reindustrialization program that was spelled out in the National Accord reached with the Carter Administration, before the Reagan Administration came along to strangle it in the cradle," Kirkland told the delegates.

"The AFL-CIO does not and will not accept the proposition that there must be an inevitable decline in the manufacturing sector of our country," he said, adding:

"To rely on Japanese automobiles or Taiwanese television sets or Korean textiles is as great a piece of folly as relying on Arab oil or Liberian cargo ships."

Both Samuel and Kirkland attacked Reaganomics for leading the country into the deepest recession with the highest unemployment rates since the Great Depression. Atlanta Mayor Andrew Young, another speaker, joined them in calling for new policies to rebuild the U.S. economy.

The agenda of the convention was structured into four panel discussions by labor and political leaders on issues of main concern to the department:

- Rebuilding America's industrial base was discussed by Senators Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) and Don Riegle (D-Mich.); Lloyd McBride, president of the Steelworkers, and Glenn Watts, president of the Communications Workers.
- OSHA and environmental issues were addressed by Robert Goss, president of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; Malcolm Lovell, Under Secretary of Labor; Joseph Fontaine, past president of the Sierra Club and co-chair of the OSHA/Environmental Network, and J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers.

A resolution on OSHA adopted by the convention castigated the Administration for "emasculating the act by reducing inspection staffs, exempting industries from inspections, curtailing enforcement, and wasting time, money, and human lives on efforts to revive dependence upon voluntary initiatives of the employers."

- A panel on bargaining in the 1980s included former Sec. of Labor Ray Marshall, now a professor at the University of Texas; Charles Pillard, president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing & Textile Workers, and Don Ephlin, vice president of the Auto Workers.
- A panel on organizing developments consisted of IUD Sec.-Treas. Elmer Chatak; Joyce Miller, vice president of ACTWU and president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and John Sweeney, president of the Service Employees.

New techniques

Chatak discussed IUD's use of polling and video in its organizing.

In other activity, the delegates re-elected Samuel and Chatak to new two-year terms. They also approved a per capita tax increase from 5 cents to 6 cents per month and elected four new members to the Executive Council: James E. Hatfield, president of the Glass, Pottery, Plastics & Allied Workers; William Konyha, president of the Carpenters; William G. Lindner, president of the Transport Workers, and William W. Winpisinger, president of the Machinists.

Jobs at stake

America can't afford to lose its industrial base and the jobs it provides, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stresses at Industrial Union Dept. convention. IUD President Howard D. Samuel is at left, Vice Presidents John J. Sweeney and J. C. Turner at right.

Missouri state convention elects new leadership team

St. Louis—Daniel J. McVey, secretary-treasurer of the Missouri AFL-CIO since 1978, was elected president over incumbent James E. Meyers as delegates to the state federation's 11th biennial convention voted to seat the entire McVey slate for four-year terms.

The other new top officers are Sec.-Treas. Robert A. Steinke, who is executive secretary of Newspaper Guild Local 47, and Vice President Emmett C. Meyer, an international representative of the Communications Workers.

The 25 candidates on McVey's ticket for the executive board were also elected.

On a weighted ballot basis, the 634 delegates gave McVey 89,700 votes to 74,500 for Meyers, who was seeking his second term as president. McVey comes out of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 562 in St. Louis.

Recognizing the impact of their hard-fought campaigns on the delegates, McVey and Meyers joined in urging them to shift attention to the Nov. 2 elections with an all-out effort on behalf of labor-endorsed candidates.

The convention resoundingly reaffirmed support of Democrat Harriett Woods in her race to unseat incumbent Republican Sen. John C. Danforth. Woods won the Democratic primary with COPE endorsement.

A former officer of the St. Louis Newspaper Guild local, Woods has a 100-percent "right" labor voting record in the state legislature. Conversely, Danforth has a 29-percent "right" voting record in Congress, with only two "right" votes and 16 "wrong" votes on labor issues in the current session.

Woods and Sen. Thomas F. Eagleton (D-Mo.) stressed in addresses to the convention that labor must turn out the vote in next month's elections and lead the fight against unfair Reagan economic policies.

President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees called on delegates to finish the fight begun on Solidarity Day 1981 by electing a Congress that will reverse the Reagan Administration's economic policies.

Union vote solidified

McEntee said the only good that has come out of President Reagan's flagrant favoritism toward the rich is that he "has regenerated popular indignation and solidified the labor union vote."

In major resolutions adopted at the three-day convention, delegates voiced their support of the boycott of Procter & Gamble soap products, effective safety standards for the grain industry, collective bargaining rights for public employees, and a national policy to rebuild the U.S. merchant fleet.

Delegates also voiced opposition to tuition tax credits and to employer demands for polygraph tests as a condition of employment.

Patrick Campbell to succeed Konyha as Carpenters' chief

William Konyha, president of the Carpenters since January 1980, will retire Oct. 31, and under provisions of the union's constitution, he will be succeeded by First Vice President Patrick J. Campbell.

Konyha, who is 67, assumed the presidency following the retirement of William Sidell and was elected to a five-year term at the union's 100th anniversary convention last year.

Konyha was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council in August 1980 and is a vice president of the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Campbell, 64, has served as first vice president since 1980. He has been a member of the Carpenters since 1945, joining Local 964 in Rockland County, N.Y., after his discharge from the Air Force. Campbell was president of the local in 1955 when he was appointed to the international organizing staff.

Campbell was named assistant to the Carpenters' president in 1966 and elected to the executive board three years later. He became second vice president of the union in 1974.

As part of his union activities, Campbell also served as president of the New York State Council of Carpenters and as a vice president of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Konyha has been a member of the Carpenters for 50 years, apprenticing with Cleveland Local 1180, which his father helped organize. He later served the local as an organizer and president.

Konyha also was president of the Ohio Council of Carpenters and a vice president of the Ohio AFL-CIO during the 1960s. He was elected to the Carpenters' executive board in 1970 and became second vice president two years later. He was elected first vice president of the union in 1974.

MARVIN J. BOEDE

Marvin J. Boede new Plumbers, Pipefitters chief

The executive board of the Plumbers & Pipefitters has elected Marvin J. Boede president to fill the vacancy created by the death of Martin J. Ward on Oct. 9. The term expires at the end of 1986.

Boede, who is 54, has served as assistant president of the 352,000-member union since May 1977.

Boede began his apprenticeship as a steamfitter-pipefitter with Local 601 in Milwaukee in 1951. He earned his journeyman's card in 1956.

During the 1960s, Boede was a vice president and later business agent of Local 601. He also served as a training instructor for the local's night school program for seven years.

Boede later was president of the Wisconsin State Pipe Trades Association and chairman of the state steamfitters apprenticeship committee.

In 1975, Boede was appointed an international representative assigned to Michigan. Since becoming assistant president in 1977, he has been a delegate to AFL-CIO conventions as well as to conventions of the Building & Construction Trades Dept., Metal Trades Dept. and Industrial Union Dept.

Eastern states remain a vote-rich prize

By David L. Perlman

Some of the nation's most fiercely contested election battles this year are being fought in a 12-state eastern region that stretches from the northern tip of New England through the populous mid-Atlantic states. But nearly all the region's close contests would have to tilt in the same direction to change the political picture significantly.

The 12 eastern states are represented this year by 67 Democrats and 50 Republicans in the House, but the numbers will shrink as a result of reapportionment resulting from the 1980 census. Population shifts have taken five seats away from New York, two from Pennsylvania, and one each from Massachusetts and New Jersey. The post-election analysis is likely to give political honors in those states to the party that loses the fewest seats.

Eastern states have tended to elect liberal Democrats and moderate Republicans, and most of the incumbents seeking re-election to the Senate reflect that pattern. Sen. William V. Roth (R-Del.), co-author of the Kemp-Roth tax bill, is the only certifiable conservative among them. And while Roth is not on the endangered species list, his apparent lead does not put him out of the range of an upset.

3 GOP senators vulnerable

Six of the 13 Republican Senate seats at stake this year are in the East, and three are clearly vulnerable. Only one of the region's five Democratic senators seeking re-election is in a close contest.

Democrats hold six of the eight governorships to be filled on Nov. 2, a ratio that is not likely to be significantly changed by the election.

If there is indeed a Democratic tide, it could sweep away the Senate seats of Republicans Lowell P. Weicker, Jr. in Connecticut, John H. Chafee in Rhode Island and Robert T. Stafford in Vermont. It could also save the Senate seat of Democrat George J. Mitchell in Maine, who is locked in a close contest.

Weicker's independence of the Reagan Administration would normally assure him of a fair share of Democratic votes in Connecticut. But this year he faces an unusually strong Democratic challenger in Toby Moffett, who is giving up his House seat to run for the Senate.

Both Chafee and Stafford were early favorites, but it wouldn't take much of a political breeze to turn things around.

In Rhode Island, a vigorous campaign by labor-backed Julius C. Michaelson has put Chafee on the defensive in a strongly Democratic state that gave Reagan only 37 percent of its vote in 1980.

Vermont race close

Stafford won renomination in a three-way Republican primary in which two conservatives shared 54 percent of the vote. He now must overcome a vigorous Democratic challenger in James A. Guest. Another close one.

In Maine, Democrat George J. Mitchell is seeking his first full term in the Senate; he was appointed to the post in 1980 when Sen. Edmund S. Muskie resigned to become Secretary of State under President Carter.

Republican David F. Emery is giving up his House seat to run against Mitchell, and at first it appeared that he would have an easy time of it. But the Republican's big early lead in the polls kept dwindling, and by mid-October the candidates were even with the momentum apparently running towards Mitchell. It's an important election to the labor movement. On COPE's scorecard, Mitchell's key votes in the Senate have been 93 percent right. Emery's comparable grade on House votes is 38 percent.

Maryland Democrat Paul S. Sarbanes, seeking his second term, now appears clearly ahead despite the influx of right-wing money that financed anti-Sarbanes television commercials by the National Conservative Political Action Committee.

Right-wing target

Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd was also a target of negative advertising in West Virginia, but his defeat would be a stunning upset. And it is hard to conceive of weak Republican challengers beating either Edward M. Kennedy in Massachusetts or Daniel Patrick Moynihan in New York.

On the Republican side, COPE-endorsed John Heinz is a strong favorite in Pennsylvania over Democrat Cyril H. Wecht.

The one open seat, without an incumbent, is in New Jersey where Republican Nicholas F. Brady had a caretaker appointment to the seat opened by the resignation of Democrat Harrison A. Williams.

Millicent Fenwick, seeking to move from the House to the Senate at age 72, is a media favorite and moved into an early lead over Democrat Frank R. Lautenberg. She has bid for the votes of both critics and supporters of Reaganomics. In a recent debate, Fenwick was asked whether she agreed with the Reagan theme, "Stay the Course."

Her straight-faced reply: "Yes, we must stay the course, but with a change in direction."

In House contests, redistricting has brought match-ups of incumbents in two congressional districts in New York and one in Massachusetts.

Most of the suburban Boston, Fall River district in Massachusetts has been represented for eight terms by moderate Republican Margaret M. Heckler. But she has never had such a vigorous Democratic opponent as Barney Frank, seeking a second term, coupled with high unemployment and a heavy Democratic registration edge. It's down-to-the-wire.

Incumbents battle

New York's 22nd District matches two liberal incumbents—Democrat Peter A. Peyser and Republican Benjamin A. Gilman. But the 14th District, Staten Island and a piece of Brooklyn, pits the 91 percent right COPE record of Democrat Leo C. Zeferetti against the 27 percent score of Republican Guy V. Molinari, who now represents most of the district.

Open seats, without an incumbent, are traditionally most susceptible to turnover.

Seats vacated by Republicans that are strong possibilities for switches include Pennslylvania's 21st District, where liberal Marc L. Marks is retiring, the West Virginia district that Cleve Benedict gave up to run for the Senate, and the Maine seat of Republican senatorial candidate David Emery.

Connecticut Democrats are hoping to avoid the loss of the House seat of their senatorial candidate, Toby Moffett.

Among the more vulnerable Republican incumbents are Thomas B. Evans, Jr., in Delaware, Harold C. Hollenbeck and Matthew J. Rinaldo in New Jersey, Jim Coyne and Eugene V. Atkinson in Pennsylvania. Atkinson was elected as a Democrat two years ago, then switched parties.

Ideological issues are often secondary in gubernatorial contests. But in New York, the matchup between liberal Democrat Mario M. Cuomo and Republican Lew Lehrman is a clear clash of opposites. Lehrman, both rich and well-financed by the radical right, is a far cry from the tradition of Nelson Rockefeller.

In Massachusetts, the big battle was in the Democratic primary where former Gov. Michael S. Dukakis reversed his loss of four years ago and beat the more conservative incumbent, Edward J. King. He's favored, but not a shoo-in, for election.

Outlook for Democrats brightens in Midwest

A Democratic current is clearly discernible in this year's elections in an eight-state Midwest region that flirted with Reaganomics two years ago—and reaped a bitter harvest of closed plants and lengthened unemployment lines.

Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Ohio and Wisconsin have been and remain two-party battlegrounds even though all have Republican governors.

The region's House delegation is evenly split—55 Democrats and 55 Republicans. Republicans have a 9-7 edge in Senate seats.

Reapportionment has whittled away seven congressional districts this year—two each in Illinois and Ohio, and single seats in Indiana, Michigan and Missouri. On balance, Republicans are the losers. Only Indiana's Republican legislature was able to tilt the reshaped districts to the GOP's advantage.

Each party has three Senate seats up this year, and here is where the change in political current has been most noticeable.

A year ago, Wisconsin's William Proxmire was the only Democrat conceded a clear edge in his re-election campaign. Ohio's Howard M. Metzenbaum, who squeaked through with 49.5 percent of the vote in 1976, and Michigan's Donald W. Riegle, Jr., were prime Republican targets. Both are now off the endangered list.

On the Republican side, meanwhile, re-election is no longer a sure thing for John C. Danforth in Missouri or David Durenberger in Minnesota. Only Richard C. Lugar of Indiana has retained a clear lead.

Most exciting has been the come-from-behind stretch drive of Democrat Harriett Woods in Missouri against the highly favored Danforth. Her issue-oriented approach and tireless campaigning have brought her up in the polls. And her supporters stir memories of another come-from-behind Missourian with T-shirts carrying the message, "Give 'em Hell, Harriett."

On the House side, redistricting has already ousted two Republican incumbents in Illinois, and at least two other seats appear vulnerable.

Redistricting

Paul Findley has only a 20 percent right COPE record during 11 terms in Congress, and redistricting gives a real chance to Democrat Richard J. Durbin.

There is also an open-district possibility in the Rock Island area that had long been represented by moderate Republican Tom Railsback. Railsback was beaten in the Republican primary by a New Right ideologue, Kenneth McMillan. Labor-supported Democrat Lane Evans is within striking distance in the campaign.

The other side of the coin was in Indiana, where redistricting eliminated one Democratic House seat and reshaped another district into a likely Republican stronghold. Two incumbents, Republican Joel Deckard and Democrat Philip R. Sharp, are in very close contests.

Missouri's redistricting matches two incumbents, Democrat Ike Skelton and Republican Wendell Bailey. The new district favors the Democrat. Another Republican incumbent in Missouri, Bill Emerson, is closely chased by Democrat Jerry Ford.

Redistricting squeezed out one Democratic and one Republican seat in Ohio. Democrat Bob Shamansky, who won an upset victory in 1980, is in a close match. But if the Democratic tide is running strong, Marcy Kaptur could oust Republican incumbent Ed Weber in Toledo.

Running scared

Some other vulnerable Republicans: Cooper Evans in Iowa, with a more Democratic district; Jim Dunn in Michigan, facing a rematch with former congressman Bob Carr who can win if Democrats turn out at the polls; Arlen Erdahl and Arlan Stangeland, both running very scared in Minnesota.

Gubernatorial contestants often remain aloof from national issues, but Michigan poses a clear liberal-conservative clash in which Democrat James J. Blanchard is a clear favorite over right-wing Republican Richard H. Headlee. Moderate Republican William G. Milliken is retiring after three terms.

Democrats also have strong chances of replacing Republican governors in Minnesota, with former Gov. Rudy Perpich; in Ohio, with Richard F. Celeste, who came close four years ago, and in Wisconsin, with Anthony S. Earl.

In Illinois, former U.S. Sen. Adlai E. Stevenson III is trying to regain an early lead over incumbent Republican James R. Thompson. And Democrat Roxanne Conlin in Iowa is still very much in the race against Republican Lt. Gov. Terry Branstad. Republican Robert Ray is stepping down after five terms.

The political map is changing.

Rising joblessness creates key test of conservative strength in South

By James M. Shevis

Well-heeled Republicans in the southern and border states are betting they will hold their own in the 1982 elections, but that outcome is by no means assured at this point.

Of the four Senate contests in the 11-state region, only the Virginia race leans Republican as of now. And in the area's six governors' races, the GOP candidate is favored only in Tennessee. Best chances for the Republicans are in a number of crucial congressional battles.

Democrats in the House races—except for the "boll weevil" group that supported President Reagan almost without fail—hope that resentment over the sagging economy will generate the votes needed to win. Unemployment in six states—Kentucky, Tennessee, South Carolina, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama—is well over the national average of 10.1 percent, and is nearly as high in a couple of others.

A major factor will be the turnout of black voters, which if heavy enough could catapult more progressive candidates than the region normally sends to Washington.

Among the Senate races, five-term Republican Rep. Robin L. Beard is waging a vicious campaign against incumbent Sen. Jim Sasser (D) in Tennessee, resorting to flat distortions of Sasser's record on a number of issues.

Attacks Backfire

But the strategy seems to have backfired. The Nashville Banner, one of the state's most conservative newspapers, withdrew its endorsement of Beard, accusing him of campaigning on "outdated conservate demagoguery." And a recent poll conducted for Sasser showed Beard's strength had dropped 6 points, with Sasser leading by more than 2 to 1. The poll also showed that negative feelings about Beard had soared 15 percent.

Sasser, who narrowly upset Republican Bill Brock in 1976 to win his first Senate term, backs the AFL-CIO's efforts to win congressional approval of a bill requiring that cars and light trucks sold in the United States contain large amounts of domestically produced parts. He says the bill would help put more than 15,000 unemployed Tennesseans back to work in a state where joblessness is at 11.1 percent of the labor force.

Democrats are also favored in Senate races in Florida and Mississippi. In the latter, Sen. John Stennis faces the hardest race of his long career against Haley Barbour, a Yazoo City lawyer and vice chairman of the state Republican party. Stennis first took office in 1947 and is counting on his Senate experience and seniority to win him another term.

Virginia is where the South's tightest Senate race is under way. Three-term Rep. Paul S. Trible, Jr., supported by the National Conservative Political Action Committee and other right-wing groups, is running as a Reagan Republican against Democratic Lt. Gov. Richard J. Davis, and is stumping hard to succeed independent Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr.

Davis has the support of most black voters, liberals and organized labor, but it is uncertain whether he can win in the face of Trible's better-financed campaign.

Southern focal point

The House contest drawing most attention in the South is in Mississippi's 2nd District, where a labor-endorsed black legislator, Robert G. Clark, is in a tough battle with former State Judge Webb Franklin, a conservative Republican.

Clark was the first black person since Reconstruction to win a seat in the Mississippi legislature, and this year he became the first to win a Democratic congressional primary. Right now, Clark appears to have an edge to become Mississippi's first black House member in this century, but much will depend on the abilities of the two candidates to turn out their vote.

Gov. William Winter, campaigning hard for Clark, has called the campaign a test of whether Mississippi has rejected its racist past. While the 2nd is the state's first black-majority district since passage of the 1965 Voting Rights Act, only about 40 percent of its registered voters are black.

In another Mississippi House contest, COPE-endorsed incumbent Wayne Dowdy, a Democrat, who won a 900-vote victory last year in a special election for the 4th District in the Jackson area, is being challenged by Liles Williams, a Republican, and Eddie L. McBride, a black who is running as an independent.

Close races

With a year in office, Dowdy is given a slight edge even though Williams has a financial advantage and McBride is running in a district where blacks constitute 45 percent of the population.

Tennessee has two close elections. In the new 4th District, Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker Jr.'s daughter, Cissy Baker, is pitted against James Cooper, a Democrat and son of the late Gov. Prentice Cooper. Despite her father's direct involvement in the race, Baker is seen finishing second to Cooper, who got off to an early start in the campaign.

In the 7th District, Memphis advertising executive Don Sundquist, a Republican, is squared off against Robert Clement, a former member of the State Public Service Commission and son of the late Gov. Frank G. Clement, in a battle to fill the seat of Beard who left to run for the Senate. Clement not only has name recognition but strength in the rural counties where conservative Democrats are dominant.

In Alabama, Democrats' prospects appear to be enhanced in the 2nd and 6th Districts. Billy Joe Camp, a member of the state Public Service Commission and longtime press secretary to former Gov. George C. Wallace, is the Democratic contender in the 2nd, giving nine-term Rep. William L. Dickinson a strong run. In the 6th, reapportionment has replaced many of the Republican neighborhoods with solid Democratic neighborhoods, helping the chances of Democratic nominee Benjamin L. Erdreich in his contest against Republican incumbent Albert Lee Smith Jr.

Reapportionment factor

In Georgia, the outcome of two key contests, in the Atlanta area's 4th and 5th Districts, will also be affected by reapportionment. In Florida and Texas, freshman congressmen are seeking re-election in districts that have rejected incumbents in the last three elections.

Two former Democratic governors are among candidates in the South's six gubernatorial contests, and both—Bill Clinton in Arkansas and George Wallace in Alabama—are rated favorites.

In Florida, the state house is viewed as safe for Democratic Gov. Robert Graham, who is seeking a second term against Republican Rep. L. A. (Skip) Bafalis.

Republican incumbent Lamar Alexander is favored to win a second term as governor of Tennessee, and Democratic incumbent Gov. Richard Riley is expected to gain a second term in South Carolina. In Georgia, Democratic State Rep. Joe Harris is running ahead of Republican State Sen. Robert H. Bell for the governorship.

Painters' pension funds to finance new housing

Pension fund assets of the Painters will be invested in new residential housing and members of the union will be given preference in mortgage commitments, President S. Frank Raftery announced.

Raftery said the union will seek to invest up to $30 million of pension fund assets—10 percent of its national investment portfolio—in mortgages for union-built homes at interest rates working families can afford.

Cities tentatively chosen for the home investment program are Portland, Ore.; San Diego, Fresno and Sacramento, Calif., Minneapolis and Chicago.

Texas governorship in the spotlight

Democrats are looking to expand their grip on governorships and their strength in congressional delegations in the Southwest, where they currently hold a slight overall advantage.

In the four southwestern states of Arizona, New Mexico, Texas and Oklahoma, Senate races are being held in all but Oklahoma and gubernatorial contests in all four.

One of the most colorful governor's contests has incumbent Republican William Clements waging a brawling battle against Democratic State Atty. Gen. Mark White.

In a large part, the race is a comparison of personalities. The 65-year-old governor is often abrasive in his remarks, attacking White's record as attorney general. In turn, White charges that Texas's first Republican governor since Reconstruction should be turned out of office because he is arrogant and lacking in compassion for the underprivileged and jobless.

Clements is courting the Mexican-American vote which traditionally goes Democratic. Mexican-Americans constitute over 20 percent of the state's population and about 15 percent of its voters. Four years ago, Clements got over 20 percent of this bloc.

White has seized on the sharp rise in the state's unemployment rate, from 6.7 percent in August to 8.4 percent in September. And he has attacked Clements for supporting a guest-worker program for undocumented workers as well as for encouraging northern workers to come to Texas at a time when its economy is faltering.

White has proven himself a tough campaigner, winning a three-way primary this year and, four years ago, defeating now-White House chief of staff James Baker in the attorney general's race. But Clements has the advantages of incumbency and a $10-million campaign chest—over twice as big as White's.

In the other statehouse races, Democratic incumbents Bruce Babbitt of Arizona and George Nigh of Oklahoma are favored to win second terms, while the New Mexico contest between Democratic Atty. Gen. Toney Anaya and former GOP State Sen. John Irick is leaning Democratic. Gov. Bruce King, a Democrat, is ineligible to seek re-election.

Three Senate contests

In the Senate races, labor is backing incumbents Lloyd Bentsen in Texas and Dennis DeConcini in Arizona, both Democrats, and challenger Jeff Bingaman, also a Democrat, in New Mexico. Bentsen and DeConcini are likely winners. Bingaman's chances against incumbent Republican Sen. Harrison Schmitt, seeking a second term, rest on how voters react to the Reagan Recession, which has produced an unemployment rate of 10.1 percent in a state where Democrats enjoy a nearly 2-to-1 registration advantage.

Among the 41 House races in the four-state area are a number of close contests where no clear favorite has emerged. One of these is in Texas, where redistricting has given Republican Jim Bradshaw a second chance at Congress.

The 42-year-old former Fort Worth city councilman got clobbered in his attempt two years ago to unseat House Majority Leader Jim Wright. Now he is running for one of three new seats awarded to Texas in the post-Census reapportionment.

In the 26th District, two-thirds of the voters went for Reagan in 1980, but the House race is in doubt because Bradshaw is running against Tom Vandergriff, mayor of Arlington, Tex., from 1951-77, a man many local politicians believe is the only Democrat who could carry such conservative territory. Vandergriff has a solid political base and is running as a conservative.

UTU pact completes national rail bargaining

The United Transportation Union approved a 39-month agreement with the nation's major railroads, winding up national bargaining in the rail industry.

The pact, which covers some 80,000 UTU members, generally follows the pattern agreed to by 12 other unions with railroad members. Total pay and fringe benefit increases could amount to 31.5-percent over the life of the agreement.

UTU members are scheduled to get checks Dec. 15 providing retroactive pay increases and cost-of-living adjustments dating back to Apr. 1, 1981.

Recession shapes battle lines in West

By John R. Oravec

The ravages of the Reagan Recession have enhanced Democratic prospects for picking up three governorships and a Senate seat in the Far West states on Nov. 2.

Five of the six states—Alaska, California, Nevada, Oregon and Washington—went for Ronald Reagan in the 1980 presidential election. In the process, two incumbent Democratic senators with strong pro-labor voting records—Warren Magnuson of Washington and Mike Gravel of Alaska—were dumped. Only Hawaii held against the Reagan sweep in the region.

The President again will be a factor in the congressional races. But this time, he could hurt more than help many of the GOP candidates.

With the recession deepening and unemployment soaring, Reagan's economic policies and opposition to jobs programs figure to be a greater liability for Republicans in the six western states than the President's polished television performances can offset. And, most Republican candidates have shunned close identification with Reagan.

On the other hand GOP incumbents and challengers alike are far outpacing Democrats in terms of campaign contributions and spending. That funding gap could jeopardize the party's chances of expected substantial gains in the region.

Here's a closer look at the six states:

California—Early in the campaign for the Senate, Gov. Edmund G. Brown (D) trailed San Diego Mayor Pete Wilson (R) by a wide margin in public opinion polls. But Brown has now pulled even. In one poll, he wiped out a 22-point deficit largely with the help of Wilson, who had suggested controversial changes in social security that could lead to cutbacks in benefits.

Wilson has since tried to shift from his conservative image, but it may not be too late to slow the momentum being built by Brown, who is running with strong labor backing. The seat is being vacated by Sen. S. I. Hayakawa (R), who compiled a COPE voting record of 13 right and 93 wrong on key issues of concern during his one term in the Senate.

In the gubernatorial race, COPE-endorsed Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley (D) continues to lead in the polls over Lt. Gov. George Deukmejian. A victory for Bradley on Nov. 2 would make him the nation's first elected black governor.

Both candidates are running low-key campaigns. Deukmejian is counting on carefully planned conservative support, while Bradley shows strong appeal with the traditional Democratic coalition of urban-minority-labor groups.

Democrats also have a chance of gaining a handful of Republican-held House seats. Long-entrenched Republican conservative incumbents Don H. Clausen and John H. Rousselot are trailing their Democratic challengers. Clausen sided with labor only 23 percent of the time on key votes; Rousselot, a mere 8 percent.

Nevada—Democratic Sen. Howard W. Cannon is favored to win a fifth term over Chic Hecht (R), a former state legislator. Cannon turned back a challenge from Rep. James D. Santini, a supporter of Reagan economic policies, in the Democratic primary. Hecht espouses the same conservative line. Cannon easily repelled attacks by the National Conservative Political Action Committee in the primary, and NCPAC has cranked up more anti-Cannon salvos for the Nov. 2 election.

In the statehouse contest, incumbent Republican Gov. Robert F. List is trailing Democratic Atty. Gen. Richard H. Bryan in the polls. List lacks the support of many Republicans, and the state has been plagued by the recession.

Nevada gained a seat in the House as a result of the population shift. Former Lt. Gov. Harry Reid (D) is a clear favorite in the 1st District over Peggy Cavnar (R). In the 2nd District, former state Sen. Mary Gojack (D) has a closer race with Barbara Vucanovich (R), an aide to Republican Sen. Paul Laxalt. Gojack challenged Laxalt in the 1980 Senate race.

Washington—Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D) appears well on his way to a sixth term against his overmatched Republican opponent, Doug Jewett. In five previous victories, Jackson has carried the state with at least 60 percent of the vote.

In the congressional contests, the five incumbent Democrats and two Republicans are clear favorites for re-election. In the state's new 8th District, drawn to favor Republicans in the Seattle suburbs, Mercer Island Mayor Beth Bland (D) is gaining on Rodney Chandler (R), a state legislator and former television news personality.

Oregon—Republicans could lose another statehouse with the defeat of Gov. Victor G. Atiyeh by Democratic State Sen. Ted Kulongoski, who is running a strong challenge. The Reagan Recession has hit Oregon hard, and Atiyeh is having problems trying to dissociate himself from the Reaganomics he earlier supported.

The three incumbent Democrats and one Republican are favored to win re-election to the House. In the state's new 2nd District—set up to favor Republicans—COPE-endorsed Larryann Willis (D) is running head-to-head with State Sen. Bob Smith (R).

Alaska—Democrats have a fair chance of wresting the governorship from Republicans. Bill Sheffield (D) is running a strong campaign against Tom Fink (R), whose conservative philosophy is making moderate Republicans uncomfortable. Incumbent Republican Gov. Jay S. Hammond is ineligible for a third term.

Rep. Don Young appears headed for re-election to keep the state's at-large House seat in the Republican column.

Hawaii—Republicans are having problems raising any meaningful challenge to the re-election drives of Sen. Spark M. Matsunaga, Gov. George Ariyoshi and Representatives Cecil Heftel and Daniel K. Akaka.

Tight races develop in mountain, plains area

Despite a number of sharply contested races, party lineups are expected to remain relatively unchanged in the nine western plains and mountain states.

The sector played a key role in the 1980 Ronald Reagan landslide and the Republican takeover of the Senate. But there appears little chance for new Republican gains even though the largely rural states have escaped the full brunt of the consequences from Reagan's policies.

Democrats figure on retaining their 3-to-2 edge in the Senate seats being contested in the nine states, as well as the 4-2-margin over Republicans in the six governorships up for election this year.

If economic problems trigger deeper voter resentment against Republicans on election day, Democrats could pick up at least three or four seats in the House.

The National Conservative Political Action Committee (NCPAC) has plowed large sums of money into media campaigns throughout the nine-state sector in an effort to oust key Democratic incumbents.

Here is a closer look at the area:

Colorado—Incumbent Democratic Gov. Richard D. Lamm is heavily favored to win a third term. Lamm has built a solid political base during his eight years in the statehouse and is at the height of his popularity. That leaves Republican challenger John D. Fuhr in a mismatch.

Although the Republican-controlled legislature redrew congressional districts, none of Colorado's three Democratic incumbent House members appears to be in trouble. Even Rep. Ray Kogovsek, whose 3rd District was chopped up and is under heavy attack by NCPAC, leads Republican challenger Tom Wiens by a substantial margin. The state's two Republican incumbents also are favored.

In Colorado's new 6th District, Republican Jack Swigert has only a slight lead over Democrat Steve Hogan, even though the district was shaped to benefit the GOP.

Nebraska—Republican Gov. Charles Thone is in a hard fight for survival against Democratic challenger Robert Kerrey, a virtual unknown until he won his party's primary. The state's economic problems and Thone's taxing policies have hurt him.

In the Senate race, Democratic incumbent Edward Zorinski is favored to defeat Republican James Keck. Zorinski failed to gain COPE endorsement because of his poor voting record on labor issues.

But in the second congressional district labor-backed Richard M. Fellman (D) is given a chance of ousting Rep. Hal Daub (R) because of the incumbent's ties to Reaganomics.

Kansas—Democratic Gov. John Carlin holds a narrow lead in his bid for re-election over challenger Sam Hardage in a state where the GOP has a majority of voters. Carlin was elected in 1978 with less than 50 percent of the vote.

Democrats have an opportunity to pick up the 2nd District congressional seat of retiring Republican Rep. Jim Jeffries. Their hopes are with Jim Slattery, a popular former state legislator who has COPE support but is being heavily outspent by his opponent Morris Kay, former GOP state chairman.

South Dakota—Republicans are favored to retain the statehouse with incumbent Gov. William J. Janklow, although Democratic challenger Mike O'Connor has made some inroads despite a poorly financed campaign.

Democrats stand a better chance of taking the at-large House seat remaining after reapportionment.

Democrat Thomas A. Daschle, 1st District incumbent, jumped to an early 20-point lead in opinion polls, and Republican Clint Roberts, 2nd District incumbent and a staunch supporter of Reagan policies, still trails by a wide margin. In key House votes, Daschle sided with labor 83 percent of the time; Roberts, 8 percent.

North Dakota—Sen. Quentin N. Burdick is strongly favored to win a fourth term over Republican opponent Gene Knorr, a former Washington lobbyist. Although NCPAC has poured heavy amounts of money into an anti-Burdick campaign.

In the state's at-large congressional contest, Rep. Byron L. Dorgan is a clear favorite to keep the seat in the Democratic column.

Idaho—Democratic Gov. John V. Evans is encountering a stiff challenge from Lt. Gov. Philip Batt, an upset winner in the Republican primary. Evans has repelled attempts by the Republican-controlled legislature to enact a "right-to-work" measure, while Batt has pledged that he would sign an R-T-W bill.

In the 2nd District House race, Democrats are looking to unseat Rep. George Hansen, who has been under fire for questionable financial dealings. Hansen's Democratic opponent, Richard Stallings, a college professor, has pulled ahead in some polls. Hansen has voted with labor only 8 percent of the time in his six terms.

Montana—Democratic Sen. John Melcher is a prime target of NCPAC, which expects to pour more than $200,000 into its effort to block his re-election. Melcher's early lead in the polls over Larry Williams (R) has been trimmed substantially.

But the state's labor movement has been developing effective voter registration and get-out-the-vote campaigns on behalf of Melcher.

Republicans may find themselves with a loss in the state's 2nd District where three-term Rep. Ron Marlenee is fighting a stiff challenge from Democrat Howard L. Lyman.

Utah—Republican Sen. Orrin G. Hatch has been fending off charges that he cares more about national conservative causes than about Utah's needs and this has slowed his re-election drive. But his Democratic challenger, Ted Wilson, mayor of Salt Lake City, has an uphill battle in this conservative state.

Ogden Mayor A. Stephen Dirks is mounting a definite threat to Republican Rep. James V. Hansen in the 1st District, which has been redrawn since the incumbent was narrowly elected in 1980.

Wyoming—Democratic Gov. Ed Herschler is in a tight race for a third term with challenger Warren A. Morton in a predominantly Republican state. But Herschler has the support of northern Republican ranchers, and is favored to win.

Republican Sen. Malcolm Wallop also is expected to win re-election, despite a strong challenge by Rodger McDaniel, a former state senator.

Shunning the 'Course'

THE CANDIDATES in this election, Democrats and Republicans alike, have already rendered their verdict on Reaganomics.

It's just not a politically saleable product.

Democrats, with good reason, are running against the President's program and the sorry record of this Administration.

That's not hard to do. The lengthened lines of the unemployed, the closed plants and idled machines, the long depression in construction and the rise in bankruptcies all testify to the punctured bubble of supply-side economics.

And a lot of Republicans are talking about constituent service these days.

The President has his hard-core defenders who echo his "Stay the Course" slogan. But there are also the pragmatists who look at their districts and take pains to put the widest possible distance between President Reagan's policies and their own re-election campaigns.

Some have even asked openly that the President please stay out of their districts—at least until after the election.

The message they are getting from their constituents is that it's time to "Change the Course."

The Decontrol Issue

IF THIS Administration is serious about holding down inflation, it will drop its plans to make decontrol of natural gas prices a key goal in the new Congress.

Prices to consumers have risen steadily under the generous-to-industry policies of the Federal Energy Regulatory Commissions; the only possible reason for decontrol is to swell oil and gas industry profits beyond any reasonable level.

Existing law allows the decontrol of about half the nation's natural gas supply by 1985. Industry doesn't want to wait, and it has a friend in the White House.

The strategy, according to the Oil & Gas Journal, "is to lie low through November" and then launch a "grass roots" campaign.

A labor-consumer alliance—the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition—has a grass roots campaign of its own—to alert voters to the threat of triple-digit gas bills and to get candidates on record for keeping the lid on prices.

The answers should be given now, not after the election.

A Key Role for COPE

ITS A RARE voter who is well informed about the candidates running for the state legislature, the voting records of incumbents or the positions of those seeking office for the first time.

Even the better local newspapers— those that cover the issues and campaigns of congressional and gubernatorial candidates—give scant attention to the contests for the legislature. A School Board election is more fully covered.

When Congress is in session, careful readers are able to find out how their representatives and senators voted on major legislation.

Too seldom, however, is the vote of a state representative or a state senator noted.

That's why the COPE screening process that leads to labor endorsements of candidates for the legislature as well as other local, state and national offices is so very important.

The union men and women who interview the candidates know the issues and the legislative records. They know the attempts to undermine consumer protections and to repeal prevailing wage laws. They know, from labor's lobbyists in the state capitals, who stood up for workers when it counted.

Equally important, the candidates being interviewed know that if elected they will be held accountable. They will be measured on performance, not promise.

A COPE endorsement is important—to candidates and voters alike.

Jobless workers' trials reflect desperation, fear

By Press Associates, Inc.

"I took a gun to myself. I pulled the trigger . . . I either moved my head—I don't remember. I'm sorry for doing it because I thought it was a quick way out of this."

His voice choked with emotion, a steelworker unemployed since July 1981—the start of the Reagan Recession—described to a congressional committee how he almost killed himself with his hunting rifle.

Albert Bragg, 33, of New Cumberland, W.Va., described the despair he felt over not being able to find work after losing his job at the Crucible Steel Plant in Midland, Pa.

"I got two little kids," he told the panel. "And the little one said to me—Angel said, 'Daddy, we'll make it.' "

Letter to Reagan

Bragg said he later found Angel writing a letter to President Reagan, telling him about the suicide attempt. Bragg intercepted the letter.

I asked her why she wrote it, he said, and she replied: "Well, Dad, ever since that man has been in office, you ain't worked." And that, Bragg added, is "the God's truth."

Bragg told the panel that Ronald Friess, president of the Steelworkers local at Crucible, sent a telegram to Reagan telling him that 5,000 workers were losing their jobs at the plant.

Bragg said Friess, who was in the hearing room, got a reply from the White House which said, "This matter is not one of overriding interest to this Administration."

On Oct. 15, one week after steelworker Bragg testified, the Crucible mill shut down.

Others appearing before the congressional Joint Economic Committee told similar tales.

Harry Hicks had eight and a half years in at a Chevrolet plant in Flint, Mich. The plant, which once employed 5,000 workers, is down to 2,600. Hicks, a member of Auto Workers Local 598, was laid off a week before last Christmas. He has a wife and three kids, a mortgage, a car on which he cancelled the insurance, and his extended jobless benefits run out in January.

Can't find work

Donald Booth of Glen Rock, Pa., had over eight years with Bethlehem Steel. A member of Steelworkers Local 24, he has been laid off almost all of the last 18 months. "I don't know what to tell my kids about why I can't buy food sometimes," he said. "I don't know what to tell them when they ask me why they can't have new shoes. I go out and try to find work. I can't find work."

Nolan Anderson, an Auto Workers' representative at a General Motors plant in Baltimore, appeared with his wife, Cheryl. "We have it bad, my family," Anderson said. "There's 4,000 other people that have been off down there for 16 months. They have it bad, too."

Asked if people want to work, Anderson said he certainly thought so, adding: "We've lost our homes, families have split up, children have left—a multitude of problems that come from no income, that come from making $20-30,000 a year and then a year after you're laid off, you have nothing, no place to turn to."

No health insurance

Ida Hines, a social science teacher in Baltimore and a member of the American Federation of Teachers, said she never had been unemployed before. After 15 years in the school system, last May she received a layoff notice; at the same time, she learned her daughter had multiple sclerosis. The head of the household, with four children, she is without a job and without health insurance and finds it "very frightening."

The talk of economic recovery, she said, is a "cover-up" and "I don't believe it."

These are real people, the "new poor" created by the millions by President Reagan and his old-fangled Reaganomics.

Long-term aid to jobless cut in nine states

Jobless workers in California and eight other states will lose up to 13 weeks of eligibility for unemployment compensation, the Labor Dept. announced.

The cutoff, which leaves only 14 states paying extended benefits beyond the 26 weeks provided by state law, is the result of new regulations enacted by Congress at the insistence of the Reagan Administration

Its effect has been to reduce the maximum duration of unemployment compensation at a time when the jobless rate has hit a 42-year high.

Besides California, states affected by the latest benefit cutoff are Alaska, Arizona, Louisiana, Montana, Nevada, North Carolina, Rhode Island and Utah.

The Labor Dept. noted that Michigan, Oregon and Wisconsin are very close to the new cutoff line and could be added to the list in the near future.

An estimated 135,000 unemployed persons in the nine states are now drawing extended benefits. Most of them will be able to shift to a temporary federal program Congress enacted last summer, which provides up to 10 weeks of federal benefits. The 10-week period starts after all other benefits have been exhausted.

Benefits triggered off

Thus, workers in states that still pay extended benefits would have a maximum of 49 weeks of payments, but the maximum for states that have triggered-off the extended benefits program would be 46 weeks. States with less severe unemployment receive less than the full 10 weeks of federal payments—either six weeks or eight weeks.

Ironically, all states provided 13 weeks of extended benefits when unemployment was less severe. But Congress and the Administration first eliminated the national trigger and then sharply raised the state trigger for determining when unemployment was bad enough to begin the extended benefits program.

That cutback was compounded by changing the rules so that workers receiving extended benefis would no longer be counted toward the trigger point. In effect, the deeper the recession and the longer people are out of work, the fewer the states that pay extended benefits.

Dump It!

Higher jobless rates likely as economic growth slows economic forecasting project at Georgia State University, told a hearing of the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

Ratajczak predicted that interest rates will begin rising again early next year and that unemployment will peak "slightly in excess of 10.5 percent" at the end of 1982.

"An 11-percent unemployment rate is not out of the realm of possibility," he added.

Other economists appearing before the panel were equally pessimistic about the prospects for recovery and an improvement in the jobs picture. They included Allen Sinai of Data Resources Inc. of Lexington, Mass., Michael Evans of Evans Economics, and Prof. Francis Bator of Harvard University.

The government announcement on real GNP came on the heels of a Federal Reserve Board report that the nation's factories operated at a seasonally adjusted 69.1 percent of capacity last month, a seven-month low. AFL-CIO Economist Bill Cunningham said the drop in the factory utilization rate was "yet another sign that the recession is still with us."

Last month's operating rate was the lowest since an adjusted 69 percent in March 1975, near the bottom of the 1973-75 recession. The September operating rate compared with 70.1 percent in July and 78.3 percent a year ago.

Earlier, the Commerce Dept. issued a report showing that industrial production fell again in September, indicating the economy's weakness in the face of a recession that has gripped the country since July 1981. Factory output dropped six-tenths of 1 percent after decreasing five-tenths of 1 percent in August. Output has fallen 10.8 percent during the recession.

Bankruptcies still mount

Commercial and industrial failures continued to mount. Dun & Bradstreet, Inc., the credit-rating service, said 554 concerns failed in the holiday-shortened week ended Oct. 14, a slight dip from 598 the week before but almost double the 284 failed firms reported in the comparable week a year earlier.

A couple of potentially bright spots for the economy surfaced in two other Commerce reports. One showed housing starts up 14.4 percent last month, while the other estimated personal income rose slightly, by three-tenths of 1 percent, and consumer spending increased a full 1 percent in September.

The slight rise in personal income came even though there was a drop in wages and salaries, mainly in the commodity-producing sector. Increases in transfer payments, which include unemployment benefits; interest and dividend income; and other non-wage income offset the wage-salary loss.

The increase in housing starts in September offset a 16-percent drop posted in August, and continued a zig-zag trend since April. Most of the increase was for multi-family structures and reflected a flood of federally subsidized units.

Building permits, a measure of future construction activity, were issued at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.038 million last month. The rate is 17 percent higher than the August rate and 24 percent above the September 1981 level.

In its report on economic growth, the Commerce Dept. said inflation as measured by its so-called GNP "implicit price deflator" was 5.4 percent in the third quarter of this year. That compared with 4.6 percent in the second quarter.

No dancing in the streets

Protesting a lockout by the American Ballet Theater, members of the Musical Artists set up a stand near New York's Lincoln Center. They were selling buttons, T-shirts and photos to supplement assistance from the union. ABT has cancelled the troupe's performances and rehearsals. The AGMA contract with the dance company expired Aug. 15 and negotiations broke off Oct. 9. ABT had locked out the dancers in 1980 over a contract dispute.

Boucher takes post with Musical Artists

New York—Gene Boucher has been named to succeed DeLloyd Tibbs as executive secretary of the Guild of Musical Artists. Tibbs has retired after 26 years service with AGMA, including 12 years as executive secretary.

Boucher, who has been president of the 5,500-member union since 1977, accepted the AGMA board's appointment to assume the new duties after completing his singing commitments with the New York Metropolitan Opera for the coming season.

AGMA's board of governors also elected First Vice President Don Yule to succeed Boucher as president. Yule is a basso with the New York City Opera.

Auto Workers weigh move in Chrysler talks

Detroit—The Auto Workers' 130-member Chrysler Council was scheduled to meet Oct. 21 to consider what course to take in the union's stalemated talks with the Chrysler Corp.

The latest development in the strained negotiations followed the company's rejection of a UAW request for an improved contract proposal. More than 70 percent of the company's hourly paid workers earlier voted against a tentative accord that would have tied general wage increases to future profits while restoring cost-of-living adjustments Chrysler workers gave up to help the automaker avoid bankruptcy.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said Chrysler's refusal to grant immediate pay raises "greatly enhances" the possibility of a strike. Chrysler workers now earn about $2 an hour less than their counterparts at the General Motors Corp. and Ford Motor Co.

Fraser said that no announcement would come until after the Chrysler Council meeting. The union must give the company 24 hours' notice of a strike, meaning a walkout could not begin before Oct. 22.

50,000 workers affected

Fraser and other top UAW officers met for a day to consider possible responses to Chrysler's stand, and the union's bargaining team met Oct. 20. The final decision will be made by the union's Chrysler Council. Approximately 50,000 UAW members are affected by the talks.

The union's rejection of the tentative agreement marked the first time in 35 years that rank-and-file UAW members have turned down a contract settlement with any major automaker and the first time ever a comprehensive Chrysler pact has been rejected.

Following the company's refusal to meet the union's request for an improved pay package, Thomas W. Miner, Chrysler vice president for industrial relations, termed the rejected contract a "final offer" and said the firm would take a strike if necessary.

The rejected contract would have restored COL adjustments to workers beginning in December. Quarterly wage bonuses would have been paid through the second quarter of 1983 only if Chrysler were profitable enough. Chrysler workers have not had a pay raise in nearly two years.

Reagan's stand on funds perils social security

He said the White House couldn't discuss specific remedies until a bipartisan commission makes its recommendations later this year.

But that same day's Washington Post newspaper quoted "a senior Administration official" as declaring that the President strongly opposes moving up a scheduled increase in the social security payroll tax to meet the system's short-term funding problem—caused by recession, unemployment and inflation.

There would be no funding crisis if unemployment were at the same level as when Reagan was campaigning for office, Seidman noted. By present projections, the retirement fund will shift from deficit to surplus in the 1990s.

Last year, the Reagan Administration proposed a drastic slash in social security benefits—and pulled back its proposal after a torrent of public protests.

Earlier this month, just before Congress adjourned until after the elections, it sent a resolution to the President expressing opposition "to any proposal to impose a means test on eligibility for the Medicare program," which is one of the ingredients of the social security system.

Labor mobilizes 'march to polls'

70,000 union members turn out in San Francisco for "jobs and justice" election march and rally.

All-out drive pressed for Election Day

By David L. Perlman

In San Francisco, 70,000 enthusiastic union members marched up Market Street in a three-hour parade that AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed "a good warmup" for labor's "march to the polls" on Election Day.

It was the city's biggest labor turnout in decades, with five times the number of participants that had been expected.

Union members paraded through the streets of Charleston, W. Va., held a massive election rally in Peoria, Ill., and demonstrated in Omaha, Neb.

In Toledo, Ohio, retired UAW member Charles Johnson, 67, was interviewed by a reporter as he limped back from door-to-door campaigning. "I had to come back to change my shoes," he said. "I was getting blisters."

Workers who have lost their jobs in the Reagan Recession are staffing COPE telephone banks in key congressional districts, calling union members to urge support for labor-endorsed candidates—and most of all to urge them to vote.

The message AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue brought to a Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers convention in Minneapolis was being echoed by local union leaders in every part of the country:

"Go directly to the local COPE campaign office. Volunteer. Stuff envelopes for the last mailing in the few days left to us. Use that phone . . . Work like your job depends on it, because it does."

Mobilizing volunteers

More than in any previous non-presidential election, labor was mobilizing its human resources to counter the enormous advantage in campaign financing that candidates hostile to labor's goals usually enjoy.

A special target of labor's effort was to bring the nation's 11 million unemployed to the polls—despite the conventional wisdom that the unemployed don't bother to vote.

"We don't believe that," Kirkland told the rally at San Francisco's Civic Center Plaza that concluded the march. "Millions

South Africans share George Meany award

By James M. Shevis

Two champions of black rights in South Africa—one black, the other white—were honored by the AFL-CIO for their efforts in the overall, worldwide struggle for human rights.

"It is a tribute to the human spirit that, even in a country like South Africa, there are men and women of courage across the color line who dare to challenge the oppressor, undeterred by the consequences," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in presenting the 1982 George Meany Human Rights Award jointly to Dr. Neil Aggett and Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi.

Dr. Aggett, a white officer of the African Food & Canning Workers, a union of black workers, was honored posthumously. He was only 28 years old when found dead early this year in a Johannesburg jail, where police had held him without charge.

Black liberation leader

Buthelezi is head of the largest black liberation movement in South Africa and chief minister of the 5-million member Zulu tribe. He has led relentless opposition to the practice of apartheid since assuming the chieftainship in 1957. Apartheid is the official government policy of racial segregation and political and economic discrimination against non-European groups.

Aggett and Buthelezi join the Polish labor federation, Solidarnosc (Solidarity), as the only recipients of the award since it was established two years ago by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The 1981 inaugural award was to have been accepted for Solidarity by its chairman, Lech Walesa, but he was unable to leave Poland.

Aggett could well have chosen a life of privilege and station that comes with being white and a member of a profession in South Africa. Instead, he chose to give himself to the struggle to improve the quality of life of the country's millions of impoverished blacks.

As Aggett's sister, Mrs. Jill Aggett Burger, observed in remarks at the award presentation, he "became increasingly aware of the glaring gaps which existed between the haves and have-nots in South African society, largely based on race," and felt the need to become involved in community health programs in South Africa.

"He became particularly aware that the problems he was dealing with were not only medical problems but basically socio-

Postal workers win back pay of $400 million

The U.S. Postal Service has agreed to pay $400 million to some 800,000 present and former employees in settlement of back pay claims based on violations of the Fair Labor Standards Act over a four-year period.

The wage-hour violations date from May 1, 1974, when postal and federal workers were first brought under the FLSA. Persons employed by the Postal Service at any time between May 1, 1974, and May 1, 1978, are in line for payments.

More than 80,000 postal workers won a $60 million back pay settlement in 1978 through a private lawsuit brought with the encouragement of their unions. After that precedent, Labor Sec. Ray Marshall filed a wage-hour suit against the Postal Service on behalf of all eligible postal workers.

The additional $400 million settlement will come from a contingency fund the Postal Service established after its liability for four years of underpayments became obvious.

Top officials of the Letter Carriers and the Postal Workers welcomed the settlement agreement which was reached in negotiations between the Labor Dept. and

Potshot from the Chamber

Know what causes unemployment? Unemployment insurance, that's what.

How do you solve it? Simple, says Reaganomics cheerleader Richard Lesher, president of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce: "You make it less attractive for people to sit on their ass."

A lot of people "are making an art of going into the workforce long enough to qualify for unemployment," Lesher told San Francisco Chronicle reporter Harre W. Demoro last week. "If you don't give them a big unemployment check they will get off their ass and go to work."

Lesher's theory is being market-tested by 7.1 million jobless Americans—63 percent of the 11.3 million total—who get no unemployment benefits at all. Among the 4.2 million who do, the average benefit is $115 a week. In 21 states, maximum benefits are set well below minimum-wage levels.

Lesher said he expects 80 of the 100 Chamber-backed "pro-business" candidates to win in next Tuesday's elections. "No way" will there be heavy Republican losses in the House, he said. It might even be "a wash."

That's because "unemployment is what the liberals are crying about the most. The fact is that unemployment affects only a small part of the population."

While Lesher pontificated, 70,000 San Franciscans were preparing to march in a pre-election rally for jobs and justice. In New York City, 2,000 job hunters were camped outside a Carpenters Union hall where they waited up to four days to apply for 400 apprenticeships that will open up over the next two years.

And in Washington, 35 more newly unemployed people, caught in a second wave of layoffs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, were weighing their ex-boss's views from a new perspective.

Main Street in Peoria is jammed with 5,000 demonstrators voicing their concerns over the impact of Reaganomics on the erosion of jobs in the central Illinois area.

A scene repeated throughout the country on Oct. 19.

Countdown to election

Leaflet distribution, rallies, demonstrations and soup lines focused the labor movement's attention on failing economic policies of President Reagan and his supporters in Congress as Election Day neared. In communities throughout the country, union members and officials joined in campaigns to elect COPE-endorsed candidates at all levels of government. Much of the activity centered on AFL-CIO efforts to spur a massive voter turnout at the polls Nov. 2.

At a coat factory in Middletown, N.Y., Rep. Peter Peyser campaigns with members of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

In southern California, Los Angeles County AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. William Robertson on the Senate campaign trail with Gov. Edmund G. Brown.

President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees distributes voter information bulletins at Pittsburgh's municipal hall.

Rubber Workers President Milan Stone and Wisconsin congressional candidate Paul Offner at an Eau Clair plant gate.

Paperworkers President Wayne Glenn and congressional candidate Bob Clement, center, at a shift change in Clarksville, Tenn.

Volunteers from the Government Employees and the Firemen & Oilers leaflet federal workers in Virginia.

As Reagan sought to rally his party-line supporters in Omaha to "stay the course," Nebraska unions protested soaring unemployment with picket lines and soup lines.

political problems due to poverty, unemployment and poor living conditions," she said.

"It was at this point that Neil made the very serious decision in his life not to follow the normal route of the white medical practitioner in South Africa, where the material rewards are very high."

In one of his letters, Aggett said he saw the "limitations of medicine in an oppressive society. . . . What was needed was an end to oppressive conditions, if the health of society was to improve. And the key to this was in the organization of the people, especially the workers."

As Transvaal regional secretary for the Food & Canning Workers, Aggett was viewed by authorities as a threat because of his association with an independent group of black trade unionists.

Aggett and his girl friend, Dr. Liz Floyd, both of whom had been under constant surveillance by the authorities for some time, were arrested, put in solitary confinement, and detained for 70 days. He was found hanged in his cell on Feb. 5, fourteen hours after compiling an affidavit complaining of security police assault and torture. Dr. Floyd has had to seek psychiatric aid as a result of her ordeal.

46th prison death

Aggett—the 46th person and the only white to die in security police detention since 1963—serves as "a lesson and an inspiration," Kirkland told some 150 union leaders and international affairs experts, including Lawrence Eagleburger, deputy U.S. Secretary of State for Political Affairs, who attended the award presentation.

Aggett's example is also "a rebuke to the rulers of South Africa who regard black people as mere pawns in a cynical game of power," Kirkland said.

The award cited Aggett for "his commitment to the cause of the oppressed people of South Africa, for his selfless service to the needy and dispossessed, for his dedication to the cause of labor in his country, and for his unremitting fight for an equal society in South Africa." Dr. John A. Aggett accepted the award for his son.

In presenting the award to Chief Buthelezi, Kirkland described the 54-year-old black leader as "the single most potent force in resisting the onward rush of apartheid" by refusing to accept the so-called independence of the autonomous black state of Kwa Zulu.

Government policy

Under its homelands policy, South Africa's white government has established four independent black states and is preparing others, including Kwa Zulu, for independence by granting them self-government.

Buthelezi has characterized the move as a sham and a fraud, an abdication of the Zulus' claim to rights as South African citizens. If Kwa Zulu leaders were to accept the government's scheme, Buthelezi has said, "they would go down in history as betrayers of each and every thing our forebears stood for, suffered for, and fought for. There can be no right more inviolable than the right to be a citizen of the country of your birth."

In addition to his role as chief minister of the Zulus, Buthelezi heads a potentially powerful national political base, the Inkatha Yenkululeko Yesizwe (National Cultural Liberation movement). Inkatha has a paid-up membership of about 350,000, making it the largest black liberation movement in South Africa, which includes many black trade unionists.

Growing pains

Black trade unionism in South Africa has continually been dogged by schisms and internal strife — "growing pains," as Buthelezi put it. "The more recent trade union scene indicates a move away from under-achievement and disunity," he said.

Earlier, Buthelezi told reporters he favors a proposed loan from the International Monetary Fund to South Africa as long as the government is not given carte blanche to use it on arms. Other conditions for the loan, he said, should include equal pay to black workers for equal work, allowing black workers to rise to higher positions, and union participation in settling labor problems.

In a statement on the proposed IMF loan, Kirkland urged the United States government to investigate carefully to see that certain conditions are met. For one thing, he said, the IMF should obtain guarantees from the South African government of its support for the principle of freedom of association expressed in the International Labor Organization's Convention No. 87.

Unionists detained

Kirkland also reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's longstanding condemnation of apartheid, called for release of all trade unionists now under detention without charges having been brought against them, and assurances that the South African government would honor fair labor standards for all its people. South Africa's 20-million blacks far outnumber its 4.7-million whites and nearly 3-million Coloreds and Asians. Coloreds are persons of mixed-race descent.

In support of South Africa's black trade unionists, the AFL-CIO established a special labor fund at its 1981 convention, encouraging affiliated unions and other groups to contribute to it.

The George Meany award, established in memory of the late AFL-CIO leader and his commitment to the cause of human rights and dignity throughout the world, consists of plaques and $5,000 each to Chief Buthelezi and Dr. Aggett's family, which will use the money to continue an inquiry into his death.

Human rights heroes

George Meany Award for 1982 was shared by two heroes in the struggle for human rights in South Africa, Dr. Neil Aggett and Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi. Aggett was honored posthumously. His sister, Jill Aggett Burger, and his father, Dr. J. A. Aggett, attended the award presentation and accepted the award from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, along with Buthelezi, the head of the largest black liberation movement in South Africa.

Technology, job issues spell growth for broadcast union

Toronto—The Broadcast Employees & Technicians' ninth constitutional convention focused on the challenge posed by rapid technological change in the industry along with employer attempts to use the economic climate as an excuse to erode union conditions.

NABET President Edward M. Lynch, in his report to the delegates, noted that the union's membership had increased by 50 percent since the last convention in 1978, on top of a previous 50-percent jump in the 1974-78 period.

Lynch credited the gains to several factors including "the technological revolution" in broadcasting which has increased workers' concerns over job security on the one hand while opening new job opportunities on the other.

He also reported that NABET has responded to the concerns of members by stepping up the union's organizing activities achieving a higher than average rate of representation election victories.

The union has a right to be proud of its successes, Lynch said, but he stressed that holding on to gains "is going to become increasingly difficult and will require our undivided attention and the solidarity of all the people that we represent . . . in a very sophisticated, highly technologically advancing industry."

Lynch, who has been president since 1971, was re-elected without opposition as was Vice President James P. Nolan.

Robert W. Lind of Chicago was elected secretary-treasurer over William A. Frank of Buffalo. Duane R. Corder, who had served as secretary-treasurer for 11 years, did not seek re-election.

Taking part in the sessions were 67 delegates representing 10,145 active members in NABET's U.S. locals.

The fully autonomous NABET Canadian international union also held its convention in Toronto where 58 delegates represented the union's 4,724 Canadian members. Joint sessions between the fraternally linked organizations also were conducted.

The delegates adopted several resolutions to streamline provisions of the union's constitution. In other action, they affirmed the right to organize as "both a human and legal right" of workers and pointed to the outlawing of Solidarity in Poland, the murder of labor organizers in El Salvador, and the harsh treatment of striking Air Traffic Controllers in the United States as "notorious examples" of repression of unions under diverse political systems.

Donahue keynote in New Hampshire rips Reagan role

Bedford, N.H.—A rousing speech by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue stressing the importance of labor's participation in the Nov. 2 elections highlighted the 26th annual convention of the New Hampshire State AFL-CIO.

Donahue assailed the Administration's economic policies that enrich the wealthy at the expense of the poor and the middle class. He charged that President Reagan has turned his back on the people who are most in need—the unemployed, the sick, the disabled, and the elderly.

The delegates to the three-day convention adopted resolutions denouncing the Reagan Recession, urging voter registration reform and support of Solidarity Day II (Election Day), and endorsed the candidacies of Democrats Gov. Hugh J. Gallen, Rep. Norman D'Amours in the 1st District, and Robert Dupay in the 2nd District.

Frank Emig, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, congratulated the State AFL-CIO for successfully defeating an attempt to push through a so-called right-to-work bill in the last session of the legislature. He warned that conservative elements in the state might try again in the coming legislative session.

The convention included a series of workshops on issues confronting labor as well as a panel discussion on trends in the labor movement.

Other resolutions adopted were measures backing legislation on workplace chemical labeling, restrictions on the use of lie detectors, and enactment of the Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act.

Illinois labor gives verdict on Reaganomics

Springfield—President Reagan's economic performance and policies came under sharp attack in resolutions adopted by the 25th annual convention of the Illinois State AFL-CIO and in remarks by union leaders and Democratic candidates.

State Federation President Robert G. Gibson reminded the 1,600 delegates that the election Nov. 2 will be judgment day for the President's economic policies.

"When the votes are counted, if we act with energy and ingenuity we will render our verdict on the Administration: guilty of economic disaster."

Former U.S. Sen. Adlai E. Stevenson, Democratic candidate for governor, said Illinois cannot afford to wait "for a Reagan recovery that is always just around the corner. In this world there is no standing still. Illinois will push ahead or it will continue to sink. I want to push ahead."

Stevenson, the COPE-endorsed candidate, told delegates he will support prevailing wage requirements for state-financed projects, a change from earlier campaign comments.

Gov. James R. Thompson (R) steered clear of national economic issues. He reminded the convention of his support for the prevailing wage and his opposition to anti-labor laws.

Rep. Harold Washington (D-Ill.) described Reaganomics as a power grab to take from the poor and give to the rich, "to take from the needy and give to the greedy."

Washington called for the defeat of legislators, governors and mayors who support the Administration's economic policies as "the way to checkmate Mr. Reagan. . . . That will slow him down in 1983. And in 1984 there is only one answer for the kind of thing he has done to us: Get rid of him."

Brian Baschnagel, player representative of the Chicago Bears for the National Football League Players Association, thanked the delegates for AFL-CIO support of the players' strike against the owners and discussed the key issues in the dispute.

In other convention action, the delegates:

- Made public employee bargaining, including the agency shop, a top priority in legislative goals.
- Supported the economic programs the AFL-CIO has presented to Congress.
- Supported the renewed drive for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Other speakers included U.S. Senators Alan J. Dixon (D) and Charles H. Percy (R); John Perkins, national COPE director; James Freeman, AFL-CIO Region 1 director, and Stanley L. Johnson, president emeritus of the State AFL-CIO.

of people who have never been unemployed before in their lives have not subsided into apathy. They will turn out in righteous indignation," he predicted.

Leaders of two big unaffiliated unions—Sec.-Treas. Ray Schoessling of the Teamsters and President Jim Herman of the Longshoremen's & Warehousemen's Union—joined AFL-CIO speakers at the rally.

An Associated Press account conveyed the flavor of the occasion:

"The crowd of carpenters, teachers, engineers, grocery clerks, newspaper workers, longshoremen, steel workers, auto workers and other trades cheered wildly" speakers urging votes "for jobs and justice."

This election will determine the tilt of Congress during the next two years of the Reagan Administration—and will at least influence the state of the economy.

In a number of the 36 gubernatorial elections being held Nov. 2, and in contests for state legislatures, the outcome will determine whether states copycat Reaganomics or try to compensate for its hardships.

All 435 House seats are up this year, and the result of about 75 closely contested races will determine whether mainstream Democrats or a conservative coalition will have effective control of the House.

The present lineup, with two vacancies assigned to the party last holding the seats, is 243 Democrats and 192 Republicans. A scattering of Republicans earned COPE endorsement. But in general, the bigger the Democratic gain in House seats, the stronger the voter message for a change in course.

Off-year tradition

Reapportionment and an off-year tradition of low voter turnout make forecasts even more difficult than usual. But with unemployment so high, Republicans will probably claim victory if the Democratic pickup is held below 20 seats. A gain of 10 to 15 seats would be the "normal" pattern. Republicans gained 11 House seats in the first congressional election after Jimmy Carter was elected President; the Democratic gain after Richard Nixon's first two years in the White House was 12 seats.

Open seats, without an incumbent seeking re-election, are the congressional districts where party switches are most likely to occur.

This year, coupled with the reshuffling caused by the post-census reapportionment, there are 58 open House seats. Of these, 41 are in districts that Ronald Reagan carried in the presidential vote two years ago.

The arithmetic of this election leaves only a slim chance that the Democrats can take over control of the Senate.

Counting Virginia's retiring Harry F. Byrd, Jr., as a Democrat since he is part of the party's caucus in the Senate, Republicans now hold a 54-46 edge.

But only 13 of the 33 Senate seats up for election on Nov. 2 are held by Republicans, and several of the Democratic seats have been considered vulnerable. Democrats would have to win 25 of the 33 Senate elections to take control.

GOP outlook dims

Nevertheless, the once-bright chances of further Republican pickups have greatly dimmed, and two years from now Republicans will have 19 Senate seats to defend to only 14 for Democrats.

Democrats hold 20 of the 36 governorships up for election this year and have prospects of taking over several Midwest statehouses now held by Republicans.

Kirkland told the San Francisco rally that the best hope labor's foes have in this recession-battered economy is that workers and the unemployed won't bother to go to the polls; off-year turnout in the recent past has seldom been much above one-third of the potential electorate.

In the few remaining days, he urged, the trade union movement's job "is to help every citizen we can reach to make the connection between his vote and his livelihood."

Court rebuffs Congress bid to 'veto' rules

A legislative veto of regulations issued by Executive Branch agencies is unconstitutional, a federal appellate court ruled.

The 8-0 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia struck down the "two-house veto" Congress had written into a 1980 law dealing with the Federal Trade Commission.

Last May, both the House and the Senate adopted resolutions disapproving an FTC regulation that would have required used car dealers to inform buyers of any known defects in the cars they purchase.

Challenge upheld

Two consumer groups challenged the congressional veto power, and the full appellate court agreed that it was unconstitutional.

Earlier, a three-judge panel in a different case had invalidated a law affecting an energy regulation agency that allowed a "one-house veto" through a resolution of disapproval passed by either the House or the Senate.

An immigration case involving the one-house veto, which originated in another appellate court, has been accepted for review by the Supreme Court.

The unanimous decision by the D.C. Circuit allowed the used car regulations to be put into effect, but the FTC said it doesn't plan to reinstate them as long as there is a possibility that the Supreme Court will eventually rule on the issue.

Congress has written some form of legislative veto into more than 100 laws. Court challenges have stressed the usurpation of Executive Branch functions by Congress and noted that resolutions disapproving regulations differ from laws in that they don't require a presidential signature.

Big contributor

Both the House and Senate voted by big margins to disapprove the disclosure requirements on used cars after a major lobbying campaign by the National Automobile Dealers Association, which has been a major contributor to congressional campaigns.

Consumers Union of the United States and Public Citizen brought the court challenge that led to the appellate court's 8-0 ruling.

Court rejects damage claim against striking fire fighters

Jackson, Tenn.—The Tennessee Supreme Court has knocked down an effort by a Memphis property owner to collect $1.8 million from the Fire Fighters and a local union for damages allegedly incurred during a 1978 strike.

By a 4-1 decision, the state's highest court ruled out the plaintiff's argument that because the work stoppage was allegedly "illegal," the city fire fighters and their union were "legally liable to private citizens for the inadequate rendition of municipal services."

Two of the complaints in the original suit had already been overturned by the state's court of appeals.

That court found that the plaintiff had no "enforceable rights" under a memorandum of understanding between the city of Memphis and Local 1784 of the Fire Fighters, an agreement that had expired four months before the 1978 strike action.

The appeals court had also found that the local union bore no liability "under principles of negligence" as a result of the strike action.

The state supreme court upheld these findings and went further, ruling that there were no possible grounds for a judgment that Local 1784's job action had constituted a "public nuisance" under the common law.

The complainant, Howard Fulenwider, said a fire that started in a shed the late evening of July 1, 1978, had spread to a commercial building he owned and burned for several hours.

His complaint charged that because of the srike, the Memphis Fire Dept. dispatched an "insufficient" number of trained men and equipment. There was no allegation that the striking fire fighters had tried to interfere with the department's response to the fire alarm.

"Secondary or incidental harm" caused as a byproduct of the work stoppage is not a basis for a claim of damages, the state supreme court declared in reversing the decision against Local 1784.

IAFF President John A. Gannon hailed the state supreme court's decision as "a major step to end harassment of fire fighters, and of other public employees, when collective bargaining breaks down and job actions result."

Much of this problem "could be constructively solved by adoption of fair collective bargaining laws covering fire fighters and other uniformed services in additional states," Gannon added. "The states that have passed these laws have freed themselves from a great deal of stress and turmoil," he said.

HRDI leaflets offer guidance on layoffs

Two new publications of the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute are designed to help workers and their unions hit by plant closings and heavy layoffs.

"Coping with a Closing: A Guide for Unions" tells local union leaders about Worker Assistance Workshops HRDI can help set up in cooperation with the union and AFL-CIO Community Service staff.

A companion publication, "Surviving Layoff," is designed to help individual workers in a search for new jobs. It discusses job-hunting techniques as well as services available to unemployed workers.

Copies of the two brochures are available from the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute, 815 16th Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

ITF plans Polish boycott

Bremen, W. Germany—The executive board of International Transport Workers' Federation, representing 4.4 million workers in 83 countries, has called for a one-day worldwide boycott Nov. 10 in support of Polish workers.

The boycott coincides with the second anniversary of the registration of Poland's suspended Solidarity trade union by a Warsaw court.

The ITF boycott, which is viewed as a first step toward wider industrial action in support of Solidarity and its imprisoned leader, Lech Walesa, will be directed against all Polish aircraft and vessels going to or coming from Poland.

The trade union secretariat includes 14 U.S. affiliates. They are represented on the ITF board by President Thomas W. Gleason of the Longshoremen; John Peterpaul, vice president of the Machinists, and J. F. Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Houston Project marks 1st-year gains

Unions that joined with the AFL-CIO in mounting the Houston Organizing Project a year ago are committing funds and staff for a second year of the labor movement's most ambitious organizing effort.

The first-year record clearly justifies the Houston project's continuation, AFL-CIO Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler said.

He and Robert Comeaux, the project's coordinator, pointed to solid gains in the first 12 months of the campaign despite a wave of unemployment that hit Houston last spring and washed away some campaigns in progress.

There is no dearth of organizing targets in a Gulf Coast area that over the past two decades has grown faster than its trade union movement. And the organizing campaigns that have been put on by 30 cooperating unions have greatly increased the visibility of the labor movement in the boom city of the Sunbelt and the surrounding Gulf Coast area.

The long pull

"We are here for the long pull," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told a Houston construction workers' rally last May. And that's been the theme of the labor effort that was brought into being on the recommendation of the AFL-CIO Executive Council's Standing Committee on Organization, headed by Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride.

The organization of some 5,000 workers in the program's first year is viewed as the initial step in turning around the "union-free" environment that the Houston area's business establishment has tried to create.

Early success

The construction industry was one of the early successes of the organizing campaign, although here, too, the business slump has taken its toll. But in the first six months of the organizing effort, close to 200 building contractors signed union contracts and the 12-month record is over 300 new contracts. While most of these have been relatively small operations, major areas of non-union construction are among current targets.

Manufacturing sector gains were achieved before the wave of recession layoffs, and a decertification move was rebuffed by the Steelworkers with the help of project organizers.

Companies that have proven most recession-proof and show signs of continued growth are the prime targets for the second year of the campaign.

Both the Teachers and the State, County & Municipal Employees have registered significant membership gains under the impetus of the coordinated organizing program. The Houston Federation of Teachers added 500 new members and signed up a record number of former members at the start of the school year. AFSCME posted big gains both among school district employees and in its city worker campaign.

Retail stores, barber shops, food stores and even a large dental unit have been organized by the Food & Commercial Workers.

The Service Employees and the Hotel & Restaurant Employees have begun a cooperative effort to organize more than 1,700 employees at Houston's Astrodome.

Campaigns are planned for office and service workers in the oil industry, at a major food chain and in hospital and health care facilities in Houston and nearby counties.

Organizers still make house calls, and in-plant committees are still vital to a campaign's success. But the cooperative program and the permanent AFL-CIO staff assigned to it are using new tools.

Research aids

The project's research department has come up with information on some 300 Houston area companies, including employment figures, NLRB histories and potential for organization. Its reports have been important aids in the selection of organizing targets.

Polling techniques have been used to measure employee attitudes toward their company. Thus a tentatively selected target company was dropped at one point in favor of a campaign that a poll indicated would be more promising. The result—a three-to-one union margin in an NLRB election.

Word processing technology provided data on a lagging hospital campaign showing that many of the employees who had signed authorization cards had not been personally contacted for nearly eight months.

And word processing has enabled mailings targeted to specific groups of workers and community leaders.

Legal services

Central legal services facilities provide participating unions with professional services on unfair labor practice charges, contract bargaining assistance and campaign literature review.

The Harris County AFL-CIO and other local central bodies in the six-county organizing area have been an integral part of the coordinated campaign. They have worked with the project's Community Relations Division in highly successful programs to strengthen labor's link with the black and Hispanic communities and with the religious groups. Leads developed in these cooperative activities, including voter registration campaigns, and through responses to labor's advertising programs have been especially helpful in selecting organizing targets.

Houston isn't yet a union town. But its labor movement is healthy and growing, Kistler stressed.

Connecticut labor shapes goals for state legislature

Hartford, Conn.—Delegates to the 26th annual Connecticut State AFL-CIO convention endorsed candidates in this year's state and federal elections and drew up a legislative program for the year ahead.

After a lively debate, the 560 delegates decided against an endorsement in the U.S. Senate race because of the pro-labor voting records of both the Republican incumbent Lowell Weicker, and his challenger, Rep. Toby Moffett. Both candidates addressed the convention.

House endorsements

Delegates endorsed the candidacies of three incumbent House members, all Democrats. They are Barbara Kennelly, 1st District; Sam Gejdenson, 2nd, and William Ratchford, 5th. Democratic candidates in three other districts also were endorsed—Bruce Morrison in the 3rd, John A. Phillips, 4th, and William Curry, Jr., 6th.

In the gubernatorial contest, the convention backed Democratic incumbent William O'Neill and his running mate, Lt. Gov. Joseph Fauliso.

The principal resolutions adopted support AFL-CIO policy regarding the need for congressional action to turn around the national economy. Delegates denounced Reaganomics and the course charted by the Administration on taxes and the federal budget.

United effort

President Gerald McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees, a major convention speaker, spelled out the failure of the Reagan economic program and urged delegates to throw their energies into the campaign to elect a more responsive Congress.

National COPE Director John Perkins congratulated the delegates on the effectiveness of the state COPE program, and urging maximum effort in the Nov. 2 elections.

State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Betty L. Tianti, who is also the organization's legislative agent, reported a relatively good year in the state legislature. No anti-labor bills were passed, she noted, while substantial improvements in the unemployment and workers' compensation laws were achieved. Another gain was passage of a "right to know" law expanding existing law to require employers to report to their workers on the use of some 400 hazardous materials in the workplace.

Low-pressure campaign

United Way campaign at AFL-CIO headquarters featured a health fair organized by the federation's Dept. of Community Services in cooperation with the United Way agencies. Here, American Red Cross nurse Nancy Wyss checks the blood pressure of Karen Ignagni. Waiting their turns are Mae Adkins, Brian Simpson, William Grigg and John McManus.

Rail supervisors to press checkoff for political fund

New Orleans—The 36th Convention of the Railway & Airway Supervisors, a division of the Railway & Airline Clerks, called on all subordinate lodges "to make every effort possible" to bring members under a checkoff system to support the BRAC political action and legislative programs, the Responsible Citizens Political League.

The resolution stressed that the RCPL is the "best vehicle available to members" to fight legislative and administrative challenges that seek to destroy the Railroad Retirement System and the National Railroad Adjustment Board, which rules on disputes in the railroad industry.

Supervisors' President Frank Ferlin pointed out the need for action on the political and legislative front in his keynote address to the 100 delegates and guests.

"Today, we are being pushed, as never before, just to maintain institutions in the railroad industry that it took many years to establish," he said. "What we have won through the legislative process we can lose by the same process, if we are not prepared to resist."

Ferlin and Executive Vice President-Sec. Edward Nadolny, the two top officers up for election, won new four-year terms without opposition. The union elects half its officers at each two-year convention.

The convention approved a constitutional change increasing dues for members paying directly to the national office from $15 to $20 per month. There was no action on per capita tax since that will be set by the BRAC convention in 1983.

In a wrap-up report to the delegates, Ferlin reported that ARASA membership had declined since the previous convention by about 1,000 members to a total of 7,000, despite the fact that membership on Republic Airlines had doubled.

He said merger with BRAC had enabled the organization to maintain an efficient and responsible operation and revealed that a "line" is being kept open with the Train Dispatchers for merger in the future.

Top BRAC officers addressing the three-day meeting included President Richard Kilroy, Sec.-Treas. D. A. Bobo and Vice President Thomas Fitzgibbon.

GOP gatecrasher falls flat before Wisconsin unions

LaCrosse, Wis.—Delegates to the Wisconsin AFL-CIO convention made their political preferences clear when they heartily endorsed a slate of Democratic candidates for state and federal offices and ejected the Republican candidate for governor, Terry Kohler, after he crashed the convention and tried to make a speech without an invitation.

Referring to Kohler's remark in a press interview that he would sign a "right-to-work" bill if one came to his desk as governor, State AFL-CIO President John Schmitt told the uninvited guest, "The National Right to Work Committee is not meeting here, it's the AFL-CIO."

He pointed out that the convention rules require proper credentials for entering the hall and ordered Kohler escorted out of the meeting room.

Schmitt later told reporters Kohler's gatecrashing was "a publicity stunt," and speculated on the reaction directors of Kohler's Vollrath Co. would have if union officials tried to walk in on them.

The more than 700 delegates at the four-day convention had already endorsed Anthony S. Earl, the Democratic candidate for governor, as well as Sen. William Proxmire, both of whom addressed the meeting. The Democratic candidates running in the state's nine congressional races were also endorsed.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, urging delegates to all-out political action in the last weeks before Election Day, stressed that "the American labor movement is alive, well and tough" and resurging on an upswing that began on Solidarity Day 1981 in Washington.

That outpouring of opposition to the Reagan Administration's destructive policies, Donahue said, has been further fueled by soaring unemployment.

Other speakers at the meeting included Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), Steelworkers Sec. Lynn R. Williams, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, State Sen. Paul Offner (D), 3rd District candidate for Congress, and Dr. Ralph Andreano, University of Wisconsin.

Schmitt, Sec.-Treas. Jack B. Riehl, and Executive Vice President Joseph Gruber were re-elected as the federation's officers.

The convention also dealt with more than 80 resolutions covering a wide range of legislative, economic and social issues.

As long as it takes

Striking machinists at Brown & Sharpe Mfg. Co., Providence, R.I., are cheered by twice-weekly picket line appearances of Albina Shears, right, in memory of her husband who died Aug. 28. Jerome Shears had been a member of IAM District 64 whose locals were forced to strike the precision tool manufacturer on Oct. 18, 1981. Mrs. Shears also participates in informational picketing at Rhode Island Hospital Trust Bank, a major backer of B&S, and says she will take her husband's place on the lines "as long as it takes to win justice." Until recently she marched with her sister, Pauline Roberti, left, also a B&S striker, who is now recuperating from a heart attack.

Unions in U.S., Japan look at potential for cooperation

Tokyo—Representatives of the AFL-CIO and Domei, the Japanese Confederation of Labor, agreed to pursue economic, political, and social goals in cooperation with international organizations where they work together to improve the position of working people.

At the 14th annual meeting of the two organizations here, they drew up a set of priorities which included:

- Attainment of higher employment through rejection of monetarist policies and high interest rates.
- Striving to reach full employment and lower inflation levels through a tripartite program of national and international accords involving labor, management and government.
- Seeking increased government investment to revitalize the world economy.
- Bilateral consultations prior to participation in international conferences and achievement of mutual agreements to lead to reduction of trade restrictions.

Mutual goals

"This would permit Domei to advocate to the Japanese government and industry a policy of restriction of exports, the execution of positive steps toward the development of domestic markets permitting additional imports, and the increase of capital investments in the United States," a joint statement noted.

- Agreement that foreign capital investments of Japanese and Americans must not result in exploitation of workers in the respective countries. The AFL-CIO and Domei also expressed deep concern over worker exploitation in the developing countries.
- Continuing study of the problems brought about by advances in technology, such as developments in robots and microelectronics.

Representing the AFL-CIO at the meeting were Irving Brown, director of the Dept. of International Affairs; Richard W. Cordtz, secretary-treasurer of the Service Employees; Wayne E. Glenn, president of the Paperworkers, and Morris Palladino, executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

During their discussions, the two groups examined the situation in Poland, where workers are being denied basic trade union rights, and problems elsewhere in the world.

Accord on Poland

The AFL-CIO and Domei agreed that the U.S. and Japanese governments should press the Polish government to restore the Solidarity trade union along the lines of the 1980 Gdansk agreement allowing greater worker freedoms.

There was also agreement on the need to strengthen the role of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in the International Labor Organization to bring about a greater observance and enforcement of the international conventions and recommendations on trade union rights.

Nevada delegates press final drive to get out vote

Las Vegas, Nev.—A strong get-out-the-vote effort for the Nov. 2 elections was the rallying point of the Nevada AFL-CIO convention.

Delegates pledged support for stepped-up political activity stressing the need to maintain momentum generated in the state primary elections in which 91 percent of COPE-endorsed candidates were victorious. Union efforts helped raise voter registration 10 percent over 1980.

The convention reaffirmed labor's endorsement of candidates for congressional and key state seats—all Democrats—including U.S. Sen. Howard W. Cannon, who is seeking a fifth term; state Atty. Gen. Richard H. Bryan, who hopes to unseat Republican Gov. Robert F. List, and House candidates Harry Reid in the 1st District and Mary Gojack in the 2nd District.

In drafting labor's agenda for the coming session of the state legislature, the 168 delegates called for renewed efforts to have tip money of hotel, restaurant and other service workers credited toward unemployment benefits and workers' compensation. The state federation pointed out that if workers are required to pay income tax on tips, that income should also be counted towards entitlement programs. The measure was narrowly defeated in the last session of the legislature.

State AFL-CIO President Mark Tully Massagli was re-elected to his second full three-year term by aclamation. The four vice presidents were also re-elected without opposition. Executive Sec.Treas. Claude Evans is in mid-term.

Convention speakers, in addition to the labor-endorsed candidates, included National COPE Director John Perkins and Director Alan Kistler of the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

At cement union convention

Election result linked to economic rebound

St. Paul, Minn.—The Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers will "stay the course" at the bargaining table and on the picket line when necessary, but will work to "change the course" that has plunged the United States and Canada into recession.

The meld of trade union and political issues was the focus of the union's 21st biennial convention, which brought together delegates representing 32,000 members in 300 U.S. and Canadian locals.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue urged the U.S. delegates to make their local COPE headquarters the first stop on their return home.

"Volunteer," he urged. "Stuff envelopes for that last mailing in the few days left to us. Use that phone—to every friend, neighbor and trade unionist you know."

Titanic's course

The Reagan Administration's "course," Donahue suggested, is the course taken by such "great leaders of the past as the captain of the Titanic, the leader of the Charge of the Light Brigade, General Custer at Little Big Horn and Herbert Hoover."

Donahue, CLGW President Thomas F. Miechur and other speakers from the podium and from the floor spoke with admiration of the union members at the Kosmos Cement Co. in Kentucky who have been on strike for more than a year. Both Donahue and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland have marched on the Kosmos picket line, and the company's products are on the AFL-CIO boycott list.

Maurice Greer, financial secretary of the Kosmos local and Patsy Burrell, president of Women's Awareness, spoke to the convention of the solidarity of the strikers and their families. Women's Awareness is made up of wives and of strikers of other family members who are publicizing the boycott. The convention delegates contributed more than $3,200, which the international union will match, so that the children of the strikers will have a good Christmas.

Miechur, who was re-elected along with Sec.-Treas. Richard A. Northrip and all other incumbent officers, cited "progress in almost all areas of activity" by the union over the past two years.

Coordinated bargaining

He said coordinated bargaining programs again proved their value, noted the participation of more than 600 union leaders and staff in labor educational programs over the two years, and cited increased emphasis on job safety and health with the help of Labor Dept. "New Directions" grants.

There must be "equal opportunity" and there must be "full opportunity—jobs for all," Miechur stressed.

Delegates voted to retain the present two-year convention interval, rejecting proposals for three and four-year conventions. Canadian Labor Congress Sec.-Treas. Donald Montgomery said lower interest rates are essential to a housing and building construction revival that is needed to bring the economy out of recession.

Economic growth, not bargaining concessions, is the path to recovery, he suggested.

Other speakers included Minnesota AFL-CIO President David K. Roe, St. Paul AFL-CIO President Jerry Scribner, Bricklayers Executive Vice President Louis Weir, Executive Sec. Howard Chester of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee, and David McIlwain, national representative of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Donahue's address to the convention also emphasized labor's grass roots lobbying efforts, climaxed this year by the rejection in the House of the proposed balanced budget amendment to the Constitution.

"That one was a victory for trade unionists across the country," Donahue stressed.

"Legislators heard from you, and they responded."

Workers return at Iowa Beef but boycott continues

Dakota City, Neb.—Union members returned to work but a boycott of Iowa Beef Processors will be continued and intensified, the Food & Commercial Workers said.

The union's unfair labor practice charges against the company—including an assertion of failure to bargain in good faith—were adopted in a complaint issued by the National Labor Relations Board's acting regional director in Kansas City.

UFCW Vice President Thomas Russow said the union made its offer to return immediately rather than wait until the conclusion of the NLRB hearings before an administrative law judge. The company has put nearly 1,300 returning union members back to work. They had been on strike for 16 weeks.

Iowa Beef had recruited strikebreakers in other cities at rates $2-an-hour less than the starting rate under the expired union contract. Returning union members will be paid their old rate. A key issue in the dispute had been the company's demand for a four-year wage freeze. The union had agreed to a two-year freeze.

For Jobs and Justice

OUR AIM IS to elect a Congress that will cure the sickness of Reaganomics and get this country back on the road to economic health and vigor.

We have plenty of walking and talking and organizing and educating to do before election day.

We have to point out to every voter we can reach what this election is all about.

It's about hardship. It's about housing. It's about the education of the young and the health and dignity of the old.

It's about taking from the poor to give to the rich. Above all, it's about jobs.

This Administration and its supporters on Capitol Hill do not care to talk about jobs. They do not picture unemployed people as real people at all; they are just "lagging indicators" on the march to prosperity.

Prosperity when? Prosperity for whom? What will be left for ordinary people to build on by the time Reaganomics runs its course?

"Stay the course," we are told. But we are not too blind to see that only a change in course can prevent shipwreck.

Nobody who works for a living—and nobody who wants to work and needs to work and can find no work—can afford to sit back, let others do the deciding and voting, and wait to see how it all comes out.

THIS ELECTION is, once again, a test between plain people and their perception of their own interests and the power of big money.

The money men have written off the votes of 11 million unemployed people, just as they have written off their jobs. The market researchers and the syndicated wise men say that unemployed people don't vote.

But we don't believe that. We believe that millions of people who have never been unemployed in their lives have not subsided into apathy. They will turn out in righteous indignation and in the true conviction that nothing is more important now than to vote, and to persuade others to vote, for jobs and justice.

That is an agenda for everybody who works for a living—and everybody who wants to work and needs to work and can find no work to do. For the retired worker and the youngster still seeking his first job. For the employed and the unemployed.

Let there be no "discouraged workers" in our ranks. This is a time for hope and a time for action that will not come again for two years. Let's make the most of it.

—From AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's remarks at San Francisco's Jobs and Justice March, Oct. 24, 1982.

For All Brave People

THE TWO GREAT South Africans who were joint recipients of this year's George Meany Award—Mangosuthu Gatsha Buthelezi and the martyred Neil Aggett—stand for all the brave people, black and white, who have resisted oppression at great personal risk.

The first recipient of the George Meany Award was Poland's free trade union, Solidarity. But the award was never formally presented.

Lech Walesa was to have accepted it on Solidarity's behalf. But freedom is too contagious for a totalitarian government to let loose, and the publication date of this issue will mark Day 321 of Walesa's imprisonment.

South Africa's Neil Aggett, a white who helped build a black trade union, died in the South African prison where he had been held without charges.

But South Africa's apartheid government is learning, as are the Communist puppet rulers of Poland, that you can't imprison the human spirit.

Reagan's 'course' heads nation toward disaster

By Press Associates, Inc.

A recurring theme of Reagan rhetoric this year has been that the United States should "stay the course" because there is no viable alternative to Reaganomics.

Tacked onto this claim is the assertion that past economic policies have failed miserably. The policies of previous GOP administrations aren't mentioned in the partisan swipes at "free-spending" Democrats.

While Congress was in its election recess, the congressional Joint Economic Committee (JEC) used the legislative hiatus to examine economic alternatives, with the focus on unemployment.

It's been said that it's hard to find two economists who agree on anything. But the five economists and former public officials who testified before the JEC during a day of hearings found themselves in agreement on several basic points. None proposed to "stay the course."

Blue ribbon panel

Those who testified included Walter Heller, an economics professor who chaired the Council of Economic Advisers under President Kennedy; Ray Marshall, Labor Secretary under President Carter who now heads the National Policy Exchange, an economic research organization; John Kenneth Galbraith, a Harvard economist; Robert Eisner, an economics professor at Northwestern University, and Willard Wirtz, Labor Secretary under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, who now chairs the National Institute for Work & Learning.

● Reaganomics, or supply-side economics, is a far-fetched theory which has proven to be as unworkable as it is unfair. Its combination of huge tax cuts for the rich, big hikes in military spending at the expense of social needs, and a tight-money policy has produced the worst economic conditions since the Great Depression. Unless these policies are reversed, unemployment will remain at current high levels for months to come. Worse still, a full-scale depression could result.

● The Federal Reserve Board's loosening of its tight-money grip since July—a move aimed at forestalling an economic disaster—is welcome. But the Fed must go further to tailor its policies, on a lasting basis, toward lower interest rates and economic growth. "Real" interest rates must come down much further if there is to be a strong and sustained recovery.

● Although the economic policies of previous administrations, Democratic and Republican, left much to be desired, at least they didn't produce what Reaganomics has given us—double-digit unemployment.

● Swelling the ranks of the unemployed is the most inefficient and economically destructive way to reduce inflation, to say nothing of the cruel social consequences. To reduce inflation by a single percentage point, it is necessary to increase unemployment by one million for two years—at a $200-billion cost to national output and a $60-billion increase in the federal deficit.

● The road to increased productivity, lower inflation, reduced deficits and economic health is a comprehensive program aimed at achieving full employment. This cannot be achieved by Reagan's unfettered "free market."

Government, in cooperation with business and labor, must play an active role in restoring the deteriorating public infrastructure, in reindustrialization efforts to keep America competitive, and in job training programs for unemployed and dislocated workers.

And full employment doesn't mean a long-range goal of 6.5 percent, recently espoused by Treasury Sec. Donald Regan.

It means, as Marshall put it, "a meaningful job for every person able to work."

$400 million settles postal backpay case

the Postal Service and approved by U.S. District Judge Aubrey E. Robinson, Jr.

It includes payments for some claims that were still being litigated, so many of the persons who shared the $60 million award will receive additional amounts from the new settlement.

The Labor Dept. suit charged the Postal Service with:

- Failure to include wage premiums such as night shift and Sunday differentials in calculating employees' regular rates of pay. This resulted in underpayment of overtime.
- Failure to compensate employees for worktime exceeding 40 hours a week in conditions where employees were expected or allowed to work longer hours but were not paid for them because the overtime had not been authorized in advance. Examples would be a letter carrier delayed in completing a route by bad weather or an unusually heavy load, or a window clerk serving people in line at closing time.
- Failure to pay workers for required training or for study time in memorizing postal "schemes" to meet the requirement of the job.

Most workers affected by the settlement will receive either $6.30 or $7.35, depending on job classification, for each two-week pay period worked between May 1974 and May 1978.

Former employees with service during that period have been asked to check with their last place of employment at the Postal Service to determine their eligibility.

Labor history reprint, steward guide offered

Two new booklets are available from the AFL-CIO—one a guide for shop stewards of federal employee unions and the other a brief history on the first century of the federation.

The 88-page Manual for Federal Employees, AFL-CIO Publication No. 138, provides a wide range of information to help unions better represent members.

The 40-page One Hundred Years of American Labor—1881-1981, AFL-CIO Publication No. 157, is a compilation of articles that appeared in the American Federationist magazine last year.

Copies of both booklets are available at $1 each or 75 cents each in lots of 100 or more from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

March with a message

West Virginia workers turned out 5,000 strong for a march through downtown Charleston to the steps of the state capitol and the largest labor rally ever held in the state. West Virginia Solidarity Day was organized by the State AFL-CIO around twin themes of encouraging voters to turn out for Election Day—"Solidarity Day II"—and protesting the Reagan Administration's economic policies that have led to high unemployment and recession while cutting back programs that benefit working people.

UAW members at Chrysler vote to remain on job

Detroit—The Auto Workers voted overwhelmingly to stay on the job at Chrysler, working under a contract that expired Sept. 14, and to resume negotiations after the Christmas holidays in hopes of reaching agreement on pay raises.

The Chrysler workers rejected a tentative pact reached earlier this month because it did not contain immediate wage increases. In balloting this week, they had two options. One was to strike the company. The other was to continue working under the old contract.

Looking ahead to talks that will start next January, UAW President Douglas Fraser told reporters: "I think we still can do better than we did in September, even if the economy does not improve. Down the road, as the economy improves, Chrysler workers have to receive a greater share of equity."

In the last three years, Chrysler workers have given up over $1 billion in cuts in pay and benefits to help the financially troubled auto maker. Recently, Chrysler has improved its position in the market, although car sales have been slow.

Chrysler workers have not had a wage increase in two years. Their current average pay is about $2.60-an-hour less than that of their counterparts at General Motors and Ford.

The American auto industry has been in a state of virtual depression for years.

Capital Cable boycott ended as CWA negotiates contract

Austin, Tex. — The Communications Workers lifted the union's boycott of Capital Cable Co. here after reaching an agreement with the company that ended a year-long dispute embittered by the presence of a union-busting consultant.

Delegates to CWA's convention in July had voted to press a boycott of the cable company owned by Time, Inc., after nearly a year of negotiations and an eight-month strike failed to produce an agreement.

In August, the AFL-CIO Executive Council also issued a statement strongly condemning the failure of the company, now known as Austin Cablevision, to bargain in good faith with its employees.

The council pointed out that after the company was acquired by Time, Inc., ten years of stable bargaining relations with the union were "scrapped" and the introduction of an Atlanta-based union-busting law firm "and other management tactics" indicated that the company's intentions were to destroy the union.

The CWA and AFL-CIO actions were credited by CWA Vice President Paul Gray, who spearheaded the negotiations, with finally bringing the company back to the bargaining table.

The agreement, reached Oct. 20, was "overwhelmingly" ratified by the employees, Gray said.

The new contract will run until July 31, 1985. Under its terms, workers will get wage hikes ranging from 3 to 7.5 percent on Aug. 1, 1983, and Aug. 1, 1984. The company had unilaterally put in effect increases of 12 and 11 percent on Aug. 1, 1981, and Aug. 1, 1982.

Employees will now be covered by a pension plan for the first time, and the health and life insurance programs were also improved.

Sick leave was improved from nine days to up to 65 days annually, and the company's employees will now receive free cable television in their homes.

"Contracting out" of jobs had been a major issue in the negotiations, and the company's employees won a guarantee that all 117 full-time bargaining unit jobs will be filled before work is contracted out.

Buying power of workers' pay continues to drop

Consumer prices continued to moderate in September as the Reagan Recession cut into both earning power and spending ability of American families.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that a rise of two-tenths of 1 percent in its monthly consumer price index, combined with a drop of one-tenth of 1 percent in average weekly earnings in September, left "real," or inflation-adjusted, weekly earnings down three-tenths of 1 percent.

Over the last 12 months, real weekly earnings have fallen nine-tenths of 1 percent. While gross weekly pay for the average factory worker last month averaged $268.66 in current dollars, pay in constant 1977 dollars averaged $166.87 a week. This compares with $168.05 a year earlier.

BLS said the latest monthly increase in retail prices lifted the CPI 4.9 percent above the year-earlier level. The index rose by three-tenths of 1 percent in August.

The price moderation occurred despite a firming of overall food prices that showed their first increase in three months —five-tenths of 1 percent. And new car prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent, despite price cutting by auto makers intended to move an unusually large amount of unsold 1982 models.

The housing component of the index declined two-tenths of 1 percent. Within that category, home financing costs were down 1.8 percent, mortgage costs alone were down four-tenths of 1 percent, and house prices were off four-tenths of 1 percent. Rents increased by four-tenths of 1 percent.

Prices in most other categories were roughly about the same as in August.

NLRB complaint blames football owners

National Football League owners violated federal labor law by refusing to bargain in good faith with the players' union, the National Labor Relations Board general counsel said in a formal complaint issued in New York.

The complaint specifically charges that the six-week strike by the National Football League Players Association "was caused and has been prolonged by the unfair labor practices of respondents"—the NFL management council.

Charges filed

The complaint is based on a series of charges initiated by the NFLPA dating back to February, when negotiations began on a new contract. The union's old contract with the league expired in July.

In the complaint, NLRB General Counsel William Lubbers accused the owners' management council of failing to provide the union with information essential to bargaining, changing working conditions without consulting the union, coercing players and interfering with their rights, as well as attempting to bypass the union in dealing with individual players.

At the same time, Lubbers rejected a charge by the management council that the union also had engaged in bad-faith bargaining.

A trial on the complaint filed by NLRB Regional Director Daniel Silverman will open Nov. 15 before an administrative law judge, who is still to be designated. In this process, a hearing usually lasts about one week and it takes three to four weeks before a ruling is issued. But that decision then can be appealed to the NLRB.

The filing had an immediate impact on stalled negotiations. Within hours after the NLRB regional action on Oct. 27, the NFL management council responded to the union's repeated calls for a resumption of talks.

Mediator Sam Kagel alerted both parties that negotiations would reopen in New York on Oct. 30.

The parties had met for mediated discussions in Cockeysville, Md., for 12 straight days before Kagel called a recess on Oct. 23. He cited a lack of progress on major economic issues in the contract dispute, and urged both sides to reassess their positions.

The day after talks had been recessed, player representatives from all 28 teams voted unanimously to reaffirm the bargaining goals the NFLPA has been pursuing since August. Sitting in on the meeting were 60 additional NFLPA members who came to voice their views on the strike. An expression of solid support for the union's position resulted from the eight hours of discussions, NFLPA President Gene Upshaw reported.

The resolution they adopted calls on owners to fully address the union's primary objectives as essential to a settlement. They are:

- Immediate substantial wage increases for virtually all players.
- A guarantee of a fair share for players of future NFL revenues.
- Elimination of wage inequities.
- Elimination of incentives to cut older players for financial reasons.
- A system of significant incentives to reward player performance.

The union has called for creation of a trust fund based largely on the league's lucrative television revenues to finance payment of a wage scale and performance bonuses. The owners will collect $2.1 billion over the next five years from contracts with the TV networks.

Meanwhile, the league has cancelled the sixth weekend of scheduled games.

Election conveys clear message to Reagan for change in policies

Democratic Governor-elect Mario Cuomo is joined by his wife Matilda in thanking supporters at a victory celebration in New York.

Voters stress job concerns, rebuff conservative appeals

By David L. Perlman

Americans sent a "change the course" message to President Reagan in an election that broke a conservative coalition's domination of the House and sent an unmistakable warning to the Republican Senate.

Polls taken at voting places identified unemployment and fears of social security cutbacks as the two most-cited concerns, and the ballot results reflect this.

An indicated pickup of 26 House seats will give Democrats more than a 100-vote majority in the new 98th Congress—269 Democrats and 166 Republicans. For the first time, President Reagan will have to negotiate with a branch of Congress effectively controlled by the opposition party.

In the Senate, where Republicans won only 13 of the 33 seats at stake this year, 41 holdover Republican senators who did not have to face the voters will prevent party control from switching to the Democrats. But the vote tallies in the 33 Senate contests sent the same message of discontent with Reaganomics.

Polls by television networks that found union members supporting Democratic congressional candidates by 2-to-1 margins were on the mark, COPE Director John Perkins said. "Without a doubt, unemployment was the principal issue."

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison termed the election outcome "a clear call" for a change in national economic policy.

"We look forward to working with the new Congress to create jobs, protect social security and return the federal government to its constitutional role of providing for the general welfare," he said.

House

The pattern of Democratic gains and Republican losses in House seats was reflected in every section of the country, but the message sent by voters was loudest in the recession-ravaged industrial states of the East and Midwest.

It comes through clearest when looked at in tandem with the impact of reapportionment that wiped out nine House seats in the East and eliminated seven congressional districts in the lower Midwest.

The pre-election view was that the party losing the fewest seats in the two regions could claim victory. As it turned out, Republicans took the losses of reapportionment—and then lost additional seats to Democrats.

The Midwest region had sent 55 Democrats and 55 Republicans to the House in the outgoing Congress. In the new Con-

Senate

Democrats won 20 of the 33 Senate seats up for election this year and came out ahead in what at first glance would appear to be an even tradeoff involving four seats.

The Senate remains under Republican control for the next two years, but the opposition to Reagan Administration economic policies has been strengthened by the election outcome. Most Republican incumbents won narrowly; most Democrats won big.

Democrats ousted a Republican conservative in New Mexico and captured a Republican-held seat in New Jersey. They re-elected 18 incumbents, including all but one of the senators who were targets of an avalanche of negative television advertising by the National Conservative Political Action Committee.

Springboard for 1984

Democrats rout GOP in governorship races

By James M. Shevis

A growing public restlessness over the economy, along with nagging local issues, combined to give Democrats a net gain of at least seven governorships in the Nov. 2 elections and a strong grass-roots base for a run at the White House in 1984.

With all but one of this year's 36 gubernatorial contests decided, the new lineup of governorships in the 50 states favored the Democrats, 34 to 15. The lead could go to 35, depending on the outcome of the extremely tight race in Illinois between Republican Gov. James R. Thompson and Democratic challenger Adlai Stevenson III.

Going into the elections, Democrats held 27 statehouses to the Republicans' 23. Twenty of the 36 governorships up this year were held by Democrats. Each party held seven of the 14 uncontested seats. Thirteen of the 14 Democratic incumbents won re-election while five of the 10 GOP incumbents—excluding Thompson in Illinois—were elected to new terms.

The new lineup rivals the Democrats' post-Watergate dominance of state capitals in 1978, when they held 37 governorships, the Republicans 12, and an independent 1.

The troubled national economy, bringing high unemployment and other social disruption to most states, particularly in the Midwest, made Reaganomics the central issue in a number of contests.

Pocketbook issues

In others, local pocketbook issues were deciding factors as in New Hampshire where incumbent Democratic Gov. Hugh Gallen would not promise to keep the state free of sales or income taxes and lost out to John H. Sununu, a former GOP state representative, who did "take the pledge."

Much of the Alaska campaign between Democrat Bill Sheffield and former state House Speaker Thomas Fink focused on a proposal to move the capital from Juneau to near Anchorage. Fink, who backed the move, lost. In Kansas, Gov. John Carlin (D) was re-elected on a campaign for a new state severance tax.

When all the votes were counted, Democrats had wrested statehouses held by Republicans in Ohio, Texas, Arkansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, Michigan, Nevada, Wisconsin, and Alaska, while losing control only in California and New Hampshire.

The Illinois race see-sawed back and forth even two days after the election but, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, Stevenson held a slight edge over Thompson, the Republican incumbent. Both sides

Benefit cuts would bypass Social Security Commission

The Reagan Administration would be guilty of "bad faith" if it put together proposals for cutting back social security benefits before getting the recommendations of a bipartisan advisory committee, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

Kirkland referred to a newspaper report of benefit cuts the Administration will propose to Congress if the National Commission on Social Security Reform doesn't come up with recommendations that are to the Administration's liking.

Ten of the 15 commission members were chosen by President Reagan or Republican congressional leaders. Only five, including Kirkland, were nominated by Democratic leaders in Congress. But despite the imbalance, Administration officials were reported fearful that the bipartisan panel will propose measures to shore up the social security system's financing instead of cutting back on benefits.

The national newspaper USA Today reported that documents being circulated by the Treasury Dept., the Council of Economic Advisers and the Office of Management & Budget propose to lower social security costs by raising the retirement age at which workers become eligible for benefits and reducing the cost-of-living protections.

Kirkland said he agreed to serve on the national commission because the AFL-CIO supports efforts to strengthen the financial stability of the social security system and safeguard its basic protections.

But if the Administration is in fact committed to reducing benefits rather than

Electioneering

Campaign posters greeted voters coming to cast ballots on Nov. 2 at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. The campus auditorium has been used as a polling station for a Silver Spring, Md., precinct since 1980. Polling officials reported a heavier-than-usual turnout for an off-year election.

Energy group warns gas heat cutoffs to rise

More than 300,000 American households will have their gas heat shut off this winter because they cannot pay their bills, the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition (CLEC) predicted in a new study.

"It won't be just the poorest people who will lose their heat this winter," said William R. Hutton, a CLEC officer and executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens.

"As the recession deepens and as natural gas price increases continue, the working poor, senior citizens and the growing number of unemployed all face the terror of winter days without heat," said Hutton.

He added that "the situation is especially tragic for children and older Americans, who risk serious illness or even death by accidental hypothermia if their heat is cut off."

Grass-roots lobby

CLEC, a national coalition of over 200 labor, senior, consumer and community groups, has been working with the AFL-CIO in a grass-roots education and lobbying campaign to maintain wellhead price controls on natural gas. Under 1978 legislation, price controls on about half the nation's natural gas are being phased out by 1985.

CLEC Executive Director Robert M. Brandon said the immediate solution to the problem of shutoffs is "for states to order reconnections for those currently shut off, and for those states without bans on winter shutoffs to institute such bans."

Brandon said "the next step is for Congress to stop these spiraling gas prices and continue price controls on natural gas. To decontrol now is to condemn hundreds of thousands of additional Americans to winters without heat."

The Reagan Administration, in the face of public opposition in an election year, held back its plans to propose legislation to speed up the timetable on natural gas decontrol. But the White House still publicly favors decontrol, and the issue may come before the lame-duck session of Congress later this year or be put before the new Congress next year.

According to the CLEC study—"Cold and Dark: Utility Disconnections in the United States"—more than 300,000 households face disconnections this winter, some 60,000 more households than those who lost their gas heat last winter.

Costs rise 20-30 percent

The study said gas heating costs are up 20-30 percent over last year in most regions of the nation. At the same time, federal energy assistance money has remained the same for the past two years while gas and other fuel prices have increased sharply.

Sixty percent of all U.S. households heat with gas, the study reported. It said its heat shutoff estimates don't include electric space heat lost because of disconnection, or those fuel oil and propane deliveries lost because of inability to pay. bills.

Chemical union adopts expanded safety program

Las Vegas, Nev.—Job safety and health and political action topped the agenda at the Chemical Workers' 29th convention.

The more than 500 delegates representing 75,000 members amended the union's constitution to create a special health and safety fund to be supported by a per capita allocation of 10 cents effective next July 1. An additional 10 cents per member will go into the fund starting the following July 1.

The fund will underwrite additional safety and health personnel and the expansion of training programs.

ICWU President Frank Martino told the delegates the 1982 convention "has an added sense of urgency this year in the light of more than 11 million unemployed Americans and the Reagan Administration which is openly hostile to labor."

Other constitutional amendments increased allocations out of per capita taxes for the union's strike and defense funds.

Labor's stake in the 1982 elections and the AFL-CIO's positions on economic, social and political issues were outlined by Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and John Perkins, national COPE director.

Martino told the delegates the newly established safety and health fund grew out of ICWU members' interests, and he stressed "there will be no reduction in the union's commitment to health and safety education and training even if the government continues to weaken Occupational Safety & Health Act protections and reduce education and training funds."

With the new fund, Martino said, the ICWU will continue its "struggle to clean up American workplaces. . . ."

In other action, the delegates voted to keep to a monthly schedule for the union's publication, The Chemical Worker, rather than reduce frequency as a reaction to sharply higher postage rates linked to Reagan Administration budget cuts.

The delegates also renewed support of the Equal Rights Amendment and of the Polish trade union movement, Solidarity.

Among other convention speakers were Howard Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and Dr. Eula Bingham, former assistant secretary of labor for OSHA.

Climb in economic indicators offset by other gloomy signals

While the government's barometer of economic trends rose five-tenths of 1 percent in September for the fifth increase in the past six months, other signs showed the economy still mired in recession.

Jobless insurance claims continued to run high, new factory orders remained low, and the nation's merchandise trade deficit widened. The main improvement reported by the government was an increase in house sales last month.

The Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators is now up 4.2 percent since last March, but more than half the September increase came from a surge in stock prices. A substantial increase in building permits also helped lift the measure.

Labor market indicators off

The rise in the index was tempered by declines in two labor market indicators—the length of the average manufacturing workweek and initial claims for unemployment insurance. Other declining indicators were changes in the sensitive crude materials component of the producer price index and a change in the total liquid assets component.

Contributing to the rise in the index were contracts and orders for plant and equipment, manufacturers' new orders for consumer goods and materials, and money supply, all as expressed in constant 1972 dollars.

In the week eneded Oct. 23, the Labor Dept. said, there were about 677,000 people who applied for unemployment insurance benefits for the first time. It marked the sixth week in a row that applications approached or exceeded 700,000.

Meanwhile, new factory orders remained locked in the grip of recession, expanding just seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month, the Commerce Dept. reported.

In another gloomy report, Commerce said the nation's merchandise trade deficit totaled $4.19 billion in September, less than August's record $7.08 billion gap, but almost twice as large as July's $2.42 billion deficit.

The nine-month trade deficit widened to $29.71 billion from $28.64 billion a year earlier. If the deficits in the remaining three months of the year average more than $3.4 billion—which analysts say is possible—1982 will show more red ink than 1981's $39.9 billion.

On the plus side, sales of single family houses increased by 23.7 percent in September while the average price dropped $6,800 to $82,300, the Commerce Dept. said. The increase was spurred by lower mortgage interest rates.

On Oct. 12, the government-insured Federal Home Association rate fell to 12.5 percent, the lowest in more than two years. Conventional mortgage rates have been about two percentage points higher. In August of last year, conventional rates hit about 17.3 percent, and FHA rates 16.5 percent.

In another report, productivity—or output per hour—gained in all sectors of the economy in the July-September quarter, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said. The agency noted, however, that the increases reflected declines in employment and hours of work.

A 7.1-percent rise in manufacturing productivity was the largest since a 14-percent jump in the fourth quarter of 1980. BLS noted that employment fell 7.7 percent in that sector in the third quarter, and average weekly hours dropped eight-tenths of 1 percent.

How education pays off

The number of workers with college degrees is going up and unemployment is hitting hardest at those with the least education, a Labor Dept. survey shows.

A study by the Bureau of Labor Statistics found that since 1970 the proportion of workers 25 to 64 years old who have college degrees has risen to about one-fourth of the total workforce. The number of workers without high school diplomas is about one-fifth.

The postwar baby boom generation, the BLS said, accounts for one-third of the 25-64 labor force, and nearly half of those workers have completed at least one year of college compared to about 30 percent among workers 55 to 64.

The study also found the largest increase in joblessness between March 1981 and March 1982 occurred among workers with a high school education or less, or about 75 percent of the total increase in unemployment.

Democrats broaden strength in House

Net gain of 26 seats ends conservative coalition rule

gress, it will send 59 Democrats and only 44 Republicans.

The 12 eastern states are represented this year by 67 Democrats and 50 Republicans. The new lineup will be 70 Democrats to only 38 Republicans.

More often than not, the Republican seats lost in reapportionment turned up as new Democratic seats in the Sunbelt states.

These are the states in which party lineups changed:

Alabama—A lineup of 4 Democrats and 3 Republicans tilted to a 5-2 Democratic majority.

The pickup was in Birmingham, where Democrat Ben Erdreich beat a right-wing Republican incumbent, Albert Lee Smith, Jr., whose 2 right, 26 wrong COPE record was the worst in the state's congressional delegation. Black turnout and Smith's support of Reaganomics when steel layoffs had pushed unemployment in the district to 13 percent brought about the upset.

Arizona—The previous lineup was 2-2 only because Bob Stump with an 11 right, 95 wrong COPE record listed himself as a Democrat in the 97th Congress. He won re-election as a Republican, but the Democrats won a seat gained through reapportionment with Jim McNulty, a political ally of liberal Morris Udall, who easily won his re-election race. Thus the new lineup of 2 Democrats, 3 Republicans is actually a one-seat gain for mainstream Democrats.

California—The pre-election lineup was 22 Democrats, 21 Republicans, and two seats were added through reapportionment. But a Democratic-authored reshaping of congressional districts helped bring in 28 Democrats and 17 Republicans, a gain of 6 Democratic seats and a loss of 4 Republican House members.

Right-wing Republican John H. Rousselot found a COPE record over seven terms of 17 right, 187 wrong votes didn't help him in a new, largely Hispanic district in the San Gabriel Valley. He lost to Democrat Marty Martinez, who won a special election to the House last July.

In the 1st District, along the northern coast, unemployment and redistricting helped Democrat Douglas A. Bosco end the congressional career of Republican Don H. Clausen after nine terms.

A Republican won the Southern California 43rd district. But the party's nominee, Johnnie Crean, had made so many enemies in winning a big-spending, smear-stained primary that a GOP write-in candidate won the general election. Write-in winner Ron Packard came in first, Democrat Pat Archer was a close second.

Newly-designated open districts went Democratic as expected. And liberal Democrat Phillip Burton, who was reported to have been in trouble in his San Francisco district, won with a comfortable 59 percent of the vote.

Colorado—Three Democratic and 2 Republican incumbents were re-elected. A new seat was won by conservative Republican Jack Swigert, a former astronaut who stayed in the campaign despite cancer treatments.

Connecticut—Each party turned over a seat to keep the lineup 4 Democrats, 2 Republicans.

The Republican pickup was a victory by Nancy L. Johnson in the district left open when Democrat Toby Moffett ran unsuccessfully for the Senate. And Democrat Bruce Morrison was a surprise winner in New Haven over moderate Republican incumbent Lawrence DeNardis.

Delaware — The lone House seat switched from Republican to Democrat. The winner, State Treas. Thomas R. Carper, had strong union and black support. He beat Thomas B. Evans, Jr., who had a 24 right, 79 wrong COPE voting record—and problems with a sex and lobbying scandal as well as Reaganomics.

Florida—An 11 Democratic, 4 Republican lineup became 13 Democrats, 6 Republicans as the parties split the four seats added through redistricting. Incumbents on the ballot were all re-elected, including liberal Democrat Dante B. Fascell, who had redistricting problems as well as a strong conservative opponent.

Georgia—No change thus far in the 9 Democratic, 1 Republican lineup. Redistricting problems forced postponement of elections in two districts until Nov. 30. Then, Democrat Wyche Fowler, is strongly favored to retain his Atlanta district. Democrat Elliot H. Levitas has an edge to keep his suburban seat, but Republicans are pouring money into a takeaway attempt.

Illinois—Previously 10 Democrats, 14 Republicans. But Republicans lost two seats in the redistricting process and two more to Democrats on Election Day.

In the Rock Island-Moline area, New Right ideologue Kenneth McMillan had ousted moderate incumbent Tom Railsback in the Republican primary. That helped Democrat Lane Evans win the election with 53 percent of the vote.

In a Springfield district, 11-term Republican Paul Findley was beaten by a hairsbreadth by Democrat Richard J. Durbin, and House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel got such a scare before he narrowly won re-election that he suggested President Reagan's economic program might need some "slight modification."

Indiana—The previous lineup was 6 Democrats, 5 Republicans. Redistricting eliminated one district and reshaped another to elect a Republican. But Democrat Francis A. McCloskey, the mayor of Bloomington, defeated two-term Republican Joel Deckard. The lineup is now 5 Democrats, 5 Republicans.

Kansas—The 1 Democrat, 4 Republican lineup shifts to 2 Democrats, 3 Republicans. Democrat Jim Slattery overcame a big-spending opponent to win a previously Republican Topeka area district.

Massachusetts—A matchup of two popular incumbents, compelled by a loss of one seat in redistricting, resulted in Democrat Barney Frank beating eight-term Republican Margaret M. Heckler by a surprisingly large margin. The 10-2 Democratic lineup becomes 10-1.

Michigan—The 12 Democrats, 7 Republicans become, after a one-seat reapportionment loss, 12 Democrats, 6 Republicans.

The party change came in a rematch in a Lansing-Pontiac district. Democrat Bob Carr won back the seat he lost two years ago to Republican Jim Dunn. Carr had a COPE record of 111 right, 24 wrong during three previous terms in the House; Dunn's one-term record was 9 right, 24 wrong.

Minnesota—A lineup of 3 Democrats, 5 Republicans has been turned around to 5 Democrats, 3 Republicans.

In the Rochester area, four-term Republican Tom Hagedorn—a 14 right, 110 wrong COPE record—was upset by Democrat Timothy J. Penny. In the Twin Cities suburbs, Democrat Gerry Sikorski defeated two-term Republican Arlen Erdahl in a reshuffled district. And Republican Arlan Stangeland won his third term by the very barest margin.

Mississippi—From 4 Democrats, 1 Republican to 3 Democrats, 2 Republicans.

Mississippi came close to electing a liberal black Democrat, COPE-endorsed Robert G. Clark, in a previously Democratic district. But the winner was Republican Webb Franklin, whose campaign had clearly racist overtones.

In a Jackson district, however, the state's most liberal congressman, Democrat Wayne Dowdy, won re-election.

Missouri — With reapportionment, 6 Democrats and 4 Republicans shifted to 6 Democrats, 3 Republicans.

In a matchup of incumbents in the Kansas City suburbs, Democrat Ike Skelton, with a 63 right, 40 wrong COPE record, defeated Republican Wendell Bailey, who had 3 right, 24 wrong votes.

A black Democrat, Alan Wheat, won with 59 percent of the vote in a Kansas City district that is nearly three-fourths white.

Nevada—From a lone Democratic seat to one for each party. Democrat Harry Reid won the Las Vegas district as expected. But Republican Barbara Vucanovich, an aide to Sen. Paul Laxalt, narrowly beat liberal Democrat Mary Gojack for the state's other seat.

New Jersey—Previously 8 Democrats, 7 Republicans. Republicans lost one seat in redistricting and another when Democrat Robert Torricelli defeated Republican incumbent Harold Hollenbeck in a battle of two liberals.

New Mexico—Republicans kept their two seats but lost a third added by reapportionment to Democrat Bill Richardson.

New York—A previous lineup of 22 Democrats, 17 Republicans, after a five-seat reapportionment loss, turns into 20 Democrats, 14 Republicans.

In a Long Island district with a 3-2 Republican edge, voters turned out an abrasive, right-wing ideologue, John LeBoutillier. He lost his bid for a second term to Democrat Robert J. Mrazek.

Most of the new 14th District is in Staten Island, the home base of Republican Guy Molinari. He won a second term by defeating four-term Democrat Leo C. Zeferetti.

And a matchup of two liberal incumbents gave Republican Benjamin Gilman a victory over Democrat Peter A. Peyser.

North Carolina—Not even an unlimited supply of campaign funds from the Congressional Club of Sen. Jesse Helms could stave off a two-seat Republican loss to make the new lineup 9 Democrats, 2 Republicans.

In the Greensboro district, Democrat Charles Britt upset Republican incumbent Eugene Johnston. In Asheville, incumbent Republican Bill Hendon lost a squeaker to Democrat James Clarke. And to top it off, Democrat Ike Andrews kept his seat despite being the Number One state target of the Helms operation.

Ohio—After redistricting the lineup of 10 Democrats, 13 Republicans becomes 10 Democrats, 11 Republicans.

Democrat Marcy Kaptur trounced Republican incumbent Ed Weber in a Toledo district. But redistricting helped Republican John Kasich oust Democrat Bob Shamansky in a Republican-tilted Columbus seat. Democrat Edward F. Feighan, who ousted the more conservative incumbent, Ronald M. Mottl, in the primary, had no trouble winning election. And Democratic incumbent Dennis Eckart, squeezed by reapportionment, switched to a previously Republican district—and won it.

Oregon—Oregon gained a seat, and it went Republican for a new lineup of 3 Democrats, 2 Republicans. The new district was won by Republican Bob Smith.

Pennsylvania—The lineup of 12 Democrats, 13 Republicans was supposed to tilt heavier to the GOP because redistricting eliminated two Democratic seats. Instead the lineup will be at least 13 Democrats, no more than 10 Republicans.

In Philadelphia, incumbent Republican Charles Dougherty lost his bid for a third term to Democrat Robert Borski.

With a big assist from union members, Democrat Joseph Kolter trounced two-term Eugene Atkinson, who switched party affiliations after embracing Reagan's program last year.

In a rematch, Democrat Peter Kostmayer won back the seat he lost two years ago to Republican Jim Coyne. In Wilkes-Barre, another one-term Republican was beaten as James Nelligan lost to Democrat Frank Harrison.

Republicans did succeed in taking the Harrisburg seat Democrat Allen Ertel gave up to run for governor. The winner is George Gekas. And in a district where liberal Republican Marc L. Marks is retiring, Republican Thomas J. Ridge had a scant lead of less than 500 votes over Democrat Anthony Andrezeski.

South Carolina—A 4-2 Republican margin changed to 3-3. The switch came with the defeat of one-term Republican John Napier by Democrat Robert M. Talon, Jr., who had strong black support.

South Dakota—Reapportionment forced the state's two incumbents to fight it out for the lone seat. Democrat Thomas A. Daschle, with a 54 right, 11 wrong COPE record was the winner. Republican Clint Roberts, 2 right, 23 wrong, was the loser.

Tennessee—A one-seat gain went Democratic. The winner in the new district was Jim Cooper, who easily beat Republican Cissy Baker.

Texas—Democrats won all three seats added by reapportionment to make the new lineup 22 Democrats, 5 Republicans. The new Democrats are Michael Andrews in a Houston district, Solomon Ortiz in the Corpus Christi area, and Tom Vandergriff in the Fort Worth suburbs—if Vandergriff's 437-vote lead holds up.

Utah—An added seat made it 3 Republicans instead of 2. He's Howard Nielson of Provo.

Virginia—A probable three-seat Democratic pickup would make the lineup 4 Democrats, 6 Republicans.

In the Portsmouth area, Democrat Norman Sisisky upset five-term Republican Robert W. Daniel, Jr. In a Roanoke district where Republican M. Caldwell Butler is retiring, the Democratic winner is James Olin. And nine-term Republican William C. Wampler was trailing Democrat Frederick Boucher by fewer than 350 votes.

Washington—An added seat was won by Republican Rodney Chandler to make it 5 Democrats, 3 Republicans.

West Virginia—From 2 Democrats, 2 Republicans to 4 Democrats. The Harley O. Staggers, Jr., who won the seat opened when Republican Cleve Benedict ran for the Senate is the son of the man who represented the district for 32 years until 1980. The other Democratic pickup was the big upset victory of Bob Wise over Republican incumbent David Stanton.

Senate races show liberal strength despite standoff in party lineups

The only real Republican takeover was the Senate seat of Nevada's veteran Howard W. Cannon, who was seeking a fifth term after a bruising primary battle. He was beaten by the well-financed campaign of Chic Hecht, 53-year-old former Republican leader of the state senate.

Republican Paul S. Trible, Jr., won the Senate seat of Virginia's retiring Harry F. Byrd, Jr. But that rates as a party switch only on the most technical of grounds. Byrd had been elected to two terms in the Senate as an independent, defeating Democratic candidates. He was counted as a Democrat because he joined the party's Senate caucus. Byrd had voted in accord with labor's position only 13 percent of the time—less even than the 16 percent COPE record Trible compiled in his three terms in the House.

A clear Democratic gain was in New Mexico, where Republican Harrison Schmitt was upset in his bid for a second term.

He was beaten soundly by New Mexico Atty. Gen. Jeff Bingaman, who campaigned as a mainstream Democrat and challenged Schmitt's support of President Reagan's spending cuts. Schmitt, a former astronaut, had 16 right votes in the Senate to 83 wrong votes.

The other Democratic pickup was in New Jersey, where Republican Nicholas F. Brady had filled the seat by appointment after the resignation of Democrat Harrison A. Williams, Jr., early this year.

New Jersey switch

Republican Millicent Fenwick gave up her House seat to run for the Senate at age 72, and it first appeared she would win in a walkaway. The Democratic candidate, Frank R. Lautenberg, was wealthy and liberal—but little known. But the combination of a Reagan-devastated economy, Lautenberg's strong media campaign and Fenwick's problem of trying to placate Republican conservatives while appealing to Democratic voters turned the election around.

In New England, three moderate Republican incumbents prevailed by slim margins against strong Democratic challenges—Vermont's Robert Stafford, Connecticut's Lowell Weicker, and Rhode Island's John Chafee.

None received more than 51 percent of the vote and Chafee's lead in Rhode Island could be overturned in the absentee ballot count. Democrat Julius C. Michaelson was still in the running as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Democrat Edward M. Kennedy won as expected with 61 percent of the vote in Massachusetts. But so did George Mitchell in Maine, whose Senate seat was considered highly vulnerable to a Republican takeover.

Elsewhere in the East, COPE-backed Republican John Heinz was the only Republican in the nation to win a Senate race with 60 percent of the vote. Delaware Republican William Roth also won handily.

But among Democrats, New York's Daniel P. Moynihan swept back in with 65 percent, the once-endangered Paul Sarbanes had 63 percent, and Senate Democratic Leader Robert Byrd, also picked as a prime conservative target, won an astonishing 69 percent of the vote.

Solid South

In the South, the three Democratic incumbents all took over 60 percent of the vote — Lawton Chiles in Florida, John Stennis in Mississippi and Tennessee's Jim Sasser, who was once thought to be endangered by the distortion-riddled attacks of Republican Robin Beard.

Democrats Lloyd Bentsen in Texas and Dennis DeConcini in Arizona both substantially exceeded their election margins of six years ago.

In the Midwest, among Democratic incumbents, only Wisconsin's William Proxmire slipped below 1976 percentages and his "drop" was to a mere 64 percent. Ohio's Howard Metzenbaum and Michigan's Donald Riegle, all in close races last time around, were easy winners this year.

On the Republican side, Indiana's Richard Lugar slipped from 59 to 54 percent in what was supposed to have been an easy contest, Minnesota's David Durenberger plunged from 61.4 percent to 53 percent, and Missouri's John Danforth dropped from 56.9 percent to less than 51 percent in holding off a strong challenge from liberal Democrat Harriett Woods.

In the Plains and Mountain states, incumbents of both parties fared well—Democrats Quentin Burdick in North Dakota, Edward Zorinsky in Nebraska and John Melcher in Montana, along with Republicans Orrin Hatch in Utah and Malcolm Wallop in Wyoming.

In the West, among Democratic incumbents, Henry Jackson won in Washington with 69 percent and Spark Matsunaga polled an 82 percent in Hawaii.

GOP retains California

The big seat was in California, where Republican S. I. Hayakawa did not seek re-election. California's outgoing Gov. Edmund G. Brown was unable to catch up with his Republican opponent, San Diego Mayor Pete Wilson, who won with 53 percent of the vote.

Republican moderates have been a stronger influence in the Senate than in the House these past two years, and the election returns may enhance their influence.

In general, voters in Senate elections this year tilted strongly away from Reaganomics and candidates who echoed the President's "stay the course" appeal. It was a marked contrast to the elections two years ago, which saw a huge swing of 12 seats from Democratic to Republican. But it will be four more years until Reagan's dozen again face the electorate.

Federal pay boosts urged to narrow gap

A presidential advisory committee has called for a series of catch-up raises for federal employees to restore comparability with private-sector jobs.

The three-member Advisory Committee on Federal Pay said government workers should have received raises averaging 17 percent last month—instead of the 4 percent set by Congress and the President.

Pay raises have been held below the comparability level in each of the past five years, the committee noted, and "the pay gap has become so wide as to undermine employee belief in the purpose and fairness of the system."

The advisory panel was created by the 1970 Federal Pay Comparability Act, which was supposed to take the pay of government employees out of the political arena by basing annual salary adjustments on a survey of similar jobs in private industry. Committee members serve six-year terms and this year's unanimous report was made by persons first appointed in the administrations of Presidents Nixon, Carter and Reagan.

Start proposed

The committee said the gap has grown so large that it is unrealistic to expect that it will be closed in a single year.

But a start should be made, it urged, by a presidential commitment to a full catch-up, to be achieved over three years preferably, but at least over a five-year period.

"If federal pay continues to deteriorate," the committee warned, "the quality of the workforce and the efficiency with which federal government functions are performed will also continue to deteriorate. This means an increase in the net cost of government."

A few years back, it was primarily higher-grade jobs that were significantly behind private-sector rates, the panel noted. But now clerical jobs have increasingly been hard to fill at federal pay levels, and above-scale pay has had to be authorized in some communities.

The committee expressed concern that the government has been looking for ways to lower the pay-setting formula instead of striving to achieve full comparability. The changes that have been proposed, it noted, "have been one-sided and have focused on reduction in pay or benefits."

Donahue cites labor's role in economic, social changes

Kansas City—The AFL-CIO will continue to press Congress for a major correction in the nation's economic course that will bring about full employment, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a speech here.

Donahue said organized labor will seek reindustrialization of the nation and a coordinated national industrial policy enabling the United States to compete with other big industrial powers.

In an address at the annual meeting of the Joint Committee on Economic Education and the National Association of Economic Educators, Donahue charged that the Administration-supported tight-money policies and President Reagan's tax and budget policies have generated an overall economic and social climate that seriously retards the drive for jobs, and social progress and compounds the problems of collective bargaining.

"To deal with these issues, labor must extend its actions into the political arena where these basic decisions are made," Donahue said.

In his remarks on the role of labor in a free society, Donahue spoke of the labor movement as a "change-agent" in society and said it has never shrunk from its historic mission to improve the lot of the poor, the exploited, and the victims of discrimination.

"No other organization in society has concerned itself with as wide-ranging a program for social improvement," he said, adding: "Today, that struggle to improve our nation is more important than ever."

He charged that Reaganomics is undoing the gains in economic and social rights that have been achieved over a half-century in this country.

"The economy has been pushed into the deepest and longest recession since the Depression" by Reagan policies, he said. At the same time, the right of workers to form and join unions for collective bargaining purposes is being eroded by determined and almost universal resistance of employers and their so-called "labor-management consultants," he said.

"That opposition is responsible for the current difficult labor-management climate in this country and the continuing inability of the labor movement to embrace wholeheartedly some writers' views of 'labor-management cooperation,'" Donahue said.

"It is very hard to think about cooperating with the bear while you are wrestling with him."

Donahue asked the educators to enlarge their effort to make young Americans economically literate and aware of the trade union movement, its goals and philosophies, and its proper role and place in society.

Bonds to bottles

Ballot questions cover wide range of issues

By Susan Dunlop

A record number of ballot questions confronting voters in this year's election ran the gamut from local bond issues to constitutional housekeeping measures to referenda on national policies.

"Bottle bills" on the ballot in five states generally were opposed by labor out of concern that requirements for deposits on returnable containers would cost jobs.

Voters in Arizona, California, Colorado and Washington turned down the proposals. But in Massachusetts, where a bottle deposit measure was approved last year, the voters decided to keep it.

Oregon voters turned down an initiative that would have crippled local revenues and threatened jobs by imposing a 1.5-percent limit property tax. They also agreed with labor in rejecting a measure to permit self-service gasoline stations.

Missouri rejection

Vigorous opposition by the Missouri AFL-CIO helped defeat a call for a state constitutional convention and for a so-called consumers' utility organization. The group would have been funded by utility companies, and union members working for utilities would have been barred from serving on the boards. The convention was opposed on grounds it would not only be expensive but could be manipulated by anti-labor groups.

Missouri voters approved a labor-supported measure to permit local governments to increase benefits of retired public employees, but voted against a measure that would have permitted improved health insurance benefits for public employees and their dependents.

In Ohio, voters rejected a proposal for an elected public utility commission, an idea labor opposed on the grounds that elected commissioners could be subject to political pressures and that utility companies could substantially finance commission candidates of their choosing.

A proposal was adopted that will permit the state to sell bonds and make the money available to private lending institutions to finance below-market rate mortgages for low- and middle-income home buyers. But funding for a high-speed rail system in the state was turned down.

In Washington, a slick campaign and heavy spending by big retail chains helped defeat a labor-backed initiative to limit interest rates on retail credit to 12 percent or 1 percent above the federal discount rate. The State AFL-CIO estimates the opposition poured well over $1 million into the campaign. The same kind of heat persuaded Arkansas voters to let the state's interest rate ceiling go up from 10 percent to 17 percent on consumer loans.

Michigan voters approved a labor-supported measure to restrict lenders from foreclosing on mortgages or land contracts by invoking "due on sale" clauses when homes are sold. Election of public service commissioners was also defeated.

Two proposals to reform utility rate-making procedures and open them to the public were on the Michigan ballot. Labor opposed one that would have stopped utilities from including labor and fuel costs in rate request justifications, but backed another measure, considered more realistic and tighter. Both passed, but the labor-supported proposal will be adopted because it got a higher number of votes.

Nebraska labor cheered the success of a "save the family farm" amendment to the state's constitution that will prohibit non-family corporations from buying or operating farms in the state.

Arizona's labor-supported "Voter-Motor" issue was also a winner. When it takes effect, anyone who renews a driver's license will automatically be offered voter registration. Registration will also be available to eligible first time drivers who are approaching voting age.

In Texas, voters approved a measure that will raise the ceiling on state expenditures for aid to families with dependent children from the current $80 million to 1 percent of the state budget. The needy elderly and blind also will benefit.

Procedures for redistricting were an issue in several states, but in California a Republican proposition to give reapportionment authority to a complicated commission, or to the courts, was defeated, thus keeping responsibility for reapportionment in the legislature.

Nuclear freeze votes

Proposals calling on the United States and the Soviet Union to freeze further proliferation of nuclear weapons were put before voters in nine states and a number of local jurisdictions.

Arizona voters said no, but in California, Massachusetts, Michigan, Montana, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oregon and Rhode Island, the idea was endorsed. It also won approval in the District of Columbia.

Colorado voters disapproved, however, a measure calling for conversion to other uses of the Rocky Flats nuclear weapons manufacturing facility. And in Maine, voters defeated a measure that would have required the phasing out of the state's only nuclear power plant, Maine Yankee, by 1987.

Administration eyes benefit cuts in social security strengthening financing, establishment of a presidential advisory commission was no more than "a smokescreen that would blow away after Election Day," he said.

Kirkland noted that President Reagan has repeatedly pledged that he would not cut benefits for persons already on the social security rolls. But that's exactly what would be done if cost-of-living guarantees were reduced, he charged.

The USA Today news story wasn't the only evidence of the Administration's approach to social security cutbacks, Kirkland said.

He cited "persistent reports of other proposals by Administration officials that would reduce benefits to the most needy recipients."

One such indication was a Republican fund-raising letter inviting contributors to express a preference, through a straw vote, among various options for dealing with social security financing problems.

The "choices" included making social security coverage voluntary instead of universal and reducing benefits for the poorest recipients.

National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob expressed "alarm and outrage" at the Republican poll.

Pickup of 7 governorships bolsters Democrats for '84 predicted the election would likely be decided in court.

Democratic gubernatorial candidates, most of whom had strong support from organized labor, had been expected to do well this year. Even so, the capture of the Texas governorship by Atty. Gen. Mark White was a stunning upset of incumbent GOP Gov. William P. Clements, Jr., who spent an estimated $11.5 million in seeking a second term. Clements had been favored to win, but White benefited from the most united Democratic Party effort Texas has seen in years and took the race with 54 percent of the vote.

Costly contest

In another expensive contest of national significance, California Atty. Gen. George Deukmejian, the Republican candidate, came from behind to prevent Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley from becoming the first black elected governor. (Deukmejian will be the first governor of Armenian descent.)

Bradley, who was regarded as comfortably ahead about two weeks before the election, lost by about 50,000 votes. He has refused to concede the race, however, and said he may seek a recount.

In New York, the second most populous state after California, Democratic Lt. Gov. Mario Cuomo turned back a strong challenge from Republican drugstore magnate Lewis E. Lehrman, who spent a large chunk of his personal fortune in an attempt to succeed retiring Gov. Hugh Carey (D). The race was a classic liberal-conservative battle in a state hard hit by unemployment.

Former Democratic Gov. George C. Wallace received heavy support from black voters in coasting to an unprecedented fourth, non-consecutive term in Alabama. A one-time fiery segregationist, Wallace appealed to black voters to forget the past and accept him as a "compassionate, caring man," who would represent all the people of Alabama. That, plus name recognition and soaring unemployment, gave him an easy victory over his Republican opponent, Montgomery Mayor Emory Folmar.

Three other former Democratic governors won return statehouse engagements —Michael Dukakis in Massachusetts, Bill Clinton in Arkansas, and Rudy Perpich in Minnesota.

In other gubernatorial contests:

- Democratic newcomer Bob Kerrey scored an upset win over Republican Gov. Charles Thone in Nebraska. Thone, a former congressman, had actively tied his campaign to President Reagan, who stumped for him in late September. Kerrey, a Vietnam Medal of Honor winner, pledged to prop up the state's sagging farm economy.

- Pennsylvania Gov. Richard Thornburgh (R) narrowly held off his Democratic challenger, Rep. Allen Ertel, in a race that proved closer than most observers had expected. A Democratic coalition of blacks and labor cut substantially into Thornburgh's lead, especially in urban areas, and he managed to take only 51 percent of the total vote.

- Ohio voters elected former Lt. Gov. Richard F. Celeste, a Democrat, over Republican Rep. Clarence J. Brown in the race to succeed retiring Gov. James A. Rhodes (R). Celeste highlighted the state's economic woes under Republicans, including an unemployment rate of 12.5 percent.

- Michigan Rep. James Blanchard (D) defeated insurance executive Richard Headlee in a contest to succeed retiring Gov. William Milliken (R), thus ending 20 years of Republican control in Lansing. Blanchard sponsored the federal legislation that helped bail out the Chrysler Corp. when it was on the verge of bankruptcy.

Court rescinds heavy fine in '75 Teachers' strike

New Haven, Conn.—A state court has rescinded a $224,500 fine that was imposed on the New Haven Federation of Teachers during a 1975 strike, agreeing with the union's contention that it was excessive punishment.

The rehearing followed a ruling by the Connecticut Supreme Court last May that the original trial judge, who has since retired, raised a reasonable doubt as to his impartiality in a newspaper interview he granted at the time.

Ninety AFT members were jailed for up to eight days during the strike and not released until the fine against their union was paid.

Frank Carrano, president of the New Haven AFT local and of the city's AFL-CIO Central Labor Council, was one of those jailed and recalled the judge's insistence on a certified check before the strikers were freed. The parent American Federation of Teachers advanced the money to pay the fine, and the refund will allow the local union to repay the loan, Carrano said.

American labor's stake in the Middle East was the central topic at a three-day Washington conference. Panelists included Ed Schneider, international relations director for the Ladies' Garment Workers, AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager, and AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, right.

Democracy in Middle East linked to strong, free Israel

American labor's concern for Israel goes far beyond its link with the democratic national trade union movement there and is concerned primarily with democracy itself, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told a Washington conference.

"The survival of democracy is our legitimate concern, and we see no hope that democracy in any of its political or economic or social forms—including the form of trade unionism—can be kept alive in the Middle East without a strong and free Israel," Donahue said.

"We have never had the slightest doubt that if Israel should fall, her Arab neighbors would quickly be swallowed up or reduced to helpless satellites of the greatest despotism of all, the Soviet empire. If the light of democracy were extinguished in Israel, the darkness would soon be complete.

"So the issues that turn on the survival of Israel are vital to free men and women everywhere."

Histadrut conference

Donahue made his remarks at a three-day conference sponsored by the American Histadrut Cultural Exchange Institute and the AFL-CIO Departments of Education and International Affairs. Histadrut is the Israeli labor organization.

The focus of the meeting was the role of American labor in the endeavor to secure peace in the Middle East. The role of Histadrut in developing countries, as well as in Israel, also was discussed.

In his address, Donahue assailed the terrorism of the Palestine Liberation Organization as an instrument of destruction against the Israeli state. The actions of the PLO—in Israel, in Lebanon, in Munich, and elsewhere in the world—speak only of hatred, death, and chaos, he said.

"Even if Israel did not exist," Donahue observed, "the establishment of a PLO state would injure and endanger the economic, political and strategic interest of the United States and the entire Western alliance.

"Therefore, as a matter of self-interest alone, the survival of Israel must remain the keystone of American policy in the Middle East."

Continued support

Donahue said the American labor movement would continue to do everything in its power to prevent any erosion of American support for Israel.

Other speakers at the conference included Israeli Counsel Gen. Benjamin Abileah; Matthew Schoenwald and Herbert Levine, national chairman and director, respectively, of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut, and Bernard Jacobson, executive vice president of the National Committee for Labor Israel.

Others were Tom Kahn and Dale Good, assistants to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland; Laborers Vice President Robert Powell; William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development; Patrick J. O'Farrell, executive director of the African-American Labor Center; Charles D. Gray, executive director of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute, and Yehudah Paz, executive director of the Histadrut Africa Asian Institute.

Also, Chris Gersten, special assistant to the president of the Operating Engineers; Meir Gatt, Histadrut representative to the United States and Canada; Danni Bloch, labor affairs counselor, Embassy of Israel; Eugenia Kemble, assistant to the president of the Teachers; Gary Nebeker, assistant director of international affairs, Food & Commercial Workers; Louis Moore, director of international affairs, Communications Workers; AIFLD Regional Director Michael Verdue; AFT International Affairs Director David Dorn; Frontlash Director Jessica Smith; Robert Dolan, coordinator, International Youth Year, U.S. Youth Council; Dan Kubiski, Labor Desk, U.S. Youth Council; Wendy Rosenberg, executive director, Youth Institute for Peace in the Middle East; Fred Hoehler, executive director of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies; Frank Lunney, director of international affairs, Steelworkers; AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager; CWA Vice President Morton Bahr; Ed Schneider, international relations director, Ladies' Garment Workers; Harry Gordon, general manager of the Clothing & Textile Workers New York Joint Board, and Director Dorothy Shields of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

1982 settlements

Pay gains depressed by sagging economy

First-year increases in major collective bargaining settlements reached in the first nine months of 1982 averaged a modest 3.8 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Measured over the life of the contracts, the wage gains averaged 3.5 percent per year.

The averages compare with 8.3 and 6.4 percent, respectively, when the same parties bargained previously, in most cases two or three years ago.

The increases are the lowest since the government first started keeping records of such settlements in 1968.

The plunge in wage increases "reflects the general sick state of the economy," AFL-CIO Economist John Zalusky observed. "Nearly half of all the workers in major contract settlements had to forgo increases in the first year of their contract.

"These figures show clearly the sacrifices workers have already made. For workers to attain real wage gains, the economy needs to be turned around by full employment action by the new Congress," Zalusky declared.

About 45 percent of the 2.7 million workers covered by the settlements reached in the January-to-September period received no specified wage increase. Most of these are in the troubled auto and trucking industries, where settlements early this year included major wage and benefit concessions.

Workers receiving increases will average a 7.1 percent boost in the first contract year and 5.9 percent annually over the life of the settlements. They are in a variety of industries, including construction, apparel, electrical equipment manufacturing, and utilities.

The BLS data were compiled from private industry bargaining units with at least 1,000 workers.

Two-thirds of all workers under settlements concluded during the first nine months of the year were covered by cost-of-living clauses. Most of these workers will not receive a specified wage increase during the life of the contract, BLS said. Therefore, the average size of settlements with COL clauses was much lower than usual, accentuating the difference between contracts with and without COL provisions.

First-year negotiated adjustments averaged 2.2 percent in settlements with COL clauses compared with 7.1 percent in those without such clauses. Wage adjustments over the life of the agreements were 1.0 percent and 6.7 percent, respectively. Settlements with COL clauses have an average duration of 34 months, while those without such clauses averaged 25 months.

Lowest since 1978

Construction industry contracts showed the smallest increase since 1978. Wage gains for these settlements in the first nine months of this year averaged 7 percent for the first year and 6.9 percent annually over the life of the agreements. These gains compared with 11.3 percent for the first year and 10 percent over the term of the contract when the same parties bargained previously.

In manufacturing, average increases were 2.7 percent for the first year and 2.4 percent annually over the term of the agreements. In non-manufacturing industries, the average gains were 5.1 percent for the first year and 4.6 percent a year over term.

NLRB bars employer penalty levied only on union officers

A sharply divided National Labor Relations Board overturned an arbitrator's ruling and held that a company may not penalize a union officer more stringently than other employees who took part in an unauthorized strike.

The 3-2 decision lined up the three pre-Reagan NLRB members—John H. Fanning, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Don A. Zimmerman—against Chairman John R. Van de Water and Robert P. Hunter.

At issue was a 30-day suspension levied by the Consolidation Coal Co. in West Virginia against two shop stewards of a local of the Mine Workers. The company had sought to discharge the stewards but an arbitrator reduced the penalty to a suspension. He said a penalty was justified, even though the two stewards had not instigated the walkout, because their participation in it was a greater transgression than that of other workers. An officer of a local union has a greater responsibility for observance of a no-strike clause than rank-and-file members, the arbitrator assumed.

The NLRB majority found this a violation of federal labor law because employees were punished for their union status, not for their actions as employees. Zimmerman noted that he joined in the conclusion that the suspension of the two stewards was unlawful only because the contract "contains no express provision which requires union officers to take affirmative steps to prevent or curtail unauthorized work stoppages." That's the position that was taken by the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals in a similar case which the Supreme Court has agreed to review. the case.

The wording of the various NLRB opinions and dissents pointed to the depths of the board's division on the issue.

Van de Water termed the majority decision "creative rhetoric," and insisted that shop stewards "are the national leaders of any work stoppage in which they participate."

Fanning and Jenkins said the "inescapable conclusion" of Van de Water's reasoning is that it is proper to punish union officers "not for what they do but merely for what they are." Such a view is "the essence of discrimination" and "repugnant," they said.

Hunter insisted that a higher degree of obligation on the part of stewards and union officers is "inherent in the collective bargaining system" and found portions of the majority opinion confusing. Fanning, in a footnote, retorted that he found Hunter's confusion "inexplicable."

Performances cancelled

Dancers of the American Ballet Theater march in an informational picket line at the Kennedy Center for Performing Arts in Washington to protest ABT's lockout and cancellation of performances. The troupe, represented by the Guild of Musical Artists, has been locked out since Sept. 2, two weeks after its contract with the New York-based company expired. The Theatrical Stage Employes and performing arts unions joined in the demonstration.

Solidarity Day II

SOME 13 MONTHS ago, a vast and peaceful army of 400,000 American workers gathered in Washington to deliver a Solidarity Day message of discontent with the direction in which the Reagan Administration was heading.

Unemployment should be fought with jobs, not tax cuts for the rich, these union members and their allies insisted. They carried signs protesting the weakening of occupational health standards, the undermining of prevailing wage laws—and the abandonment of compassion for the needy and the aged.

That was Solidarity Day I.

Because Congress responded inadequately, and the President not at all, the AFL-CIO designated the Nov. 2 election as Solidarity Day II.

Again, the American people have spoken, and it is time for the Reagan White House to listen.

The message clearly is not to "stay the course."

Election Lessons

IN NUMBERS and enthusiasm unprecedented for an off-year election, the trade union movement worked to elect its friends and defeat labor's enemies.

This did not always happen, of course. Nor could all the candidates be so simply categorized.

Nevertheless, in terms of labor's concerns, the new 98th Congress should be a big improvement over its predecessors. And that's good—for all of the American people, not just those who carry union cards.

There is work to be done in shaping a realistic program and giving grass-roots support to the effort to move it through Congress. But we can take out a few moments to relish the election just completed and mull its significance.

We can delight in the voter rejection of a LeBoutillier—a particularly obnoxious right-wing ideologue—and of an Atkinson, who was a special target of Pennsylvania unions after he switched parties and embraced Reaganomics. And we will no longer have California's Rousselot to kick us around.

WE SHARE the disappointment of those labor-backed candidates who fought the good fight and in so many instances came astonishingly close to upset victories that would have turned this election into a total rout for the President's party.

It is shameful that the voters in Mississippi's 2nd District chose an overt racist over the respected and capable black who was the Democratic Party candidate. And it is heartening that the Kansas City district represented so long and ably by Dick Bolling elected a black Democrat to succeed him by a big margin—even though the district's population is overwhelmingly white.

We welcome back to the Senate—with enhanced majorities—those liberal Democrats who were targeted for defeat by the New Right.

In the statehouses, the new crop of governors will be taking a clearly critical look at the small print in the Reagan Administration's New Federalism proposal.

TWO YEARS AGO, in the flush of the Reagan victory, most of the more moderate Republicans in Congress swallowed their qualms and voted—at least in the first year of the new Administration—to give the President whatever he wanted.

Many of them survived this election only by stressing their distance from the President's program. Their votes in both the Senate and House can be decisive in the new Congress.

There is still a powerful conservative coalition, reduced though it may be in numbers. But it can be overcome by a coalition of mainstream Democrats and non-ideologue Republicans who read the lesson of this election as a call to change course, a demand for jobs and justice.

High social costs linked to prolonged recession

By Press Associates, Inc.

The prolonged recession is producing especially harsh consequences for older workers.

Chairman Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) of the House Select Committee on Aging says unemployment among older workers is nearing crisis proportions. There are now 771,000 unemployed aged 55 and over and 1.7 million who are 45 and over—the highest level since World War II.

Unemployment is rising fastest among older workers, too. Since January, unemployment increased 24 percent for those 55 and over, compared to 11 percent for the 16-24 age bracket and 16 percent for all workers.

Once employed, workers aged 55 and over are out of work one-fourth longer than the average unemployed worker. Those 60 or older are three times as likely as other adults over 25 to become discouraged and withdraw from the workforce.

The economic losses are obvious, but the social costs may be even higher, according to experts who testified before Pepper's committee.

As jobs disappear

Dr. Paula Rayman, a sociologist at Brandeis University, conducted a study for the National Institute of Mental Health on unemployment in the aircraft industry in Hartford, Conn., where 30,000 jobs disappeared between 1967 and 1972. "What happened to these workers foreshadowed what soon would happen to hundreds of thousands of others in the industrial heartland of the country," Rayman observed.

All the workers reported changes in financial well-being. These ranged from cutting back on household luxuries and necessities to depletion of family savings, repossessions and evictions.

Included among the psychological and physical health problems reported by the unemployed workers were loss of self-esteem, insomnia, anxiety, increased smoking and drinking, lack of energy, headaches and stomach ailments.

Dr. M. Harvey Brenner of the School of Hygiene & Public Health at Johns Hopkins University emphasized the role of continuous stress from high unemployment in "deteriorated mental and physical health. . . ."

He pointed to a 1976 study by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress which found, in effect, that unemployment can kill.

Mortality rate rises

During the period 1940-1974, there was a strong relationship between national unemployment rates and total mortality rates for people over 65, the report said. Higher rates of death due to homicide, suicide, cardiovascular, renal disease and cirrhosis of the liver among older people also were related to high national unemployment rates.

The study estimated that the 1.4 percent rise in unemployment during 1970 accounted for 51,570 more deaths between 1970 and 1975 than would have occurred had unemployment not increased.

Brenner said similar studies in Canada and England and Wales substantiate the JEC findings.

Another long-range effect cited by Rayman is the social consequence of children watching parents and grandparents, after a lifetime of faithfully following the American dream that hard work brings personal and financial rewards, end up without these rewards.

The experts recognize that programs such as jobless benefits and aid for food, housing and medical care, along with social security, provide necessary cushions. The basic solution calls for policies to modernize the industries where many of the older workers were concentrated, retrain people for today's technology, and point the way toward full employment.

Sharp decline cited in OSHA enforcement

Enforcement activities of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration have dropped off significantly under President Reagan, an AFL-CIO analysis of government statistics shows.

On a monthly average, the number of total inspections declined 25 percent during a nine-month period through June 1982 from a comparable time span in 1980 under the Carter Administration, while complaint inspections plummeted 58 percent. During similar periods, citations for willful violations of the federal job safety law under the Reagan Administration were down 89 percent.

The study by the federation's Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health also tracked sharp declines in other OSHA enforcement activities during the first 17 months of the Reagan Administration, including: followup inspections down 87 percent; citations for repeated violations down 64 percent; total penalties down 70 percent, and complaint filings down 50 percent.

The only increase in OSHA activity was in general schedule inspections, which rose 11 percent since Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter took over as head of OSHA.

Bookkeeping gain

But this is more of a bookkeeping gain than an actual step-up in comprehensive plant inspections, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor said.

Taylor said that as a result of the "targeting" program instituted by Auchter in October 1981, the majority of general schedule inspections now involve a review of employer records rather than a comprehensive inspection of the workplace.

He pointed out that 56 percent of the general schedule inspections that OSHA conducted from October 1980 through June 1982 were employer record reviews.

The AFL-CIO analysis shows that inspections in the manufacturing sector have declined 35 percent under Auchter, to 1,533 a month. Construction industry inspections dropped 5 percent to 2,314 a month and maritime industry inspections declined to 20 percent to 72 a month.

Penalties decline

Other areas of the study show total penalties for violations proposed by OSHA declined from more than $2 million in 1980 to $611,661 in 1981-82, a drop of 70 percent; discrimination complaints on a monthly average dropped from 230 to 81, a decline of 65 percent; proposed penalties for failure to abate hazards dropped from $187,144 per month to $26,692, a decline of 50 percent, and the number of hours per health hazard inspection dropped from 41 to 31.2, a decline of 24 percent, and the amount of time spent per safety inspection was reduced to 12.4 hours, a decline of 22 percent.

Time to Change Course

Drozak terms cargo policy vital to U.S. merchant fleet

Long Beach, Calif.—A national cargo policy that gives U.S.-flag ships a reasonable share of the market is the only way to prevent the death of the American maritime industry, Maritime Trades President Frank Drozak warned.

In an address to the Propellor Club's annual convention, Drozak said U.S. maritime policy must include bilateral shipping agreements, cargo sharing, ratification of the UN Conference on Trade & Development code, and passage of the Competive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act.

The UNCTAD code on liner shipping, formulated in the early Seventies, proposes that 80 percent of cargo be shared by two trading partners, with the remaining 20 percent open to cross-traders, or third countries. The U.S. government has opposed the code's ratification.

The Competitive Shipping & Shipbuilding Act, introduced in the House by Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.), specifies that 5 percent of all U.S. bulk cargo be carried on American-flag ships built in U.S. shipyards and manned by American crews. The legislation would require a 1 percent increase in bulk cargo carriage each year until the U.S. share reached 20 percent in 15 years.

Under the Boggs bill, Drozak pointed out, reduction of at least 15 percent in the costs of building and operating bulk vessels in the United States would qualify U.S. bottoms to carry this minimal percentage of exports and imports beginning in 1983.

"I don't have to tell you that this bill will be good for our national security, help turn back the economic depression we are now in, and put thousands and thousands of Americans back to work," Drozak said.

Drozak said new proposals from the Reagan Administration will not work. Taking away the ship construction subsidy and offering in its place a foreign yard ship construction proposal means an end to the berth line operations and the trade routes as they now exist, he observed.

Drozak called the proposal "just another quick fix" plan that would make the problem worse.

Also, not allowing a differential for the one-way grain voyage to Russia means the destruction of many U.S. companies now in the trades today who have over the years paid the American price for American-built ships, he said.

"Until the policymakers in this country understand and accept this truth—that free trade in the rest of the world is only a word and not a fact—this country will continue to lose its industrial base, its shipbuilding base, its merchant marine, and its national security."

Reagan opens attack on rail pension plan

Railroad unions will ask Congress to reject an Administration attempt to dismantle the railroad retirement system and, in President Reagan's words, "free rail labor and management from inappropriate federal intrusion in their affairs."

Congressional committees were cool to the dismemberment proposal when it was advanced earlier this year as a budget proposal. But Reagan reiterated the Administration's position in an Oct. 25 message to Congress which forwarded the annual report of the members of the Railroad Retirement Board.

Reagan proposed to shift railroad retirement unemployment benefits to the states, leave sick pay up to state or private resolution, separate out social security coverage and leave employer-paid pensions to the area of private negotiations.

President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks said Reagan's proposal would abandon "a tested and workable system" and "bring about a chaotic period of uncertainty."

Noting that railroad retirement benefits have been funded by railroad workers and their employers, Kilroy said Reagan was misleading the American people by portraying benefits as coming from federal funds.

Strong opposition voiced

The Railway Labor Executives' Association, representing 20 railroad unions, reiterated its strong opposition to the Administration plan.

Maintenance of Way President O. M. Berge, chairman of the RLEA's Committee on Railroad Retirement, said the unions "are solidly committed to preserving the railroad retirement system and will continue to fight to prevent its dismantlement."

In this effort, Berge said, "we expect our friends in Congress would support us as they have in the past."

Union wins right to challenge ruling of OSHA review panel

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers won a legal skirmish when the Supreme Court declined to block appellate court proceedings in a case involving the sterilization of women workers as a condition for retaining their jobs.

At issue was the union's right, as an affected party, to challenge in court a ruling by the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission that dismissed an OSHA citation against the American Cyanamid Co.

At the bottom of the stack of legal pleadings and rulings is the still unanswered question of whether an employer can fulfill his obligation under the Occupational Safety & Health Act by barring women of childbearing age from jobs where they are exposed to lead or other substances that would be hazardous to a fetus—unless they have undergone sterilization to remove the possibility of pregnancy.

The union's contention—and the position taken by OSHA when it issued a citation and levied a $10,000 penalty against American Cyanamid—was that such a policy violates the requirement for a safe and healthful workplace.

The U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia agreed and ruled last February that the union could seek a reversal of the review commission's action dismissing the citation, but held up further hearings on the case to allow American Cyanamid to request the Supreme Court to pass on that issue.

If the appellate court upholds the union position on the applicability of the law, the case would presumably be referred back to the review commission for further proceedings on the facts.

Among other actions, the Supreme Court:

- Agreed to decide whether pension systems can pay lower monthly benefits to women based on actuarial tables showing that women as a group live longer than men. The Supreme Court had earlier invalidated a pension plan that required higher contributions by women employees. The present case involves a deferred compensation plan for Arizona state employees.
- Declined to review an appellate court decision holding that an employer's agreement to use only union labor on its construction contracts was not in itself a violation of federal antitrust laws.
- Agreed to review a case involving a union's handbilling of a shopping mall asking consumers not to patronize establishments there. The union's dispute was with one department store, but there were financial links among the various stores and the corporation operating the mall. The NLRB upheld the union position, as did the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, but there have been conflicting decisions among circuit courts in similar cases.
- Declined to review an appellate decision that an employer's adamant refusal to consider union proposals for dues checkoff, union security and a no-discrimination clause was proof of failure to bargain in good faith—as the National Labor Relations Board had found.
- Refused to review the appeal of a Pennsylvania cheese processing plant that sought exemption from NLRB jurisdiction on freedom of religion grounds because of its relationship with an Amish dairy cooperative.

COPE chalks up gains

Well over 60 percent of the labor-endorsed candidates for the Senate and House were elected Nov. 2 while the victory record of union-backed gubernatorial candidates was even better.

COPE Dirctor John Perkins said the election of at least 24 labor-endorsed candidates in the 36 contests for governor is the best showing since the Watergate year of 1974 when labor also endorsed 33 candidates and 26 won.

In Senate contests, 20 of the 31 COPE-endorsed candidates—64.5 percent—were elected this year. Perkins said that is the highest winning percentage since 1974 and far exceeds the 34.4 percent of 1980 and the 40 percent of 1978.

According to COPE's incomplete tabulation of House races, 237 of the labor-endorsed candidates, or 63 percent, were elected. That is roughly comparable to COPE's winning percentages of recent years.

Perkins said the Democratic pickup of about 26 House seats exceeded his expectation of 15 to 20.

He said the television network exit polls "were accurate when they found that trade union members voted Democratic by a margin of 2 to 1" on Election Day. "Without a doubt unemployment was the principal issue," he observed.

Job-creating programs pressed

The Detroit Scene

Long lines of unemployed workers snake their way through a suburban Detroit branch office of the Michigan Employment Security Commission. Double-digit unemployment is nothing new to the Detroit area, where the auto industry has been hard hit by high interest rates and foreign imports. Michigan's jobless rate rose last month from 15.9 to 16.1 percent, considerably higher than the national rate of 10.4 percent.

Kirkland bids Congress act immediately

By James M. Shevis

A new surge in the nation's unemployment rate to 10.4 percent in October—the highest level since 1940—portended a grim holiday season for millions of Americans, and heightened the need for federal job-creating programs.

"Those millions of Americans standing in the unemployment lines cannot wait for a new Congress to write a new jobs program," warned AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland as he called for immediate action to halt the further erosion of jobs.

"We call on the current Congress to enact legislation which would create jobs by stimulating the housing industry and by starting to rebuild the collapsing network of highways, bridges, public facilities, and services."

Kirkland told a news conference that the October increase in unemployment to 10.4 percent was "an economic and social disaster." And he pointed to Republican losses in the 1982 elections, in which high unemployment was a major issue, as a clear call for change in the economic course set by the Reagan Administration.

Specific job-creation programs are already in place that could be acted on during the "lame duck" session of Congress that convenes on Nov. 29, Kirkland said. There is a public works bill ready for action in the House, and authority on the books for housing programs that only require appropriations, he observed.

Public works jobs

The House public works bill would provide about a quarter of a million jobs directly and additional employment in related fields, Kirkland said. But he stressed the need for quick action, pointing out that it takes time to get programs translated into jobs.

"It'll be a very, very hard winter for millions of people," he said. "We can't afford delay. I think the people need a message of hope from the Congress. That's what they called for when they went to the polls in what reports tell me were very considerable numbers for an offyear election."

Budget slashes cripple human service agencies

Federal budget cuts have crippled the ability of American cities to cope with the growing need for human services, according to a survey released by the U.S. Conference of Mayors.

The study, conducted in October, found that city agencies cannot meet even 50 percent of the current demand for such basic emergency services as food and shelter.

Other services—employment and training, health care and aid to the elderly—that have been the victims of the steepest budget cuts are almost non-existent in many of the 55 cities that participated in the survey.

The mayors' conference said the findings of the survey support its demands, and those other of other organizations representing local government, that the Reagan Administration "halt further domestic budget cuts."

The report pointed out that the massive cuts in federal social programs have magnified the problems growing out of soaring unemployment and the deepening recession.

Democratic gains boost state legislative outlook

By David L. Perlman

Democrats scored impressive gains in elections to state legislatures, generally brightening the outlook for labor's program and diminishing the threat of new anti-labor laws.

One or both houses of legislatures in nine states shifted from Republican to Democratic control. Only Alaska tilted the other way.

Including four states that did not elect state legislatures this year, Democrats control both houses of 34 legislatures, and 24 of these states also have Democratic governors.

Republicans control 11 legislatures, but only four of those states also have Republican governors. Four states have divided legislatures, and members of Nebraska's single-house legislature do not run under party labels.

Both houses of the Iowa and Washington state legislatures moved from the Republican to the Democratic column, and single-house shifts took place in Delaware, Illinois, Maine, Montana, North Dakota, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In most other states, Democrats gained seats to either increase existing majorities or narrow Republican advantages.

There were no legislative elections this year in Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi and New Jersey.

This year's elections wiped out Republican gains in 1980, when the GOP pumped unprecedented sums into legislative campaigns in an effort to gain control of the redistricting of congressional seats following the census reapportionment. It also recaptured most of the GOP pickup in the previous election.

Both parties controlled an equal num-

Unions helping jobless to cope

By Susan Dunlop

The Reagan Recession is driving Americans to the unemployment lines in record numbers, and to meet the crisis the labor movement is stepping up its services to jobless workers and their families.

A marked increase in requests for help has been noted by the AFL-CIO Community Services network and by central labor council community services committees.

In some cases, community resources are beginning to feel the strain of the growing demand, Community Services Director Walter Davis noted. As the unemployment situation gets worse, he observed, there is real concern that some aid programs funded by private agencies, such as emergency "food pantries," could dry up altogether.

The federation's Dept. of Community Services works directly with labor liaison representatives on the staffs of United Way agencies or the Red Cross in 196 major cities. In addition, state and local central labor bodies and many local unions have community services committees.

Trained volunteers

The department encourages the training of local union counselors with the help of local social services agencies. These volunteers are prepared to refer union members to community resources where they can get help, and many also act as advocates for workers having trouble obtaining aid, Davis said.

Community service representatives and union counselors play a crucial role in times of massive unemployment, he said. They help workers, many facing long-term unemployment for the first time, with financial management, mortgage and credit problems, referrals for food stamps and health care, as well as job placement and retraining programs, Davis stressed.

The Dept. of Community Services offers pamphlets in both English and Spanish on services to the unemployed and on the training of union counselors.

The AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute is in the business of "getting the laid-off worker re-employed," HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold points out, but in the meantime basic needs such as food, shelter and health care have to be met.

HRDI has conducted 37 "displaced worker" programs since July, in cooperation with the Dept. of Community Ser-

Black workers building a new world

Fifty historical photographs depicting the struggle of black workers dating back to the mid-1800s make up a traveling exhibition sponsored by the Smithsonian Institution. The show features the work of noted photographers such as Lewis Hine, Gordon Parks, Doris Ulmann and Francis Benjamin Johnston. It includes a picket line picture of the late A. Philip Randolph, a founder of the Sleeping Car Porters and an AFL-CIO vice president. The tour began last month at Loomis Chaffee School in Windsor, Conn. It will make additional stops in North Carolina, West Virginia, and Minnesota through next May. These four photos are of oystermen in Florida, 1912; a government charwoman, 1942; shipbuilders, 1943, and a road construction worker, 1870s.

Elections tilt legislatures to Democrats ber of state legislatures after the 1968 elections, with a slight GOP edge in governorships. Then followed an era of steady Democratic gains, until the political tide turned in 1978.

Increased conservative strength over the past two years has been accompanied by efforts to repeal state prevailing wage laws, a revival of "right-to-work" proposals to prohibit union shop agreements and other attacks on labor standards.

These are the states where the most significant party changes took place:

Alaska—The Senate tilted from a 10-10 tie to 11 Republicans, 9 Democrats. The House no longer has its two Libertarians. But it has a new 21-19 Republican majority. The governorship, however, switched from Republican to Democratic.

Delaware—A 25-16 Republican majority in the House was turned around. It's now 25 Democrats, 16 Republicans. The state Senate stayed Democratic.

Illinois—Democrats took over control of the House and widened their previous 30-29 edge of the Senate to a more comfortable 33-26 majority. The House previously had 86 Democrats and 91 Republicans. The number of House districts was reduced by previously adopted constitutional amendment. The new lineup is 68 Democrats, 49 Republicans. The result, State AFL-CIO officials expect, is that labor's emphasis will be on passing needed legislation instead of defending unions.

Iowa—Democrats won both houses of the legislature. The Senate shifted from 21 Democrats, 29 Republicans to a 28-22 Democratic majority. The House turned from a 55-45 Republican majority to a likely 60-40 Democratic control.

Maine—The Senate turned around from a 17-17 Republican edge to a 23-10 Democratic majority, and Democrats increased their House control from 82-69 to 93-57, with a tie for one seat.

Montana—A 57-43 Republican majority in the House was changed to a 54-44 Democratic advantage. The Republican majority in the Senate dropped to 26-24.

Nebraska—Only half of the unicameral Nebraska legislature was elected this year. But COPE-endorsed candidates won 15 of 24 seats, the State AFL-CIO reported.

North Dakota—The House division had been 27 Democrats, 73 Republicans. In the new legislature, it will be 55 Democrats, 51 Republicans.

Ohio—Going into the election, Ohio had a divided legislature and a Republican governor. Democrats strengthened their majority in the House, captured a 17-16 majority in the previously Republican Senate, and elected a governor.

Pennsylvania — A 103-100 Republican edge in the House turned into a Democratic majority of 102-101. Republicans kept the Senate.

Washington—Party lineups were almost exactly turned around as Democrats took over both bodies of the legislature. The Democratic majority is 25-24 in the Senate and 54-44 in the House. The holdover governor is Republican.

Study links health problems to long-term unemployment

Unemployment is a serious threat to health and the quality of life, and these factors should be taken into account by people who set economic and social policies, a team of social scientists concluded in a recent study.

An individual worker's physical and emotional health can be strained to the breaking point as a result of long-term joblessness, Boston College psychologist Ramsay Liem and Brandeis University sociologist Paula Rayman said in a study, "Health and Social Costs of Unemployment," in the October 1982 issue of American Psychologist. The researchers also cited evidence showing that the problems caused by unemployment "ripple" over to workers' families and their communities.

Direct link

In their review of several studies of joblessness, Liem and Rayman found that while physical and mental responses to unemployment are complex, health problems and emotional strain are "direct consequences" of job loss.

They pointed to studies which linked periods of economic decline to "indicators of strain" including higher rates of death from cardiovascular and alcohol-related diseases, increased infant mortality, more first admissions to psychiatric hospitals, increased demand for other mental health services and a higher suicide rate.

"Unemployment does not simply happen to individuals," the researchers said. They cited a study showing wives in families suffering long-term unemployment were significantly more depressed, anxious and sensitive about family relationships than wives in families where husbands were working.

The "changed family environment" brought on by unemployment creates stress and "increased disorganization" in family life, the researchers said. They pointed out that in the same study, marital separation was three times more common in "unemployed" compared to "employed" families.

Another study, conducted over a 10-year period in the aircraft industry, revealed that an overwhelming majority of people unemployed during the period had episodes of serious physical or emotional problems including high blood pressure, alcoholism, increased smoking, insomnia, anxiety and many other physical and emotional symptoms associated with strain.

Rayman and Liem said their research indicates that "the primary assumption informing overall policy on unemployment should be that job loss brings costs of personal health and the quality of family life" and that these factors "should figure centrally in the formulation of unemployment policy."

Involvement urged

Joblessness must be looked at not simply as "a problem in economics, but as a factor in human and social welfare," they stressed, urging that "the helping professions" get more involved in the formulation of economic policy "that influences the amount and distribution of unemployment in the population."

Where these policies mean more unemployment, Liem and Rayman said, "there must be accountability not only for the economic consequences to those affected but also for the personal and social costs."

Ballet Theater's dancers approve 4-year contract

New York—Dancers of the American Ballet Theater overwhelmingly ratified a new contract that will provide substantial improvements in salaries and benefits over four years. The vote was 61 to 4.

The economic package will for the first time bring ABT dancers to parity with the New York City Ballet pay scale—a major collective bargaining objective.

The settlement negotiated by the Guild of Musical Artists ended a two-month ABT lockout that resulted in the cancellation of performances for the 91-member troupe in Paris, Boston and Washington.

After agreement was reached, ABT management announced that a portion of the Washington engagement would be reinstated in mid-January.

Benefit improvements

Joan Greenspan, AGMA associate executive secretary, said the new agreement also provides improvements in vacations and job security, as well as doubling supplementary unemployment benefits.

Greenspan said the union's key bargaining goals were achieved in the four-year agreement. Other first-time provisions include vacation pay, severance pay and expense payments for single-occupancy rooms while on tour.

The wage package provides increases ranging up 74 percent, AGMA chief negotiator Frank Smith reported. In the last year of the agreement, weekly salaries for fifth-year corps de ballet dancers will rise to $630; for soloists to $750, and for principals to $865. The new agreement extends the ABT season to 43 weeks from 40 weeks under the pact that expired Aug. 31.

The ABT management locked out the troupe Sept. 2 after the dancers rejected the company's offer of a 30-percent pay increase and a demand for givebacks.

Voter turnout up

An estimated 41 percent of Americans of voting age cast ballots on Nov. 2, reversing a 20-year downward trend in off-year elections.

Curtis Gans, head of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, said the turnout in the 1978 election was 37.9 percent. Seven states had turnouts over 50 percent this year, he said. They were Minnesota, South Dakota, Alaska, Montana, Utah, North Dakota and Oregon.

The 41-percent voter participation is the highest for a mid-term election since 1970, the year before the voting age was dropped to 18.

Manufactured imports swell trade deficit

A sharp swing of nearly $15 billion in the trade of manufactured goods—from a surplus of $6.9 billion last year to a deficit of $7.7 billion this year—dramatized the impact the Reagan Recession is having on the nation's merchandise trade deficit.

In reporting a $33.8 billion deficit for the first nine months of 1982, the Commerce Dept. said the red ink represented a 5-percent rise over the $32.1-billion trade deficit for the comparable period in 1981.

In the past few years, the United States has enjoyed a surplus in the trade of manufactured goods, but the recession which has shut down plants and assembly lines, has brought about a serious turnaround in this area.

In the machinery and transportation category, the U.S. trade surplus has been more than cut in half, falling from $19.5 billion for the first nine months of 1981 to $9.1 billion for the first nine months of 1982.

Machinery exports fall

While U.S. exports of machinery fell by 7 percent, or about $5.2 billion, imports into the United States increased by nearly 10 percent, also about $5.2 billion. This sector, which includes industrial machinery, computers, telecommunication equipment, and aerospace equipment, constitutes the core of U.S. industrial strength.

Since the recession began 16 months ago, this sector has lost 670,000 jobs, a decline of 10 percent.

Also aggravating the deteriorating trade picture was a deepening of the deficit in miscellaneous manufactured goods.

As a result of the Administration-supported tight money policy of the Federal Reserve Board, the trade-weighted value of the U.S. dollar has soared by 30 percent relative to the currencies of the nation's major trading partners since January 1981.

This increase in the value of the dollar makes it less expensive for Americans to buy foreign goods and, at the same time, raises the cost of U.S. goods sold abroad.

Good catch

Autographing baseball gloves is not out of bounds for National Football League Players Association members. The mitt was the only sports item young Ian Stack had handy when he cornered Washington Redskins veterans Russ Grim, left, and Dallas Hickman after a stewards meeting of Food & Commercial Workers Local 400 where they explained the NFLPA's bargaining objectives. The local stewards voted unanimous support of the players' union.

Foreign trade barriers divert flood of shoes to U.S. market

Unfair trade barriers set up by other nations have diverted millions of pairs of foreign-made shoes into the U.S. market and destroyed jobs here, a union-employer coalition charged in a petition filed with the U.S. Trade Representative.

The Footwear Import Action Committee, which includes the Clothing & Textile Workers, the Food & Commercial Workers and the Footwear Industries of America, Inc. called on the trade representative's office to take steps to persuade eight countries and the European Economic Community to drop their barriers against shoe imports.

The countries named in the petition are France, Italy, Spain, the United Kingdom, Brazil, Korea, Taiwan and Japan as well as the European community.

The committee pointed out that the United States is virtually the only nation with a completely open market for non-rubber footwear, so the high barriers set by other countries have resulted in the diversion of more than 100 million pairs of shoes into the United States and a loss of more than 40,000 U.S. jobs in recent years.

The trade representative's office has 45 days to decide whether or not to accept the petition charging the countries with violations of the Trade Act and the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT).

Imports make up about 60 percent of the U.S. footwear market.

About 56 percent of all imported shoes come from Korea and Taiwan, the group said, yet those countries maintain stiff restrictions against imports.

Taiwan, for example, shipped 128 million pairs of shoes to the United States in the first eight months of 1982.

AFTRA moves to safeguard assets during antitrust appeal

The American Federation of Television & Radio Artists has filed a Chapter 11 bankruptcy petition to protect the union's assets while it appeals a punitive antitrust award.

AFTRA Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff said the legal step will allow the union and its locals to continue serving the membership. Neither the antitrust award nor the bankruptcy proceeding affect the union's pension and welfare fund, he stressed.

A San Diego jury last spring awarded $10.5 million in triple antitrust damages and costs to a small non-union firm that claimed it had trouble marketing its advertising jingles because it had been placed on AFTRA's unfair list.

The same firm, Tuesday Productions, has followed up its action against AFTRA with a similar antitrust suit against the Screen Actors Guild. The SAG case is awaiting trial.

Danbury Hatters case

The antitrust judgment had overtones of the Danbury Hatters case early in the century, when heavy penalties were levied against the Hatters union and its members for "damages" inflicted by a union boycott. Outrage at this interpretation of the Sherman Antitrust Act helped bring about passage of the Clayton Act in 1914, which excluded labor disputes from most antitrust prosecution. Anti-union groups in recent years have campaigned for the elimination of the antitrust exemption.

The bankruptcy move resulted from the insistence of the trial judge, U.S. District Judge Judith N. Keep, that AFTRA put up a bond equal to the amount of the judgment while its appeal was pending.

AFTRA offered a bond of $2.5 million, which a union attorney said was all the union could scrape up.

Bankruptcy process

When this was unacceptable to Tuesday Productions, which wanted the union to assess its membership for the bond, AFTRA opted for the bankruptcy process, which allows an organization to continue to operate under court supervision of its assets while working out a way to pay its debts.

AFTRA attorneys are hopeful that the judgment will be overturned on appeal so that there won't be any debt to pay off.

According to press accounts, Tuesday Productions sought to operate as the advertising jingle equivalent of the construction industry's "double-breasted" contractors—a non-union operation for customers who didn't want to pay AFTRA scale or make "residual" payments for repeated use of the same commercial, while meeting union requirements for some larger customers. It claimed that refusal by advertising agencies under contract with AFTRA to handle its commercials amounted to an illegal secondary boycott that was not immune from antitrust prosecution.

As an added safeguard of the union's assets, AFTRA's Los Angeles, San Diego and New York locals joined with the parent union in filing the bankruptcy petition.

Rail workers endorse plan to buy Conrail

Railroad unions got the go-ahead signal from their members to try to arrange for employee purchase of Conrail—the government-owned freight system formed in 1976 from the consolidation of seven then-bankrupt Northeast railroads.

A committee of the Railway Labor Executives' Association has been exploring employee ownership as a way to preserve the system and avert reductions in service and destruction of jobs. The Dept. of Transportation is under a congressional mandate to sell off the system.

Unions polled their members as to whether the cooperative effort to achieve employee ownership of Conrail should be continued. The response was overwhelmingly in favor, RLEA Chairman Fred A. Hardin said.

Employee ownership

In a letter to Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis, the RLEA task force stressed that the union role is confined to helping arrange for employee ownership and that the unions would neither own stock nor share in the management of Conrail.

As the unions see it, employees have already made a big downpayment toward the purchase of the Conrail system by deferred pay increases and other pay concessions, and in the 15 percent of Conrail assets committed to future employee benefits. Wage concessions made in a three-year contract negotiated in 1981 are estimated at $200 million a year.

Hardin noted also that sale to employees rather than a private firm seeking a tax shelter would save the government large sums in tax revenue.

He said the task force intends to seek private financing for acquisition costs in addition to the employee equity.

Hardin is president of the United Transportation Union, and the other task force members are President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks; President O. M. Berge of the Maintenance of Way Employees, Vice President Andrew M. Ripp of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and Vice President Albert A. Terriego of the Transport Workers. The task force's consultant in the negotiations is Brian M. Freeman, a former Treasury Dept. official.

Task force meetings

The task force was set up last April and has had meetings with Conrail management, Dept. of Transportation officials and private investment firms.

The ownership path is being followed, Hardin said, because "employees know better than anyone else that if they do not act the railroad is likely to be acquired by speculators, entrepreneurs, other railroads, or others who are apt to reduce service, 'cherry-pick' the assets, and terminate a significant number of employees."

Fraser quits Chrysler post

Detroit—Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser announced he is "temporarily suspending" his membership on Chrysler Corp.'s board of directors until the union's collective bargaining disputes at the company's Canadian plants and in the United States are resolved.

At a news conference, Fraser said his action was aimed at eliminating any perceived conflict of interests in his roles as UAW leader and Chrysler board member. "In terms of reality," he added, "we have never discussed any collective bargaining matter on the Chrysler board since I have been a member."

Fraser, the only union leader to sit on the board of a major American corporation, was elected to his seat May 13, 1980, as the company sought to skirt bankruptcy. UAW members over the past three years have made concessions to enable the firm to qualify for federally guaranteed loans.

Meanwhile, Chrysler said it will lay off 2,500 U.S. workers as the result of a strike by 10,000 Canadian Chrysler workers that began Nov. 5. The American employees increases the cost of U.S. goods sold vehicles assembled in Canada. Eight of the facilities are in Michigan, five in Ohio, two in Indiana, and one in Alabama.

The Canadian strike was called in response to the company's refusal to offer an immediate pay increase. Last month, Chrysler workers in the United States rejected a tentative contract linking wages to future profits, without an immediate pay boost, but voted subsequently to stay on the job and resume negotiations after the first of the year.

Chrysler has said it would not settle with its Canadian workers until it reached an agreement in the United States. But Fraser pointed out that negotiations could resume before Jan. 1, when talks with U.S. workers are slated, if the company makes a new offer.

11.6 million unemployed

Terming the nation's 10.4 percent jobless rate "an economic and social disaster," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called for immediate congressional action to address the problem. He told reporters at a Washington news conference that "those millions of Americans standing in the unemployment lines cannot wait for a new Congress to write a new jobs program."

CBS report on Coors boycott branded 'shoddy journalism'

A CBS News presentation on the "60 Minutes" television program dealing with the Coors boycott was produced in a biased fashion that distorted the image of the labor movement, the AFL-CIO said.

"It was a piece of shoddy journalism," Information Director Murray Seeger charged in a letter to the program's executive director, Don Hewitt.

The program was aired on Sept. 26.

Seeger pointed out that the AFL-CIO had sought an opportunity to explain labor's position in the dispute with Adolph Coors Co. when it was learned that CBS was shooting the presentation for a segment of 60 Minutes.

"Despite these notices, CBS presented a version of the boycott issue without consulting AFL-CIO headquarters," Seeger wrote. "The program itself never explained the origin of the boycott, referred to the original collective bargaining dispute between a directly affiliated local union of the AFL-CIO, or explained the basis of the boycott which was imposed by the AFL-CIO in 1977."

Although AFL-CIO Field Rep. A. David Sickler was interviewed on the program, he was not given an opportunity to rebut accusations made by Coors management.

Seeger pointed out that even though Sickler had been interviewed before Coors spokesmen were, Sickler's comments were edited to appear that he was responding to management. His explanations detailing the nature of the boycott were deleted by editing, Seeger said.

Union members excluded

The letter to Hewitt noted that "CBS also chose not to put on the air any of the union members who voted unanimously to strike the Coors plant in 1977 after rejecting the management's final demands for contract provisions which would have permitted intolerable invasions of individual privacy rights."

Seeger asked the network for air time in a future 60 Minutes program to enable the AFL-CIO to present a factual view of the boycott.

"While we hope it will not prove necessary," Seeger said, "we are prepared to make a fairness complaint to the Federal Communications Commission."

First GM plants selected to test life security plan

The Auto Workers and General Motors Corp. jointly announced the selection of three GM plants where "lifetime job security" pilot projects will be conducted. A fourth plant will be selected shortly.

The concept for the projects is spelled out in the UAW's national agreement with GM that was negotiated earlier this year.

In implementing the contract provision, UAW Vice President Owen Bieber and GM Vice President Alfred S. Warren, Jr., announced that the selected sites are a Buick plant at Flint, Mich., a Fisher Body plant at Grand Rapids, Mich., and a New Departure-Hyatt Bearings plant in Bristol, Conn.

Minor details must be worked out for the selection of the fourth plant, they said.

"The pilot project represents a major step forward toward greater job security for the UAW-General Motors workers," Bieber and Warren said. "We jointly agreed to this pilot project during our bargaining, recognizing that job security is of paramount concern to the people in the plants."

As spelled out by the national agreement, the projects are designed to develop experience in providing protection against permanent layoffs for most GM workers during the term of the contract.

The projects are to be developed mutually by local unions and local management, subject to approval by the UAW leadership and GM's industrial relations department. The agreement rules out plant closings at the project sites except in the event of serious physical disasters.

Unemployment 10.4%

Kirkland urges action to create needed jobs

The 10.4-percent jobless rate reported by the Bureau of Labor Statistics represented an increase of three-tenths of 1 percent over September and was the highest since the 14.6-percent annual rate in 1940. In 1933, at the depth of the Great Depression, the annual rate reached 24.9 percent.

Counting "discouraged" workers—those who have given up their search for jobs—and half of those employed part-time because that is the only kind of work they could find, the true jobless rate for October would have been 14.8 percent, with 16.6 million unemployed, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research said. The government does not include these categories of workers in calculating the official jobless rate.

The BLS report followed a Labor Dept. announcement that the number of Americans receiving unemployment benefits hit a record 4.7 million in mid-October. But that means that among the 11.6-million officially unemployed workers, 60 percent were without unemployment compensation.

Also, the unemployed are finding it harder to get jobs once they have been thrown out of work. BLS Commissioner Janet Norwood, appearing before the congressional Joint Economic Committee, said the Reagan Recession has resulted in an increase in the duration of unemployment.

"In October, 35 percent of the total unemployed had been jobless for 15 weeks or longer and nearly 20 percent of the total for six months or more," she said.

Need for new policies

In a background paper on the unemployment situation, the AFL-CIO said the need for new economic policies is amply demonstrated by the October figures.

"Major new jobs legislation is overdue to employ people in revitalizing the housing industry, in rebuilding the nation's infrastructure of highways, bridges, ports, railroads, and sewers, and in meeting the public service needs of the country," the federation said.

"It is also time to start on a new program to reindustrialize America. Only through these undertakings will the unemployed have some hope in the near term."

Widespread suffering and hardship lay behind the cold numbers released by the government. Nearly every major worker group registered an increase in joblessness over the month. Twenty-three percent of all construction workers in the nation were unemployed. And joblessness among black workers remained at the extremely high level of 20.2 percent.

The unemployment rate for white workers rose from 9 to 9.3 percent over the month. The jobless rate among workers of Hispanic origin went up from 14.6 to 15.2 percent. Among blue-collar workers, unemployment increased from 15.6 to 15.9 percent. The rate for manufacturing workers went from 13.8 to 14.1 percent.

Unemployment continued to increase sharply for adult men, rising from 9.6 to 9.8 percent; for adult women, from 8.3 to 8.6 percent; for teenagers, from 23.7 to 24 percent. In Michigan, joblessness rose from 15.9 to 16.1 percent, and five of the nation's 10 largest states now have a jobless rate above the national average of 10.4 percent.

"Since July 1981 (when the recession began), unemployment has risen by 3.7 million, with virtually all of the increase occurring among persons laid off or permanently separated from their jobs," BLS said. "Persons who have lost their jobs now account for over 63 percent of total unemployment, compared with about 50 percent in July a year ago."

Manufacturing jobs hit

Most of the lost jobs were in manufacturing. The BLS's Norwood noted that "because this recession is concentrated in the goods-producing sector where nearly all jobs are full-time and this sector employs a high proportion of prime age males, jobless rates for both of these groups are at record highs."

The total number of jobs in the economy fell by 627,000 to 99.1 million in October as layoffs not only continued but opportunities for new job entrants failed to materialize. The number of unemployed would have risen even more if the labor force had not shrunk by 340,000 to 110.6 million.

For those Americans with jobs, actual work hours dropped by one-tenth of 1 percent to an average 34.7 hours, indicating a worsening of employment conditions.

Joseph Egan heads IUE's GE conference board

Joseph Egan has been elected chairman of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' conference board representing 60,000 General Electric Co. workers.

The post had been held since 1968 by John Shambo, who died Sept. 1 of leukemia.

Egan served as president of IUE Local 119 in Philadelphia for seven terms and is a vice president of the Philadelphia AFL-CIO. He had been secretary of the GE conference board since mid-1981.

Human service needs swamp city agencies

The need for services has increased especially among the "working poor," many of whom are losing public or private jobs and benefits and are being forced back on welfare, the study found. It said human service agencies are facing a tidal wave of the "new poor" who have lost their jobs, exhausted their unemployment benefits, come to the end of their financial resources and are losing their homes.

Citing "drastically reduced federal budgets, limited state and local revenues and worsening economic conditions which contributed to client loads," the report observed that economic conditions and joblessness are not going to get better "in the near term."

Looking ahead to 1983, it predicted that the gap between the need for services and the ability of public agencies to provide them will get wider.

To make matters worse, "as benefits run out for more and more unemployed workers concentrated in the cities, the demands placed on human services programs by the unemployed workers and their families will stretch those programs far beyond their capacities," the mayors' conference said.

The growing number of poor and jobless people in American cities, the survey stressed, "will have fewer services available to them, fewer opportunities for relief from the human misery that accompanies joblessness and poverty."

Block grants

Two-thirds of the cities surveyed reported that conversion to state block grants in 1982 had hurt rather than helped their local human services programs. Most felt that funds had not been adequately passed through the state system to them, and 70 percent complained that they had not been fairly represented in the state planning processes that determine where the money goes.

To try and make up for the cuts, cities reported they were dipping into local general revenues, looking for increases in private sector contributions, and, in a very few cases, tapping into other federal funding resources.

But the study pointed out that other community programs and services have also suffered federal budget cuts, leading to reductions in police, fire and sanitation services and continual deterioration of streets, sewers and other public facilities.

Employment and training, health and senior services programs were identified most often by the city officials as those most severely damaged by the federal cutbacks. Energy assistance and child day care also have suffered sharp curtailments.

In employment and training, the cities reported as much as a 56-percent cut in funds available for these programs in 1982 with a 68-percent cutback likely in 1983.

"In cities across the country," the report said, "human services officials can provide case studies that reflect the serious family and personal problems that have been created or exacerbated by current economic conditions," particularly joblessness.

"Sunbelt" cities in the South and Southwest also report severe strains on human services resources due to the influx of unemployed workers and their families from other states lured by rumors of jobs. Many must turn to city agencies for food, shelter, health care or jobs, the survey said, but the agencies "too often cannot respond."

Report on forced labor indicts Soviets

A State Dept. report estimating that some 4 million Soviet citizens are now engaged in what amounts to forced labor underscores the "moral urgency" of denying credit to the Soviet bloc of nations, the AFL-CIO declared.

"While Western democracies may not be able to prevent forced labor in the Soviet Union, we need not be accomplices in this barbaric practice," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a statement commenting on the report. "An economic system that requires slave labor is not a system that should be underwritten by free men and women.

"Economic questions aside, it is morally unconscionable that forced labor projects should be financed by Western credits and technology."

The use of forced labor in the Soviet Union has a long history. The first time forced labor in the USSR was raised as a serious issue was in 1948, when the American Federation of Labor proposed that the International Labor Organization undertake a survey of forced labor in all member countries.

While that survey found little evidence of forced labor in non-communist countries, it left no doubt that in both law and practice the Soviet Union employed forced labor in the interests of its national economy and as a means of political coercion.

A typical Soviet forced labor camp, according to U.S. intelligence sources, houses up to 1,000 prisoners. Several rows of fencing are used for security. Prisoners in the large industrial camps may never leave the compound during their confinement. Some 4 million Soviets are engaged in forced labor.

Soviet bloc denials

The USSR and the Soviet bloc vehemently denied the conclusions of the 1956 study and, as the new State Dept. report puts it, ratified ILO convention 29 on abolition of forced labor "perhaps in an effort to strengthen its denial."

The State Dept. report, prepared in response to a congressional resolution in September requiring an investigation of allegations that political and religious prisoners were being used in the construction of the Trans-Siberian gas pipeline to Western Europe, "leaves no doubt that the Soviet Union remains in blatant violation of ILO convention 29," Kirkland observed.

"There is clear evidence that the Soviet Union is using forced labor on a massive scale. This includes the use of political prisoners," said Powell A. Moore, the State Dept.'s assistant secretary for congressional relations, in a covering letter to Sen. William A. Armstrong (R-Colo.), who conducted hearings of a Senate Banking subcommittee last summer into charges of forced labor utilization in the USSR.

Domestic pipeline labor

Moore said the government has information from a variety of sources confirming that the Soviets routinely employ a portion of their 4 million forced laborers —the world's largest forced labor population—as unskilled workers on domestic pipeline construction. He added:

"It cannot yet be conclusively established whether such labor is being used specifically on the export pipeline project, but a number of reports suggest that forced labor has been used in some of the site preparation and other preliminary work on the export pipeline, including clearing the forests, leveling the right-of-way, building roads, and constructing living quarters."

Kirkland said he found "especially disturbing" the fact that between 90 and 100 forced labor camps are located close to the routes of the proposed natural gas pipeline route to Western Europe.

"Since forced labor has already been used in construction of the domestic pipeline," he said, "there can be no doubt that it will also be used on the export pipeline."

CIA analysis

A Central Intelligence Agency analysis attached to the State Dept. report said that "while large-scale use of forced laborers on the export pipeline is unlikely because many of the jobs require special skills, some forced labor will probably be used unless the Soviets depart from their usual practice because of the exposure the issue has received in the Western media.

"If historical precedent is followed, the unskilled forced laborers will be used in construction of compressor stations and auxiliary buildings—most of which are in an early stage of construction," the CIA said.

Of the 4 million Soviet citizens now serving sentences of forced labor, about 2 million are confined—85 percent of them in over 1,100 camps—and the remainder in prisons, the State Dept. reported.

"About 1.5 million, convicted of crimes for which they could have received sentences of confinement, have been sentenced instead to probation with 'compulsory involvement in labor,'" the report said. "Most of them are working at construction jobs far from their homes."

Among those forced laborers are dissidents whose numbers may reach as high as 10,000, the figure claimed by Soviet human rights activist Andrei Sakharov and Amnesty International, the London-based organization that seeks to free political prisoners wherever they may be held, the State Dept. said.

Many of the forced laborers are used on major projects in Siberia, where the official Soviet press has acknowledged it is difficult to persuade workers to go voluntarily. Some 250,000 forced laborers are believed to have perished during the 1930s while working on the construction of the Bielomorsk Canal, the State Dept. report noted, and in the 1970s thousands of forced laborers were reported to be building the Baikal-Amur railway extension in southeastern Siberia.

ILO investigators blocked

The Soviet government could help establish the truth about the seriousness of the charges against it by permitting an objective examination of labor conditions at its various Siberian projects and the conditions in which Soviet political prisoners live and work, the State Dept. said. The prospects of such an investigation are "probably not bright," it said, since Soviet authorities have consistently refused to allow an ILO mission to visit the USSR to investigate similar charges in the past.

"Because of the seriousness of these charges, and the massive human rights violations which they imply, we believe the international community has a responsibility to investigate them," the State Dept. said.

Reports that the USSR has used a large number of prisoners to work on huge labor projects have come from a wide variety of individuals and organizations in Europe, Asia, and the United States, the government said. The sources include human rights organizations, labor organizations, laborers who have managed to emigrate from the Soviet Union after working on such projects, and letters reaching Asia and the West from the USSR.

Inquiries sought

France's democratic trade union federation, Force Ouvriere, has asked French President Francois Mitterrand to investigate whether forced labor is being used on the Trans-Siberian pipeline. West Germany, through its embassy in Moscow, also has initiated an inquiry into the pipeline project.

Meanwhile, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions based in Brussels has asked the International Labor Organization to inquire directly of the Soviets about alleged labor practices which violate various ILO conventions to which the USSR is a party. And the 10-nation European Community discussed the forced labor allegations at its plenary session last month in Strasbourg.

The State Dept. report, replete with maps showing the site of forced labor camps and the use of prisoners in the USSR, is a preliminary one that will be followed in January with a final version.

Union counseling helps jobless members to cope

vices. The workshops have been organized at the request of national and local unions and state and local central bodies in hard-hit areas, especially those faced with a major plant closing.

Each session includes specific advice on job search methods, credit counseling, how to get unemployment compensation and trade adjustment assistance, information on social services in the community and techniques for managing the stress of unemployment.

Arnold said the workshops also are "a tangible way for a union to do something for its members, including providing a forum to fully discuss rights and benefits under the union contract and to counter claims the company may be making about the shutdown."

To help unions train their own staffs and develop their own workshops, HRDI has developed a detailed written guide to setting up a worker assistance program. This includes information on workshop planning, setting up job search and retraining services, and program models based on workshops HRDI has already conducted.

In stricken areas, Community Services staff representatives often serve as a "first line of defense" in meeting the needs of jobless workers.

Outside assistance

For example, when the Bunker Hill Silver Mine in Kellogg, Ida., began a protracted shutdown and layoffs of its 2,100 employees, Bob Frazier, labor representative with the nearby Spokane, Wash., United Way, stepped in to work with the seven local unions at the mine and with the Idaho AFL-CIO.

Financial counseling, health and welfare advice and job search and assistance were requested by the unions to meet the problems certain to result from the closing of the area's largest employer, Frazier said.

The State AFL-CIO and the Community Services representatives also worked with the governor's task force set up to respond to the mine closing and the resulting 50-percent jobless rate in the immediate area.

In another case, in Black River Falls, Wis., when the town's largest employer shut down for good, the local union Community Services committee played a crucial role in easing the shock, State AFL-CIO Community Services Director Robert Blessington reported.

Steelworkers Local 7613 put its committee into action when the union got the news that the employer, a taconite mine, was going out of business at the cost of 257 jobs. The committee, with the cooperation of the state federation's community services staff, organized its own unemployment counseling seminar. With joblessness running as high as 25 percent in the county, the union opened the session to all unemployed workers, union members or not.

Local President Arnie Palmer reported that until they took part in the seminar, many of the 125 participants were unaware of the kinds of help available to them or how to qualify for assistance.

Top officers re-elected by Flight Attendants

Dallas—The board of directors of the Flight Attendants re-elected President Linda A. Puchala, Sec.-Treas. Pamela J. Casey and Vice President Susan Bianchi Sand to new four-year terms.

The board's seventh annual meeting here drew 80 representatives of the union's master executive council and local executive councils.

The New House of Representatives

The House of Representatives will have 269 Democrats and 166 Republicans in the 98th Congress, assuming the re-election on Nov. 30 of Democratic incumbents in Georgia's 4th and 5th Districts. Of the 81 new members, 57 are Democrats, 24 Republicans.

A New Road

IT'S UP TO the outgoing 97th Congress, including those of its members who were defeated for re-election, to start America back on the road to recovery.

Jobless Americans can't afford to wait for the newly elected Congress to take office in January. Then, additional weeks will be lost in getting congressional committees established and starting up the legislative machinery anew. Even with a sense of urgency, it will be nearly spring before the promise of this election can be transformed into deeds.

That's too long to wait when unemployment is pushing closer to the 12-million mark.

It's too long to wait for those who trekked from unemployment-devastated Michigan to the promised land of Texas only to find that the recession had preceded them there.

It is much too long for those whose unemployment benefits are running out—and for those millions who moved directly from school to the unemployment line and thus have no benefits to tide them over.

The cancer of unemployment has eaten into every sector of American life, sparing no group.

THE TASK OF getting Americans back to work must be effectively begun in the lame-duck session of Congress that convenes on Nov. 29.

It doesn't have to start from scratch.

There are bills ready to bring to the floor of the House and Senate to provide public jobs and public works, to spur construction of new homes through mortgage subsidies.

Even Republicans who have toed the Reagan Administration line for the past two years are saying in the wake of the election returns that yes, putting people to work rebuilding roads and bridges, repairing the crumbling infrastructure of America's cities, makes good sense after all.

It is too much to expect an immediate bipartisan consensus on the magnitude of the legislation, but it is not too much to expect a good-faith effort to get the maximum number of people on jobs that need doing in the shortest possible time.

We have already seen the ripple effect of plant closings and indefinite layoffs—in the falloff of retail trade, the loss of tax revenues at all levels of government, the increased demand for social services at a time when these are being cut back. Unemployment feeds upon unemployment.

IT IS TIME for a different type of ripple effect—from the payrolls of hundreds of thousands of new jobs.

That type of ripple sets cash registers jingling and generates additional employment. New homes mean a revival in building supplies, in furniture manufacture and sales, in appliances.

Jobs mean more tax revenue. The incredibly large budget deficit of this past year of Reagan austerity would disappear under full employment. That—not a constitutional amendment—is the way to get a balanced budget.

Jobs mean that the social security system is taking in the payroll taxes on which it depends, instead of paying out additional amounts to those forced to retire earlier than they had planned because there is no work for them.

That's the path on which we can start this year.

That's the path on which we must start.

The Moral Imperative

IT IS MORALLY unconscionable that forced labor projects should be financed by Western credits and technology.

While Western democracies may not be able to prevent forced labor in the Soviet Union, we need not be accomplices in this barbaric practice.

An economic system that requires slave labor is not a system that should be underwritten by free men and women.

—From AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's comment on the State Dept. report on forced labor camps.

Double standard on trade damages U.S. industries

By Press Associates, Inc.

Among the nation's more than 11-million unemployed are many who have lost their jobs because of foreign imports.

Many of these imports—steel, for example—are unfair in the sense that their production and export are heavily subsidized by their governments. These goods are sold here below their cost of production—dumped.

Other job-destroying imports, such as footwear, are unfair because the trade barriers of other nations funnel them into the more open U.S. market.

Yet whenever organized labor or an injured industry calls for reasonable limits on unfair trade, a hue and cry goes up about violating "free trade" principles. Editorialists, Reagan Administration officials and some members of Congress even raise the specter of an international "trade war" and the kind of protectionism that fed the worldwide depression in the 1930s.

'Fair trade' alternative

In limiting the choice between "free trade" on the one side and "protectionism" on the other, many leave the impression that there is no middle course. Labor insists there is such a course and that it's called "fair trade."

"Free trade" enthusiasts usually fail to note that "the rest of the world is playing by different rules. Most of the world is relatively closed in trade policy while the United States is relatively open," AFL-CIO Economist Elizabeth Jager points out.

Other nations protect their industries by tariffs and by nontariff barriers. Japan, for example, uses complex technical and paperwork barriers to keep out American cars.

U.S. manufacturers, meanwhile, have been losing ground in their home market. During the past 20 years, the U.S. auto industry has lost 35 percent of its own market at a cost of 900,000 jobs, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. reports. In steel, 22 percent of the domestic market, representing 150,000 jobs, has been lost to foreign manufacturers.

In the depths of this recession, when imports logically would be expected to decline, the U.S. trade deficit reached $28 billion during the first eight months of 1982 despite declining oil imports. Nearly $6 billion of that deficit resulted from increasing imports and decreasing exports of such capital goods as machinery and transport equipment.

A positive step

The recent agreement by the European Common Market to limit its steel exports to the United States is a positive step. Agreements now should be pursued to protect the vital specialty steel industry from subsidized imports, and to prevent Japan and other nations from taking advantage of the European agreement to boost their steel exports to the U.S.

As for the domestic footwear industry, where unemployment has soared to 18 percent, U.S. trade officials should press the European Common Market, as well as Japan, South Korea, Taiwan and Brazil, to lift the barriers which have funneled low-wage shoe exports into the United States.

Congress, for its part, should enact the domestic auto content bill to stem further erosion of jobs and of an industry to which one of six jobs is linked. The bill would require foreign and U.S.-based automakers to use minimum percentages of American parts and labor in the cars they sell here.

For the long run, the nation needs an industrial policy to revitalize our declining manufacturing base, create jobs, and make U.S. products more competitive here and abroad.

MEMO FROM COPE

GOP: Publicly Confident, Privately Shaken

Reagan Administration and Republican Party leaders are still sifting through the wreckage of November 2, searching for the remains of a "mandate" that was never there in the first place.

Publicly, they dissemble. They contend their showing in the election was, indeed, a victory. Privately, they know they took a shellacking. The scope of their defeat was greater than the hard numbers suggest.

Publicly, they claim the GOP loss of 26 seats in the U.S. House was just a "normal" off-year setback. Privately, they know the figures as well as political scholars know them: Theirs was the greatest House defeat for an administration only two years into its first term since 1922, when the GOP, with President Warren Harding in the White House, dropped 75 seats. The loss was more than double the average since World War II following a switch of party in the White House.

Publicly, they assert they achieved their main objective—a stand-off in the U.S. Senate and continued GOP numerical control. Privately, they are as aware as anyone that only 39,000 additional Democratic votes in four states—Nevada, Rhode Island, Wyoming and Vermont—would have knotted the Senate at 50-50, and just 16,400 more would have tipped Missouri into Democratic hands and put the GOP on the short end of a 51-49 margin.

Publicly, they hail GOP gubernatorial victories in key major-population states of California, Illinois and Pennsylvania. Privately, they know they lucked in with only 50,000 out of 7.5 million votes cast in California and made it partly on the basis of race (the Democratic candidate was black) and in large measure on the basis of hot state initiative issues that brought out a large conservative vote.

In Illinois, GOP incumbent Governor Thompson was expected to win by 15-20 points over Adlai Stevenson, but was merely 6,000 ahead out of 3.5 million votes cast as the AFL-CIO News went to press and was not fully assured of ultimate victory. Final results are expected November 22. Whoever wins, the outcome probably will be challenged.

In Pennsylvania, popular GOP incumbent Governor Thornburgh was supposted to cruise to an easy victory over Rep. Allen E. Ertel, but won with only 52 percent of the vote.

Meanwhile, Democrats picked up a net gain of seven governorships, among them the key industrial and high-population states of Michigan, Ohio, Wisconsin, Texas and Minnesota, and retained New York and Massachusetts.

Publicly, Republicans are mute about losing nine state legislative chambers and the Democratic hold now on both houses in 34 states. Privately, they know they took it on the chin. Less than a year ago, their expectations were for sweeping state legislative gains.

November 2 was the fifth time since World War II that a mid-term election followed a shift of party control of the White House two years previous. President Reagan's GOP House loss was 26. Average loss by the party in power in four preceding off-year elections was 11½ House seats.

Year	President	House Loss
1954	Eisenhower (R)	19
1962	Kennedy (D)	4
1970	Nixon (R)	12
1978	Carter (D)	11
1982	Reagan (R)	26

Publicly, Republicans explain that House, Senate and gubernatorial elections were hundreds of unrelated events settled on the basis of local, regional and personality issues. This is, of course, partly true. But privately, they know the Administration tried to make the election a national referendum on Reaganomics ("stay the course" and "give the guy a chance"), that largely it was just that, and that they lost the referendum. Reaganomics came up with egg on its face.

Finally, publicly, the Administration and the GOP are popping champagne corks. Privately, they're chug-a-lugging wormwood.

Why? For many reasons.

► One: Deep down, they know they've lost the edge in the House they enjoyed the past two years. Democratic gains were sufficient to nullify the swing effect of conservative Democratic "Boll Weevils" who strongly backed Reagan economic proposals.

► Two: Notwithstanding the 54-46 grip they retained in the Senate, they know many of their incumbents who made it back were like quarterbacks sacked once too often—groggy and beginning to question the game plan.

► Three: The "conservative revolution" heralded by themselves and by most commentators in 1980 was a myth. They presented their program. It was enacted. It failed to do what they promised it would do. Voters punished them for it.

► Four: Their dream of dominant-party status is shattered—for now at least. Only a year ago, GOP National Chairman Richard Richards (recently resigned) proclaimed "we (the GOP) are on the threshold of majority status." Other GOP leaders picked up the boast. Most party spokesmen confidently predicted they would gain the 25 House seats needed to capture numerical control. Thus, the 26-seat loss, is actually a 51-seat shift from GOP expectations of just one year back.

► Five: It is possible the "great communicator" has lost the golden touch. Voters indicated he could no longer con the public that things are looking up when they're so clearly looking down.

► Six: The results of 1982 are hardly encouraging in terms of 1984 for the GOP, unless there is a miraculous economic recovery.

Quick Notes on Nov. 2

• Republicans lost 12 House seats in the East, 12 in the Midwest, two in the South. They kept the same number of seats in the West, where Democrats gained six seats.

• Including retirements, there will be 81 new members in the House, largest number since the post-Watergate election of 1974 that saw 76 new Democrats and 16 new Republicans elected. On Jan. 3, 1983, 57 Democrats, 24 Republicans new to Congress will be sworn in.

• Twenty-one black candidates and nine Hispanics were elected to the House, an increase of three in each instance.

• In six races that pitted incumbents from each party against one another, Democrats won four, Republicans two. In California, Democrat Matty Martinez beat the GOP's John Rousselot; in South Dakota, Tom Daschle beat Clint Roberts; in Missouri, Ike Skelton over Wendell Bailey; in Massachusetts, Barney Frank defeated Margaret Heckler. GOP winners: Guy Molinari over Leo Zeferetti, Ben Gilman over Peter Peyser, both in New York.

• Only other House Democrat who lost was Bob Shamansky (Ohio).

• Big plus was defeat of 14 members of GOP Class of 1980, hardcore Reaganites. Among those least likely to be missed: John LeBoutillier (N.Y.), whose indiscriminate dagger-tongue had even offended his GOP colleagues.

• Further satisfaction: Defeat of Eugene Atkinson (Pa.), who was elected as a Democrat, jumped to the GOP in mid-term.

Beginning the Rollback of the New Right

Don't bury the "new right" political committees yet. It would be a sad and costly miscalculation to count them out on the basis of one election.

True, they plummetted from almost all-winning to almost all-losing in the two years since their 1980 zenith, when they made enormous Senate gains and toppled some of the Senate's strongest pro-labor incumbents.

But any movement that can generate more than $30 million in political dollars is not ripe for burial. More than two-thirds of that amount was collected by two "new right" PACs alone. They were the Congressional Club, Sen. Jesse Helms' (N.C.) personal operation, and the National Conservative PAC, whose so-called "independent expenditures" campaigns succeeded wildly in 1980 and failed as wildly in 1982.

Their movement remains strong, though they no longer strike fear in opponents' hearts. And some of their predictions look absurd, among them that of the "new right's" five-star general, Richard Viguerie. Take his 1980 book, "The New Right—Ready to Lead," that is itself now a quaint reminder of how quickly America's political winds can shift.

However, 1982 results and opportunities in 1984 encourage the hope that the rollback of the "new right" is underway and can continue.

It started small this year in terms of actual gains but big in terms of over-all results. Faced with certain defeat, Sen. S. I. Hayakawa (Calif.), a creature of the "new right," chose not to run. Sen. Harrison Schmitt (N.M.), another favorite of the rightist PACs, was defeated.

Only one incumbent senator targeted by the "new right" for special treatment was defeated, Howard Cannon (Nev.). All the others won and won big: Paul Sarbanes (Md.), Don Riegle (Mich.), George Mitchell (Maine), Jim Sasser (Tenn.), Ted Kennedy (Mass.), Robert Byrd (W.Va.), Quentin Burdick (N.D.), John Melcher (Mont.), Howard Metzenbaum (Ohio).

Millions of right-wing dollars were poured into these campaigns, beginning in some states a year before the election. The same tactics had been used effectively two years ago by the right. This year, they failed—and one reason is the targets came out fighting and making NCPAC a campaign issue. So, a beginning of a rollback of the right has been made.

Two years from now, the opportunities to keep the momentum going will be plentiful. A large group of patrons of and beneficiaries of the "new right" will face Senate elections.

These include: Helms, Bill Armstrong (Colo.), Jim McClure (Idaho), Roger Jepsen (Iowa), Gordon Humphrey (N.H.), Strom Thurmond (S.C.), John Tower (Texas). Among them are the worst voting records in the U.S. Senate, in aggregate more than 90 percent "wrong" on the AFL-CIO scorecard.

Despite the power and purse of his Congressional Club, Helms already has been hurt. He targeted five House races in his home state of North Carolina November 2—three against incumbent Democrats and two for first-term Republicans. His PAC money and personal prestige were put on the line. He lost every one of the five.

Maybe that was another sign pointing to a sharp decline in right wing political fortunes that can carry over into 1984.

Drop in output dampens hope for recovery

By James M. Shevis

The economy emitted clear signals that the Reagan Recession is far from over and may indeed be worsening as the government reported sharp declines in both industrial output and factory use and only slight improvement in the housing industry.

Industrial production fell another eight-tenths of 1 percent in October, the largest drop in the last six months, the Commerce Dept. announced. And, in a separate report, the Federal Reserve Board said the nation's recession-hobbled factories operated at just 68.4 percent of capacity last month, the lowest rate in 35 years.

Production now has fallen 11.4 percent since the recession began in July 1981. The recession itself is challenging for longevity the postwar record set by the severe downturn between November 1973 and March 1975.

Tight-money drag

"The impact of the Administration-supported tight-money policy pursued by the Fed continues to show up in reduced output," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald observed. "Meanwhile, the nation's workers and factories stand idle, as the Administration admonishes us to stay the course."

With unemployment officially at 10.4 percent of the labor force, the highest level since 1940, analysts looking for the start of a recovery eagerly awaited the government's report on last month's housing starts. Housing starts are especially watched by economists since the wide dispersion throughout the economy of housing supply industries, from lumber to appliances, makes a housing recovery the sure forerunner of a general recovery.

The Commerce Dept. report showed the number of new starts up only 1 percent, however, and the improvement in September, which had prompted President Reagan to say "America is on the move again," turned out to be far less than originally reported. Instead of a strong 14.4-percent increase, government revisions lowered the September rise to 7.6 percent. And most of that increase was due to a surge of federally subsidized projects reaching the construction phase under programs that are expiring.

Building permits, a sign of planned housing activity, were up sharply in October, however, rising 17.8 percent after increasing 13 percent in September.

Auto production slumps

Steep cutbacks in auto production held down both factory use and industrial output in October. Auto output fell to an annual rate of 4.7-million units from the 5.5-million-unit rate in both August and September, the Fed reported. The reduced output was reflected in the Commerce Dept. report on factory capacity utilization, which showed the auto industry operating at just 49.7 percent in October, higher than its recession low of 43.7 percent in January but far below the 61.3-percent operating rate last July.

The October decline of eight-tenths of 1 percent in the factory-use rate was the largest since a similar drop last April. While the overall factory operating rate

Job-stimulus agenda set for lame-duck Congress

By David L. Perlman

Democrats will press for a job-creating, economic stimulus program in the lame-duck session of Congress, and a growing number of election-scarred Republicans are signaling that they want to move in the same direction.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. described an economic recovery package advanced by Rep. Henry S. Reuss as a likely "framework" for a legislative agenda to be acted on when Congress reconvenes on Nov. 29.

Reuss, who is retiring after 28 years in the House, is chairman of the congressional Joint Economic Committee and had been asked by O'Neill and Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd to recommend the ingredients of an economic recovery program.

As a minimum, O'Neill has said, the House leadership will press for completion of action in the lame duck session on job-intensive public works and a housing stimulus. There has been increasing bipartisan agreement that this is the time to deal with the crumbling infrastructure of America—the deteriorating bridges, roads and water systems. And "every economic recovery since World War II has been led by the housing sector," O'Neill noted.

600,000 public sector jobs

Reuss proposed assistance for both moderate-income homebuyers and for renters, urged reauthorization with full funding of Economic Development Administration programs and called for a large-scale public sector program of "community renewal" that would provide 600,000 jobs for the unemployed. He said enactment of a land conservation bill already passed by the House would open up 20,000 year-round jobs for young workers and another 50,000 summer jobs.

The lame-duck session, a post-election reconvening of the outgoing Congress, is expected to run until mid-December. The newly-elected 98th Congress will convene in January.

President Reagan, meanwhile, reiterated his objection to what he calls "make-work" programs and continued to insist that the Administration's policies weren't responsible for the disastrous surge in unemployment. He called for further cuts in non-defense spending and the President's only proposal for economic recovery has been a renewed call for a controversial "enterprise zone" of tax incentives and

Democratic plan retains benefit levels

A Democratic plan to guarantee the solvency of the social security system, without tampering with benefit levels or retirement age, moved to center stage as the debate over the future of the nation's giant social insurance program neared a climax.

The proposal was in line with a strong statement by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, who attacked Administration efforts to drive a wedge between workers and beneficiaries in their joint support of the protection which the system provides to both groups.

After being in existence more than nine months, the National Commission on Social Security Reform finally came to grips —right after the elections—with the short-term cash-flow problems facing the system.

The commission came into being as a face-saving device for President Reagan, whose 1981 proposals to slash some $81 billion from social security over a five-year span touched off a firestorm of public opposition which sent even the President's staunchest allies in the Republican-dominated Senate scurrying for cover.

Although the commission met sporadically throughout the summer and fall, it was not until Nov. 11-13 that it got down to serious deliberations on how to help social security surmount problems caused by a lagging economy. Mounting unemployment continues to push down contributions, and a protracted period of runaway inflation has pushed up benefit levels.

Bottom-line offer

At the end of three days of public meetings in an Alexandria, Va., motel, the commission headed by Economist Alan Greenspan recessed for a month. On the table was what the Democrats termed their "bottom-line offer," a package which included:

- Accelerating tax increases scheduled between now and 1990, making them ef-

Players return with gains, set ballot on new contract

By John R. Oravec

New York—The 57-day stalemate between National Football League owners and the NFL Players Association was broken with an agreement on a five-year contract that will bring substantial gains in salary minimums and establish a severance pay system, the first in professional sports.

The tentative accord, approved by player representatives from each of the 28 teams, paved the way for resumption of the NFL schedule on Nov. 21. The eight-week strike began Sept. 21.

A ratification vote on the $1.6 billion compromise package by the 1,500 NFLPA members will be held Nov. 23. Although specific details of the agreement were not released, estimates put the contract worth at about 46 percent of the league's projected revenues over the next five years. The union initially sought 55 percent of gross revenues.

The major turning point in the sputtering negotiations came after management negotiators agreed to the immediate payment of bonuses to all players on the pre-strike rosters.

Under the $60-million bonus provision for 1982, first-year players will receive $10,000, second-year players $20,000, third-year players $30,000 and players with four or more years in the league $60,000.

pledged that no player representatives or alternates would be cut from team rosters this year. Management further agreed that two player representatives who had been released earlier this year would be allowed to qualify for the 1982 bonus plan, provided they drop unfair labor practice charges against the league.

The minimum wage scale was vastly improved for seasoned players as well as for rookies. In the final two years of the contract, the minimums will range from $50,000 for first-year players to $200,000 for a veteran with 16 years' experience.

For rookies, the wage floor was raised from $22,000 under the old contract to $30,000 in 1982, to $40,000 in 1983-84 and to $50,000 in 1985-86.

The minimum for longer-term players in 1982 will range from $40,000 for second-year players, rising in $10,000 increments for each year of service up to $200,000. And during the term of the contract, the minimum for a 10-year veteran, for example, goes to $120,000 this year, $130,000 in 1983-84 and $140,000 in 1985-86.

The NFLPA also negotiated substantial improvements in union security, pensions, and insurance benefits. Medical coverage will increase from $250,000 under the old contract to $1 million per player.

Under the precedent-setting severance payment plan, players will be vested in their second year, with payments ranging from $5,000 for players with two years' experience to $140,000 for 12-year veterans. Third-year players would get $20,000, fourth-year players $60,000, and there will be $10,000 increments for each year up to the $140,000 maximum.

The agreement also gives the union approval rights over agents who represent veterans in individual contract negotiations with owners. A rookie may retain an agent without union approval.

Team rosters frozen

Owners will be required to maintain 49 players on each roster for the remainder of the season. Next year, the maximum team roster will be 45.

In announcing the tentative settlement, NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey said the union made substantial improvements in a number of areas, but that it did not achieve all of its objectives in the negotiations.

"We concluded that it was better to get on with the season and fight some fights later," Garvey said. "We demonstrated solidarity and the players demonstrated once and for all that the players are the most important element of the game."

IUE board elects Bywater and Fire to top union posts

Pittsburgh—The executive board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers elected Sec.-Treas. William H. Bywater president of the IUE to fill the unexpired term of David J. Fitzmaurice.

The board, meeting shortly after Fitzmaurice's funeral, also elected Edward L. Fire as the new secretary-treasurer of the 200,000-member union. Fire has been president of IUE District 7 since 1975.

Chief organizer

Bywater, 62, was elected secretary-treasurer of the IUE at the union's 1980 convention. He also has served as organizing director for the past two years.

Bywater became active in the labor movement in 1941 as a shop steward of Local 425 of the United Electrical Workers in Long Island City, N.Y., and later was president of the local for seven years. He was the first chairman of the IUE-Sperry Rand conference board, serving from 1958 to 1967.

In 1968, he was elected president of IUE's New York-New Jersey District 3, holding that post until 1980. He also served as an IUE vice president for 12 years and has been a member of the union's executive board since 1961.

Fire, 45, was president of IUE Local 717 in Warren, Ohio, from 1964 until he was elected secretary-treasurer of District 7 in 1974. He also had been chairman of the IUE-General Motors conference board, president of the Trumbull County AFL-CIO and a vice president of Ohio AFL-CIO. He has been on the IUE executive board since 1975.

Worker medical records

Court rebuffs attack on OSHA access rule

Lake Charles, La.—A federal district court here upheld the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's access rule on worker medical records and toxic exposure data kept by employers.

In rejecting a challenge by the Louisiana Chemical Association, the court declared that the rule is essential in efforts to reduce job-related illness and disease.

The 1980 OSHA regulation established the access right for the federal job safety agency, workers and their unions to employer-maintained records covering a wide range of toxic substances, not just those already regulated by OSHA standards.

The rule, issued under the Carter Administration, also established procedures for OSHA to follow in reviewing the records so as to insure employee privacy. It does not require employers to create any new records, but only provides the right of access to records that companies already maintain.

"The core purpose of the rule is to gain greater knowledge of substances whose effects and characteristics are not yet fully understood," Judge Earl E. Veron of the U.S. District Court for Western Louisiana said in his decision.

"Given the insidious nature and long-term effects of many latent occupational diseases, a rule which establishes a data base for medical research—as does the records access rule—bears more than a mere reasonable relation to the major policy goal" of the federal job safety law, Judge Veron observed.

He rejected the contention of the Louisiana Chemical Association, a chemical manufacturers group, that OSHA exceeded its authority in issuing the rule.

The court also rejected LCA's arguments that the rule would force companies to disclose trade secrets, violate an employer's Fourth Amendment protections against unreasonable search and seizure, and infringe on the privacy rights of workers.

The court also threw out the industry group's argument that the OSHA rule invaded the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. The NLRB requires employers to provide unions with information, including job safety and health records, necessary for collective bargaining.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. stressed that there are no grounds for invalidating the rule simply because the NLRB extends comparable provisions on union access. Veron agreed.

"While the rule undoubtedly enhances the bargaining status of unions, it is plain on the record that this result was simply incidental to fulfilling the statutory goal of promoting healthful working conditions," the court said.

Question on regulation

The case was initially brought before the district court, then shifted to the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans, but later was returned to the district court when it was deemed that the access regulation was a rule and not a standard.

The employers' association sued former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall and Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham, who issued the regulation during the Carter Administration.

Although OSHA under the Reagan Administration has proposed changes in the rule that would lop off protections for about 11 million workers and eliminate most of the hazardous substances now covered, Labor Dept. lawyers presented a strong defense in arguments before the court.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter has called the proposed changes an effort to "streamline" record-keeping requirements for employers.

The AFL-CIO said Auchter failed to provide any documentation or factual evidence to support the proposed rollback of the rule.

IUE's David J. Fitzmaurice dies after bout with cancer

Euclid, Ohio—David J. Fitzmaurice, president of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers since 1976, died Nov. 12 after surgery for cancer. He was 69.

Fitzmaurice was also a vice president of the AFL-CIO and served on several Executive Council standing committees.

He led the IUE's bargaining teams in national contract negotiations this year with General Motors Corp., General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Corp.

Last May, during the 13-union coordinated negotiations with GE and Westinghouse, Fitzmaurice was hospitalized for surgery. He returned to the talks a week after surgery and remained on the job until he entered the hospital a week before he died.

In a message to the IUE, Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said, "to the very end, Dave Fitzmaurice, displayed the same courage, resolution and selfless dedication that he brought as a young man to the struggle to organize his fellow workers in the electrical industry."

"Dave will be remembered for his contributions to inter-union cooperation, especially coordinated bargaining, and for his great gifts of friendship which enriched the lives of all trade unionists," Kirkland and Donahue said.

Local shop steward

Fitzmaurice began his trade union career in the early 1940s as a shop steward of United Electrical Workers Local 707 at the GE lamp plant in Cleveland. As chief steward of the local in 1948, he was elected president on an anti-communist slate.

After the IUE was founded in 1949, Fitzmaurice helped lead the local out of the communist-dominated UE and into the new CIO affiliate.

Fitzmaurice later headed IUE District 7, which encompasses seven states from Ohio to Florida, and built it into the union's largest district with some 90,000 members.

In 1968, Fitzmaurice was elected IUE secretary-treasurer. He continued to hold that post until he succeeded Paul Jennings as president in 1976. He was elected to a full four-year term at the union's convention later that year and re-elected to 1980.

Survivors include Fitzmaurice's wife Jean, two sons and three grandchildren. A funeral mass was said at St. Luke's Church in Carnegie, Pa., Nov. 17. Burial was in Carnegie.

Metal Trades petition Congress to bar export of U.S. shipyard work

The 200 delegates to the AFL-CIO's Metal Trades Dept.'s National Shipbuilding Conference petitioned Congress not to allow the Reagan Administration to export the construction of U.S.-flag merchant ships and the thousands of jobs connected with merchant ship construction.

All the delegates to the second biennial conference signed the petition, directed to Congress under the "redress of grievances" provision of the Bill of Rights.

The delegates to the Nov. 16-17 meeting in Washington represent shipyard production workers in all the federal shipyards and almost all the major private shipyards in the country, who are covered by collective bargaining agreements negotiated by local Metal Trades councils.

In his keynote address, Dept. President Paul J. Burnsky declared that shipyard workers face disaster because "our national leaders have literally given away the future."

Burnsky noted that private ship construction employment plunged from 141,000 to 124,000 between January 1981 and July 1982.

"In the year ending this July, more than one of every 10 wage earners in our private shipbuilding industry were told to go home," he said. "There was no work for them. Some of them were lucky. They found work in naval shipyards. But they were only a fraction of those whose livelihoods were destroyed, and the future outlook is bleak, indeed, in a time of worldwide depression in the ship construction industry."

Exporting jobs

Burnsky pointed out that the Reagan Administration's reaction was to authorize the construction and reconstruction abroad of nearly $1.5 billion worth of U.S.-flag merchant ships, "exporting 22,500 shipbuilding jobs and another 65,000 jobs in allied endeavors."

This authority to authorize foreign construction of U.S.-flag ships has expired, and a proposal to renew it, as well as to give a tax break to ship owners who build their ships in foreign countries, will be under consideration in the lame-duck session of Congress later this month.

It is to urge defeat of these proposals that the conference is petitioning Congress "on behalf of American shipyard workers." The petition says these proposals will "adversely affect the economy of every one of the United States, do serious and immediate damage to the economic futures of thousands of working people, and undermine drastically our national ability to construct and maintain a modern navy."

James Kennedy, executive assistant to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, said in an address to the delegates that using foreign labor to build American ships is a "disgrace" and that doing so has deprived workers in 26 states of jobs.

He said that the AFL-CIO intends to work in the lame-duck congressional session for programs that will generate jobs.

"We want to earn the paychecks," Kennedy said. "We want to hold our country together, and that takes work . . . If work stops in such vital areas as shipbuilding, the country dies, it's as simple as that."

Kennedy lashed at the Reagan Administration for twisting unemployment figures to make the extent of joblessness appear less harmful than it actually is.

People must eat

"Percentages don't have to eat, don't have children, but people do," he declared. And he noted that there are 100,000 more Americans out of work now than there were in 1933, the worst year of the Great Depression.

Maritime Trades Dept. President Frank Drozak told the conference that "our merchant marine is at the lowest ebb" in the history of the nation.

"Free trade has to be a two-way street," Drozak continued. "Competition must be fair and equal to all, not to just a few . . . Until the policy-makers in this country understand and accept this truth . . . then this country will continue to lose its industrial base, its shipbuilding base, its merchant marine and its national security."

The U.S. must "change, and change now to conform to the reality of foreign trade as it is in this very real world we live in," Drozak said. "There needs to be a national cargo policy for the United States. Whether we like it or not, it is the only answer."

Navy Sec. John F. Lehman, Jr., defended the Reagan Administration's defense appropriation proposals as both necessary to a strong defense and a way of creating jobs.

Other speakers included Rep. Joseph P. Addabbo of New York, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Defense Appropriations; President Edwin Murray Hood of the Shipbuilders' Council of America; Adm. E. B. Fowler, commander of the Naval Sea Systems Command; retired Navy Adm. Isaac Kidd; and Gerald Seifert, general counsel for Maritime Policy of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee.

Conference goals

In other actions, the conference:

- Called for "proper and wholehearted" administration of the Occupational Safety & Health Act "with special emphasis on the unabridged right of workers and their representatives to demand the prompt investigation and correction of hazardous conditions."
- Urged Congress to restore federal pay to comparability with that in the private sector.
- Recommended that the Metal Trades Dept. work toward a congressional decision to end the contracting-out by the Navy of work that can be done by civilian employees.

Administration plan to build U.S. ships abroad is assailed by Metal Trades Dept. President Paul J. Burnsky at department conference.

Bargaining stressed as basis of worker participation plans

Conflict and cooperation are both useful strategies for workers' progress.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue focused on that theme during a recent institute on "Unions and the Quality of Work Life" at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Participants in the four-day institute analyzed worker participation programs and their impact on collective bargaining, and representatives of nine AFL-CIO unions reported on their unions' experiences. Donahue was asked to give the AFL-CIO perspective.

Since the federation does not set policy on collective bargaining issues, Donahue explained that his views on worker participation plans were his own, expressed in talks and articles over the past six years.

He reminded the group that organized labor has always insisted that improvements in the quality of work life can only be achieved through collective bargaining—"where equal talks to equal."

Donahue explained that collective bargaining is rooted in conflict, that employers as a class have interests different from their workers, that "we get what we can take." He continued:

"But I believe that adversarial relationship ought to be limited to the bargaining process. Once we establish a deal on conditions of work we move to a cooperative relationship doing our damnedest to improve the quality of work life, the quality of production, and improve productivity and thereby enhance our chance to get a bigger bite of the apple next time around."

To be effective, Donahue said, QWL programs—like joint apprenticeship committees or joint safety committees—have to be based on collective bargaining.

He enumerated problems unions face dealing with worker participation programs:

- Training negotiators to address these issues in collective bargaining sessions.
- Developing union counterparts to management facilitators so the union's institutional interests are protected.
- Keeping collective bargaining issues separate from QWL issues and knowing when an issue should be handled through the grievance machinery.
- Combating management's use of QWL as a union avoidance program.

Donahue cited the almost universal opinion of union organizing directors that QWL programs make organizing more difficult. Only a few have been able to use them as an asset in organizing, he said.

"We haven't reached the millennium that some faddists in this field would have us believe," he concluded.

Quality of worklife programs must stem from collective bargaining, Sec.-Treas. Donahue tells seminar.

New auto models lead increase in wholesale prices

Wholesale prices rose a seasonally adjusted five-tenths of 1 percent in October, mostly due to higher costs for new cars, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In September, domestic auto makers closed out the 1982 model year with unusually large discounts. Largely as a result of these end-of-model-year price cuts, BLS's producer price index for finished goods registered a slight decline of one-tenth of 1 percent that month.

The difference between the steeply discounted 1982 model costs and the higher 1983 model costs overwhelmed widespread declines elsewhere in the October report, BLS said. New car prices showed a 4.1 percent increase over the marked-down dealer cost for leftover 1982 cars.

Last month's increase in the producer price index for finished goods—the government's measure of changes in wholesale prices—was about the same as the advances of six-tenths of 1 percent in both July and August.

The index for intermediate goods declined two-tenths of 1 percent in October. It went down one-tenth of 1 percent in August and was unchanged in September. The crude materials index dropped seven-tenths of 1 percent, the fifth consecutive monthly decrease.

Energy prices edged down one-tenth of 1 percent following four months of increases. Natural gas prices posted a rare decline of nine-tenths of 1 percent. Gasoline prices fell 1.3 percent, but home heating oil cost 1 percent more after dropping the previous two months.

Consumer food prices were down two-tenths of 1 percent after dropping five-tenths of 1 percent in September.

Walesa vows to keep spirit of Solidarnosc

Gdansk, Poland—Lech Walesa, the leader of Poland's now-outlawed Solidarity trade union, returned home here after being held 11 months in detention by communist authorities, and pledged to remain faithful to the "spirit" of the labor organization he helped found.

"I was, am, and will be faithful to the spirit of the Gdansk agreement," he told newsmen, referring to the historic worker-state accord ending the 1980 shipyard strike here that gave birth to the first independent trade union in a communist-ruled nation.

"I will never depart from this spirit," he said.

Many still held

Along with thousands of other Solidarity leaders and members, Walesa was detained by the military regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski last December after the junta swooped down on Solidarity, and suspended it. While many of those held have since been released, hundreds of others are still held by the authorities and martial law, with its limits on personal freedoms, is still in effect.

A new trade union law sponsored by Jaruzelski and passed by the Polish parliament last month outlawed Solidarity and strictly limits the activities of official trade unions the government will allow to exist after the first of the year. Political and sympathy strikes, along with other freedoms granted by the 1980 Gdansk agreement, are banned by the Oct. 9 legislation.

Walesa, who refused to comment on the establishment of the new official unions in his meeting with reporters, said that during his long, isolated internment near the Soviet border, "I did not sign anything and I didn't give anything up. . . . I was freed without any obligations."

Underground and interned Solidarity activists have issued clandestine bulletins condemning the new unions as "treason."

New York rally

Rally sponsored by New York area trade unionists, the Committee in Support of Solidarity, and the Polish American Congress drew hundreds to the Polish consulate, where Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol Chaikin pledged renewed American labor support for the Polish workers.

LaGuardia remembered as advocate of labor's cause

Fiorello LaGuardia championed labor's cause in Congress before becoming New York's "greatest mayor," AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue recalled at a Washington lunch marking the centennial of LaGuardia's birth. The event was organized by the National Trade Union Committee of the LaGuardia Centennial organization.

Donahue pointed out that the Norris-LaGuardia Act is a keystone of the labor movement's "Magna Carta" and stands as a declaration "that the Bill of Rights does not end at the factory gate."

The 1932 law, sponsored in the Senate by George Norris of Nebraska—a Republican like LaGuardia—stopped the use of court injunctions to break strikes and outlawed "yellow dog" contracts that forced workers to sign away their union rights.

An award in recognition of his service to the labor movement was presented at the luncheon to Leon Keyserling, a key New Deal figure, who had been an assistant to New York Sen. Robert F. Wagner and was an administrator of the U.S. Housing Authority under President Franklin D. Roosevelt. Keyserling was cited for his contributions to the writing of the Wagner National Labor Relations Act and other major New Deal legislation and, more recently, the Full Employment Act of 1978.

GOP shambles

Donahue said that LaGuardia, "the greatest mayor of the greatest city in the world," would be "outraged" by what today's Republican leadership is making of the cities.

When he became mayor in 1934, LaGuardia's New York was in the throes of the Depression, but under his administration "that city was regenerated both in spirit and in substance," Donahue recalled.

These things could never have been accomplished, he stressed, "except in partnership with a federal government committed to the same civilized and humane goals."

"After living on that legacy for 50 years," he said, "we find ourselves once more with massive unemployment and deepening decay and disrepair in all our cities. Only this time, we have an Administration that has turned its back on the cities and on the philosophy of Franklin Roosevelt and Fiorello LaGuardia."

Keyserling said that LaGuardia and Sen. Wagner, "did not want to turn the American system upside down," but worked to "water the economic tree at the bottom and not at the top . . . because they recognized that this was best for all the people."

Worker rights

The Norris-LaGuardia and Wagner acts "were not only conceived to make working men and women free and give them the power to organize and bargain collectively, but also to bring about the improved distribution of purchasing power, so essential to restore a stricken economy and make it durable and sound," Keyserling stressed.

A resolution adopted at the 1981 AFL-CIO convention urged the labor movement's participation in the LaGuardia centennial activities. On Sept. 30, the House unanimously adopted a resolution designating Dec. 11, his 100th birthday anniversary, as "Fiorello H. LaGuardia Memorial Day." Senate action on the measure is expected when Congress returns.

Fraser stresses job potential in domestic auto content bill

Domestic content legislation being pushed by the auto workers would create 900,000 new jobs to stimulate economic recovery, UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said.

Fraser told a National Press Club luncheon in Washington that a domestic content requirement would be better for consumers than high tariffs or quotas because competition would be enhanced. Japanese car makers and other foreign manufacturers would continue to have access to the U.S. market. But the cars they sell would have to contain a specified minimum percentage of U.S. parts or labor, with the ratio pegged to U.S. sales.

With a content law in place, Fraser said, the "pent-up demand" for new automobiles could propel an economic recovery. The auto industry is in the 45th month of a recession that has devastated Michigan and other auto centers, bringing "agony I haven't seen since I was a kid in the Great Depression." The soup kitchens that once fed Skid Row alcoholics, he said, are now "feeding unemployed auto workers."

Job security

In his remarks and in response to questions, Fraser said job security remains a key UAW contract goal. An early step must be to assure that employment reduction stemming from technological changes be achieved solely through attrition, he said.

Fraser acknowledged the problems the UAW has had in trying to reach an agreement with Chrysler Corp., culminating in a strike by Canadian employees.

Chrysler workers live next door to Ford and General Motors workers receiving more money for the same work, Fraser noted. And Canada's inflation is running double that of the United States, while cost-of-living adjustments are weighted to the U.S. pattern. But he predicted that the strike will be settled "without permanent damage" to a company still climbing back from near-bankruptcy.

In response to questions, Fraser said he thought it would be difficult to get an early AFL-CIO endorsement of a presidential candidate by the required two-thirds majority if the Democratic choice were between Sen. Edward M. Kennedy and former Vice President Walter F. Mondale. But a choice would be likely, he suggested, if there were a serious candidate in the race who represented a right-wing viewpoint hostile to labor's goals.

Fraser, himself, is retiring from the UAW presidency when his term expires next spring and the UAW executive board and a 350-member steering committee of local union officials has recommended as his successor Vice President Owen Bieber, who heads the UAW General Motors Corp. department. Delegates to the union's convention next May will make the decision.

Does this represent the passing of an era? Fraser was asked. He is the last of the "Reuther generation" in the leadership of the union—veterans of the era of sit-down strikes and organizing who shaped a union known for social concerns and bargaining table innovations.

Fraser didn't see it quite that way. He has seen commitment and dedication in young people who don't have the first-hand experiences of his generation, he observed. The "institution" that the earlier generation of union members built so well "is forming the new leadership," Fraser said. And he's "comfortable" with the direction the UAW is pointing.

Federal labor study termed short of mark

A new report on labor relations in the federal government showing a sharp rise in the number of unfair labor practice charges is a step in the right direction, but its conclusions and recommendations "miss the mark in some instances and do not go far enough in others," the Government Employees commented.

While the union said it agreed with the basic findings of a General Accounting Office study of federal labor-management relations, AFGE President Kenneth T. Blaylock said the report "fails to look at the real and fundamental problems" which prevent improvements and a reduction in unfair labor practice charges.

GAO's recommendations to the Federal Labor Relations Authority and the Office of Personnel Management were that the number of charges and processing costs could be reduced if more disputes were settled informally and by assessing the effectiveness of managerial labor relations.

Blaylock said the report is silent on "the single most significant cause" of the high number of unfair labor practice charges in the federal sector—the lack of enforcement by the Federal Labor Relations Authority.

No enforcement

"Enforcement to date has either been non-existent or so long in coming that the dispute issues are rendered meaningless," Blaylock charged.

Without enforcement, he said, federal management apparently sees no compelling need to abide by the obligation to bargain spelled out in the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978.

"With unfair labor practice charges having no deterrent effect, the agencies commit illegal acts and challenge the union to file more charges. The agencies then accept the slap on the wrist they get two years later when they are found guilty," he said.

In its report, GAO said that the number of unfair labor practice charges totaled 6,448 in fiscal year 1981, and costs could reach $25.9 million. It said the number is expected to continue to increase.

Blaylock said the union will ask Congress to enact corrective amendments to the 1978 statute to promote better labor-management relations in the federal sector.

In his statement, Blaylock said the primary problem that must be addressed in any attempt at solving the high rate of charge filings is the lack of acceptance of collective bargaining by federal managers.

"Many government officials fail to understand their statutory duty to bargain," Blaylock said.

rarely approaches 100 percent—it comes closest to that mark only in time of war—it generally averages above 80 percent outside of a recession. The last time it touched 80 percent was in May 1981.

The October decline in industrial production—the total output of the nation's factories, mines and utilities—was the 13th in 15 months and reflected the impact of high interest rates on the economy. Financial analysts, hoping for an easing in the cost of money, were disappointed when Fed Chairman Paul A. Volcker indicated no immediate change in the central bank's policy.

"I am well aware interest rates are still historically high, and that it is not yet clear that a broad-based recovery is under way," he said in a Boston speech. "Obviously, in the circumstances, further reductions in interest rates would be welcome. But we also want to be sure that lower rates can continue so that the recovery will last."

Social security panel weighs funding

Kirkland scores fostering of split among generations

fective in 1984, but giving workers a tax credit for their social security contribution so that there would be no net increase in their taxes.

- Bringing all employees of nonprofit organizations, and all new federal employees, under the social security umbrella. Federal workers with more than five years of service would not be affected.
- Stretching out cost-of-living adjustments for social security beneficiaries by one month a year for the next three years so that, by 1986, these raises would be effective on Oct. 3, instead of July 3, of each year.
- Making provision for a slight reduction in the ratio between benefits and earnings, to take effect in the year 2020 only if such a step were needed to insure the solvency of the trust funds.
- Creating standby authority to raise social security taxes again in the year 2020, but only if economic conditions demand such a step.

Federal sector

On the issue of extending social security coverage to newly hired federal employees, both Kirkland and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging and expected to head the Rules Committee in the 98th Congress, expressed strong opposition.

Kirkland said he was concerned about such a move, particularly since it was being considered "in the context of looking for dollars to enhance the status of social security, and not in the context of what is best for the federal employee."

He said federal workers were being asked to "buy a pig in a poke," since discussions about the size and scope of a new federal pension system are still going on. Kirkland said he would "reserve judgment" on any such program until he saw whether it was "fair and equitable."

Pepper voiced concern that putting future federal employees under social security would erode the contribution base of the present federal retirement system.

Taken together, the provisions of the Democratic plan would guarantee added social security revenues of between $150 and $200 billion between now and the end of the decade. That would be enough, the Democrats said, to meet the worst-case economic scenario — more than enough, in Kirkland's view. He insisted the economic forecasts for social security were too gloomy.

In setting the $150-$200 billion target, Kirkland said, "our action should not be constructed as accepting the forecast of a deficit" of that magnitude.

"Our action was based on prudence," Kirkland told his fellow commissioners. "We have nothing to lose by over-funding (social security); we have much to lose by underfunding. We are voting our fears, not our hopes."

GOP prescription

The Democratic proposal stood in sharp contrast to a Republican scheme which called for:

- Slashing initial benefits by 10 percent, so that retirees would receive, on the average, only 38 percent of their pre-retirement earnings, instead of the present 42 percent.
- Moving the age for retirement at full benefits from 65 to 68, which would require workers to stay on the job longer to receive less benefits.
- Hacking 20 percent from the benefits of those who take early retirement at age 62, pegging their pensions at only 64 percent of the full benefit instead of the 80 percent provided in present law.
- Clamping a lid on cost-of-living adjustments, making it impossible for beneficiaries to keep pace with inflation, and stretching out the effective date of such increases for three months.
- Bringing federal employees under social security and reducing benefits for those who qualify for both federal pensions and social security based on their work records in the private sector.

One alternative social security financing plan, not yet addressed by the commission, is the longstanding AFL-CIO call for employers to pay the social security tax on all of their payroll instead of cutting off payments after an annual limit is reached as is the case with employee taxes. The commission staff estimates that such a change would mean $41 billion to $42 billion in additional revenues for the years 1983 to 1989.

Four key issues

For organized labor and its allies in senior citizen groups, the civil rights movement and social welfare agencies—who have banded together in the Save Our Security (SOS) coalition—the deliberations produced tentative agreement on four key issues advocated by SOS.

- Removing social security from the unified budget, so that it would be shielded against efforts to balance the budget by slashing benefits.
- Tying the investment of social security trust funds more closely to current market interest rates. The trust funds now receive an overall yield of about 8.5 percent—well below the current market level. Had the trust funds been invested at market rates over the past 21 years, they would have earned an additional $14.9 billion in interest.
- Adding two public members to social security's board of trustees, giving the public a voice in the economic forecasting now considered the exclusive province of the Secretaries of the Treasury, Labor and Health & Human Services.
- Creating a bipartisan board of directors to oversee the system which affects 36 million beneficiaries and 116 million contributors. At present, the system is run by the HHS Secretary and the Social Security Commissioner.

Generation issue

As the commission moved toward the close of its three days of deliberations, Kirkland spoke directly to the "so-called generation-gap conflict, which, he said, had permeated much of the discussion.

"This system, he said, "is not one which exacts from the young workers for the exclusive benefit of an elderly drone. The system has values for those who are working and who are young today"—by offering survivor benefits if a worker dies during his or her productive years, leaving behind a spouse and dependent children, and by insurance to protect workers and their families in the event of disability.

But even if that were not the case, Kirkland said, "I would presume that most young working families would regard it as a value to themselves if their parents are provided for through an effective and sound social insurance system."

In the absence of such a system, he continued, "most human beings would accept the proposition that they have some responsibility to their parents that might otherwise be a burden and might diminish their capacity to meet other responsibilities, such as the education of their children.

"Even if all this were not so and we had a population made up of 'I'm-all-rightniks' and to hell with everyone else . . . it's not unreasonable to say that the proper place to put those costs is on those who have a job and who can work, (who) are healthy and have a long life ahead of them . . . as against imposing those burdens on those who have already done their work and made their contribution to society.

"If you have to choose between the two in the allocation of those burdens and costs, it's entirely proper and reasonable to expect those of us fortunate enough to be able to work . . . to accept it."

The commission will reconvene on Dec. 10 to put the finishing touches on a report due by year's end.

Intermission time for Social Security Reform commissioners, Sen. Robert J. Dole, Rep. Claude Pepper, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Air Line Pilots elect Duffy as new president of union

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Air Line Pilots' 27th biennial board of directors meeting elected Henry A. Duffy, a veteran Delta Air Lines pilot, as the union's new president to succeed John J. O'Donnell.

Duffy, 48, is from Atlanta. He will assume office Jan. 1, becoming the fifth president in ALPA's 51-year history. O'Donnell has led the organization since 1971.

In a three-way race with O'Donnell and Trans World Airlines Capt. John Gratz of Saratoga, Calif., Duffy received 13,753 votes. O'Donnelll netted 10,284, and Gratz 3,209. The votes represent active pilot-members.

Meeting at a time of economic troubles in the airline industry, the board of directors—the union's highest governing body—acted on more than 80 resolutions, conducted internal business, and heard a number of speakers. The 300 delegates attending the meeting were the elected representatives of all ALPA local councils.

Each ALPA council is composed of the pilots of a particular airline in a given geographic area. Duffy currently serves as the highest elected officer of the Delta pilot group.

Call for unity

Heralding "a new beginning" and calling for unity, Duffy told the delegates that "to survive the '80s, we have to return to the unity of the '30s." He called for a joint government-industry-labor study group to take a deep look into the causes of the industry's problems to seek ways to correct its ills.

O'Donnell, in congratulating Duffy, urged the board "to work together and get behind the new president. I can assure you he has my support and he needs yours."

Delegates also elected three other national officers. Thomas M. Ashwood, a Trans World Airlines pilot who has served as ALPA secretary since 1977, was elected to the union's second highest post, executive vice president. Gerry Pryde, who had held the post, did not run for re-election. Ashwood is from Bayport, N.Y.

Charles J. Pierce, a United Airlines first officer from Bloomingdale, Ill., was elected to replace Ashwood as secretary, and John J. Magee of St. Louis was re-elected to his fifth consecutive term as treasurer.

HENRY A. DUFFY

Pilot concerns

Constitutional "housekeeping" amendments were among the resolutions presented to the delegates for action. The resolutions covered the whole range of pilot concerns—job security, air safety, contract ratification processes, forced early retirement—as well as communication between line pilots and the union's officers.

Among the speakers were Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis and Chairman James Burnett of the National Transportation Safety Board.

4,000 win major contract gains at Keebler bakeries

Members of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers at six Keebler Co. plants have approved a new contract that includes major improvements in wages and benefits.

The two-year agreement covering about 4,000 employees of the nation's second largest biscuit maker provides wage increases totalling $1.70 and improvements in health, pension and vacation plans. The plants covered are in Denver, Atlanta, Grand Rapids, Mich., Cincinnati, Macon, Ga., and Philadelphia.

The contract provides an across-the-board hourly wage boost of 85 cents on Nov. 1 and another 85 cents in the second year. The first-year increase doesn't apply to starting rates or promotion rates.

First-class journeymen in the maintenance and repair departments will get an additional 15 cents an hour now and another 10 cents Nov. 1, 1983.

To equalize wage rates in classifications in each plant, nearly 800 employees will get additional wage increases of from two to 15 cents on Nov. 1 this year, and 444 workers will get a further increase of seven to 14 cents on Nov. 1, 1983.

The agreement provides for increased company contributions for health insurance, creation of an employer-financed optical plan in the second year, and improved life and accident insurance coverage. Vacation and holiday benefits also were improved.

Senate lineup for the 98th Congress

These are the senators who will serve in the 98th Congress, which convenes in January. Democrats won 20 of the 33 Senate seats that were up for election this year, but holdovers will enable Republicans to carry a 54-46 majority into the new Congress.

Labor's boycotts an answer to union-busters

By Susan Dunlop

Union-busting is the common theme that runs through the case histories of the nine companies currently on the AFL-CIO boycott list.

John Mara, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., notes that the department is in the business of encouraging union members to buy union-made products and use union services. But the other side of the job, Mara stressed, is the exercise of organized labor's collective influence in persuading people not to buy the goods and services of unfair anti-union employers.

The UL&STD concentrates its boycott activities on actions that have been endorsed by the AFL-CIO Executive Council. The council's sanction, Mara said, is the cue for the department to begin a national publicity program that supplements the boycott campaign of the union directly involved.

On the list

The products now on the "do not buy" list are Coors beer, Indiana Desk Co. goods, cements from Kosmos Cement Co., Marine Optical products, the soaps and detergents made by Procter & Gamble, Inc., R. J. Reynolds Co. tobacco products, Seattle First National Bank, meats from Iowa Beef Processors, Inc., and iceberg lettuce from Bruce Church, Inc.

The Union Label Dept. distributes the national boycott list throughout the labor movement and to the labor press every month.

Mara points out that any union has the right to call for a boycott. To gain the endorsement of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, the action must conform to a set of guidelines adopted by the council in February 1980.

The council also has created a separate "unfair" list publicized by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to call attention to "do not buy" campaigns where normal boycott activities may not be applicable.

Labor law violators

Boycotts against some of the nation's worst labor law offenders and most repressive employers have spurred action from union members and the public and have contributed to the eventual success of unions in many of those struggles, Mara pointed out.

He stressed that the common thread among the most successful boycotts is a "wholehearted commitment" by the union to make the boycott a top priority. "Money, staff, and someone's full time attention at union headquarters were channelled into those boycotts," Mara said.

Another key, he said, is reaching out to local trade unionists through the network of AFL-CIO state and local labor councils, to publicize the boycott and gain support. Mara said this is an area where his department can offer some of its most valuable service through local union label and service trades councils within the central bodies.

He emphasized that "just saying there's a boycott doesn't make it happen," and before any decision is made every aspect should be thoroughly researched and realistically analyzed by the national or international union.

The employers now on the boycott list "earned their way on with their flagrant disregard for the rights of their workers," Mara asserted. Those disputes include:

- Adolph Coors Brewing Co.—This is the only current boycott initiated by the AFL-CIO itself. It was launched in April 1977 after workers at the Golden, Colo., brewery struck over issues of human dignity. The union was directly affiliated with the AFL-CIO.

Among Coors demands were the unrestricted right to conduct body searches and lie detector tests. The company hired strikebreakers, and the union was later decertified after an election in which only the strikebreakers were allowed to vote.

A number of the fired workers became the core of the group that has kept the boycott active and helped put a large dent in Coors sales.

- Indiana Desk Co.—The Furniture Workers asked the council to back its boycott in May 1982. The Jasper, Ind., office products maker soured 30 years of bargaining relations by calling in a union-busting consultant and frustrating the union's efforts extending more than a year to negotiate a new contract. The workers struck March 29, 1982.

- Kosmos Cement Co.—Another long relationship, spanning more than 25 years, was disrupted in 1980 when the company was acquired by Moore-McCormack, Inc., which refused to honor the existing contract with the Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers.

After trying to bargain with the company, the union struck in May 1981, instituted a boycott in July of that year and obtained the Executive Council's endorsement in February 1982.

Contract abandoned

- Marine Optical, Inc.—When the company decided to move its plant from Roslindale to Brockton, Mass., in late 1979, it also decided to run away from its existing contract with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and end a 25-year bargaining relationship.

The union quickly filed charges with the National Labor Relations Board. These have been upheld, but have been dragged into a lengthy appeals process by the company. The council endorsed IUE's boycott of Marine Optical in February 1980.

- Procter & Gamble, Inc.—The Steelworkers won an election and were certified as the bargaining representative of the workers at P&G's Kansas City, Kan., soap and detergent plant in May 1980 after a 43-year-old in-plant union asked USWA to help win a fair contract.

After months of bargaining, the Steelworkers agreed to accept P&G's "last offer," but the company then reneged and started a program the union describes as "punishment and reprisals" against the plant's workers.

The USWA organized a worldwide boycott of the company's soap products that was endorsed by the AFL-CIO council in November 1981.

- R. J. Reynolds Co. tobacco products—The oldest boycott on the list dates officially from 1955, but union members have been boycotting Reynolds' cigarettes and tobaccos since the 1920's.

BCT campaign

Repeated attempts by the Tobacco Workers to organize Reynolds workers in plants near Winston-Salem, N.C., have been beaten back by the company. The most recent was a campaign by the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers in 1974.

- Seattle First National Bank—The AFL-CIO council endorsed the Food & Commercial Workers "close your account" campaign against the bank in July 1979. The 40-year-old independent union that had been representing Sea-First workers affiliated with the UFCW in March 1978 and notified the NLRB of the change.

Although ordered by the board to recognize and bargain with what is now UFCW Local 1182, after being found guilty of a variety of unfair labor practices, the bank tied the board decisions up in appeals.

- Iowa Beef Processors, Inc.—Labor relations with the Dakota City, Neb., company have always been stormy. No dispute over a contract there has been settled without a strike, and IBP's reinstatement on the boycott list in August 1982 at the request of the UFCW marked the fourth boycott since 1969 when the Meat Cutters achieved the first contract with the firm.

- Bruce Church Co.—One of the labor movement's most widely supported boycotts was the one led by the Farm Workers in the 1970s against growers of grapes and lettuce.

That boycott has been credited with helping bring contracts, decent wages and conditions to many workers in those fields for the first time.

Bogus bug swatted

Catlettsburg, Ky.—A company offering a phony union label to non-union printers has been ordered by a federal court to stop selling its bogus bug.

The so-called American Independent Lithographers Union, Inc., a private company, agreed to the terms of an injunction issued by the U.S. District Court for Eastern Kentucky. The firm was ordered to stop selling its "union label" which it had advertised to printers as a way to put a label on their work without having any union contracts in their shops.

The president of the company, Roger Dodds, was also required to inform companies that had bought the phony bug of the court order and to instruct them to stop using it.

The suit was brought by the Graphic Arts International Union, the International Allied Printing Trades Association and the Louisville Allied Printing Trades and was joined by the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Is Anyone Listening?

HALLOWEEN IS long past, but those voodoo economists who have President Reagan's ear are still flying high in the White House.

Supply-side economics has brought us nothing but huge deficits and the highest unemployment in more than 40 years. So let's have some more of it. That's what the President and his key aides seem to be saying.

Election-battered Republicans in Congress and in the state capitals have been trying to tell the Reagan White House that Americans voted for a change in course, that unemployment was the Number One issue.

But no one at the White House seems to be listening.

The President goes before a convention of bankers to say that what America needs is further cuts in non-defense spending. Oh yes, Mr. Reagan also wants the House to reconsider the balanced budget constitutional amendment proposal that it so wisely rejected before the election.

We've got to cut the budget still further, the President insists. And he will veto any budget-busting measures Congress passes.

But that's not all, apparently. Now the President says he is actively considering a plan to make the next 10 percent cut in the federal income tax effective on Jan. 1, 1983, instead of July 1, 1983.

THAT, OF COURSE, would push projected deficits above their already staggering $150 billion mark. And it would presumably lay the groundwork for new Administration pressure to cut spending and abandon proposals to put unemployed Americans to work.

As with the earlier stages of the tax cut, the biggest beneficiaries would be those with the highest incomes. People without a job wouldn't get a thing.

If it doesn't work, of course, the President could explain once more that it's not his fault that so many people are without jobs. It's the fault of all of his predecessors—the fault of Presidents Carter, Ford, Nixon, Johnson, Kennedy, Eisenhower, Truman and back to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

America just hasn't been the same since Herbert Hoover's Administration.

Three (Tentative) Cheers!

JUST ABOUT every sports columnist in the country, it seems, is an authority on collective bargaining and labor relations as well as everything else. So the members of the football players union haven't lacked for unsolicited advice.

Nevertheless, it is the members of the National Football League Players Association who call the signals. It was their decision to strike and it will be their decision whether to ratify the tentative agreement ending the strike.

Regardless of that decision, this much is obvous:

The players understood the importance of teamwork, and they showed it during the eight weeks of their strike. In the trade union movement, we call it solidarity.

A hostile management repeatedly tested the union and learned that it would not break. In the end, an agreement was reached through the give-and-take of collective bargaining.

THERE IS NO doubt that gains the players could not have achieved without a strike will benefit future professional football players as well as those who sacrificed to achieve them.

That, too, is in the nature of union contracts. Pensions are such an accepted feature of employment these days that it is easy to forget there were virtually no employer-funded pensions in American industry until 500,000 Steelworkers struck for more than a month in 1949.

That first agreement was for a $100-a-month benefit, including social security. But it was a mighty big foot in the door.

As we owe a debt to those who put their jobs on the line a generation ago, so tomorrow's NFL players will owe a debt to their trade union predecessors.

Social security concerns part of election message

By Press Associates, Inc.

Those who went to the polls in the recent midterm elections reported that they were concerned most of all about unemployment and then about the future of social security.

Those who named jobs and social security as their biggest worries voted overwhelmingly for Democratic House candidates and against those of the GOP, a party which has become associated with social security cutbacks, past and proposed.

Thus, the outcome of the election, in which the Democrats netted 26 additional House seats and many Republican incumbents held their seats by slim margins, can be read as a message to Congress to keep hands off social security benefits.

The final weeks of the campaign were filled with rhetoric, misinformation, and plain nonsense about social security.

One example was when President Reagan accused the Democrats of "trying to scare the elderly" regarding social security. Going back to May 1981, it was Reagan and his budget chief, David Stockman, who scared — and mobilized — the elderly by proposing savage cutbacks in social security benefits, especially for early retirees and the disabled, to "save" the program from "bankruptcy."

Administration retreat

A public outcry forced the Administration to back off for the time being. Reagan appointed a "bipartisan" National Commission on Social Security Reform to make recommendations to Congress.

The new 98th Congress, which will take up the question of how best to ensure the program's continued solvency, should first separate the myths being perpetrated about social security from the facts.

One myth is that drastic, long-term "reforms," including some form of benefit cuts, must be made in the program to keep it from "going broke."

The fact is that the 47-year-old social security system is structurally sound and its funding problems are mostly short-term. The usual large surpluses in the program's three trust funds—old age and survivors; disability, and Medicare—have been declining because the nation's economy has been weak in recent years, especially during the Reagan Recession.

Unemployment's impact

High unemployment and slower wage gains have meant less payroll taxes paid into the program while high inflation has meant that benefit payouts, tied to the consumer price index, have been larger than had been foreseen.

The old age trust fund has been the only one headed toward near-term deficits. Congress this year wisely authorized this fund to borrow from the disability and Medicare funds.

This will be sufficient to carry the program through most of 1984.

Borrowing from the Treasury's general revenue funds is one such solution. The money could be paid back with interest when the program yields an expected surplus after 1990.

Scheduled payroll tax increases through 1990 and demographic shifts—an increase in the postwar "baby boom" workforce and a lower rate of retirees—is expected to keep the program financially healthy for at least 20 years beyond 1990.

Another myth is that Americans could get a better deal through a private pension or a special Individual Retirement Account (IRA). The conservative Heritage Foundation has actually proposed phasing out the social security program

The new Congress should reject the myths spread by the enemies of social security and those who would try to balance the federal budget on the backs of the elderly.

Job injuries continue to show decline

Work-related injuries declined in most U.S. industries during 1981, although the decline was not as sharp as the year before, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The government's survey of private industry employers also showed a slight drop in occupational fatalities and job-connected illness last year from 1980 levels. But again, the rate of decline in these categories was narrower than from 1979 to 1980.

In its sampling of employer reports, BLS found that job-related injuries dropped by 200,000 to 5.3 million last year. In 1980, the bureau recorded a drop in injuries of 500,000 to 5.5 million.

Donovan takes credit

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan hailed the improvements in the occupational injury and illness report for 1981 as a reflection of Reagan Administration policies.

"Most significantly during the first year of the Reagan Administration, workers were less likely to be hurt at work than during any other year in the past decade," Donovan declared.

Even so, the BLS report cited a general decline in occupational injuries over the past 10 years, pointing out that the injury incidence rate declined from one in every 10 workers in 1972 to one in every 13 in 1981.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor suggested that the 1981 improvements actually stem from policies instituted at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration by former Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham during the Carter Administration.

"The Secretary is attempting to get a free public relations ride on Dr. Bingham's gas," Taylor charged.

He said that none of the new OSHA "enforcement innovations" was in place during 1981 except for the inspection targeting program. Under OSHA's targeting plan, he noted, almost half the inspections involve a review of employers' records rather than actual inspections of workplaces.

Puffery scored

Organized labor welcomes any decrease in workers' injuries, Taylor stressed. But he dismissed as "puffery" Donovan's attempt to attribute the drop to his Administration's policies.

The BLS report also showed:

- Job-related deaths declined to 4,370 in 1981 from 4,400 the year before.
- The estimated number of occupational illnesses declined to 126,100 from 130,200 in 1980.
- Injuries involving lost workdays dropped by 100,000 to 2.4 million in 1981.
- The largest decline in injury rates occurred in manufacturing and construction, but increased in mining. Even so, construction remained the most hazardous major industry with an injury rate of 14.9 per 100 workers in 1981, followed by mining at 11.4 and manufacturing at 11.1 per 100 workers. Meanwhile, the injury rate for agriculture, forestry and fishing rose from 11.3 to 11.7 per 100 workers last year.

'There's Work to Be Done!'

Donahue sees Reagan policy as a 'great leap backward'

New York—The future of the American economy should be determined with a greater degree of citizen support, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a speech before the Franklin Delano Roosevelt Centennial Commission conference here.

He called on the Reagan Administration to respond to the election verdict and alter its course to deal with the suffering of unemployment.

"We think that even if the Administration doesn't, Congress will," he said.

Calling for a national consensus on economic goals and policies, Donahue said it was ironic that just as the conference gathered to mark the 50th anniversary of FDR's election as President, the current Administration "is doing its utmost to take a great leap backward to the pre-New Deal era."

Wrecking crew

"The Reaganites have come close to dismantling all of the benign and constructive activities of government that were fostered by the New Deal in response to the rejection by the people of a do-nothing government," Donahue observed.

"The Reaganites are joyfully removing the federal presence from any substantial role except for the raising of armies and the de-taxing, de-regulating, and general unleashing of private business enterprise.

"In the process of getting government off our backs and turning civic responsibilities over to private enterprise and the state legislatures, the Reaganites have done violence to the concept of 'one nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all,' which was embodied and given tangible form in the unifying endeavors of the New Deal."

National consensus can be achieved but the President and his associates must be open to it, Donahue said. "It is a way which cannot be walked by ideologues. For our part, as a trade union movement, we continue to be available for such a serious effort to bring business, government, and labor together."

Donahue reiterated the AFL-CIO's long-standing belief that only a nationally coordinated industrial policy can help the nation's factories survive and grow.

"To deal directly with the nation's many concrete and visible problems," he said, "we have urged the creation of a tripartite national reindustrialization board—including representatives of labor, business, and the government—which would develop a balanced program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities while at the same time encouraging the development of new industries with promise for the future."

The board would also provide policy and priority guidance for the activities of a financing agency patterned after the Reconstruction Finance Corp. of the 1930s and 1940s. This agency would be authorized to make and guarantee loans for approved reindustrialization ventures. In addition, private pension funds could be encouraged to invest in ventures to support and expand industrial employment.

Such a national industrial policy, Donahue suggested, "would force the development of a sensible and sustained education policy designed to feed into those industries the trained engineers, scientists, technologists, and others who would be required, and would also force the development of a trade policy somewhat more sophisticated than that which can ever be achieved under the simplistic rubric of free trade in a world in which it doesn't exist."

NLRB covers toteboards at horse tracks

The National Labor Relations Board, in a 3 to 2 decision, asserted its jurisdiction over employees of the American Totalisator Co., a Towson, Md., firm that makes and maintains parimutuel betting equipment used at racetracks throughout the United States and Canada.

The majority ruling represents a reversal of the board's policy regarding the company. In a 1979 decision involving the manufacturer and the New York Racing Association, the agency declined to amend its rules and regulations which historically have excluded the horse racing industry from its purview.

The majority stressed that American Totalisator "maintains its operation as an independent entity with its own employees who are hired, supervised, assigned, and transferred without any input from the owners of the racetracks," and that its operations are not an integral part of the racing industry.

Different group

The company's 445 shop and field employees involved in the case, therefore, "are outside the category of employees contemplated" by the board's exclusion of horseracing the NLRB majority observed. Members John H. Fanning, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Don A. Zimmerman joined in the opinion.

Dissenting were Chairman John R. Van de Water and Member Robert P. Hunter, who held that the company's operations are an integral part of horse racing.

The ruling stems from unfair practice charges filed with the NLRB by Local 1501 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which has bargained collectively with the company since 1946. The firm has recognized the union over the years even though it took the position that it was not within NLRB jurisdiction.

Following a 12-day strike in March 1980, the union filed charges accusing the company of violating the rights of three workers who were on sick leave at the time of the walkout. The company, which had refused to pay sick benefits to the workers, also sent a letter to all employees urging them to ratify management's proposal for a new agreement and declaring that it would refuse to bargain further.

Job-stimulus needs shape lame-duck Congress agenda freedom from regulation for businesses locating in depressed city areas.

There was a general belief, however, that the Administration will end up supporting a plan being pushed by Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis and a number of Senate Republicans for an additional gasoline tax to finance badly needed highway repairs. White House aides now refer to the proposal for a higher gasoline tax as a "user fee" instead of a tax increase, which would be counter to Reagan's supply-side economic theories.

Reuss has proposed that an economic recovery program be financed largely by limiting the 10 percent income tax reduction scheduled for next July to a maximum of $700 per return—affecting only high-income households that have already benefitted most from earlier stages of the tax cut. He also advocated holding the projected 7 percent annual rise in constant-dollar defense spending to a 5-percent rate.

In sharp contrast, President Reagan said the Administration is considering advancing the tax cut to the start of the year in another gamble on supply-side economic theories.

In the wake of the election, congressional Republicans have been going public with complaints that the Administration's inaction in the face of rising unemployment led to the GOP defeats and near-defeats.

A Republican governor's conference turned into a gripe session against Reagan policies that were blamed in large part for the net loss of seven statehouses in the election.

And at a meeting called by the U.S. Conference of Mayors, there was bipartisan accord for a jobs program to repair the infrastructure, housing assistance and emergency aid for the unemployed.

House and Senate Democratic leaders, while welcoming the Reuss proposals, made clear that other measures would also be considered and that the agenda for both the lame duck session and the new Congress is still being formulated. There was accord that the first emphasis would be on a public works package.

"The important thing is to get started on the highway, bridges, sewage systems and public structures that are ready to go," Reuss said.

"We hope to put hundreds of thousands of Americans to work doing useful things," he declared.

Cement Workers move headquarters offices

The Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers have moved the union's headquarters offices to 2500 Brickvale Drive, Elk Grove Village, Ill. 60007. The new telephone number is 312-595-5171.

The union's offices were previously in Chicago.

Any more 'good' news?

There's a cracked crystal ball over at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

It's the one the Chamber's chief economist, Dr. Richard W. Rahn, used last year after the nation's jobless rate had climbed to 7.5 percent, pushing unemployment close to the 8 million mark.

Not to worry, Rahn insisted in a press release issued on Oct. 2, 1981:

"The U.S. Chamber's latest forecast indicates that as a result of the enactment of the Administration's economic program, the unemployment rate will start to decline" early in 1982, dropping below 7 percent by year's end.

Rahn is still the Chamber's chief economist. But the jobless rate at latest count was 10.4 percent and the Reagan Administration's economic program has pushed unemployment to 11.6 million.

Union-busting federal style

A protest over the firing of Carmen Delle Donne, president of the American Federation of Government Employees local at the National Archives in Washington, drew hundreds of demonstrators to the Archives steps. Delle Donne was sacked after a heated bargaining table exchange over a management takeaway proposal, and AFGE charges it was union-busting. From left are AFGE Sec.-Treas. Nicholas Nolan, Vice President Donald MacIntyre, Women's Dept. Director Barbara Hutchinson and Delle Donne. (Story, Page 4.)

Bipartisan accord in Congress spurs highway jobs plan

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO welcomed a bipartisan accord on a job-creating program for repair of roads and bridges, but stressed the need for Congress to follow through with other ingredients of an economic recovery legislative package.

Legislative Director Ray Denison said highway rehabilitation should be coupled with a broader program of public works and public service jobs, measures to revitalize the housing industry and a domestic content requirement for automobiles sold in the United States.

Denison termed the groundswell of support for the highway program a recognition that "putting people to work is the single most important issue facing the country."

It is expected to provide more than 300,000 jobs but Reagan, in a belated endorsement of the program, insisted he was supporting it only because roads are in such disrepair.

Reagan had resisted the program, which had been pressed by Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis. The White House announcement of presidential support came after House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) and Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) said they would push the legislation in the lame-duck session of Congress that convenes Nov. 29 whether or not it has the President's endorsement.

Higher gas tax

The proposal expected to be presented to Congress calls for a five-cents-a-gallon increase in the federal gasoline tax to fund the program, with four cents earmarked for highway-related projects and one cent for mass transit equipment.

Denison said the AFL-CIO is still weighing the merits of financing the program through a higher gasoline tax, "but feels the program must move forward immediately because unemployment is still increasing."

He termed the measure "a down payment for what should be a comprehensive anti-recession program."

Baker and O'Neill told the White House bluntly that Congress doesn't want an income tax cut scheduled for next July advanced to Jan. 1, 1983—as has been urged by some of the Reagan Administration's supply-side ideologues.

An accelerated tax reduction would push up a recession-inflated federal budget deficit, and Baker said he doubted if it would pass either the Republican-controlled Senate or the Democratic House.

Reagan told reporters at the White House that he is still considering an accelerated tax cut proposal.

Agendas differ

Baker and O'Neill parted company, however, on an agenda for other anti-recession measures for the lame-duck session, which is expected to run until mid-December.

O'Neill indicated he will also seek House approval of a broader jobs bill, housing subsidy legislation and a domestic content measure.

He will work with Baker wherever possible, he said. "Our first priority must be to put the millions of unemployed back to work," and "both parties must work together" to meet that goal, O'Neill said.

Senate urged to reject new nominee for NLRB

National Labor Relations Board Chairman John R. Van de Water will leave office Dec. 16 after having failed to win Senate confirmation, but President Reagan has nominated another management lawyer to succeed him.

The AFL-CIO opposed Van de Water's confirmation and will also urge the Senate to reject the new nominee, Assistant Sec. of Labor Donald Dotson.

Dotson joined the Reagan Administration after serving as a management labor relations lawyer for a string of industrial firms, and the AFL-CIO's view is that he lacks the neutrality expected of an NLRB member, and especially its chairman.

Anti-worker record

"The NLRB and its chairman are charged with enforcing the nation's basic federal labor law for protection of workers' rights," the AFL-CIO pointed out. But Dotson's record, both before and since joining the Reagan Administration, "is simply not the record of a person who believes in protecting workers," the federation said.

Dotson was nominated for a full five-year term, to replace John Fanning, a former NLRB chairman whose term on the board expires Dec. 16.

To fill out Van de Water's term, running to Aug. 27, 1986, Reagan nominated Patricia Diaz Dennis, an attorney with the American Broadcasting Co. She would be the only Democrat on the NLRB, serving with three Republicans and one independent.

The White House announced that Van de Water will move to the Labor Dept. after his resignation from the NLRB takes effect to serve as special assistant to Sec. of Labor Raymond Donovan. John C. Miller, who served as chief counsel on Van de Water's staff, has been named to a five-year term as general counsel of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, which has functions in the federal civil service that are comparable to those of the NLRB.

Van de Water headed his own management consulting firm before his appointment to the NLRB—advising on campaigns to defeat union organizing efforts.

Economy shows zero growth rate for third quarter

Economic growth ground to a standstill in the third quarter as the Reagan Recession continued to take its toll.

Largely because U.S. foreign trade and retail sales were weaker than expected, "real" gross national product remained unchanged between July and September, the Commerce Dept. said in releasing a revised estimate of economic output during the period. Furthermore, the department said, real GNP is unlikely to expand in the current quarter.

Separately, the department reported that new orders to the nation's factories for durable goods—another closely watched indicator—declined 4.9 percent in October. It was the largest monthly decline since last Octoer, when orders fell 8.6 percent.

5th straight month

Paycheck buying power drops

By James M. Shevis

The buying power of the average American worker's paycheck continued to fall in October, down five-tenths of 1 percent, as reduced workweeks and higher prices cut into "real" earnings.

The drop in real, or inflated-adjusted, earnings was the fifth straight monthly decline and continued a deepening trend. The decline was four-tenths of 1 percent in September, two-tenths of 1 percent in August, and one-tenth of 1 percent in July.

Over the year, real earnings were down by 1.3 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics attributed the October decline to a drop of three-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours of work and a five-tenths of 1 percent increase in consumer prices over the month.

While gross weekly earnings of production and nonsupervisory workers in the private sector averaged $268.93 in October, this represented only $166.11 in constant (1977) dollars.

The latest jump in retail prices lifted the government's consumer price index to 294.1 percent of its 1967 level, which meant that goods and services costing $100 fifteen years ago now cost $294.10. The CPI last month was 5 percent higher than it was 12 months ago.

Housing costs rise

Higher rent and home fuel costs were largely responsible for the October acceleration in consumer prices, BLS said. While mortgage interest rates fell 2.3 percent, the decline was offset by a rise of nine-tenths of 1 percent in rents and sharp increases for home fuels and utilities, which as a group rose 1.5 percent.

Within the home fuel category, piped gas rose 3.6 percent, reflecting the continuing effects of natural gas decontrol, and home fuel oil rose 1.9 percent.

Further price increases for transportation, entertainment, and other goods and services also contributed to the October upturn in the CPI. These increases were partially offset by smaller increases for food and beverages and apparel and upkeep.

A seven-tenths of 1 percent increase for medical care was somewhat less than the average monthly increase during the first nine months of the year, BLS said. Medical care costs have been one of the fastest-rising components of the CPI, and are now 10.7 percent higher than a year ago.

Slow growth afflicts world economy

Reston, Va.—The AFL-CIO's chief economist warned in a speech here that the outlook for the world economy—unduly influenced by monetarist policies—is "distressing."

"After two years of recession, and with only minimal growth anticipated at best, no country is undertaking major traditional job-creating programs," Rudy Oswald, director of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research, told the American-German Economic Conference.

"Rather, the major nations continue to concentrate on anti-inflation policies rather than anti-recession programs. The AFL-CIO does not believe this will work at home or abroad."

Broad representation

The economic conference, sponsored by the Friedrich Ebert Foundation of West Germany, drew some 150 high-ranking representatives of government, banking, industry, trade unions, and the press from both the United States and Germany. Held annually, it deals with various aspects of transatlantic relations.

If the global economy is to revive, Oswald said, contractionary policies must be rejected both in the United States and among both advanced and developing nations. Policies that cling to monetarism, budget cuts hurting the poor and tax cuts skewed toward the wealthy must be reversed, he said.

"It is time to abandon these misguided economic experiments in voodoo monetarism and to undertake programs to revive the economies in the United States and elsewhere," Oswald declared. "If free nations persist in their refusal to change course, one can expect continued economic stagnation in both the United States and the rest of the world."

With millions of people out of work, Oswald said, policies must be implemented to create jobs and generate economic growth instead of unemployment and slow economic growth.

Lesson ignored

In the United States, the Reagan Administration's economic program has ignored what Oswald called a fundamental lesson of the post-World War II period: i.e., that recovery can best be achieved through the active role of the government. Instead, the Administration has based its strategy on the notion that unfettered free markets will somehow turn the economy around without any governmental push.

The Reagan program—based on the four pillars of tax cuts favoring business and the wealthy, budget cuts primarily affecting social and job programs, fewer workplace regulations, and high-interest rates—has had the reverse effect from that predicted by the President 21 months ago, Oswald pointed out.

Citing Reagan's message to Congress on Feb. 18, 1981, accompanying the Administration's economic programs — including promise of 13 million new jobs if the measures were enacted—Oswald noted that since the beginning of the Reagan Recession in July 1981 employment has fallen by 2.4 million.

"Unemployment is now at 10.4 percent, and the number of people unemployed is the highest since the trough of the depression five decades ago," he said. "Business activity has plummeted (and) the number of bankruptcies is at its highest level since the 1930s."

With over 30 percent of industrial capacity lying unused, it is not surprising that the Administration's investment incentives have proven futile, Oswald observed. In addition, while interest rates have declined from their staggering levels of a few months ago, they still remain high, particularly when adjusted for inflation. As a result, other interest-sensitive sectors, especially housing and autos, remain sluggish, he said.

Similar weakness plagues the economies of other nations, Oswald said. More than 30 million people are unemployed in the industrial countries, and the number is expected to grow.

The "foolhardy" monetarist approach to economic problems exists in many places throughout the world and is accepted by far too many policymakers as the proper solution, he observed. He cited the International Monetary Fund's approach which, in its main thrust toward containing and abating inflation, appears to be a mirror image of the Reagan Administration's own "ill-founded" policies.

Worldwide impact

"To the extent that the IMF has been able to influence policymakers to adopt these measures, they have added to the worldwide spread of recession," he said. "The failure of Reaganomics in the United States is obvious. Why the IMF would embrace these failed policies is less clear."

Like the United States, some countries —notably Chile and the United Kingdom— have voluntarily adopted the monetarist approach and, like the United States, are now paying for it in the form of weak economies and high unemployment, Oswald pointed out. Many of these countries are being run by the "Chicago Boys," so called because they received their training at the University of Chicago under conservative economist Milton Friedman.

Pump-priming needs

While the British and the other "Chicago Boys" of the Western world reject government pump-priming at home, many are willing to extend credits to the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries to stimulate their communist economies, he noted.

In the United States, the Administration does not have to wait in vain for market forces to unleash themselves and bring the nation out of the recession, he said. Instead, a pump-priming program can be used to generate jobs and stimulate the economy.

Oswald pointed out that the AFL-CIO has proposed a clear alternative to the Administration's programs. He noted that labor's plan sets the restoration of full employment and economic growth as priority goals and includes job-generating public works and public service programs, the channeling of money and credit toward productive investment, the introduction of a new reindustrialization policy, tax reform, and the sustainment of social programs protecting the elderly.

New home port

The Seafarers International Union has moved its headquarters from Brooklyn, N.Y., to a newly built facility near Washington, D.C. All of the union's activities have been transferred to the new building at 5201 Auth Way & Britannia Way, Camp Springs, Md., 20023; telephone (301) 899-0675. The union plans a dedication ceremony when the building is in full operation.

Woodworkers' new accord links wages to productivity

Portland, Ore.—The Woodworkers have reached an innovative agreement with Crown Zellerbach Co., that links wages to productivity and involves union members in company decision-making.

While the new pact covers only about 500 loggers employed by Crown Zellerbach, it will be watched closely for possible trend-setting implications.

"Everyone will be watching it to see how it will work. A few years down the road it may have an effect," said John Ball, secretary-treasurer of the Woodworkers' Western Regional Council 3. Ball said he doubted that the new agreement would affect present negotiations between the union and other major wood products firms. The Crown Zellerbach agreement is the first of several pacts to be negotiated in the industry to replace contracts that expire next June.

Replacement rates

The Crown Zellerbach settlement, concluded more than six months before the current contract is scheduled to expire, will replace hourly pay rates with a new "pay for production" system in which the company will establish a labor price for each activity or combination of activities in dollars per unit of production. In effect, loggers, who now earn an average of $12 to $13 an hour, will work as if they were contractors.

Under the agreement, which takes effect June 1, 1983, the company will continue to provide certain industrywide benefits and equipment.

Joint operations committees will be formed at each of the company's six work sites in Oregon and Washington. Each committee will include eight members, four from the company and four from the union. These panels will constitute the "core leadership" of the firm's logging operations.

Joint committees

"The local joint operations committees will be making the substantive decisions to enable the company to be more productive, more cost effective, a tough competitor, and an excellent performer in the industry," a company statement observed.

The company also said the new arrangement will replace the "more rigid" vacation and holiday schedules that are now in effect.

Moreover, "since the new agreement will result in sharing of production and support activity earnings rather than individual hourly rates, there will be no classification or craft lines, and employees will perform whatever work is required to maintain a safe and productive operation," the company statement said.

The union's western membership has been hard hit by the slump in wood products demand, with one-third of the members unemployed on the average this past year. Its western council represents a total of 25,000 woodworkers in eight states.

Pension fund loans explored to revive faltering industries

Montreal—The use of pension funds by unions to assist ailing industries that employ their members was advocated by Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers. Sheinkman called this a "logical next step" in the labor movement's evolving role in pension fund management.

Speaking before a meeting of the International Foundation of Employee Benefit Plans, Sheinkman observed that such investments would require federal legislation to provide guarantees by an appropriate agency of the government.

"Such loans," he said, would "then be prudent under the standards of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA) and the welfare of the pension fund beneficiaries could not be jeopardized.

Sheinkman, who chaired a study on pension fund investments for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., pointed out that the United States has, at various times, determined that the health of an industry or industries justified the use of federal guarantees or insurance.

"The housing industry still benefits from the Federal Housing Administration insurance of mortgage loans, and a significant amount of American industry has for many years received direct or indirect assistance from federal and state governments designed to assure its survival and ability to compete," he said.

He said legislation providing for loan guarantees should establish a federal agency like the Federal Housing Administration to determine which employers merit this type of financing. The enabling legislation should also amend ERISA to authorize the Labor Dept. to simplify exemptions for loans to employers that qualify for the federal agency guarantee.

AFL-CIO issues guide on student aid

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has published its 1983 Guide to Union-Sponsored Scholarships, Awards and Student Financial Aid to help union members and their families find ways to cover the costs of college and other post-secondary education.

Education Director Dorothy Shields said the guide may be especially valuable now in "the first full school year the Reagan Administration budegt cuts and tighter eligibility restrictions have been in effect, cutting every major federal aid program for college students."

Nearly 2,000 scholarships totalling more than $2,225,000 are listed, Shields said. Financial aid programs listed cover college and graduate schools as well as vocational, technical and nursing schools.

The scholarships are offered by AFL-CIO national and international unions, local unions and AFL-CIO state and local central labor bodies. An additional section in the guide provides other sources of information on how to pay for college.

Copies are being mailed to national and international unions and central labor bodies, and single copies are free to union members. Libraries and other institutions can get copies for $3 each from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

NFL players postpone vote on settlement

A dispute over contract language held up a vote by members of the National Football League Players Association on a five-year contract that includes higher salary minimums, establishment of a severance pay system and $60 million in bonuses this year.

While negotiators and lawyers for both sides went over the contract clause by clause, the 28 NFL teams returned to action, resuming a season that was two games old when the 57-day strike began.

Vote options

The union's executive director, Ed Garvey, said the ratification vote is now scheduled for Dec. 3, and will allow the 1,500 union members three options.

They can vote to accept the contract, to reject the contract and resume the strike, or to reject the contract without resumption of the strike.

Garvey told reporters that he did not expect the strike to be resumed. The union's goal in the careful scrutiny of each contract clause, he said, has been to assure that the NFL club owners "do not win anything in drafting that they did not win at the bargaining table."

Player representatives—elected by each of the teams in the league—have been meeting frequently on the contract issues and keeping their teammates up to date on the situation.

They are scheduled to consider the final contract language on Nov. 30 and vote on a recommendation to the players.

While there has been agreement between the two sides on the bulk of the contract language, some thorny issues had still not been resolved as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Hearing reset

Further action on unfair labor practice charges against the owners awaited final agreement on the contract language, the union said. A hearing before a National Labor Relations Board administrative law judge, originally set for Nov. 29 in New York, was postponed a week.

The NLRB general counsel earlier issued a formal complaint backing up the union's charges that the club owners violated federal labor law by refusing to provide the NFLPA with information essential to bargaining, changing working conditions unilaterally, coercing players and attempting to bypass the union by dealing directly with the players.

Despite the continuing contract disagreement, the resumption of league play on Nov. 21 appeared little affected by the long layoff. Attendance in some parks was less than usual but television audiences generally were higher.

Tribute to a labor martyr

Members of a joint mission of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT) looking into the trade-union situation in Central America attended a wreath-laying ceremony honoring slain Nicaraguan labor leader Luis Medrano in Managua. Medrano was murdered by Somozan forces in 1979. The ICFTU-ORIT mission visited El Salvador and Costa Rica as well as Nicaragua. Representing the AFL-CIO were Federation Vice President Frank Drozak, head of the Seafarers, and William C. Doherty, Jr., executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. Other members of the mission were from Canada, Italy, Costa Rica, and Nicaragua.

South Carolina unions press recovery from Reaganomics

Myrtle Beach, S.C.—Fresh on the heels of an impressive string of gains in the Nov. 2 elections, delegates to the South Carolina AFL-CIO convention drafted an agenda to sustain the drive to cure the "economic illness of Reaganomics."

President Randy Kiser cited the near-sweep of COPE-endorsed candidates in congressional and general assembly contests as a "clear call for lower interest rates, realistic job creation, bolstering the social security system and updating the state's unemployment compensation protections."

He termed the essential social programs "the last line of hope for thousands of South Carolina families hit by the worst unemployment since depression days."

High victory rate

Kiser noted that 19 of 22 labor-endorsed candidates for the state legislature were elected, as were three of the five endorsed congressional candidates.

AFL-CIO Regional Director James Sala urged the 300 delegates to keep the momentum of Nov. 2 running in both the state house in Columbia and in Congress. "Stay after these people you elected. . . . Show them you're ready to work with them and that you expect them to stay with you—and with the working people of America," Sala urged.

Congressman-elect Robin Tallon thanked the convention delegates for "the tremendous effort of the South Carolina AFL-CIO and union volunteers" that was a key factor in his upset win over incumbent Republican John Napier. Tallon said he expects to work closely with state and national union leaders, especially in areas and issues that affect working families.

Priorities outlined

House of Delegates Speaker Raymond Swartz (D) and State Rep. McKinley Washington (D) told the convention that the upcoming General Assembly session "has to face up to the reality that South Carolina is no longer insulated from the sickness in the national economy." Statewide unemployment now stands at 10.7 percent. They put high priority on jobs and job training, human services, workplace safety, job security, workers' compensation and "other solid investments in the human potential of South Carolina."

The delegates adopted a series of policy resolutions on state and national issues. These included support for amendments to ease the state's Sunday business laws, opposition to the business community's attack on the state's workers' compensation system, support for the elimination of the waiting period for unemployment benefits, rejection of attempts to "cripple" the public school system with such schemes as tuition tax credits, and support for the Coastline Disaster Project, a joint venture of the AFL-CIO and the American Red Cross.

Workshop sessions

Also highlighting the convention were workshops on national legislative issues conducted by Assistant Director Jacqueline Kienzle of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, and on trends in arbitration law, conducted by State AFL-CIO counsel James Bell.

Among other major convention speakers were Bruce Thrasher, director of Steelworkers District 35; Vice President Nick Bonanno of the Ladies' Garment Workers; Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; COPE VIP Director Fannie Neal; E. T. Kehrer, southern area director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; George Kiser of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, and State Labor Commissioner Ed McGowan.

Building trades, contractors map promotion effort

A national agreement to promote union construction and make it more competitive has been signed by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the National Construction Employers Council.

The terms of the "Market Recovery Program for Union Construction" call for establishment of local joint labor management committees to increase cooperation between local unions and contractors to "build on mutual interests" and increase the share of union construction.

The agreement was signed by BCTD President Robert A. Georgine and NCEC President James R. Baxter.

In a joint statement, Georgine and Baxter said the success of the agreement depends on the ability of local unions and employers to set up "realistic" programs.

National organizations can plan, endorse and promote the plan, the statement said, but "local acceptance and wholehearted support are absolutely necessary."

Program review

Representatives of each building trades craft and of the contractors will meet in mid-December in Washington to review existing construction promotion programs and discuss start-up of the local committee efforts.

Under the terms of the agreement, the local committees will work under principles that stress the availability of highly skilled craftsmen, the importance of mutual efforts to improve productivity, the value of increased competitiveness in bringing in more jobs, elimination of non-essential work rules, the use of up-to-date tools and equipment and the need to let the public, and users of construction, know that union labor and management are working on improved productivity.

Priorities for the local committees will include developing "an atmosphere of cooperation and trust" in the industry, an emphasis on pride in workmanship and written objectives and timetables.

The agreement suggests that local committees set up task forces to study the open shop problem, non-productive work practices or rules, the local employment picture, the collective bargaining process and the need for a public relations campaign to promote union construction.

The task force reports can then become the basis for taking specific actions, the agreement suggests.

Visiting editors

German labor editors visiting the United States under the auspices of the John J. McCloy Fellowship meet with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. They are, left, Hermann A. Grontzki, editor of Angestellten Magazin, published by the Deutsche Gewerkschaftsbund for white-collar workers, and Heinz Esslinger, editor of the Gewerkschaftspost of the German Chemical, Paper & Ceramic Workers. The fellowships, an exchange program for U.S. and German trade unionists, were established by a gift from the German government.

Food unions demand probe of grain blasts

The AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. has called for an immediate federal investigation to determine the cause of a Nov. 16 grain elevator explosion at Raymond, Neb., that killed four workers and critically injured three others.

FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant said that neither the Dept. of Agriculture nor the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has conducted an on-site investigation into the cause of grain elevator explosions that have occurred during the past two years, even though Congress appropriated funds in the last fiscal year specifically for this purpose.

According to an FBTD study, 18 workers died and 110 were injured in 31 grain industry explosions in 1981 and 1982.

Because OSHA has yet to develop a grain dust standard to eliminate grain industry hazards, Harbrant observed, inspectors can only look for violations of routine regulations under the general duty clause of the federal job safety law.

Causes undetermined

For this reason, he said, the direct causes of grain explosions are not determined.

"The only means of preventing these explosions is to determine their cause," Harbrant stressed.

The AFL-CIO and several unions, including the Grain Millers and Government Employees, have been pressing OSHA to develop an effective grain dust standard.

In congressional hearings earlier this year, union witnesses urged the government to heed the recommendations of a National Academy of Sciences task force that stressed urgency in the development of a standard. The NAS study found that techniques are readily available and economically feasible to prevent grain elevator explosions.

For distinguished service

Economist Leon Keyserling, whose public service dates to the New Deal era, was honored at a trade union celebration of the 100th birthday anniversary of Fiorello LaGuardia, New York's famed mayor and Norris-LaGuardia Act sponsor. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presented a plaque.

Government workers protest federal union-busting tactics

An effort to strip 4,000 employees of the Environmental Protection Agency of union representation and an attempt to fire the president of a union local at the National Archives were linked by the American Federation of Government Employees to the Reagan Administration's anti-union tilt.

The decertification bid by the EPA was thwarted by the Federal Labor Relations Authority, whose New York regional office dismissed management charges against the AFGE as "without merit."

AFGE Executive Vice President John N. Sturdivant said he was "baffled" by the heavy-handed attempt by the Environmental Protection Agency to get the union decertified. He termed "absurd and completely unfounded" the agency's charge that an item in a newsletter put out by AFGE's council of EPA locals amounted to condoning a job action against the government. The newsletter item for which the agency wanted the AFGE decertified indicated that workers had the right to a union representative's presence during an evaluation of their work performance.

Sturdivant termed the episode part of "a pattern of harassment around the country."

The National Archives episode which led to a protest rally by Washington area AFGE locals on the steps of the archives building, stemmed from a bargaining table argument in which some hot words were exchanged and tempers frayed.

The dispute was over what the union viewed as management's attempt to narrow the scope of a "maxiflex" working time agreement it had negotiated.

Management's response to the episode was to attempt to fire Carmen Delle Donne, president of AFGE Local 2578 and its chief negotiator. He is accused of disorderly conduct, the union said. A management claim of destruction of government property apparently stems from the fact that a plastic "in-box" was broken when Delle Donne knocked it off a desk in the heat of argument.

Management reprisals

The union has taken the case to expedited arbitration, and AFGE Vice President Donald MacIntyre, who heads the Washington area region, said there has been an "epidemic of anti-union reprisals" by agency managements. He said a panel of local AFGE officials is preparing a document on "union-ubsting actions."

Speakers at the rally cited the Administration's destruction of PATCO, the union of the air traffic controllers, and the government workers responded with a chant, "No more PATCOs."

SEIU gains 'partial victory' on social security pullouts

The Service Employees won what President John J. Sweeney termed "a partial victory" in the union's effort to compel the Internal Revenue Service to provide a list of non-profit hospitals that have filed a notice of intent to withdraw from the social security system.

Social security coverage is optional for non-profit institutions, although compulsory for other employers. But once coverage is chosen, a non-profit employer must retain coverage at least eight years and then must file a two-year advance notice of intent to withdraw from coverage. But it is not required to inform employees when it files the notice.

The SEIU found out from the Social Security Administration that 930 non-profit employers, with an estimated 375,000 workers, have filed withdrawal notices over the past two years. But the IRS wouldn't tell the union who they were.

After the SEIU filed a Freedom of Information Act suit in federal court, the IRS said it would tell an individual employee on request whether his or her employer had filed a notice of intent to withdraw from social security. But it contended that the union, as a "third party," had no right to the information.

U.S. District Judge Norma Johnson disagreed—in part. She said that if the SEIU or any other employee organization submitted a list of institutions where it represents workers, the IRS would be obligated to reveal which employers on the list had withdrawn applications pending.

Sweeney said the union is considering whether to appeal the denial of information about non-organized institutions.

Meanwhile, he said the SEIU will press for congressional action to "freeze" all social security withdrawals, pending congressional action on the recommendations of the National Commission on Social Security Reform, due in December.

Bargaining order pressed

The SEIU also has been seeking National Labor Relations Board and court action to compel institutions with collective bargaining relationships to bargain over the issue of social security coverage rather than proceed unilaterally.

District 1199, the health care division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, joined the SEIU in its motion for summary judgment in the Freedom of Information Act suit. It also represents a large group of health care workers whose social security coverage is threatened.

Hospitals and nursing homes seeking to cut costs have been looking at the potential savings from elimination of the social security tax they pay on the wages of their employees, with possible substitution of a lower-cost private pension system that would provide less protection for workers than social security.

William Baldwin dies, former AFTRA leader

Los Angeles—William Baldwin, president of the Television & Radio Artists during the early 1970s, died of cancer Nov. 17. He was 69.

Baldwin was a three-term president of AFTRA in the period 1970-73. He was a long-time member of the union's board of directors and also served it as a vice president. His career in radio, films and television spanned more than 35 years as an actor, narrator, announcer and sportscaster.

Survivors include his wife Enid, a son and a daughter.

Sioux Falls association affiliates with AFSCME

Sioux Falls, S.D. — The 340-member Municipal Employees Association here voted to affiliate with the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The group, which bargains for nonuniformed Sioux Falls city workers, will be chartered as a local of AFSCME Council 59, which represents 1,800 state and local government employees in South Dakota.

Jobless rates in 49 states up over year

Unemployment rates increased in all states except Alaska between September 1981 and September 1982, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In 17 states and the District of Columbia, jobless rates soared above 10 percent. The rates are not seasonally adjusted for labor force fluctuations.

Over the 12-month period, the unadjusted national jobless rate rose 2.4 percentage points, from 7.3 to 9.7 percent, BLS said. On a seasonally adjusted basis, national unemployment increased from 10.1 percent in September to 10.4 percent in October.

Michigan continued to have the highest jobless rate, 14.5 percent, followed by Alabama, 14.3 percent, and West Virginia, 14 percent. At the other end of the spectrum, six states—North and South Dakota, Wyoming, Nebraska, Vermont, and Oklahoma—reported rates of less than 6 percent.

Even among the states with relatively low jobless rates, however, September levels were generally 1 to 2 percentage points higher than a year earlier, BLS said.

"The largest over-the-year increase occurred in West Virginia—5.6 percentage points—as employment declined in all industry divisions, especially in mining, construction, and manufacturing," the report said.

Double-digit areas

Jurisdictions with jobless rates of 10 percent or more in September were Alabama, 14.3 percent; Arizona, 10.7 percent; District of Columbia, 10.7 percent; Illinois, 12.1 percent; Indiana, 11.4 percent; Kentucky, 10.6 percent; Louisiana, 10.6 percent; Michigan, 14.5 percent; Mississippi, 12.2 percent; Nevada, 10.4 percent; Ohio, 12.3 percent; Oregon, 10 percent; Pennsylvania, 10.9 percent; South Carolina, 10.7 percent; Tennessee, 11.4 percent; Washington, 10.9 percent; West Virginia, 14 percent, and Wisconsin, 10.2 percent.

Among the 215 metropolitan areas for which September 1982 data were available, 92 had jobless rates that equaled or exceeded the national average. The highest rates were recorded for the Youngstown-Warren area in Ohio, 18.7 percent, and Duluth-Superior, Minn., 18.6 percent.

Economy shows zero growth rate for third quarter

Real GNP is the value of the nation's total output of goods and services adjusted for the impact of inflation. Initially, the government estimated that real third-quarter GNP had risen by eight-tenths of 1 percent. The revised estimate put the growth rate for the quarter at zero. The economy grew at an annual rate of 2.1 percent in the second quarter, after declining 5.1 percent in the first three months of 1982 and 5.3 percent in the final quarter of 1981.

Commerce Under Sec. Robert Dederick told a news conference that net exports "dropped very sharply—$10 billion," and said "that was the big drag on the quarter."

"The fourth quarter will be up only modestly at best, which means it could be down," he said. Dederick predicted that growth in the first half of 1983 would be "relatively subdued by past post-recession standards, but the second half will be somewhat closer to the norm."

Real gross national product—in 1972 inflation-adjusted dollars—was at an annualized level of $1.478 trillion in the third quarter, the same as in the second quarter after adjustment for routine seasonal trends, the Commerce Dept. said in its report.

Steel policy body rejects concessions

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers' main bargaining policy body, the 600-member Basic Steel Industry Conference, voted down a proposed new 45-month agreement that would have cut wages and benefits of workers at eight major steel firms by about 10 percent.

The conference voted 231 to 141 to reject the tentative settlement approved by the union's 30-member executive board. The bargaining policy body consists of the union's local and district leaders.

Rejection of the proposed pact leaves the current agreements with the industry in effect until the July 31, 1983, expiration date. USWA President Lloyd McBride expressed disappointment at the vote and said it would be futile to attempt further negotiations until May, when regular bargaining is slated to begin on a new contract.

It was the second time this year that efforts to reach an early agreement with the industry ended in failure. In July, however, the union leadership had recommended rejection of an industry offer that would have frozen pay.

Immediate pay cuts

Terms of the latest proposal to be turned down called for an immediate pay cut of $2.25 an hour. Of that amount, 75 cents would have been diverted to help fund benefits for laid-off workers. The remaining $1.50 would have been restored to workers in 50-cent increments in August 1983, August 1984, and August 1985.

The rejected agreement also would have tied future cost-of-living increases to restored profitability among the steel makers, struggling through their worst slump in decades. The pact, which would have affected some 270,000 workers, would also have eliminated the industry's extended vacation plan which gives senior employees a 13-week vacation and junior employees an extra five weeks of vacation every five years.

It would also have eliminated one paid holiday, reduced Sunday overtime from time and a half to time and a quarter, and eliminated non-steel making operations from contract coverage.

Company guarantees

In return, the companies would have guaranteed payment of supplemental unemployment benefits to all workers with at least five years of seniority for the next year, regardless of the condition of the industry's SUB funds. Benefits would have ranged from $100 to $200 a week, depending on seniority.

The industry, which is operating at about 40 percent of capacity, had sought concessions from the workers to help cope with severe financial problems. McBride told the conference that two of the steel companies have severe cash-flow problems, and might not be able to continue operations.

The eight firms covered by the bargaining—U.S. Steel, Bethlehem Steel, Jones & Laughlin, Republic, National, Inland, Armco, and Allegheny-Ludlum—negotiate as a unit.

New York demonstrators led by Service Employees President John Sweeney, center, protest Equitable Life Assurance Society's refusal to bargain with claims processing workers in Syracuse.

SEIU demonstrators protest Equitable's anti-union policy

New York—More than 1,000 marchers joined a demonstration organized by the Service Employees outside the headquarters of the Equitable Life Assurance Society here to protest the company's refusal to bargain with the union and its discrimination against women in setting rates for some insurance policies.

Marches were also held at Equitable offices in 40 other cities by SEIU's office workers' division, District 925, to dramatize the company's refusal to bargain for a first contract with claims processors in its Syracuse, N.Y., group benefits office. SEIU won an election there early in 1982, overcoming the company's anti-union campaign abetted by a union-busting consultant.

Rate policy protested

Leaflets distributed by the protestors also denounced the insurance industry's practice of setting higher rates for women for health, disability, pension and other coverage.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney said the company "has long postured as a caring, people-oriented, organization, a leader in corporate social responsibility and a friend of women and minorities."

But Equitable is being "particularly hypocritical," Sweeney charged, in its treatment of the workers in Syracuse "who are symbolic of the vast majority of women employed in traditional women's jobs by the company."

Sweeney said the union has also asked the company to sign a "non-discrimination agreement" which calls for Equitable to remain neutral in representation elections, stop hiring union-busting consultants, reexamine its policies toward women employees, recognize and bargain with unions certified by the National Labor Relations Board, and drop any rate schedules that discriminate against women.

The Syracuse claims processors, who earn an average of $4.50 an hour, contacted District 925 during the summer of 1981.

The union won an election last February and was certified as bargaining agent by the NLRB in June after the company's objections were set aside.

Issues in the organizing campaign were low pay, lack of respect from management, arbitrary job classifications and safety and health concerns over the introduction of video display terminals.

Company threats

The Equitable, the nation's third largest insurance company, brought in an outside consultant, subjected the workers to daily meetings, sent letters to their homes and threatened that the office would be closed before the representation election, the SEIU said.

The company has refused to come to the bargaining table even though an NLRB summary judgment issued Oct. 29 denied again all the company's objections and reconfirmed District 925 as bargaining agent, the union asserted.

Labor opposes Reagan's latest choice for NLRB

His nomination was blocked when he could not get a majority in the Senate Labor Committee to send it to the floor, but he has held office since August 1981 under a series of recess appointments made by President Reagan when Congress was not in session.

Another Reagan appointee, Robert P. Hunter, was confirmed by the Senate.

In testimony at Senate hearings last year, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said the federation opposes the appointment of "active partisans" of either labor or management to the NLRB.

Dotson served early in his career as an NLRB attorney. But from 1973 until he joined the Reagan Administration in 1981, Dotson was a labor relations attorney for Westinghouse, Western Electric and, most recently, Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. He is currently assistant secretary of labor for labor-management relations. His executive assistant is a former attorney for the National Right to Work Committee.

Lucy warns WDL on perils of wayward Reagan 'course'

New York—Sec.-Treas. William Lucy of the State, County & Municipal Employees told more than 600 labor and liberal leaders at a Workers Defense League dinner in his honor that the nation cannot "stay the course" set by President Reagan because his course means "going full speed backwards on a ship with no rudder" under "a captain with no compass."

The league honored Lucy with its 1982 David L. Clendenin Award for Distinguished Service to Labor's Rights. The award was presented by the 1981 recipient, President John J. Sweeney of the Service Employees.

Lucy responded with praise of the WDL for its long record of fighting for the rights of defenseless workers and its legal battles in support of organization, especially in the South.

He pointed out that the league's Recruitment & Training Program (RTP) had helped more than 30,000 young minority workers learn marketable skills and that the WDL had fought for fairness in the military justice system and provided counseling for victims of workplace discrimination.

Lucy urged wide support of a WDL campaign opposing the Reagan Administration's activities in behalf of an International Monetary Fund loan to the apartheid regime of South Africa.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee praised Lucy as "a man with an uncommon degree of honor and decency, one hell of a great trade unionist and a man of conviction and courage who was always willing to take a difficult stand and make a tough fight when it became necessary."

Sol C. Chaikin, president of the Ladies' Garment Workers and chairman of the dinner, praised the league for its struggle against slave labor "everywhere in the world" and for its continuing campaigns for workers' rights. He called the award to Lucy particularly appropriate in recognition of his efforts in these areas.

Letter to Reagan

Lucy recalled that he and McEntee had been among 170 labor and civic leaders who had signed an open letter sent to President Reagan late in 1981 by the WDL detailing instances of peonage among migrant and undocumented workers in the United States.

The Reagan Administration did not respond, he said, except to object when the league some months later presented its evidence to a United Nations working group on slavery.

Other speakers at the dinner included WDL President Rowland Watts and Executive Sec. Philip Van Buren; Harry Fleischman, chairman of the WDL executive committee, and Bettye Roberts, president of AFSCME District Council 1707, New York City.

High-tech organizing

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. is testing the use of video as an organizing tool and is showing specially produced films in the homes of workers as well as at union meetings.

IUD President Howard D. Samuel said a prototype 10-minute film, Something Called Dignity, has been developed for use in southern organizing campaigns. It features testimony by workers to the value of unions and refutes arguments used by management and union-busting consultants. It was produced with technical assistance from the National Football League Players Association.

Organizers making house calls are able to show the film on briefcase-sized portable projectors or through hookups with television sets.

The department's future plans, Samuel said, include even more localized films, developed for specific organizing campaigns. The IUD has purchased video production equipment with these goals in mind, he said.

Medicare: prescription or problem?

By Karen Ignagni

This article appeared originally in the issues book for the seventh annual Leadership Conference on Health Policy sponsored by the National Journal. The author, Karen Ignagni, is an assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Late last year Louis Harris & Associates conducted a survey for the National Council on Aging. When senior citizens were asked to name the greatest problems facing the elderly today, 42 percent of the respondents cited health care and its costs. By contrast, only 24 percent named inflation and the high cost of living and only 7 percent mentioned crime.

Clearly the cost of getting sick and the expense of staying well are very much on the minds of our elderly citizens. And this concern is not unwarranted. Elderly people are highly susceptible to chronic conditions such as diabetes, respiratory ailments, heart disease and arthritis. Although the life expectancy of those aged 65 and older has increased in recent years, their health status is not a great deal better than it once was. Despite the sizable financial investment that we have made in the Medicare program, many senior citizens remain unable to afford essential medical treatment.

Protection against cuts

In July of 1965 Congress enacted the Medicare law, Title XVIII of the Social Security Act, to protect the elderly and their families against the high cost of getting sick. At that time an older person's access to health care services was largely dependent on his or her ability to pay, and many believed that the elderly's problems with the medical care system could be solved by removing this financial barrier.

Prior to the passage of Medicare, the elderly were spending approximately 20 percent of their income for health care costs. This burden eased slightly during the early '70s, according to the Dept. of Health & Human Services' Health Care Financing Administration (HCFA), but in recent years has been approaching pre-Medicare levels. Nevertheless, the program's share of total personal health care expenditures for persons aged 65 and over has been steadily increasing and now covers 45 percent of their total health care costs. Since the elderly themselves are not much better off today than they were before the passage of Medicare, it seems appropriate for Congress and the public at large to consider whom, if not the elderly, the program is benefiting and what can be done to make it more responsive to the health care needs of those it was designed to serve.

Medicare shortfall

Most citizens under age 65 believe Medicare will fulfill their health care needs upon retirement. Some even consider Medicare a welfare program for older Americans. Neither view is accurate. Until they reach retirement age most workers receive health care coverage through their employers. Some plans include comprehensive hospital care and major medical insurance. When they leave the workforce, and as they get older and more susceptible to illness, workers find that Medicare falls far short of meeting their health care needs.

Medicare requires a sizable amount of patient cost-sharing, provides no protection against catastrophic illness, and does not cover the services that the elderly most frequently need—preventive services and long-term care, prescription drugs, foot care, dental care and eyeglasses. Under Medicare the sicker you are, the more you pay. Unless they are eligible for Medicaid, many retirees choose to go without essential health care services because they cannot afford the high cost of treatment.

Program goals

The roots of our present problem can be found in the 1965 congressional debate on Medicare. Despite the public emphasis that was given to the prospect of medical costs overwhelming the aged, Congress had another goal in mind in designing the program—that Medicare not interfere with the way the health care system was organized or the way medical services were provided or paid for. Although Congress was willing to make health care more affordable to the aged, it was unwilling to rock the boat where the providers were concerned.

As a result, an important opportunity was missed to use the purchasing power that the government gained through the Medicare program as a lever to improve access to health care services for citizens in underserved areas, to control inflation in the program or to improve the quality of care that beneficiaries were to receive. Ultimately, as a result of the many compromises necessary to get it passed in both Houses of Congress, the program became nothing more than a bill-paying mechanism divided into two parts, which were modeled on existing Blue Cross and private health insurance programs.

The Hospital Insurance Program, Part A of Medicare, is available to persons aged 65 and older eligible for social security cash benefits or railroad retirement benefits; the severely disabled after a lengthy waiting period; victims of end-stage renal disease; and those 65 or over who do not meet these qualifications but pay a monthly premium, which now amounts to $78. Approximately 90 percent of those enrolled in Part A are aged 65 and over. HI is financed by employer and employee payroll taxes. Unlike Medicaid, there is no "means test" to qualify for this program. As long as individuals fulfill the requirements described above, they are eligible for benefits.

Paying deductibles

But the program stops far short of protecting the elderly against the rising cost of inpatient care. Hospital coverage is limited to 90 days per spell of illness. Beneficiaries must pay a $260 hospital deductible (up from $40 when the program began) and $65 per day for the 61st through 90th day of inpatient services. Patients who use the full 90 days of coverage and have no other insurance are presented with a $2,210 hospital bill upon discharge, although they exert little influence over the length of their stay.

As for long-term care, which is one of the most crucial needs of elderly patients, the Medicare program covers only 100 days of skilled care in nursing home facilities per spell of illness. Patients face no cost-sharing obligations in the first 20 days. Thereafter, up to the 100th day maximum, they must pay approximately $35 per day. In addition, Medicare patients who are not Medicaid eligible are sometimes turned away by nursing home administrators who fear the cost of their treatment will be disallowed because it falls short of the law's definition of skilled care.

Limited eligibility

Similarly, in the area of home care, only beneficiaries who are in need of skilled nursing care and home-bound are eligible. Medicare does not cover the elderly who need custodial care, such as assistance with meal preparation or light household chores. Thus, many older Americans who could remain at home frequently end up in nursing facilities, simply because they have no one to tend to their basic needs. Medicare's benefit structure encourages expensive inpatient care because more cost-effective services are not covered.

Nowhere are the structural defects in the Medicare legislation more apparent than in the Supplementary Medical Insurance program. Part B is financed through beneficiary premiums and general revenue contributions. Enrollment is voluntary and open to all seniors and the severely disabled who pay a monthly premium of $12.20 (up from $3 in 1966). To qualify for benefits, enrollees must meet a $60 annual deductible. Unlike reimbursement for inpatient services, where the federal government pays the hospital directly and prevents facilities from billing the patients more, physicians are paid 80 percent of their reasonable and customary charges and have the option of accepting the government rate as payment in full (assignment) or charging patients standard fees.

The structure of the system creates two strong financial incentives. Physicians raise their charges regularly to increase the level that is considered "reasonable and customary" and bill the patient for charges the government does not reimburse. The number of physicians accepting assignment has been declining steadily. Currently fewer than 50 percent of physicians accept Medicare reimbursements as payment in full. This rate is much lower in states like Florida and Arizona, with high concentrations of elderly citizens. Due to the structure of the Part B payment system, Medicare covers only 55 percent of total physician expenditures incurred by the aged and disabled. Most elderly citizens cannot afford the co-insurance required for physician services. Some are even postponing treatment until it warrants hospital care, which is more expensive for the program but may be cheaper for the beneficiary.

Supplemental insurance

It is clear that Medicare has failed to fulfill its original mandate to break the traditional barrier between access to services and ability to pay. As a result, elderly people have been forced in increasing numbers to buy private health insurance to supplement their Medicare coverage. Those who cannot afford this additional insurance often go without hospital and physician services, and both groups find it very difficult to meet the expenses of the many services not covered by Medicare or private insurance. In an effort to meet this gap, according to HCFA, approximately 64 percent of the aged bought private hospital insurance and 43 percent bought surgical insurance in 1979. On the average, the elderly paid $350 per year for private coverage. It is estimated that 9 million of the poorest elderly had no private hospital insurance and 14 million had no private surgical insurance.

The Medicare program has many weaknesses. Nevertheless, it is big business for the federal government. Nearly 29 million people are enrolled and 17 million use services annually. In fiscal year 1980, expenditures for this program amounted to $36.7 billion, up from $4.5 billion in 1967. From FY 1979 to 1980, Medicare expenditures increased 21.4 percent (compared to a 15.2 percent increase in total personal health care spending) and claimed a 41.2 percent share of public funds spent on personal health care. If current trends continue, the program is expected to cost up to $50 billion by the end of this year and, according to OMB, could amount to 80 percent of all federal health care outlays by the middle of the decade.

Hospitalization favored

There would be fewer questions about the worth of such a sizable federal investment if it were adequately meeting the needs of its beneficiaries. In reality, however, Medicare expenditures are skewed towards hospital care. Almost three-quarters of program funds are spent on inpatients services for one-third of the beneficiaries who are hospitalized annually.

Ironically, HHS trend data show that in recent years Medicare's share of total health expenditures for the 65-and-over population has increased. The department has determined that almost two-thirds of the rise in Medicare expenditures since the beginning of the program is due to inflation directly attributable to the structure of the Medicare reimbursement system.

Medicare pays hospital costs after they are incurred and, with the exception of some prospective limitations on routine services, the federal government exerts virtually no control over the program's annual payments to hospitals.

Subsidizing waste

The unwillingness of Congress to make Medicare anything more than an open-ended public insurance program has fueled hospital capital expansion and price inflation. Until the current method of reimbursement is changed, taxpayers will continue to subsidize waste and inefficiency in this program and seniors will be no better off as a result of it.

Many proposals have been advanced to solve the "Medicare problem." Unfortunately, most of the recent suggestions would reduce short-term federal expenditures by either increasing beneficiary cost-sharing or further restricting their financial access to treatment.

For example, in its original version of the first concurrent budget resolution for FY 1983, the Senate Budget Committee recommended that patients be required to pay 6 percent of their per diem costs from the 2nd to the 60th day in the hospital—care that is now fully reimbursed. Under this proposal an elderly person who enters the hospital with a chronic condition would be responsible for the deductible plus $25 for each day of treatment. These payments could eat up one month's benefits for the average social security beneficiary. The Budget Committee also recommended making Medicare the secondary payor for individuals over age 65 who remain in the workforce, increasing the Part B deductible and requiring that beneficiaries pay for part of the cost of their home health care.

In addition, Congress has extended controls on reimbursement of routine hospital costs to ancillary services. These limits will reduce short-term federal expenditures for Medicare, but could create strong incentives for hospitals to turn away beneficiaries who are in need of non-emergency treatment, or shift their costs on to already overburdened employee health insurance plans and state and local governments. Extending the limits would do nothing to control overall hospital inflation. It would also exacerbate the current tendency to shift beneficiaries of government health care programs to public hospitals, which have become the providers of last resort for many old and indigent citizens.

No cost curbs

Congress could circumvent these problems, reduce Medicare inflation and slow the rate of growth in all health care programs by enacting a viable comprehensive cost containment program. Unfortunately, it is unlikely that Congress will select this alternative. Instead it will probably enact further cuts in entitlement programs that penalize beneficiaries for the inefficiencies that are indigenous to the structure of the system.

In fact, the Administration is expected to propose that Congress enact a Medicare voucher plan. Beneficiaries would be given a federal voucher that is equivalent to the per capita cash value of Medicare and told to shop around for health insurance coverage. If they chose a plan that costs less than Medicare, they would be allowed to keep the difference. This would be very attractive to someone on a fixed income. However, less insurance for older Americans will mean earlier death for some and unnecessary suffering for many because they will be unable to afford doctors' visits no longer covered by insurance.

Congress should be considering alternatives to cover all the services the elderly and severely disabled need, making sure they can afford to pay for them and eliminating the red tape associated with the program.

Access still lacking

The problem with Medicare goes far beyond the issue of cost control. Seventeen years after the enactment of Medicare, senior citizens still do not have access to services that the program was designed to provide.

In the long run, the best solution to this problem is the one that organized labor has been advocating for many years: that is, for Congress to enact a universal, comprehensive national health insurance program that reforms the current method of reimbursing hospitals and providers, removes the barrier of beneficiary cost-sharing, provides protection against the cost of catastrophic illness, offers comprehensive benefits, including preventive services, drugs and home care, and encourages the development of HMOs as alternative delivery systems.

Unless Congress is willing to enact reforms along these lines, Medicare expenditures will continue to increase and account for an even greater share of the federal budget, and health care costs will be out of reach for more and more Americans.

Cracked Crystal Balls

MANY YEARS AGO, George Meany suggested that economics was one of the few areas of endeavor where a person could achieve a great reputation without ever being right.

During this year of the Reagan Recession, many economists have been wrong, dangerously wrong, because they have misled the American people into thinking that the contradictory Administration policies would somehow correct themselves and bring the country into a new era of prosperity.

Instead, as every working American knows, the country is in a serious recession which has yet to touch bottom; recovery remains a figment in the minds of only the most optimistic Reagan cheerleaders.

This one fact stands out: there are today more individuals out of work than at any time in our history. At the depth of the Depression in 1933, the jobless toll stood at 12.8 million. Now, by official government count, there are 13.8 million unemployed, including 1.6 million who have given up the hopeless search for jobs.

Still, there are economists like those at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce who continue to sugar-coat the ugly facts. The Chamber says that the current recession falls "somewhere in the middle of terms of severity" for the postwar period.

On that basis, the Chamber draws the conclusion that it would be a "mistake" for Congress to enact an emergency jobs program. "Adequate programs now exist to help those temporarily unemployed," the Chamber concludes.

WE TRUST THAT members of Congress will look back just a year to see the earlier, equally sanguine, equally wrong conclusions of the business lobby. In October 1981, Dr. Richard W. Rahn, the Chamber's chief economist, predicted that because of the enactment of the Reagan economic program, unemployment would fall below 7 percent by the end of 1982.

In February 1982, the same spokesperson said the economy "is on the road to recovery." In July, he announced that "economic recovery is underway . . . the recession ended in early spring."

By October, the Chamber had changed its tune and conceded that double-digit unemployment is "a national tragedy." Still, the Reagan sycophants urged Congress and the country to "stay the course."

The jobless toll has risen to 10.4 percent since then, and the voters of the country have sent a message to Washington: the issue is jobs, and Congress has the power and the duty to attack the problem head-on.

The issue is too important to be left to economists whose crystal balls are cracked, just like their theories.

Tuned-Out Broadcasters

AS AN EXAMPLE of a sour product offered in an attractive package, we call attention to the proposal that radio and television station owners be exempted from conforming to the Federal Communications Commission's "fairness doctrine."

The legal provision requires broadcasters to assure that different points of view on controversial issues be given access to the airwaves. The source of the requirement is the federal authority to issue broadcast licenses.

While it sounds commendable to assure broadcasters the same First Amendment rights for disseminating information that publishers enjoy, the two cases are different. It is possible for individuals or groups to start a newspaper or magazine to challenge the positions that publishers enjoy. That is not possible in broadcasting.

Send out a new radio or television signal on an existing channel and you will go to jail. Each broadcaster has a monopoly and the number of available bands is limited. A traffic cop is needed.

The experience of unions and other liberal organizations with broadcasters is so negative that they understand their rights to access to the public broadcast channels can only be guaranteed by federal regulation. The main advocates for ending the fairness doctrine are well-financed conservative organizations, a signal for liberals to protect the doctrine.

Jobless stripped of aid by Reagan budget slash

By Press Associates, Inc.

Conventional wisdom has it that, as bad as this recession is, at least it's different from the 1930s depression since today's jobless are protected by unemployment insurance. But that's not always so.

In fact, this is the first time since 1935, when the unemployment insurance system was created, in which a majority of the unemployed are receiving no jobless benefits at all. Today, fewer than 42 percent of the jobless are getting benefits and the trend continues to worsen.

By comparison, about two-thirds of those unemployed during the 1974-75 recession were able to collect benefits. Now, as then, many aren't eligible because they newly entered the job market—a category that includes many teenagers and women.

Today's low ratio of beneficiaries is due mostly to cutbacks in the unemployment compensation program which the Reagan Administration rammed through Congress last year as part of its budget cuts.

Recovery flop

Back in the spring of 1981, the Administration told Congress that its "economic recovery program" would reduce unemployment from its then 7.4 percent rate to 7.2 percent in 1982, to 6.6 in 1983, and to 6.4 in 1984. Thus, no need to worry much about cutting the compensation program for the long-term unemployed—right?

Wrong, as is now apparent to all. The Reagan Recession has brought a double-digit unemployment rate for the first time since the Great Depression and the number of jobless is still rising.

While the government and the news media focus on the "rate" of unemployment, the actual number of jobless now exceeds the number in 1933, at the peak of the depression, by nearly 400,000 as of October.

Adding the nation's 1.6 million "discouraged" workers to the official 11.6 million jobless, the real number is 13.2 million. And that's not counting the 6.6 million Americans forced to work part time, a figure which experts translate as an additional 3.3 million jobless.

In some states and cities, especially in manufacturing centers, the jobless rate has been at depression levels for many months.

2 million lose benefits

At the same time unemployment has been soaring, the number of those whose jobless benefits have run out has been growing. As a result of last year's cuts, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that unemployment benefits were eliminated or reduced for 2 million workers during the fiscal year which ended Sept. 30. CBO said the cuts would affect another 3.1 million jobless in the current fiscal year.

These Administration-initiated cuts have nearly dismantled the extended benefits program. During the 1974-75 recession, that program provided up to 39 weeks of benefits for the long-term jobless in addition to 26 weeks of regular benefits.

The number of states providing up to 13 weeks of extended benefits—the limit under the current program—have dwindled to about a dozen.

Congress in October enacted a supplemental jobless benefits program providing from six to ten additional weeks of eligibility for the long-term jobless. But this program expires the end of March.

In recent months, Congress showed signs of recognizing the dismal failure of Reaganomics, and apparently got the message of the November elections. Plans are afoot on both sides of the aisle to create jobs, rebuild the nation's crumbling infrastructure, and aid the unemployed. The nation is waiting.

MEMO FROM COPE

The Evidence Mounts — One Vote Counts

You knew it would happen. November 2 results just proved all over again: one vote counts. It's a lesson that's repeated every election year.

Fifty-two contests for governor and U.S. House and Senate were settled by 52 percent or less of the vote, about par for the course. Indeed, winners in 36 of the 52 made it in with margins of 51 percent or less. Following are some of the tightest races.

Win Slim for Big Jim

With 3,627,128 votes counted in the Illinois governor's race, incumbent Big Jim Thompson (R) was certified a 5,074-vote winner over former Senator Adlai Stevenson in a race Thompson originally had been expected to win big. The count was 1,816,101-1,811,027. It was the closest gubernatorial race in Illinois history, and one of the closest ever in any state. A recount is expected to be demanded by Stevenson.

No major contest November 2 went so contrary to pollster's predictions. Thompson held apparent leads in various polls ranging from 10-15 percent.

What's Skinnier Than 503? What Else but 502?

In Arizona's new 5th Congressional District, Democrat Jim McNulty got 83,820 votes to 83,317 for Jim Kolbe, a difference of 503 out of 167,137 votes cast.

Candidates in Pennsylvania's 21st District went them one better. There, Thomas Ridge (R) topped Buzz Andrezeski by 502 votes out of 159,182 votes cast—79,842-79,340.

(The closest House race in number of votes was in the 26th District in Texas, where Tom Vandergriff (D) topped Jim Bradshaw by just 434 out of 139,160 votes cast—69,797-69,363.)

Missouri to California

Only 78,736 out of a total of 8,029,242 aggregate votes cast settled major statewide races in Missouri and California, both victories going to Republicans.

In Missouri, Sen. John Danforth staved off the challenge of Harriett Woods 780,276-753,835, a difference of 25,441 out of a total vote of 1,534,111.

In California, George Deukmejian (R) topped Tom Bradley for governor by only 52,295 out of a vote total of 7,495,131. The count: 3,773,713-3,721,418.

Nap Time, Commissioner

It's one thing when people in their 20s win public office. But 15?

That's right, 15. Fifteen-year-old Eric Salem, a high school sophomore in Lincoln, Neb., was elected to a four-year term on the Lancaster County Weed Commission November 2. He got more than 15,000 votes.

Handful of Votes Could Stop For-Less

In Idaho, Gov. John Evans (D) was re-elected by a margin of 3,577 votes out of 326,125 votes cast—164,851-161,274.

That small number of votes could turn out to be the major defense line against right-to-work-for-less in Idaho. Evans is committed to veto a R-T-W law if state legislators enact one. They've done it before, and he's vetoed it before.

Close-Call Re-runs

Two re-runs of close House contests in 1980 wound up close calls again in 1982.

In Virginia's 8th District on November 2, Rep. Stan Parris (R) defeated a comeback effort by Herb Harris 69,616-68,057—only 1,599 out of 137,673 votes cast.

Two years before, then-challenger Stan Parris topped then-incumbent Rep. Herb Harris by just 1,165 votes out of 189,947 votes cast—95,556-94,391.

In the case of Pete Kostmayer (D) in Pennsylvania's 8th CD, the comeback succeeded. Two years ago, he was ousted from the House by Jim Coyne 103,557-99,588, a difference of 3,969. This November, Kostmayer won back the House seat by 2,203 votes—83;145-80,942.

In their two confrontations combined, 372,585 votes were cast. The combined difference: 6,172. In the Harris-Parris duels, a combined total of only 2,724 out of 327,620 votes separated them.

Exactly One Vote

It wasn't a congressional race, but it was close enough to take note of.

It was a primary race for the Democratic nomination for city council in Warwick, R.I. First returns put George Carberry seven votes up on Gregory Pellicano, 723-716.

But 19 absentee ballots remained to be counted. They were tallied the next day. Final results: Pellicano by 729-728. Exactly one vote!

Footnote

A repeat of information carried on this page two weeks ago:

Only 39,000 additional Democratic votes in four states—Nevada, Rhode Island, Wyoming and Vermont—would have changed the U.S. Senate from 54-46 for the GOP to 50-50.

New Right Sets Up 'Populist Coalition'

Lost in all the pre-election hub-bub was a significant announcement by the organized "new right." It's taking a second name and, perhaps, shifting its issues emphasis.

Richard Viguerie, "new right" founder, announced in his October Conservative Digest what he calls the New Populist Coalition.

Viguerie claims this coalition will "emerge as the strongest political force of this century," and says other major rightist leaders have joined him in it—including Rep. Jack Kemp, Terry Dolan of National Conservative PAC, Howard Phillips of Conservative Caucus, and Paul Weyrich of Committee for the Survival of a Free Congress.

The coalition is unlikely to drop its push on "social issues"—busing, abortion, school prayer—but apparently it seeks to con support from others by focussing on trade relationships that "flood America with goods but keep our products out" and on immigration control, the right to conduct national voter initiatives (for ideas like balanced budget amendments and the new right "social issues," undoubtedly), for voting on reconfirmation of judges and for political control of the Federal Reserve.

The October Conservative Digest inveighed against "establishment power blocs," flailing at the big business and big banking communities. (It has always put what it calls "big labor" on its anathema list and targeted unions for special spite.)

Odds 'n Ends

'STAY THE COURSE' was never claimed by the Reagan Administration to be an original phrase, but does the President know the most recent officeholder to use it before him was Jimmy Carter? Carter used it at least twice in a speech to B'nai B'rith Sept. 4, 1980. Speaking of his Middle East objectives, Carter said we will "stay the course, no matter how difficult it might be. . . ." And speaking of his domestic programs, Carter said, "Our country is on the right road to the right future, and we will stay the course."

DEFICIT SPENDING hits "new right" political committees, and they wind up in the red. National Conservative PAC is $800,000 in debt, despite receipts approaching $10 million. Fund for a Conservative Majority in the hole for $325,000 after costly direct-mail appeals with "support Reagan" and "repeal O'Neill" pitches fall flat.

FISCAL IRRESPONSIBILITY also afflicts another citadel of "fiscal responsibility," the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Its capital fund dropped by 26 percent in the 1980-81 period, and its operating deficit doubled to $10 million. The Chamber decided to make up the shortfall by dunning members in a special fund-raising program.

Three R's: Reagan, Republicans, Rebellion

There's a mini-rebellion among Republicans against the choke collar President Reagan had them on during his first two years in office.

It springs directly from November 2, when voters decided there were better ways to get ahead than to "stay the course." The mini-uprising is evident in many post-election events.

- When the President first floated his idea for moving up the third stage of his tax cuts to January and perhaps increasing them, promptly, his two main congressional leaders, Howard Baker in the Senate and Robert Michel in the House (who survived the election, but not by much) said forget it. Not only are they unenthusiastic, they said their troops are, too. In addition, the President's own top economic adviser opposes the notion openly.
- On the same day the President went before the United States League of Savings Associations to tell delegates how swell his economic program is and how things are looking up, one of the good GOP soldiers of the first two years of Reaganomics stood before the same group and argued for a change in course. Senate Budget Chairman Pete Domenici (N. Mex.) said if things are indeed looking up at all, "recovery will be anemic." And Domenici called for a second look at the Reagan tax program and defense build-up.
- At a post-election private meeting of House Republicans, the consensus was to demand a greater voice in White House decisions over the next two years. GOP Whip Trent Lott (Miss.) said the House GOP leadership "will be more aggressive in having an input at the White House" and added, "We're going to have an input on what they recommend up there or we won't carry water for it."

Reminding Reagan that he lost on November 2—rather than won, as the White House likes to claim—Lott said, "It's a different ball game with different numbers and different problems. And we're going to approach things differently."

A year ago, that would have been heresy.

- Republican governors, shocked by the loss of seven of their colleagues—reducing their ranks from 23 to 16—blamed their election losses on high unemployment and Reagan policies that are "scaring people to death."

They deplored record-setting deficits under Reagan, claimed voters feel "Republicans care only about the rich" and are frightened by "screwball ideas" for changing social security.

Congress weighs action on jobs

Raring to roar

Machinists' pit crew services the union's racing car during one of its stops on the Championship Auto Racing Teams circuit for Indy-class racers. During the 1982 season, the IAM racing team raised its standing to ninth place among the 66 CART competitors and collected $134,000 in prize money. The CART teams also voted IAM driver Roger Mears and chief mechanic Dennis McCormack the "most improved" on the circuit. (Additional photos, Page 2.)

Lame-duck session bucks resistance of White House

By David L. Perlman

Congressional Democrats are putting together a job-creating legislative package which they hope to attach to a "must-pass" appropriations resolution that will be needed to keep the government functioning after Congress adjourns.

President Reagan wants no part of it. He called House and Senate Republican leaders to the White House to urge them to resist new job initiatives in a lame-duck session of Congress that began Nov. 29 and is expected to run until mid-December.

As Congress reconvened, there appeared to be wide bipartisan support for the highway repair and mass transit bill, despite disagreements over some of its provisions and over the proposed five-cent-a-gallon gasoline tax to fund it. But there were big differences over the rest of the agenda.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., told reporters that the Democratic package will include a $5 billion public works program that would employ some 250,000 persons on projects such as refurbishing public housing, veterans hospitals and AMTRAK rail facilities. Other ingredients being considered include mortgage subsidies to spur housing construction. O'Neill has also said he will push for House passage of a domestic content requirement for autos sold in the United States to relieve massive unemployment in the automobile industry.

Gas tax jobs

All this would be in addition to the highway bill, which would allocate about 80 percent of the new gas tax revenues for road and bridge repair. The remaining 20 percent of the estimated $5.5 billion-a-year revenues would go for transit system equipment and repairs. The government's latest estimate is that such a program would provide direct employment for 175,000 workers, with about 150,000 additional jobs from a ripple effect.

At a White House news briefing, Reagan told reporters that the Democratic public works plan wasn't needed because the country would be coming out of the recession before it took hold. He cited a Commerce Dept. report of a strong rise in the leading economic indicators—which just hours later the department revised downward after discovering an error in calculations.

Reagan said the Administration would not seek to advance the 10 percent income tax cut due next July to January, as it had contemplated doing. Republican leaders told him bluntly there was no support in either the House or Senate for such a deficit-raising move.

But the Administration's agenda for congressional action in the lame duck session included such labor-opposed programs as the job-exporting Caribbean Basin Initiative, a regulatory reform measure the AFL-CIO termed deeply flawed, and the controversial Urban Enterprise Zone proposal. The enterprise zone plan would encourage firms to relocate in depressed

ILO calls on Poland to restore union rights

Geneva—The Polish military dictatorship has been warned that its union-busting tactics will be subjected to the scrutiny of a semi-judicial investigation by the International Labor Organization unless it moves by February toward the restoration of free trade unionism.

The ILO's Governing Body of worker, employer and government delegates agreed to postpone until its February-March session a decision to set up a formal commission of inquiry on the recommendation of its Freedom of Association committee.

The recommendation was contained in a committee report denouncing the government's banning of the Solidarity free trade union as "contrary to the principles on Freedom of Association."

Watchdog panel

Drafted by the watchdog committee after hearing out Poland's deputy labor minister, Krzyfztof Gorski, the report was sharply critical of all the government's moves against Solidarity and its leaders. The report also called on the military regime to recast the labor legislation it railroaded through parliament and permit independent unions to function freely.

The committee's report and recommendations were adopted by a vote of 47-4, with three abstentions, over the heated protests of Gorski, who collected only Soviet bloc votes.

AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown told the Governing Body that he had "grave doubts" in view of the Jaruzelski government's record that there would be sufficient progress toward the "restoration of the legitimate trade union movement of Solidarnosc" to obviate the need to establish the commission of inquiry.

"It is not only in this body that the international free trade movement will continue to keep the issue of Polish free trade unionism alive," he said.

The fight will be waged "everywhere in the world—in the United Nations, its hu-

Reagan abandons proposals for tax on aid to jobless

A storm of outrage has scuttled a Reagan Administration proposal to tax all unemployment benefits, but other soak-the-poor proposals are still afloat including a subminimum youth wage.

Unemployment compensation is already taxed for an individual whose total income for the year is at least $12,000 or for a couple with a combined income of $18,000.

The reasoning of the Administration task force that came up with the idea of taxing jobless workers with lower annual incomes, a White House spokesman explained, is that it would make unemployment "less attractive" and spur people to "seek jobs." The added tax revenue squeezed from the poorest of the unemployed could be used for job training programs.

The AFL-CIO expressed the labor movement's revulsion at the "callous and unfair" proposals that were the top Thanksgiving Day news stories from Santa Barbara, Calif., the temporary White

Management Consultants

Union-busting behind the scenes

The tentacles of the management consultant are penetrating ever deeper into the workplace.

Since the congressional exposures more than 20 years ago of the infamous anti-union practitioner, Nathan R. Shefferman, the management consultant has multiplied a thousandfold.

His union-busting tactics are spreading throughout the workplace as each success spurs new and more ambitious strategies.

This is the first of a series of articles on the rise of "management consultants" as a tool for employers in thwarting their workers' trade union rights. Future articles will deal with specific union-busting firms and their tactics, the factors encouraging their growth and the ingredients of an effective union response.

He is unsatisfied with merely guiding employers on how to keep their workers from joining unions.

He is unsatisfied with counseling employers on how to avoid signing contracts with unions elected to represent the workers.

Inciting unrest

His crown of achievement in a career built on fomenting disruption in the workplace is to destroy union representation through decertification.

A rising star of the union-busting set is Alfred T. DeMaria, a high-income New York consultant who specializes in decertification at an average campaign fee of $15,000. If litigation is involved, as it usually is, employers pay extra.

DeMaria won his union-busting spurs by conducting one-day seminars for executives who pay $425 each to learn about decertification campaigns. The text for the course is a 167-page guide, authored by DeMaria, that tells the businessman how to "recapture the union-free status your company once enjoyed."

DeMaria's budding career was duly noted in a recent profile in the Washington Post, titled Corporate Strategist Against Unionism.

The article quotes from the text of the $49.95 guide in which DeMaria advises employers to make a "twenty-fifth hour captive audience speech to all employees."

He even provides the text:

"Vote for your company, vote for yourselves, vote for the future, vote for progress. . . . No more haggling. No more

Management consultants—a growth industry

dues taxation. No more distrust." This, he tells employers, is their "last shot" before the decertification vote.

The shadow world of management consultants is populated by some 1,500 practicing union-busters.

The practitioner is a specialist whose only goal is to defeat the union, whether in an organizing campaign, bargaining on a contract, or in the decertification campaign he is likely to have inspired.

From his perch behind the scenes, he guides employers on delaying tactics to keep workers from voting for union representation. He pushes supervisors to probe employee sentiments and encourage dissension. He advises on the latest communication techniques so that management will dominate the employee's access to information.

A major industry

The record exposed in the 1979 hearings on Pressure in Today's Workplace by the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations shows that management consultants have become a major American industry, with annual sales of more than half a billion dollars.

They are involved in planning strategy directed at influencing workers in an estimated two-thirds of all National Labor Relations Board representation elections.

By their own accounts, they are earning their fees.

Modern Management, Inc., the biggest of the union-busters, boasted at the hearings that over the 1977-79 period, the firm assisted employers in 696 union organizing campaigns and defeated unions 93 percent of the time.

Tenfold growth

In the front line of the surge of management consultant firms a decade ago, Modern Management's payroll had swelled to 92 consultants at the time of the House subcommittee hearings. MM's own witness estimated the number of practicing consultants overall "has had maybe a tenfold growth in the past 10 years."

Management consultants come in a variety of guises. In addition to firms whose activities are directed primarily to union-busting, consulting is performed by law firms, employer and trade associations and individual psychologists. Detective agencies and non-profit anti-union organizations also play a role.

They employ specialists with degrees in industrial relations, psychology, business law and other social sciences. Their job description is spelled out in the subcommittee report:

"These firms provide a variety of services which might include union 'prevention,' management and supervisor training, devising employee compensation programs, and other functions aimed at structuring the relationship between employer and employee to maximize employer control and minimize union influence.

Defeating unions

"Their primary function, however, is the orchestration of campaigns to defeat unions."

The management consultant could not flourish, or even survive, in an atmosphere that did not encourage such clandestine activity.

He serves as an agent, an adviser, responsible to the employer, and not otherwise responsible for his actions. He serves at the behest of management, performs his services and moves on to the next assignment.

A sizable segment of the business community supports his functions. Even where they may not be directly involved in union-busting activities, employers are encouraging its practice.

Advice provided

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, the National Association of Manufacturers, the Business Roundtable—the heart of blue-chip corporate America—all provide advice to their members on tactics for maintaining or achieving a "union-free environment."

Other trade associations, such as the Master Printers of America and the Associated Builders & Contractors, are single-industry organizations supplying their members with advice and services to be used in opposing unions.

In combine, these employer organizations provide a formidable array of resources, including research and publications, seminars, information clearing houses and advisory services.

The House subcommittee hearings probing the actions of these employer associations found "they supply expertise in every stage of anti-union efforts, including 'prevention,' union representation elections, decertification, deauthorization, and setting up non-union operations."

Industrial psychology, originally applied in the workplace to maximize production through efficient labor-management relations, is also being utilized for union prevention. The subcommittee report notes:

"Through management seminars, supervisor training, and individually tailored compensation and workplace organization programs, industrial psychologists help employers create work environments designed to resist unionization. The new breed of industrial psychologist operates individually, in connection with professional seminar firms, or for labor consulting firms."

The end result of this activity is an atmosphere befogged by hostility to unions, out of which emerges the management consultant.

Two-way position

Yet some of these same employers and management associations extol the virtues of labor-management cooperation for better job performance and, they say, to build a better work environment.

Because a management consultant thrives on destroying that environment, it is not unreasonable to question management's true motivation. Employers cannot help but be aware of the damage to labor-management relations in the wake of the management consultant's visit.

Evidence of the negative impact of management consultant activities was brought out in the nine days of hearings by the House Labor-Management Relations subcommittee. Its report stated:

"We found that the strategies advocated and implemented by the consultant can have a troubling impact on labor-management relations far beyond the consultant's presence on the scene."

Lingering conflict

The report adds that "while strategies are motivated by the immediate concern of defeating the union, the result can be lingering conflict and antagonism, which is unproductive and debilitating for worker and management alike."

With the management consultant's departure, both are left to deal with "what probably has been one of the most traumatic periods that either employer or employee has endured at the workplace," the report states. "This can be true whether the union wins or loses."

Violations rise

The dissension created by the union-busting campaigns is evident in the records of the National Labor Relations Board. They show extensive increases in unfair labor practice charges filed against employers and discriminatory firings of union supporters, beginning with the rise of the management consultant to the present.

In 1957, 3,655 unfair labor practice charges were filed against employers involved in 6,744 representation petitions. A total of 922 illegally fired employees were reinstated as a consequence of employer discrimination.

By 1980, unfair labor practice charges against employers had increased ninefold. Reinstatement of employees after discriminatory findings reached 1.3 for every election—a tenfold increase.

The 1980 board report shows some 500,000 employees participated in union representation elections, and 10,000 were reinstated after the agency found they were illegally fired—primarily in organizing campaigns. This means one in 50 employees is likely to be illegally discharged during an organizing campaign and among union supporters, the odds are more like one in 25.

Protections lacking

The protections of the National Labor Relations Act are inadequate, particularly when management and its consultant agents are determined to circumvent its provisions.

Modest reforms in the law sought by the labor movement several years ago would have minimized their ability to evade the law.

Instead, the right to union representation continues to be thwarted by firings, intimidation—and endless delay. This is the working agenda of the management consultant who guides a receptive employer on a mutual mission of destroying democracy in the workplace.

Mediation agency funds joint panel on productivity

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service has awarded a $100,000 grant to the American Arbitration Association to establish a Labor-Management Committee on Productivity & the Quality of Working Life.

AAA President Robert Coulson and FMCS Director Kay McMurray will serve as co-chairmen of the 14-member panel. The committee will develop model guidelines for cooperative efforts in both the public and private sectors.

Eight members of the committee have already been named. They include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon, President Robert Georgine of the federation's Building & Construction Trades Dept., President Gerald W. McEntee of the State, County & Municipal Employees, and Service Employees President John J. Sweeney.

The committee will choose two geographic sites, one city and one state, for establishing local model area labor-management panels to carry out the objectives of the grant. Terms of the grant call for a 50-percent matching of funds from the selected areas.

The grant is authorized by the 1978 Labor-Management Cooperation Act, which enables FMCS to help set up plant, area, and industrywide labor-management committees.

A total of $500,000 was appropriated for such aid in fiscal year 1982.

On the circuit

Finishing in the top 10 in seven major races on the Championship Auto Racing Teams circuit, the Machinists-owned and operated Indy-class racer drew wide attention during the 1982 season. And that required IAM driver Roger Mears to handle additional autographing work to accommodate young racing fans. For the 1983 season, the IAM will retire the aging No. 31 and replace it with an improved Penske-Cosworth PC10.

Caribbean bill opposed for high jobs cost

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to set aside the Administration's flawed Caribbean Basin Initiative bill and urged that tht lame-duck session be used for "job creation, not job destruction."

Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote House members that the AFL-CIO considers the legislation "economic suicide" for the United States "at a time when more than 11 million Americans are jobless and Congress is desperately seeking funds for job-creating programs."

The Administration proposal would allow duty-free imports from the Caribbean and give special tax breaks to U.S. firms that set up operations in the region.

Denison noted the AFL-CIO's continuing commitment "to help our friends in the Caribbean" and its support for "a strong economic aid program" to help the region overcome "massive problems." But "neither the workers in the Caribbean nor the workers in the United States want programs that cost one another jobs and lead to more unemployment," he stressed.

Among the Administration proposal's many faults, Denison said, is a loophole that will allow non-Caribbean exporting nations to funnel duty-free goods into the United States by having as little as 25 percent of the work performed in the Caribbean. Thus, the legislation could end up as a windfall for the Soviet Union or Asian nations, he noted.

Worsening trends

There was no strong support for the measure at House and Senate hearings earlier this year, Denison noted, and since then unemployment and the trade picture have worsened. "The first nine months of 1982 have shown a huge swing from a trade surplus to a $7.7 billion deficit in imports over exports in manufactured products," he added.

The Caribbean Basin legislation should be "sent back to the drawing board where a more thoughtful plan of assistance to the Caribbean region can be drafted" for the new Congress, Denison urged.

But if the Administration proposals should be called up in the lame duck session, "the AFL-CIO urges that you vote against it," the letter said. The obligation of the outgoing Congress is to address "the critical problems of . . . unemployment, foreclosures, plant shutdowns and human misery," Denison insisted. He urged House members not to "add to these problems" with the Caribbean Basin proposal.

Job-placement pact

Signing of a cooperative agreement between the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and the Maryland Vocational Rehabilitation agency inaugurates a new HRDI handicapped placement program in Baltimore. Participating are from left, Vince Moretti, HRDI handicapped placement coordinator; HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold; Richard Batterton, assistant state superintendent for vocational rehabilitation, HRDI President Alan Kistler and Maryland AFL-CIO President Thomas M. Bradley.

New HRDI center to assist job search of handicapped

Baltimore—The AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute and the state of Maryland are cooperating in a new program to find jobs for handicapped workers.

HRDI officially opened the new Baltimore office of its handicapped placement program with the signing of a cooperative agreement with the state's Division of Vocational Rehabilitation.

Under the agreement, HRDI placement specialist Joseph Jones will work with the rehabilitation agency to find regular jobs and additional training opportunities for people certified by the agency as ready to work.

Agreement signed

The agreement was signed by HRDI President Alan Kistler and Richard Batterton, assistant state superintendant of the Maryland Division of Vocational Rehabilitation.

Other participants in the signing included HRDI Executive Director Mike Arnold, Maryland State AFL-CIO President Thomas M. Bradley and Baltimore AFL-CIO President Henry Koellein, Jr.

At the ceremony, Kistler pointed out that the labor movement "has historically supported the efforts of those with disabilities to take their places as independent, productive and working members of society."

Close union ties

Batterton said the state agency actively sought the agreement with HRDI because of the institute's close contacts with unions and track record "in helping to change attitudes and open doors for disabled workers."

The Baltimore facility is one of four handicapped placement offices now being operated by HRDI with funding from a $265,000 grant from the U.S. Dept. of Education. The other offices are in Houston, Minneapolis-St. Paul and Seattle.

Kistler said Baltimore was chosen for the new program because of assurances of "full cooperation by both the labor movement and the state rehabilitation agency."

HRDI's handicapped placement program was initiated by an AFL-CIO Executive Council resolution in 1977, and since that time jobs have been found for more than 2,400 handicapped persons including union workers injured on the job.

Holiday bonus set for laid-off GM workers

Detroit—The Auto Workers reached agreement with the General Motors Corp. on a special holiday payment of $300 each for 87,000 of its laidoff members.

The money for the payments, to be made in time for Christmas, will come from a fund established under the UAW GM contract signed last March. It provides that GM pay $6.7 million a month into the fund, which is earmarked primarily for retraining workers for new jobs.

At the same time, the company will make a comparable $300 special payment to about 7,000 laid-off salaried employees and to 6,000 laid-off hourly workers represented by other unions.

Joint announcement

The special payment announcement was made by UAW Vice President Owen Bieber, who is head of the union's GM department, and GM Chairman Roger B. Smith. The $300 payment will be given to employers who were placed on layoff status after Jan. 1, 1979, and who:

- Had at least one year of service as of the date of layoff and have not exhausted this seniority or service as of the end of last month.
- Have exhausted all GM layoff benefits as of the end of November 1982 and are not eligible for other benefit payments such as sickness or workers' compensation benefits.
- Have not found regular full-time employment elsewhere.

Payment checks are expected to be made available to eligible workers starting Dec. 17. After eligibility and current status are verified, employees may pick up their checks at the location from which they were laid off, or have their checks mailed to them.

Democrats retain both House seats in Georgia voting

Two postponed congressional elections resulted in decisive Democratic victories as Georgia voters re-elected Wyche Fowler, Jr., in Atlanta and Elliott H. Levitas in an adjoining, largely suburban district.

Both winners had COPE endorsement and were elected by big margins in contests that had attracted national attention. The elections had been postponed until Nov. 30 after the districts were realigned under court order to avoid dilution of the black vote.

The effect of the realignment was to increase a slim black majority in Fowler's 5th congressional district to 65 percent and to add to Republican strength in the district Levitas has represented since defeating a Republican incumbent in 1974.

Fowler, who is white, first won his seat in a 1977 special election to succeed Andrew Young, who had resigned to become President Carter's ambassador to the United Nations. He has compiled a 64-percent "right" voting record by COPE standards.

Despite the redistricting, Fowler was unopposed in the Democratic primary. And in the general election, he won with more than 80 percent of the vote over two black candidates—an independent who came in second and a Republican who had less than 6 percent of the vote.

Levitas, a middle-of-the-roader in Georgia political terms, had been seen as endangered by the redistricting which cost him some Democractic votes and by a heavily-financed Republican opponent helped by a team of GOP campaign professionals sent in after the Nov. 2 nationwide elections. They tried to portray Levitas as too liberal for the district.

But when the ballots were tallied, Levitas had beaten Republican Dick Winder by a two-to-one margin.

Levitas termed his victory a rejection of President Reagan's economic policies.

Family earnings plunge 2.5% over year

The earnings of American families have taken a nosedive in 1982, and more families than ever report no wage earners working at all.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics report on earnings for the third quarter of 1982 showed real median family income down 2.5 percent compared to 1981.

Without adjustment for inflation, families would have gained 3 percent for the period with median weekly earnings at $455.

The recession's impact is also clear, the BLS said, in the higher number of families without an employed family member, 12.1 million in the third quarter, or about 19.5 percent of all families. This is an increase of 766,000 families over last year's figures.

Among families reporting some unemployment during the third quarter, 29.3 percent had no one employed, up from 26.9 percent last year.

Married couple families had median earnings of $498 a week in the third quarter. Median income was $399 a week, where the husband was the only worker, but only $197 a week where the wife was the only one with a job. In families with both husband and wife working, weekly median income was $590.

The median income of families maintained only by a female householder was $220 a week.

Earnings for individuals fared slightly better, the BLS noted. Real median earnings of individuals, adjusted for inflation, were up 1.4 percent in the third quarter of 1982 compared with the same period a year ago. Earnings had declined 2.7 percent in the period between 1980 and '81.

$307 per week

Before adjusting for inflation, individual earnings were up 7.1 percent over the year to an average weekly wage of $307.

Young men 16-24 suffered a 4.7 percent drop in median weekly earnings adjusted for inflation and real wages for young women that age declined 1.9 percent.

White males' median weekly wages were up 2.6 percent even after inflation is taken into account, but earnings of black males were down 2.3 percent. White females had a gain of 1.4 percent, but the median real income of black women edged down two-tenths of a percent.

The BLS figures for Hispanic workers showed a six-tenths of a percent drop in median weekly pay in the third quarter.

The earnings gap between male and female workers remained wide, the BLS report said, with the $240 weekly median wages paid to women amounting to only 65 percent of men's $371 median wage, the same ratio as last year.

Black men earned only 74 percent of the wages paid to white men, but in contrast, the BLS pointed out, black women earned 92 percent of wages paid to white women.

The BLS data for major occupational groups showed that nonfarm managers and administrators still take in the highest median weekly earnings, $428. Again, the disparity was sharp when broken down by sex with male managers earnings a weekly median of $500 compared to $311 for women in the same category.

Professional and technical workers posted median weekly earnings of $413—$485 male, $346 female.

Women's earnings lag

Craft workers had median weekly earnings of $382 overall, or $392 for men against $242 for women. The BLS data showed clerical workers earning $248 weekly, broken down to $352 for men versus $235 for female clericals.

The lowest earnings, the BLS noted, were among service workers at $200 a week and for farm workers where median pay was $188.

German study group

Concerns of unions in both the United States and Germany are discussed by a study group of German trade unionists during a visit to AFL-CIO headquarters in Washington. From left are Dale Good, assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland; Hans-Joachim Welt, administrator of the Westphalian Relief Fund of the German Union of Miners & Energy Workers (IBGE); Udo Wichert, assistant to IBGE President Adolf Schmidt; Diethard Bendrat, deputy director, IBGE Recklingen District; Norbert Roemer, deputy editor of "Einheit," the IBGE journal; Christopf Burmester, secretary of the youth and works council division, German Construction Workers Union; Doug Brooks, president, Atlanta Labor Council, and Inge Wichmann, the group's interpreter.

Heavy agenda of bargaining slated for '83

A heavy bargaining agenda is developing for 1983 with major union contracts covering about 3.6 million workers due for renegotiation.

A report released by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics said 845 of the 1,772 major agreements it tracks will expire next year. The BLS data cover some 8.5 million workers in bargaining units with at least 1,000 employees.

Negotiations are slated in aluminum manufacturing, telephone communications, steel, East and Gulf Coast longshoring, and aerospace, the report said. Contracts will also be up in the tobacco, food store, lumber, glass and copper industries.

The BLS also said bargaining in construction would be "particularly heavy" in 1983 because of the many short-term contracts negotiated in 1982.

Of the 8.5 million workers covered by major contracts, about a third will get deferred wage increases next year, the report noted.

This is the smallest proportion of such increases since its record-keeping started in 1967, the BLS said. It cited as a factor the number of 1982 multi-year settlements that don't include specific wage increases during the contract period.

COLA a factor

The BLS speculated, however, that most of those contracts would produce some wage increases triggered by cost-of-living adjustment clauses.

Deferred wage increases bargained for in agreements reached in prior years will average 6.1 percent in 1983, the BLS said. But actual increases will depend on when the contract was negotiated. The agency said the average increase for agreements reached in 1981 will be 6.7 percent compared to 5.8 percent for those settled in 1982.

About three million workers will get COLA raises in 1983, the BLS estimated.

Sterner action on hijacking sought by Flight Engineers

New Orleans—Key resolutions on airplane hijacking and the size of aircraft crew complements highlighted the agenda at the Flight Engineers' annual convention here.

Both branches of the union—one representing only U.S. affiliates or chapters, the other comprising chapters from 19 other countries in which FEIA has members—approved the measures as well as resolutions concerning internal affairs. Delegates also elected a new secretary-treasurer and a vice president for technical matters.

In the resolution on hijacking, FEIA delegates deplored the failure of the Thai government to prevent the hijacking of an Italian airliner, condemned the Sri Lanka government for harboring the hijacker and Alitalia Airlines for providing ransom money.

"Such considerate treatment in a hijacking incident can only encourage a repetition of such criminal conduct to the peril of all passengers and flight crew members," the FEIA resolution warned.

In its resolution on aircraft crew complement, the union said the absence of a flight engineer on board the two-pilot Air Florida plane that crashed in Washington Jan. 13, 1982, led to mistakes which the National Transportation Safety Board has found as probable causes for the tragedy.

The board said the flight crew's failure to use engine anti-ice during ground operations and take-off, its decision to take off with snow or ice on the plane's airfoil surfaces, and the captain's failure to abort the take-off after his attention was called to irregular instrument readings would not have happened with a flight engineer in the cockpit.

"These failures were caused by the absence of the technically competent human backup which has in the past been afforded to pilots who fly such large sophisticated aircraft by a flight engineer whose responsibility, training, and sensitivity for the safe condition of the aircraft at all times assure the passengers and flight crew that no take-off will occur unless the aircraft, under any weather conditions, is ready for a safe take-off observing all applicable safety regulations," the resolution said.

Fatal crash

The Tampa-bound Boeing 737 jet crashed into the Potomac River minutes after takeoff, killing 78 passengers and crew members as well as several people in cars struck by the plane when it slammed into a bridge.

To prevent a repetition of the Air Florida disaster, the FEIA called for crews consisting of two pilots and a flight engineer on all airlines. It forwarded the resolution to President Reagan and the heads of other governments that certify commercial airliners.

In other action, the delegates elected Jerry L. Austin of American Airlines to succeed Karl F. Anderson of Pan American as executive vice president/secretary-treasurer. Anderson is retiring from the post.

Also elected was Charles L. Hunt of American Airlines as vice president-technical. The position had been vacant since the retirement of Jack Wahle of Pan Am two years ago. President William A. Gill, Jr., of Pan Am and First Vice President Roger C. Bricknell of British Airways have another year remaining in their two-year terms.

IUD booklet cites need for industrial policy

Alternative policies that the United States should pursue to halt the continuing deterioration of basic industries are explored in a report prepared by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Presented in a 20-page booklet titled "Crossroads for American Industry," the report was written by IUD President Howard D. Samuel and three union presidents, Douglas A. Fraser of the Auto Workers, Lloyd McBride of the Steelworkers and Glenn E. Watts of the Communications Workers.

The report, which documents the decline in U.S. manufacturing jobs, is the outgrowth of discussions the IUD conducted at the Democratic Party's conference in Philadelphia earlier this year.

Flexible system proposed to pay Medicare costs

If the Reagan Administration is going to limit Medicare reimbursements to hospitals, it ought to provide a flexible method that will take into account the higher costs incurred by public facilities that serve many poor and elderly patients, the AFL-CIO asserted.

Federation President Lane Kirkland in a letter to Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker said the AFL-CIO is "very concerned" that the department's new regulations limiting Medicare reimbursements to hospitals do not include a method that would permit larger, justified payments to public and community hospitals "serving a disproportionate number of elderly or low-income patients."

Kirkland urged that such a program be developed quickly.

New proposed regulations issued by Schweiker's department stemmed from belt-tightening provisions in the tax bill passed in August. But Kirkland reminded the secretary, "Congress recognized an adjustment had to be made for higher costs involved in treating patients in inner-city hospitals."

Adjustments authorized

He pointed out that labor-supported provisions in the bill gave HHS authority to develop a system to adjust payments to hospitals with higher costs.

Development of some kind of mechanism is "crucial," Kirkland warned, "for without special treatment there is no doubt that many inner-city hospitals, which provide the only access to services to the elderly, the poor and the rapidly growing number of unemployed workers, will be forced to close."

These facilities are frequently "the providers of last resort for our most disadvantaged citizens," Kirkland said. He noted that many hospitals that have taken care of these people have already gone under and others "have accumulated deficits which seriously jeopardize their ability to continue to operate."

The cost of treating patients in public and community hospitals has been shown to be higher on a per diagnosis basis than for other facilities, but unlike other institutions, public and community hospitals are unable to survive reductions in reimbursement under public programs by shifting costs onto patients covered by private insurance, the AFL-CIO pointed out in comments attached to Kirkland's letter.

Not all hospitals will need special treatment, but "it is essential that hospitals which do need allowances receive them," the statement stressed.

"Cutting back the predominant source of reimbursement for these hospitals without taking into account the higher cost involved in treating their patients will surely hasten their demise," it said.

U.S. trade deficit climbing toward another record

The nation's merchandise trade deficit widened by a seasonally adjusted $5.33 billion in October, pushing the deficit for the first 10 months of the year to $35.04 billion, compared with $33.67 billion in the comparable 1981 period.

"The October trade figures virtually assure a record deficit this year," Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said. Earlier this year, the Commerce Dept. had estimated that the 1982 deficit would narrow from last year's $39.69 billion red-ink total.

Last month's deficit compared with an adjusted deficit of $4.19 billion in September. The record deficit for any one month, $7.08 billion, was set in August.

Fewer jobs

The trade deficit indicates the extent that money is flowing out of the country and is therefore not available for domestic use. Rising imports and declining exports translate into fewer jobs for Americans.

The country's largest annual deficit to date was $42.36 billion in 1978, followed by $40.37 billion of red ink in 1979. The last time the nation registered a surplus was in 1975, when exports exceeded imports by $1.72 billion.

In October, exports fell 4 percent to a seasonally adjusted $16.7 billion from an adjusted $17.39 billion in September. Much of the decline stemmed from reduced shipments to Mexico, which is in financial difficulties.

Imports rose 2.1 percent over the month to an adjusted $22.02 billion, after falling 12.2 percent in September to an adjusted $21.58 billion. The value of imports of petroleum and related products rose 15 percent to $5.78 billion after declining 19.3 percent in September.

AFSCME Gains 8,000 in Arizona

Phoenix—The Arizona Public Employees Association voted to affiliate with the State, County & Municipal Employees at a special membership meeting by a 90-percent margin.

The new 8,000-member affiliate, representing largely state government workers, will be designated APEA/AFSCME Council 97. Four existing AFSCME locals with a membership of 2,500 have also voted to join the new council.

Following the Nov. 20 affiliation vote, more than 1,500 of the new AFSCME members rallied at the state capitol to press the legislature to enact collective bargaining rights and needed pay increases for public employees.

AFSCME President Gerald W. McEntee pledged the union's support in the campaign through legislative and political action.

"There is no reason why public employees in Arizona shouldn't have a collective bargaining law—a right that exists in some form or another in 45 other states," McEntee told the demonstrators.

Mixed economic signals chill hopes for recovery

By James M. Shevis

A tentative economy continued to send out mixed signals, despite a two-tenths of 1 percent rise in a government index designed to forecast economic trends, leaving recovery from the 16-month-old Reagan Recession nowhere yet in sight.

The October rise in the Commerce Dept.'s index of leading economic indicators—the sixth improvement in seven months—was greeted with restraint by Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige, who said simply:

"The moderate rise in the leading index for October continues an upward trend that began last April. Gains in the index have been slower than the average prior to past recoveries, reflecting the cross-currents in the economy during the last two years."

'Clerical error'

Baldrige's comments came after an unusual department correction, saying that a more encouraging six-tenths of 1 percent rise reported earlier in the day was wrong. The department said a "clerical error" occurred in compiling new orders for consumer goods and materials, one of the 11 statistical series that make up the leading indicators index.

The two-tenths of 1-percent rise in October followed a 1.1-percent increase in September, which was revised from the originally reported five-tenths of 1 percent increase. After showing no change in March, the index has risen every month since then, except for August when it declined two-tenths of 1 percent.

Validity questioned

The index is not designed to forecast the strength of a recovery. Rather, it is supposed to provide an advance signal of recovery just before a recovery becomes evident. It has proved a reliable indicator in the past, yet at least one government economist has questioned the validity of the index in forecasting recovery this time.

"The rising trend in leading indicators has been long enough"—and yet a recovery has failed to materialize—"to lead one to say, 'What is wrong here?' " Robert Ortner, chief economist at the Commerce Dept., told the New York Times. "Either the indicators are not connected to the economy any more or there may be some blockage here, and I'm inclined to go with the latter explanation."

A companion index, the department's index of coincident indicators, which is designed to measure current economic activity, fell 1 percent in October. Baldrige told newsmen the typical lag between upturns in the leading indicators—or the onset of a recovery—is three to four months.

"I believe that the prolonged lag this time, and the relatively slow rise in the leading indicators as well, was caused by the persistence of high interest rates into the summer," he said. With interest rates somewhat lower now, the housing industry is beginning to recover and "a sustained pickup in sales of new cars and other consumer durable goods can be expected to follow," Baldrige predicted.

Ups and downs

A jump in stock prices and building permits led the October rise in the leading indicators index. Other components contributing to the increase were vendor performance, a rise in the money supply, and a slight decline in initial claims for unemployment insurance benefits.

Four components declined, including new orders for manufactured consumer goods adjusted for inflation, contracts and orders for new plant and equipment, total liquid assets, and sensitive crude material prices.

The length of the average work week in manufacturing was unchanged, and figures on the other component—net business formation—were not available.

Factory orders drop

The decline in the volume of new orders to the nation's factories for durable manufactured goods was particularly disappointing. Down by 4.9 percent in October, these orders are often an important indicator of what lies ahead for the economy. Orders had risen four-tenths of 1 percent in September. The October decline was widespread, including primary metals, electrical machinery, and transportation equipment.

On the other hand, machine-tool orders climbed 37 percent from September's extremely low level, and domestic auto makers reported a 42 percent increase in new-car sales in mid-November.

Congress weighs measures to spur creation of jobs city areas with promises of tax subsidies and "relief" from government regulations and worker safeguards.

The Democratic jobs package is likely to pick up some Republican support in the wake of an election in which high unemployment proved a potent issue. Rep. Silvio O. Conte (Mass.), the ranking Republican on the House Appropriations Committee, told reporters that he will support an expanded public works jobs bill because "people have suffered enough. They can't wait any longer."

But an early vote on a generally noncontroversial appropriations bill was a reminder that the lame-duck Congress is made up of the same legislators that have gone along with most of the Reagan Administration economic policies.

The House approved virtually unchanged a multibillion dollar appropriations bill funding the Treasury Dept., the Postal Service and a number of independent agencies. It included, incidentally, $208 million more than the Administration had requested for the Postal Service in order to avoid an increase in postage for non-profit mailers and publications.

But as a final step, the House adopted by a 193-172 vote a Republican motion to reduce spending authority by 2 percent except for payments mandated by law.

Soak-poor plans still alive but jobless tax scrapped

House while the President was at his mountaintop ranch.

"To attempt to raise more revenue from the ranks of the unemployed is to punish twice the chief victims of Reaganomics," the federation protested.

Congressional comments were equally critical. Joint Economic Committee Chairman Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) protested the implication that people who are unemployed are "goldbricks or loafers," and by the next day the White House was backtracking—but only on the unemployment insurance tax.

After various efforts to downplay the proposal as merely one of many suggestions under study, top White House officials told reporters that it would not be part of an Administration plan to reduce unemployment.

Unemployment insurance payments had been fully exempt from federal income tax before the Reagan Administration. Last year, persons with total incomes of at least $20,000 were taxed on unemployment compensation; this year, Congress dropped the cutoff to $12,000.

Wage-cut options

The subminimum youth wage "options" drawn up by the Administration task force were not spelled out in detail. But press reports indicate that both a lower wage for summer jobs and an employer subsidy for hiring the "hard core" of the unemployed were under consideration. There are already various student exemptions from minimum wage requirements and tax breaks for employers, and the AFL-CIO viewed the further steps under consideration as "more trickle-down economics."

Employers don't need more financial subsidies on top of the "giveaways" already received, the AFL-CIO said. And "the minimum wage has already been eroded by two years of inflation to reduce real income" of those receiving it.

Reagan program tied to continued high joblessness

The Reagan Administration's economic recovery blueprint calls for high joblessness for years to come and disavows the goal of full employment.

It will take five or six years of "moderate and sound" recovery to lower the unemployment rate to a 6 to 7 percent range, according to Martin Feldstein, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

The slowness is deliberate, Feldstein indicated. "A faster recovery runs the risk of accelerating inflation," he said in a speech to the Washington Press Club.

Feldstein's analysis reflected none of the optimism President Reagan has been voicing about the pace of recovery.

"I wish I could tell you that I knew for sure that the recovery has begun and that unemployment will soon be declining," Feldstein said. "Unfortunately, though, the economy is still in the ambiguous bottoming-out range of the business cycle."

After two back-to-back recessions, unemployment is 5 million more than at the start of 1980, he noted, and the number jobless for six months or longer has quadrupled.

Feldstein made clear, however, the Administration's disavowal of the 1978 Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act—the Humphrey-Hawkins bill that set a national goal of reducing unemployment to no more than 4 percent.

Inflation threshold

"The notion of full employment is not a meaningful or helpful concept," Feldstein insisted. He said the significant rate is the "inflation threshold level," when a further reduction of unemployment causes inflation to increase. "Economists now generally estimate that the inflation threshold of unemployment is between 6 and 7 percent," he said.

With the "natural growth" in the population and the labor force, Feldstein noted, 10 million more jobs will have to be created over the next six years just to prevent a rise in unemployment.

Continued high unemployment has a silver lining, Feldstein suggested. He predicted that the inflation rate will "continue to decline in the years ahead because the downward pressure on inflation caused by the high level of unemployment will outweigh the upward pressure on inflation caused by the fall in the unemployment rate."

While efforts should be made to reduce "structural unemployment" through measures such as job training, Feldstein said the Administration sees "no justification for public employment projects."

Public Health Association demands new OSHA chief

The American Public Health Association has called for the replacement of the head of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

In a resolution adopted at its annual meeting, the 50,000-member organization of health professionals expressed deep concern that worker protections have been "seriously weakened" under Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter.

Without specifically naming Auchter, the resolution charged that OSHA has ignored the statutory mandate of the federal job safety law by failing to develop new standards vital to worker safety and health, cancelling standard development initiated under previous administrations, and weakening or revoking existing standards and regulations.

The APHA also accused Auchter of undermining the ability of OSHA to perform its legislated mission by closing one-third of the agency's field offices and reducing workplace inspections 19 percent and follow-up inspections 69 percent.

The APHA took issue with Auchter's policies granting exemptions from inspections to most workplaces, sharply curtailing investigations of worker complaints, and halting the distribution of information and educational materials on workplace hazards. It specifically cited his refusal to distribute booklets on cotton dust hazards.

One of Auchter's first actions after taking the reins of OSHA was his attempt to halt the implementation of the cotton dust standard developed during the Carter Administration.

The APHA resolution urged Congress and President Reagan to take immediate steps to pursue the development of worker protections launched in previous administrations, reopen the closed OSHA offices and rehire experienced personnel who have been laid off or forced to resign.

It called on Reagan to appoint a replacement for Auchter "who is a health professional dedicated to promoting the health and safety of workers and pursuing policies to achieve this goal."

ILO warning blasts Poland for union ban man rights commission and agencies where this is possible as well as in the Madrid conference where the Helsinki accord is under discussion," Brown declared. He is the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO.

Under the ILO constitution, the projected commission of inquiry would make an official determination of whether Poland is guilty of welching on its international treaty commitments by contravening ILO conventions guaranteeing freedom of association and trade union rights that it has rattified. The case could go as far as the International Court of Justice if the commission's findings are contested.

Addressing the ILO executive body, Gorski "noted with bitterness" what he termed the "tendentious" report of the Freedom of Association committee. But he received no support outside the Soviet bloc for his contention that the ILO was interfering in Poland's internal affairs.

Claim refuted

Heribert Maier of Austria, speaking for the majority of the worker delegates, rejected Gorski's claim that only 700 Solidarity trade unionists were still in prison. "We have information that the number is far higher," he said.

In his statement, Brown said the arrested free trade unionists remained in the "thousands." This denied the Jaruzelski government all "moral or legal right" to enact "so-called labor law," he added.

Brown said the release from detention of Solidarity leader Lech Walesa had given hope that there might be a change in Warsaw.

"But he is still in a straitjacket under the strictest police surveillance with no one allowed to enter or leave his house without a search," Brown noted.

Support for Solidarnosc

Worker delegates to the International Labor Organization's Governing Body pressed for condemnation of Poland's suppression of its trade union federation, Solidarnosc. AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown discusses the resolution with other worker delegates. ICFTU delegation to assess freedom of Turkish unions

Brussels—The International Confederation of Free Trade Unions will send a delegation to Turkey soon to assess the political landscape following last month's approval of a new Turkish constitution.

The decision to send the mission came at a three-day meeting of the ICFTU executive board here attended by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Vice Presidents Douglas Fraser and Albert Shanker, and International Affairs Director Irving Brown.

The AFL-CIO will be represented on the delegation, which will observe what changes have taken place since the ICFTU's last mission to Turkey in 1981. The mission will study particularly the organization and composition of the democratic labor center, Turk-IS, with an eye toward lifting its current suspension from ICFTU membership.

The Turkish labor organization was suspended when its general secretary accepted a ministerial post in the provisional regime set up after the nation's constitutionally elected government was overthrown by a military coup. The ICFTU suspended Turk-IS until the general secretary relinquished either his new position or his trade union post. He has since resigned the labor position.

Modified provisions

Turk-IS, the oldest and largest labor confederation in Turkey, was instrumental in modifying some highly anti-labor provisions in the new constitution. In its first drafts, the document also restricted civil, press, and other freedoms. Turk-IS conducted a nationwide campaign in the face of great risks from the harsh military regime to remove the undesirable clauses. The constitution, with its modifications, was approved by public referendum on Nov. 7.

The military council governing Turkey, headed by former Chief of Staff Kenan Evran, has pledged to reinstitute a "viable democratic system" according to a specific timetable.

Turk-IS has vowed to hold the Evran regime to that schedule and to press for continued liberalization of the new constitution after a new parliament assumes office.

Talks bolster case for auto content law

Congressional approval of domestic auto content legislation is even more urgent now that U.S. representatives have failed to gain concessions on foreign trade restrictions, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said after reviewing the document adopted at the worldwide conference on trade in Geneva.

"The United States went to Geneva leading a charge for free trade, but discovered it had no followers," Oswald said. "Only the Americans expressed a belief in free trade, while the remainder of the ministers at the 88-nation conference clearly recognized the many restrictions on trade that exist in the real world."

The five-day meeting on the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade was marked by deep differences on major questions affecting the flow of trade. The document that emerged was more symbolic than substantive in dealing with trade restrictions.

A major setback for U.S. representatives was the rejection of a proposal for GATT participants to phase out investment performance requirements which are in force by law or practice in most of the countries that the United States trades with.

Foreign barriers

Many European countries and most developing nations, along with Canada, Mexico and Australia embrace investment performance provisions that require domestic sources of production or the export of a certain portion of shipments from domestic plants.

In hearings before the House earlier this year, the AFL-CIO pointed out that Australia, for example, has an 85-percent domestic content requirement on autos sold in the country, along with quotas limiting imports and tariffs ranging from 35 to 52 percent, depending on the stage of assembly. Three major U.S. automakers —General Motors, Ford and Chrysler— produce vehicles in Australia under those conditions.

Oswald noted that the GATT ministers also rejected U.S. positions on trading agreements dealing with high technology items and on a new round of negotiations over tariffs in developing countries.

He said the United States did have partial success in its position on import safeguards dealing with quotas and tariffs as well as agreement for new negotiations on service industries, such as transportation, shipping, construction, banking and insurance.

Free world labor mourns Otto Kersten's death at 54

Brussels—A memorial service for General Sec. Otto Kersten of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, who died a week earlier, was held here Nov. 24.

The service, attended by members of the ICFTU executive board here for a three-day meeting, honored the German-born Kersten as "one of the great personalities in the history of the international trade union movement."

Attending the ceremony from the United States were AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Vice Presidents Albert Shanker and Douglas Fraser, and Director Irving Brown of the federation's Dept. of International Affairs, all ICFTU board members.

Kersten, who had served as ICFTU general secretary the past 10 years, died Nov. 17, one week before his 54th birthday. His death was due to heart failure following surgery. Private funeral services were held Nov. 20.

OTTO KERSTEN

At its meeting, the executive board appointed John Vanderveken, who had been serving as assistant general secretary, to replace Kersten until an election is held at the ICFTU's 13th World Congress next June in Oslo.

The ICFTU, which is headquartered here, represents 132 free labor organizations in 93 countries and territories with a membership in excess of 84 million. It was founded in 1949 in opposition to the communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions. Before the 1955 merger, both the AFL and the CIO were charter members of the ICFTU.

Soviet prison term

Born in Alt-Jessnitz in Germany, Kersten became involved in trade union activities early in life. Shortly before the 1953 East German workers' uprising, he was arrested for belonging to a social democratic group opposing the communist regime and was sentenced to 15 years' forced labor in Soviet prison camps.

Released in 1956, he went to West Germany and worked in the Central Federal Bank in Frankfurt. Four years later, he joined the European Trade Union Secretariat in Brussels. In 1965, the German trade union federation, DGB, invited him to Dusseldorf to undertake the task of rebuilding its international department.

He was elected ICFTU general secretary in 1972 and re-elected in 1975 and 1979. During this time, he worked to further the ICFTU's prestige throughout the world, attaching particular importance to the problems of developing nations, educational problems, and the struggle against poverty.

In an address to the AFL-CIO convention in New York a year ago, Kersten said the ideals which brought about the confederation in 1949 "still hold us together: freedom, peace, and social justice."

Economic aid for Costa Rica pressed as vital to stability

The AFL-CIO called on the Reagan Administration and the governments of other countries of the industrialized free world to help Costa Rica extricate itself from severe economic difficulties.

"Democratic Costa Rica has enjoyed a singular climate of freedom and prosperity in an area of the world where non-democratic regimes, guerrilla warfare, and urban terrorism are the rule rather than the exception," a federation statement observed.

"Today, high energy import costs and a precipitous decline in the price of agricultural exports have seriously strained the small Costa Rican economy.

"These difficult economic circumstances, together with disturbances along Costa Rica's undeveloped northern frontier with Nicaragua and the recent occurrence of urban guerrilla activity, threaten the political and economic stability of the country," the AFL-CIO warned.

Because of the financial troubles, Costa Rica's government headed by President Luis Alberto Monge has been forced to implement a series of austerity measures and is working to qualify for loans from the International Monetary Fund. Monge discussed his country's difficulties with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a meeting at federation headquarters on Nov. 3.

Costa Rica's problems were sure to come up this weekend when President Reagan stops over in San Jose on his current Latin American swing for talks with Monge.

Limited U.S. aid

Under Reagan's proposed Caribbean Basin Initiative, Costa Rica would receive some $70 million in soft loans. But, as the AFL-CIO pointed out, that amount would only begin to address the nation's economic problems.

Small programs for the integrated regional development of agrarian industry in Costa Rica's northern provinces bordering Nicaragua have been initiated by the Monge government. And plans for land reform, already widespread, are expected to develop the country's potential even more. The new programs also seek to expand the country's fishing industry.

Making Real Work

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S excuse for opposing a more extensive public works program than the highway repair legislation he rather belatedly endorsed fails to convince.

Putting people to work rehabilitating housing projects or repairing deteriorated railroad roadbeds would be "make-work," the President tells us, and would not produce "real jobs." And anyway, the recession will surely be over before a large-scale public works program could make a contribution to economic recovery.

This judgment, of course, comes from an Administration that in its first two years has been consistently wrong in its economic forecasts, has dismantled the safety net of public works and public service jobs programs, and has insisted that the only medicine an increasingly sick economy needed was more tax giveaways to the wealthy.

The nation's unemployment rate would not now be in double digits if the Administration had not been blinded by its own rhetoric.

Even as the President argues that any job stimulus would come too late, the chairman of his Council of Economic Advisers tells us in an unusually frank speech that it is likely to be five years or more until unemployment comes down even to the 6 to 7 percent range. It wasn't all that long ago that a 5 percent unemployment rate was recognized as cause for concern.

Just as highway potholes, weakened bridges and antiquated mass transit systems need upgrading, so do the other elements of our country's infrastructure. And if it is make-work to make abandoned housing liveable for families that need shelter, why by all means let's make more of it.

There is work to be done—real work. And there are people who are jobless—real people and too many of them.

What are we waiting for?

'Free' Trade Fallacies

IS THERE any other country in the world that has been as blind to the damage that a one-sided "free trade" policy has done to its economy and to its workers?

No one takes it amiss that American auto manufacturers are producing cars in Australia because of that country's domestic content law. But, somehow, a domestic content law that would encourage Japanese auto manufacturers to build in the United States the cars they sell to Americans is "protectionist"—a dirty word in the vocabulary of those who learned their economics from a 50-year-old textbook.

All we need to stay competitive, it is suggested in some quarters, is weaker unions, lower paychecks and fewer benefits.

But low textile wages and non-union runaway firms in segments of the clothing industry didn't stop an exodus of manufacturers to countries paying even lower wages. Nor did "free trade" prevent the indirect export subsidies that enabled other countries to penetrate U.S. markets or the red tape that somehow blocked attempts by American firms to sell products abroad.

IN ADDITION, the Reagan Administration must accept responsibility for the tight-money, high-interest policy that has distorted the value of the dollar in international trade. The Treasury Dept. has balked at joining international efforts to set currency values among trading nations at realistic levels.

Two years ago, an American wage of $10 an hour and a Japanese wage of 2,200 yen an hour were equivalent. But today, because of the artificially high exchange rate for the American dollar, that same Japanese wage is only $8.08 in U.S. dollars—some 20 percent less.

That means in trading terms that a Japanese car imported to the United States can be profitably sold at a 20 percent discount just because of lowered currency values. Likewise, American goods sold in Japan cost 20 percent more—even before all of the other trade restrictions.

The solution obviously is not a 20-percent pay cut for American workers.

Needy children victimized by cuts in school lunches

By Press Associates, Inc.

In April 1981 President Reagan's budget director, David Stockman, asked Congress to cut the school lunch program. He assured members the cuts would not force schools and middle-class children out of the program and "truly needy" children would not suffer.

Congress believed him and cut the school lunch program 30 percent for fiscal 1982, which ended Sept. 30.

Savings of some $1 billion were achieved by decreasing cash and commodity subsidies for upper- and middle-income children's lunches by tightening eligibility requirements for reduced-price and free lunches.

Now the Agriculture Dept. reports that more than 2,700 schools have dropped the program and some 3.2 million fewer students participated in the program in the past year. Almost 40 percent of these students are from low-income families, according to the USDA.

The USDA study results give child nutrition experts and advocates the right to say, "I told you so."

Warnings unheeded

They had argued that decreased federal subsidies would leave many schools unable to afford to keep up the program's nutritional requirements and, if not saved by increased state or local funds, these schools would drop out, eliminating poor and non-poor alike. They also warned the cuts would force up school lunch prices and, consequently, many middle-class families would reconsider keeping their children in the program.

Administration officials, true to their rosy scenario policy, said that despite the program dropouts, there is still a "very large school lunch program."

Lynn Parker, a nutritionist with the non-profit Food Research & Action Center, observed that since the Administration is talking about more than 3 million children, it is "pretty callous" to gloss over the drop as inconsequential. She pointed out that the current deep recession should have increased eligible participants in the program, but instead the numbers are shrinking.

Drop in nutrition

A FRAC study released about the same time as the USDA study shows the serious impact of the cuts on child nutrition, which has been the point of the program since its inception in 1946.

In its survey of 44 states and 27 schools, FRAC found that children in the school lunch program ate substantially more nutritious meals than those not in the program.

For example, in elementary schools with the program, 91 percent of the children eating school lunches had milk, 99 percent had fruit or vegetable juice, 31 percent had chicken or fish, 75 percent had a vegetable, 65 percent had fruit and 23 percent had cheese.

Of children not in the school lunch program, 50 percent had milk, 8 percent had juice, 12 percent had chicken or fish, 14 percent had a vegetable, 28 percent had fruit and 16 percent had cheese.

The drop in nutrition is especially harmful for the more than one million low-income students who no longer receive school lunches because, as FRAC said, studies have shown these children depend on school lunches for one-third to one-half of their daily intake of vitamins, minerals, protein and calories.

It is to be hoped that the new Democratic strength in the House will spur the incoming 98th Congress to another consensus—to restore cuts to child nutrition programs that also are clearly in the national interest.

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Congress Returns: Job-Creating Legislation is the Top Priority for the Lame-Duck

Reagan's Caribbean Basin Bill Would Export Jobs

Republicans and Democrats in Congress are saying that the top priority for the lame-duck session is restoring jobs. But the Reagan Administration is pushing in the opposite direction, asking for quick action on its bill to ease imports to the United States from Caribbean nations. The Reagan Caribbean bill, H.R. 5900, would speed the export of U.S. jobs, and would not improve conditions for Caribbean workers.

The major proposal in the Reagan plan would give multinational corporations from any part of the world tariff-free access to the U.S. if only 25 percent of the product was of Caribbean origin. This would allow our chief competitors to funnel their products through the Caribbean, hurting U.S. industry while failing to help Caribbean industries.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Urge your Representative to reject H.R. 5900, the Caribbean Basin bill. (Sample message below).

Dear Representative _____:

H.R. 5900, the Reagan Administration's Caribbean Basin Initiative, would aggravate harm to U.S. industries and hasten export of U.S. jobs, and it would not provide economic aid to Caribbean industries and workers. The major beneficiaries would be multinational corporations which could funnel their products through the Caribbean in order to receive trade privileges.

I urge you to take action to save U.S. jobs, not destroy them. Please vote against H.R. 5900, the Caribbean Basin bill, if it should reach the floor.

Sincerely,

Domestic Content Bill Would Restore Jobs

The election returns have brought Congress back to Washington in a frame of mind to take a major step toward halting the export of U.S. jobs.

The domestic content bill for the U.S. auto industry is one of the major attempts by Congress to save a core domestic industry. This legislation would tie a company's level of auto sales in this country to the percentage of required U.S.-made components in the vehicle.

While President Reagan criticizes any attempt to deal with the increasing problem, the U.S. now imports $40 billion more annually than it exports.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: H.R. 5133, the domestic content bill, may come to a vote on the House floor during the lame-duck session. Urge your Representative to vote in favor of this bill.

Job-Creating Highways Bill Is Good, But Not Enough

The AFL-CIO welcomes legislation to put an estimated 320,000 Americans back to work maintaining and repairing the nation's highways and bridges. This legislation is expected to achieve passage easily in the lame-duck session.

But the Federation cannot support the Reagan-backed tax hike to finance this program, a nickel increase in the federal gasoline tax, to 9 cents per gallon. A fairer tax would be to cap the 1983 cut at $700, which would help all families earning $45,000 or less per year.

Furthermore, this legislation is only a start toward restoring jobs. Other job-creating bills are expected to be attached to a continuing funding resolution.

WHAT YOU CAN DO: Ask your legislators to support all job-creating bills, including home mortgage subsidies and bills to provide maintenance and repair of the public "infrastructure."

Union-Buster Van de Water Forced To Resign, But Reagan's New Nominee for NLRB Is No Better

Because of union members' strong opposition, President Reagan's appointment of union-buster John Van de Water for chairman of the National Labor Relations Board failed to win confirmation in the Senate. Thus Van de Water was forced to resign.

But Reagan's new appointment for NLRB chairman, Donald L. Dotson, is no better, and the AFL-CIO will urge the Senate to reject the new nominee as well. As Assistant Secretary of Labor, Dotson hired as a top aide a former attorney for the National Right to Work Committee, the employer-financed outfit that fights union security laws. Previously, Dotson served as a labor relations attorney for Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., Westinghouse, and Western Electric. Dotson's career as a management lawyer does not prove him to have impartial views regarding unions.

After the Reagan Administration announced the nomination, several international unions reported that their dealings with Dotson as a management lawyer showed him to lack impartiality. Any union representative who has had professional contacts with Dotson should notify the AFL-CIO Legislative Department.

New Reagan Turkey: Tax Unemployment Benefits

Now that Reaganomics has pushed the unemployment rate to a post-war high of 10.4 percent, Reagan refuses to take any responsibility for the state of the economy. He blames Democrats, he blames previous Presidents, he blames everyone but himself.

At Thanksgiving the Administration tried a new tactic--blame the victims, the 11.6 million jobless Americans. Reagan advisors came up with a plan to tax unemployment benefits. Currently most jobless benefits, because they average only $115 per week, are exempt from federal tax.

A Reagan spokesman said that taxing unemployment checks would make unemployment "less attractive," and "a lot of people would get off unemployment and seek jobs." He was echoing U.S. Chamber of Commerce President Richard Lesher, who said the way to reduce joblessness is to "make it less attractive for people to sit on their ass."

The callous Reagan proposal came under heavy fire and was dropped only hours after it was announced. But the Administration did not drop its other bad ideas to solve unemployment, such as creating a sub-minimum wage, or giving more tax cuts to corporations. They'll probably push them at Christmas.

End-of-Session Wrap-Up of Major Labor Issues

SUCCESS! BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT BEATEN DECISIVELY IN THE HOUSE

Labor won one of its biggest victories on Capitol Hill as the House of Representatives rejected the Constitutional amendment to force balanced federal budgets. The 236-187 vote was far short of the two-thirds majority required to change the Constitution.

The AFL-CIO objected to the budget measure on the grounds that it would force enormous cuts in Social Security and all other programs, would prevent Congress from taking action to stop recession and restore jobs, and would write Reaganomics into the U.S. Constitution.

The balanced budget fight now moves to the states. Already 31 states have passed resolutions calling for a Constitutional Convention to consider a balanced budget amendment. If three more states do so, we could face the first such convention since the founding fathers met to draft the Constitution.

IMMIGRATION REFORM: The Senate has passed an immigration reform bill; the AFL-CIO is supporting H.R. 6514 in the House only on the condition that an amendment to limit the "H-2" program receive majority support before H.R. 6514 goes to the floor. "H-2" allows for importation of temporary foreign workers.

LONGSHORE WORKERS' COMPENSATION: The House Education and Labor Committee is conducting hearings on amendments to the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. The bill under consideration in the House includes major improvements over the Senate-passed bill. There may be too little time in the lame-duck session to achieve House passage and conference.

"REGULATORY REFORM": The Senate has already passed legislation that could delay federal agencies as they try to implement and enforce laws passed by Congress. The AFL-CIO is urging the House leadership not to take up this complex legislation in the brief lame-duck session.

NATURAL GAS PRICES: Despite a glut of natural gas and lower producer prices, the cost of natural gas to consumers could jump as much as 60 percent in some parts of the nation this winter because of unfair deals forced upon pipeline operators by gas producers. Yet the Reagan Administration remains committed to speeding decontrol of gas prices, allowing even greater windfalls for the major oil companies. Urge your Representative and Senators to oppose faster decontrol of natural gas prices.

House votes highway, transit bill

Grim statistics of rising unemployment are recorded on the marquee of the AFL-CIO building.

10.8% rate 'shocking'

Kirkland asks action as jobs crisis mounts

By James M. Shevis

The numbers from the Bureau of Labor Statistics told only part of the story: November unemployment, at 10.8 percent of the workforce, was at its highest level since 1940 when the average for the year was 14.6 percent.

Officially, 12 million Americans who looked for work last month could not find it. But added to that were 1.6 million jobless workers who were too discouraged to look any longer and about 6.5-million others working shorter hours than they would like. Neither group is factored into the government jobless rate.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland described last month's sharp, four-tenths of 1 percent increase in unemployment as "shocking" and evidence that the economy is continuing its downward plunge.

Kirkland called on Congress to act immediately to alleviate the human suffering by passing jobs-creating legislation in addition to the highway bill pending in the current lame-duck session.

"Programs are already on the books that could produce one million jobs quickly and directly and ultimately help many more Americans," he observed. "All these programs require is funding.

"To wait two months until the new Congress gets down to work is to deny any hope to the millions of jobless Americans facing a bleak holiday season."

There was a consensus among both private and government economists that the unemployment rate—a "lagging indicator" of the state of the economy that responds to improving conditions later than other indicators—would probably go higher before it starts to come down.

"I have no crystal ball," Kirkland told reporters, "nor do I have any confidence in those who behave as though they did have crystal balls. All one can do is project past trends. In the absence of any concrete steps to turn it around and to interrupt that trend, it's going to get very, very bad. Much, much worse."

Two-month surge

Kirkland noted that unemployment has risen seven-tenths of 1 percent, or about three-quarters of a million people, in the past two months alone.

"The 10.8-percent jobless rate in November," he observed, "should finally silence those who have been painting rosy pictures of recovery."

Kirkland cited a list of economic stimulus programs already federally authorized and needing only funding that could put people to work immediately. These include urban and community development block grants, low-income weatherization

Deep recession heightens need for extended aid

The duration and severity of the Reagan Recession has made further extension of jobless benefits for the long-term unemployed a matter of utmost urgency, the AFL-CIO testified at House hearings.

Cutbacks in the extended unemployment compensation program that Congress imposed last year have pushed America's jobless "to the brink of economic disaster," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a House Ways & Means subcommittee.

Seidman, joined by Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten, welcomed a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Harold E. Ford (D-Tenn.) as "a considerable step" toward easing the hardships of some 2 million persons who have been jobless more than six months.

The legislation would build on the temporary program of federal supplemental benefits that Congress set up to run from last September to Mar. 31, 1983. That program provided 10 weeks of additional payments in states with the highest unemployment rates, and either six or eight weeks in other states.

The Ford bill would allow everyone who previously exhausted the benefits of that program an additional five weeks. For those who had not, the six, eight and 10-

Democrats seek added job stimulus

By David L. Perlman

A much-needed highway and mass transit bill capable of creating more than 300,000 new jobs passed the House by a 262-143 vote and seemed bound for Senate approval.

Still uncertain was whether other equally essential components of an economic recovery package would clear Congress during the final days of the lame-duck session.

House Democrats are putting together the ingredients of an anti-recession package to be tacked on to a "must-pass" funding resolution for government agencies.

The Senate Democratic caucus started down a different path with a proposal to expand the highway bill into a larger-scaled jobs program—including such elements as a $2 billion public works program, public housing rehabilitation and job retraining. The entire program would be funded by phasing down next July's income tax cut for persons making more than $50,000 a year.

By contrast, the House-passed highway and transit bill is funded through a 5-cent-a-gallon increase in the federal gasoline tax.

The AFL-CIO would prefer the Senate Democratic version, Legislative Director Ray Denison made clear. But it nevertheless vigorously supports the basic highway-transit bill and is not opposing the gasoline tax rise because the need is so great.

Pressing problem

"Record unemployment and deteriorating highways and transit facilities are problems that cannot wait until the new Congress gets down to work next year," Denison wrote House and Senate members.

His letter urged "full retention" of Davis-Bacon Act coverage provided in the similar bills cleared by House and Senate Public Works Committee. It opposed any attempts that might be made to weaken existing labor protections for transit workers. And it urged that the bills be improved by stronger "buy American" provisions.

In the House, the Davis-Bacon safe-

'Victimizing workers'

Health benefit tax scheme scored

By Susan Dunlop

The AFL-CIO is firmly opposed to a proposal floated by the Reagan Administration to slap a tax on workers' health insurance benefits.

Karen Ignagni, assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Social Security, called the plan to tax workers for a good part of health care benefits paid by employers "another way of victimizing workers and their families."

Ignagni said such a tax would "reduce health care coverage, do nothing to control soaring medical costs, and it represents an unnecessary government intrusion into the collective bargaining process."

Trial balloons floated by the Administration call for placing a limit on tax-free employer contributions to the health insurance coverage of their workers. Currently, employers can deduct this cost as a business expense, yet it is not considered part of a worker's taxable income.

The scheme being pushed by the Administration and some of its supporters in Congress would cap the amount an employer could pay in tax-free coverage. Workers would be required to pay income taxes on employer payments beyond the specified ceiling.

Flawed proposal

When the plan surfaced earlier this year, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison called it "an inequitable way to raise revenues." In a letter to Senate Finance Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.) Denison said the change would "disrupt" labor-management relations by forcing the reopening of agreements and "unduly influencing future negotiations."

Besides meddling in collective bargaining, Denison said, the proposed tax scheme would penalize workers in areas where medical costs are higher and discriminate against employees in groups with large numbers of older workers.

He pointed out that the tax would actually lead to a loss of insurance for many employees, who would be under pressure to choose lower cost, minimal coverage health plans. Workers would also be discouraged from joining health maintenance organizations and from obtaining preventive care, diagnostic services and early treatment, he said.

Contrary to the Administration's claims, the tax scheme would "do nothing to control soaring medical costs," Denison charged.

Management consultants

The union-buster's shadowy world

Meet the management consultant.

It's not easy, because he plies his trade in the recesses of the anti-union structure, invading the workplace under management's cloak.

You can feel his presence with the dissension and fear he creates. But you seldom know who he is.

He wants it that way.

Typical is Alfred T. DeMaria, a high-priced specialist in contriving union decertification elections. Profiled recently in the Washington Post, DeMaria prefers that unions don't know he's on the scene.

"I don't want the union to have the political advantage," he is quoted as saying. "They will tell the workers, 'Look, the company hired this guy from New York City.' I try not to let the union take that potshot at me. I don't think it's fair."

Yet DeMaria and the legion of 1,500 practicing union-busters think it's fair to advise employers on how to sidestep, circumvent and stretch the labor law to prevent workers from exercising their free choice of union representation. Employer violations of worker rights continue to soar.

Second of a series

There are no ground rules for union-busting campaigns. They're tailor-made for employers, whether in fighting union organizing, resisting a contract agreement or in fomenting union decertifications.

Common elements

But they have three common elements, according to the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations which investigated management consultant activities some years ago:

- Their principal agent is the "frontline" supervisor who carries out consultant strategies. In day-to-day contact with employees, the supervisor pushes the campaign while ferreting out employee sentiments to relay to management.
- Under the guiding hand of the consultant, the supervisor controls workplace communications, spreading management's message while keeping employees from hearing the union side.
- Behind the scenes, the consultant manipulates the campaign through delays and discharges to keep workers from exercising their rights through representation elections or collective bargaining agreements, despite the fact the federal law encourages these processes.

Supervisor's role

The frontline supervisor "is probably the most important aspect of the consultant-led campaign," the panel found.

From the supervisor, the consultant develops a "detailed, in-depth picture of just how each and every employee is likely to vote. The data, which can be updated frequently, is invaluable in designing and orchestrating the anti-union campaign."

With this information, the subcommittee report explains, the consultant "develops issues designed to capitalize on the employees' greatest concerns . . . weaknesses in the union's position are exploited and strengths attacked."

By this time, the consultant has transformed "the work environment into one of great anxiety and pressure which workers associate with the presence of a union."

When workers persist in their determination, the consultant tries to manipulate the law to avoid fair elections. Union supporters are fired, and each legal decision against the employer is appealed.

Justice delayed is justice denied, and the remedies of the National Labor Relations Act are insufficient to prevent this from happening.

The subcommittee found that consultants "lead" employers into violations "since the monetary cost of any possible legal liability is less than it might be if they had to deal with an organized workforce."

Each management consultant firm has its own techniques and strategies. Some are less subtle than others, but typical are these examples of several of the more notorious consultant firms.

'Biggest in the business'

Modern Management (MM), based in Deerfield, Ill., is a nationwide company best known for working with hospitals but with a broad clientele in insurance, manufacturing, retailing, banking and among universities. MM describes itself as "the biggest firm in the business."

It is also one of the most flagrant in giving advice to employers who end up violating the law. MM's campaign for St. Elizabeth's Hospital in Boston several years ago was typical: 38 unfair labor practice charges against the employer, including threats, intimidation, interrogation, surveillance, suspension and discharges for union activity.

Periodically, MM outlines its strategy for employers in management seminars, as it did in coast-to-coast sessions presented by Professional Seminar Associates on "Avoiding Unions."

When facing an organizing campaign, MM warns employers that "union attitudes" can be found among those with sympathy for the underdog or favoring "liberal causes," or active in tenant and consumer rights groups.

MM drafts a letter over the signature of the chief executive, explaining the company position in an effort to "impede, and if possible, defeat union efforts to obtain a showing of interest."

"The point," according to MM strategy, "is to spar aggressively and exploit opportunities without creating more interest in the subject than the situation requires."

MM tells management that workers should not be expected actually to withdraw union support as a result of these tactics. Rather, "the impression can be created that some employees actually want to withdraw, then doubts in the minds of others may be raised about the solidarity of existing union support."

Hand-carried messages

To make certain the messages reach the employees, MM advises they should be "personally hand carried by the supervisor to employees on work time, at their work stations."

As the campaign progresses, MM has a tactic it calls "counterpunching," which is to "create doubt in the minds of employees about the union's credibility and to remove doubts, if any, about the employer's temerity."

Supervisors, in MM's terminology, are "precinct captains . . . not neutrals, not spectators, they are involved."

MM strategy calls for isolating the union committee and union supporters. They are harassed and threatened with unsatisfactory work records, with verbal and written warnings, suspensions, and as a last resort, discharges.

When it finally comes to an election, MM tells management to seek as large a unit as possible, aiming at a ratio as low as one supervisor for each 10 employees. And then the stall when the NLRB processes begin:

"As a rule of thumb, go to a hearing—don't consent to an election," MM advises. "Time works on your behalf. Let them know you are prepared to go to a hearing." However, "if you get the time you want and the unit you want, then go for a stipulated election."

West Coast Industrial Relations Association (WCIRA) favors "ventilation meetings," described in a Los Angeles Times article a few years back:

"They were captive-audience meetings in which workers were called in during working hours, off the job, and they went into a room where they met one of the representatives of the West Coast Industrial Relations Association. In the first round they took people in groups from 8 to 12 to 15 at a time and meetings lasted from an hour to two hours. It took them a week to run almost all of the 800 employees through these sorts of meetings."

Mostly, the sessions elicited employee complaints about company personnel practices, with the WCIRA representatives indicating nothing could be done about it because of a pending union election.

Management promises

"They left it," the article said, "with a very strongly implied promise that if the people voted against the union the company was going to make improvements and changes concerning the problems that they heard employees raise."

In promoting decertification, another union-busting firm—University Research Center—favors probing deeply into employee sentiments: "To uncover employee thinking requires a sophisticated system of employee interviews and remedial response. . . . It has to be a systematic effort, continuous and handled with care.

"This is also the basic method used in all successful union-avoidance efforts, our research indicated. It is always wiser to strive to avoid unionization than attempt to decertify a union once it is in place."

When they aren't supplying union-busting strategy in company campaigns, consultants are selling their wares through seminars, usually running from one to three days and starting at a minimum $300 daily rate.

Here are some of the standard seminar subjects and sponsoring consultants:

"Making Unions Unnecessary" and "The Process of Decertification," Executive Enterprises; "Defending Union-Free Status," Criterion Development; "Update—Staying Union-Free," Western Carolina Industries; "Avoiding Unions," Professional Seminar Associates.

Ties to academia

To give greater legitimacy to their seminars, consultants frequently tie in with colleges and universities. Among those identified with courses on how to defeat or decertify unions are the University of Denver Law School, the Delaware Law School, the University of Baltimore School of Business and the University of Wisconsin Extension School.

"Seminars give the participants only a taste of what they might expect if they avail themselves of the more complete services of the seminar leader," the subcommittee report states. "They create the impression that the safest and best means of avoiding unionization is to hire the consultant."

House approves highway repair, mass transit measure guards were preserved by the defeat of three anti-labor amendments, no effort was made to weaken transit worker protections, and the "buy American" language was significantly strengthened.

For the first time, the highway bill specified that virtually all construction materials—including steel, cement and manufactured products—must be produced in the United States.

The labor-supported amendment offered by Rep. Douglas Applegate (D-Ohio) and adopted without a rollcall vote also tightens the preference for American-made buses and subway cars.

As passed, it requires that at least 50 percent of the cost of the component parts of the rolling stock be of domestic origin and that final assembly take place in the United States. The labor costs of the final assembly aren't counted toward the domestic share of the components.

Applegate and other supporters of his amendment argued that with unemployment so high, it would make no sense to use money earmarked for the program to buy goods abroad. For every $1,000 of domestic procurement, Applegate noted, $552 is returned to state, local and federal governments in the form of taxes on incomes, profit and social security.

The Administration has opposed such provisions, and a battle on the issue was anticipated in the Senate.

The imbalances between the states whose residents would pay disproportionately high amounts of gasoline tax and the states with proportionately more highway mileage than people almost sideswiped the legislation. But a compromise adopted by the House eased the problem by assuring that no state would get back less than 85 percent of its gasoline tax contribution. Other disputes have involved authority to run heavier and wider trucks on highways in exchange for new trucking taxes.

The gasoline tax, which would take effect Apr. 1, 1983, would raise about $5.5 billion in its first full year.

In another area of labor concern, the House Banking Committee is moving ahead with a housing authorization bill that would continue some programs the Administration wants to drop, add some new measures including a mortgage foreclosure assistance provision, and stay within budget limits that Congress has imposed.

A simultaneous effort was being made through the appropriations process to assure full funding within budget resolution limits of all assisted housing programs that have already been authorized. The AFL-CIO was among 13 national organizations, including federations of city, county and state governments, that joined in a memorandum to members of the House Appropriations Committee urging programs carrying $9.7 billion in new spending authority.

The Administration's labor-opposed Caribbean Basin Initiative tariff provisions seem to have been stalled in the House and there appeared to be no push behind the urban enterprise zone proposal touted by the President.

In an alert to senators, the AFL-CIO expressed opposition to a change in the federal bankruptcy law being pushed by the consumer credit industry. Its enactment, the federation said, would fall most heavily on recession victims who have been burdened by debts they can't pay off because of long unemployment.

Donahue tells conference:

Government role vital in restoration of cities

Providence, R.I.—America can't prosper if its cities are allowed to die, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue warned at a public affairs conference sponsored by Brown University and the Providence Journal.

Today's "shame of the cities" is neglect and decay, rather than corruption, Donahue insisted. He cited a pattern of collapsing streets, broken water mains, chronic breakdown of buses and subways, the understaffing of essential public services.

Even more damaging, he said, has been the abandonment of the concept of government as a "creative force" that "does for individuals what they can't do for themselves."

Donahue was one of nine nationally prominent speakers taking part in the three-day exploration of the plight of America's cities held on the Brown University campus. Participants ranged in viewpoint from Housing & Urban Development Sec. Samuel Pierce, Jr. to the Rev. Ralph Abernathy, the civil rights activist, and included the mayors of Detroit and Indianapolis, economists and urban planners.

"Without cities, you cannot have civilization," Donahue said. "The city is the exchange center where every kind of human enterprise finds its market and every sort of talent finds its showcase."

Cities have always been an annoyance to the world's rulers because "people get together there and discuss their grievances and try to devise remedies."

Donahue faulted the Reagan Administration's neglect of America's cities and its insistence that government should do as little as possible and rely on the forces of market economics.

Administration cuts

In fact, he stressed, the Administration has been providing big tax cuts for private business at the same time that it has been making huge cuts in public investment. But instead of producing jobs, the private sector has used the money for speculation that has forced up interest rates to the near-destruction of the automobile and housing industries, Donahue charged.

Meanwhile, he said, government has failed its responsibility to the education, health and housing needs of its people.

While unemployment has mounted to depression levels, the big difference in the 1930s was that President Roosevelt had Congress put "all of the resources of government into the struggle to stabilize and restore the economy," he said.

"The New Deal did the obvious, sensible thing in matching unemployed people with work that badly needed to be done, and the country has been a better place to live ever since," Donahue noted. The parks and playgrounds, highways and bridges, museums and zoos "have paid for themselves a hundred times over."

By contrast, Donahue said, the Reagan Administration's "enterprise zone" proposal of tax breaks and giveaways to attract low-paying firms from one depressed area to another "would not create any new jobs and therefore would create no new customers, no incentives to expand production."

Labor's program for economic recovery does not rely solely on government, Donahue reminded the conference participants. It includes "investment from every source, including union-negotiated pension funds which are often cited as the largest single pool of private investment capital."

Development and revival

He stressed the need to develop new industries and modernize older ones, to build both public and private housing and to shape tax policies "based on ability to pay rather than ability to extort favored treatment."

The role of government must be defended and praised, Donahue urged. "We ought to put an end, once and for all, to mocking it, debunking it and weakening it."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Donahue explores the crisis of the cities.

Coalition pushes U.S. processing of farm exports

A union-industry coalition is rallying support for a congressional resolution aimed at expanding the processed product share of American agricultural exports and curbing unfair trade practices of U.S. competitors.

The newly formed Export-Processing Industry Coalition (EPIC) said an increase in processed farm exports would stimulate the country's battered economy by creating jobs, generating business activity and raising personal income.

Joining the drive for passage of the measure are the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., and 10 federation affiliates, as well as a number of agricultural, manufacturing and shipping associations. Companion resolutions, which call on President Reagan to revise U.S. foreign trade policies to expand product processing before export, are now before House and Senate committees.

With unemployment over 10 percent and more than 11 million people out of work, "we have to look at initiatives" to create jobs, said Nolan W. Hancock, legislative director of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and EPIC legislative coordinator.

More jobs, reopened plants

"Processing agricultural products here before shipment overseas would create thousands of jobs and reopen plants that have been shut down," he said at a Washington press conference.

In addition to increased employment at grain and oilseed processing plants, jobs also would be created in transportation, packaging, process supplies and other service industries, EPIC said. State, local and federal governments would gain substantial tax revenues, the group added.

"If an additional 10 percent of the U.S. wheat now exported were turned into flour before shipment, it would generate $1.2 billion and provide 122,000 more American jobs," he said, citing a Dept. of Agriculture study.

The same economic effect would apply to corn, soybeans and other commodities now being exported primarily as raw materials, Hancock said.

Unions participating in EPIC, besides OCAW, are the Allied Industrial Workers; Grain Millers; Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers; Molders; Operating Engineers; Woodworkers, Carpenters, Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, and the Steelworkers.

OSHA again defers deadline on lead engineering controls

For the third time this year the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has postponed requirements for engineering controls on worker exposure to lead in the primary and secondary smelting and battery manufacturing industries.

OSHA said it has decided to delay the requirement to avoid higher costs for the three industries while the agency completes a review of its 1981 lead-exposure standard.

Last June, OSHA postponed a June 29 deadline until Aug. 30. It subsequently put the compliance requirement off again until Nov. 15. The latest postponement could last until March 1984 or longer. The agency said it expects to propose a revision of its lead standard next March, and any proposed changes wouldn't take effect until a year after that.

Employers sought delay

The industries, which employ primarily auto and steel workers, asked OSHA to put off the compliance requirement indefinitely, arguing that if OSHA decided to alter the engineering control requirement, the value of the compliance plans would be negated.

"This is just another example of OSHA's weakening of the existing regulation," said industrial hygienist Margaret Seminario of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health.

Although OSHA maintains that it keeps in effect and enforces existing regulations while reviewing standards, "that's just not true," Seminario charged. OSHA merely "pays lip service" to compliance with existing regulations, she said.

OSHA said that to develop a compliance plan an employer would need to conduct an industrial hygiene survey, including environmental sampling, to identify sources of lead exposure and then devise methods to reduce exposure to within the permissible limit of 50 micrograms of lead per cubic meter of air.

OSHA said that if reconsideration of the lead standard led to a change in the mix of engineering controls and respirators required to meet the lead exposure limit, or to a conclusion that the 50 micrograms of lead per cubic meter of air is not feasible for some industries by engineering controls alone, employers would have to make major, costly alterations.

Another requirement, that employers develop more general compliance plans, remains in effect, the agency said, because it does not involve "excessive, unnecessary expenditures."

Exposure to excessive levels of lead can cause damage to the kidneys and nervous system, serious blood disorders, sterility and death.

'Discouragement' high among jobless blacks

Ann Arbor, Mich.—Ten percent of the U.S. population is black, but blacks account for 20 percent of the unemployed and nearly 40 percent of jobless workers classified as "discouraged" because they have had given up the search for work.

An article in Economic Outlook USA, the quarterly published by the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research, says the higher rate of discouragement of blacks is highly concentrated among youth, women, older persons and the unskilled.

House rejects new attacks on Davis-Bacon

The House upheld Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage standards by defeating three labor-opposed amendments to the highway repair and mass transit bill.

It rejected, 223-174, an attempt to exempt construction funded by the legislation from Davis-Bacon requirements of locally prevailing wages and benefits. The amendment's sponsors, Rep. Charles W. Stenholm (D-Tex.) and Rep. Arlan Stangeland (R-Minn.), argued that more jobs could be provided by paying workers less.

By an even stronger 217-149 margin, the House defeated an amendment by Rep. Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.) that would have had the same effect indirectly. It would have allowed the Secretary of Transportation to waive Davis-Bacon requirements if he was of the "opinion" that enforcing the law would limit "legitimate job opportunities."

The closest vote, 194-191, amounted to a setback to the Administration's attempt to reduce Davis-Bacon coverage through changes in regulations.

At issue in this dispute was the interpretation of the Davis-Bacon Act language that was part of the 1956 Federal Aid Highway Act, which provides for predominantly federal funding of highways and major roads.

The law refers to coverage of "initial construction," which over the years has been interpreted to include all major resurfacing, restoration and rehabilitation work. Only routine maintenance and minor repairs for which federal funds were not provided have been considered exempt from coverage.

But the Federal Highway Administration has reinterpreted the provision to mean that only entirely new construction should be covered by Davis-Bacon.

To make clear that Congress does not go along with that interpretation, the House Public Works Committee included in the new legislation a Davis-Bacon clause that eliminated the qualifying "initial" before the word "construction." If the Senate did likewise, the Administration's attempt to reduce coverage would be thwarted.

Rep. Buddy Roemer (D-La.) sought to restore the phrase "initial construction" by amendment, arguing that the committee had expanded Davis-Bacon coverage by the change.

But House Public Works Chairman James J. Howard (D-N.J.), who was instrumental in beating back all of the attacks on Davis-Bacon protections, countered that it was supporters of the amendment who wanted to change an interpretation that had prevailed for some 25 years.

Chrysler pact keyed to vote on new offer

Toronto — The Auto Workers scheduled a ratification vote Dec. 12 on a tentative new contract with the Chrysler Corp. in Canada that could end a five-week-old strike by some 10,000 workers and influence bargaining for Chrysler workers in the United States.

If the agreement is approved, UAW Canadian Director Robert White said, the Chrysler employees could return to work the next day. White did not disclose the economic terms of the settlement, but earlier this week the union turned down a 30-cent-an-hour wage increase offered by the company, saying it was inadequate.

The Canadian workers struck the company Nov. 5 because the auto maker would not grant them an immediate pay raise. The walkout had a ripple effect on American workers making parts for cars built in Canada, forcing the layoff of 4,600.

UAW President Douglas Fraser, who came here to rekindle the talks after they had faltered a day earlier, said negotiations on a new contract covering some 43,000 Chrysler workers in the United States would continue at the company's headquarters in Highland Park, Mich. U.S. workers, who rejected an earlier Chrysler proposal, also want an immediate pay rise, but have voted not to strike.

Both in Canada and in the United States, Chrysler workers are paid considerably less than their counterparts at Ford and General Motors. Over the past three years, they have made substantial wage concessions to help the company recover from financial difficulties.

Mutual satisfaction

"It's been a very difficult set of negotiations, and the economic settlement satisfies us," the UAW's White told reporters. Chrysler officials said they were pleased with the agreement, and noted in a statement that "it paves the way for the immediate return to work of all our employees before the holidays. Chrysler workers will be eligible for six days of holiday pay if they are back at work by Dec. 23.

Negotiations on non-monetary contract issues involving the Canadian workers were proceeding, but if the wage terms were accepted the strike could end, White said.

Earlier, the company and the union tentatively agreed to a September 1984 expiration date for any final pact they might reach.

As unemployment mounts

An emergency extension of federal supplemental unemployment benefits received strong labor support at hearings by a House Ways & Means subcommittee. AFL-CIO witnesses discuss the urgent issue with Subcommittee Chairman Harold E. Ford (D-Tenn.). Business survey confirms sluggish recovery outlook

Don't count on the big corporations to lead the country to economic recovery on the strength of increased investment.

That's the bottom line of a Louis Harris survey commissioned by Business Week magazine and conducted early last month. An overwhelming 90 percent of some 600 high officials with 1,200 major companies said their policy will be to try to increase output without adding significantly to their workforces.

While employment in a recovery normally lags other signs of improvement, the level of opinion for holding down hiring is disturbingly high, the Harris poll revealed.

The survey supports the views of those economists who see relatively sluggish growth when recovery from the Reagan Recession—now 16 months old—finally gets under way.

Another poll—of purchasing managers at 350 industrial companies—confirmed that the economy continued to sink in November with no indication of an upturn in sight. Production, new orders, and employment all were down last month and inventories continue to be reduced, the National Association of Purchasing Managers said.

"The industrial sector is still declining, with poor vital signs," the group reported.

And the business-oriented Conference Board, at an economic forum in New York City, forecast a recovery next year but one that will fall "far short" of those that have followed previous recessions.

The forum's 13 economic analysts predicted that real gross national product, or the value of the total output of goods and services, will grow by only 2.7 percent in 1983, while unemployment "will remain a serious problem, averaging 9.8 percent." Inflation will be 4.8 percent, down from 6 percent this year, the panel said.

At the same time, the Commerce Dept. reported that new orders to the nation's recession-staggered factories plunged to their lowest level in more than two weeks in October. With an increase in new orders needed for any near-term recovery, the latest news dealt a major setback to hopes for economic improvement soon.

Lower auto output

Meanwhile, domestic auto makers said they will trim their production plans in December, and called for a 4 percent reduction in the number of vehicles over the month. At that rate, the industry will likely end the year with output of about 5.1-million units, or 18 percent fewer than last year's depressed level of 6.2-million units.

The Harris survey for Business Week also discovered that big companies apparently have resolved to push up output in the event of a modest recovery without resorting to large-scale capital financing. The Administration has long claimed that business tax incentives would boost capital investment but, by 83 to 12 percent, corporate executives rejected much new capital financing in advance of a strong recovery.

The biggest agreement was in the area of office management costs. About 80 percent of the respondents to the Harris poll said their firms likely would invest in devices to cut white-collar labor costs. Some 76 percent also said they would probably invest in labor-saving equipment on the factory floor.

Extended aid for long-term jobless sought week entitlements would be increased to a flat 13 weeks in every state.

The Steelworkers and the Auto Workers testified along with the AFL-CIO in support of an additional benefit period, but the Reagan Administration sent word that it needed more time to assess the need.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan wrote Ford asking that consideration of the legislation be put off until the new Congress convenes.

Instead, the subcommittee later that day unanimously approved the measure, clearing it for action by the full Ways & Means Committee.

Seidman reiterated the AFL-CIO's preference for a more comprehensive and permanent supplemental benefit program that would provide an additional 26 weeks of payments funded by general revenues rather than the payroll tax.

But if a comprehensive reform can't be achieved immediately, "prompt enactment" of the Ford bill is needed to deal with a growing emergency.

Seidman noted that only about 5 million of the nearly 12 million Americans officially counted as without jobs are receiving unemployment compensation under the regular state program, the sharply curtailed extended benefits program, or the stop-gap federal supplemental benefits program. Already, he noted, 135,000 persons have exhausted federal supplemental benefits, and the promised economic recovery appears more and more distant.

Ill-considered cuts

Ironically, he reminded the Ways & Means subcommittee, duration of benefits now is substantially shorter than in less serious recessions of past years "as the result of ill-considered restrictions demanded by the Reagan Administration and imposed by Congress."

Seidman and McGlotten stressed the AFL-CIO's strong advocacy of employment programs that would "put people back to work." But meanwhile, workers left jobless are approaching desperation, they stressed.

Film shows job factor in pension investments

The Operating Engineers have produced a film exploring the job-creating potential of channeling pension fund investments into union-built construction projects.

The 25-minute, 16mm film, titled "Our Pensions, Our Money, Our Jobs," points out that about $200 billion in pension fund money could go to such investments.

Because pension funds are really a form of deferred wages, the plans belong to their participants and must be used to promote and protect the best interest of union workers, the film stresses.

Information on the film can be obtained from the International Union of Operating Engineers, 1125 - 17th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20006, 202-429-9100. Prints are also available from the AFL-CIO Film Library and the Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Clinch River project support tied to energy, job concerns

A union-business-public interest alliance is calling for the completion of the Clinch River breeder reactor as a key step in U.S. energy development and a needed source of jobs.

Funding bills for the nuclear energy demonstration project are encountering stiff opposition in House and Senate committees which are considering appropriations for fiscal year 1983.

Pressing the case for continued funding of the project is the Committee on Jobs, Environment & Technology (CJET), chaired by President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The broad-based coalition includes the NAACP, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, General Federation of Women's Clubs, national business organizations and affiliates of the BCTD.

In announcing the formation of CJET, Georgine said that while support for the Clinch River project is an immediate priority, the committee will deal with a number of energy and technical issues.

Georgine described the $3.6-billion project at Oak Ridge, Tenn., "a prudent and vital investment" in the country's future.

The reactor, which would be linked to the TVA energy grid when completed, is intended as a demonstration of the commercial feasibility of generating electricity by using plutonium as fuel. It would actually produce more plutonium than it would use in making electricity.

Noting that $1.4 billion has already been spent on the project, Georgine warned that it would cost up to $1.9 billion to terminate it—slightly less than the cost of completion.

Funding measures

The Dept. of Energy funding bill now before the House Appropriations Committee would provide $227 million for fiscal '83; a companion bill in the Senate would provide $195 million.

In addition to generating energy, Georgine said the Clinch River reactor would produce more than enough revenue for the government to recover its original investment. He also stressed that the construction work would be responsible for about 8,000 jobs, about half of them at Clinch River.

Vote near on auto content

The domestic auto content bill was cleared for House action and the AFL-CIO urged its passage without weakening amendments.

The legislation would require foreign auto companies selling more than 100,000 cars a year in the United States to include a minimum percentage of "added domestic value" through use of U.S. workers or American-manufactured parts. Firms selling 900,000 cars would have to meet a 90 percent domestic content standard by 1986.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said its enactment would take the automobile and auto parts industries "off the list of endangered U.S. industries while creating jobs for hundreds of thousands of American workers."

Its ripple effect would help the entire economy, he stressed.

33 Opportunities for labor studies

For the first half of 1983—the 14th and busiest year of its operation—the George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer 33 institutes, workshops and programs. All but five will be held at the 47-acre campus in Silver Spring, Md.

Course descriptions begin on the next page. Subjects range from organizing techniques and grievance arbitration to the organizational use of computers, how to deal with the news media, effective union actions for civil rights, and union skills for union women.

These courses are open to all full-time officers, representatives and staff employees of AFL-CIO affiliates. There is no charge for tuition. An application to enroll for any of these programs is included in this issue.

In addition to these multi-union programs, 23 staff training sessions at the George Meany Center will be sponsored by 13 AFL-CIO unions for their own leaders. The American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) will sponsor three six-week programs for Spanish-speaking union officers from Latin American countries.

During the 12 months of 1982, a total of 3,856 union leaders attended classes at the George Meany Center. The Center sponsored 48 institutes, workshops or programs open to full-time representatives of AFL-CIO affiliates. The affiliates sponsored 51 training sessions for their own personnel, including seven by Departments of the AFL-CIO.

AIFLD sponsored training courses on campus for six groups of trade unionists from Latin America.

The Center's facilities are booked almost solidly through June. However, cancellations occasionally free some space. AFL-CIO unions interested in using the Center's facilities should contact Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., Executive Director, or Janis Strange, Registrar, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903; telephone 301/431-6400.

★ Education Techniques

Jan. 9-14

This institute explains and demonstrates the techniques most commonly used in labor education. It is designed for those who teach in union conferences, summer schools or night classes. Co-sponsored with the AFL-CIO Department of Education, this is a basic institute for union staff members who want to upgrade their teaching skills.

Individual sessions will explain and demonstrate a number of techniques—lecture, discussion, buzz groups, role playing, films, and use of materials. These sessions will lay out when and how to use various techniques, and help participants understand the learning theory that underlies methods in labor education.

Practice teaching is an important part of the program. Each participant will teach two short sessions, in a small group with an expert instructor to critique.

★ Psychology for Union Leaders

Jan. 16-21

The position of union leader is a stressful job; union leaders are always giving of themselves, always acting with, and reacting to, others.

Some of the stress may be reduced if you understand yourself, the people, and groups you deal with. Such understanding makes you a more effective leader; that is the purpose of the Psychology for Union Leaders institute.

To accomplish this, the institute is structured as follows:

The first day the class focuses on the individual. Why do we do what we do? What motivates a union member? How can we deal with the stresses of the job?

The second day is devoted to an analysis of leadership styles. You will come away knowing what kind of leader you are. A super leader? A chaplain type leader? A compromiser? A task master? You'll understand, also, that you can shift into other styles when it is appropriate.

The third day's program will explore group dynamics; how committees can become more effective and how good decisions are made.

On the fourth day the class will learn about systems analysis. How departments within the larger organization can all pull together.

Finally, on the fifth day we discuss how all these skills can be usefully applied back home on your job.

Running through the week will be a mini-course in public speaking; video tape will be used so you can see yourself as others see you.

★ Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration

Jan. 16-21

This institute will examine the experience of unions with both interest arbitration and fact finding. There is now considerable experience with the arbitration of contract terms, particularly in the public sector. Many states require interest arbitration for the protective services and a few require it for all public employee disputes. In other states it is offered as an alternative, or may be agreed to by the parties.

This institute will examine the variety of forms of interest arbitration, and the use of fact-finding as a way of settling public employee contract impasses. It will also analyze the impact on bargaining and the strategies that are effective with the various forms of interest arbitration. Attention will be paid to the preparation of both fact-finding and interest arbitration cases.

★ Arbitration: Preparation and Presentation

Offered twice:
Jan. 16-21 at the University of Oregon, Eugene and
Feb. 27-Mar. 4 at the George Meany Center

The way to learn to prepare and present grievance cases to an arbitrator is to do it. That learning is best done at an institute such as this when a union member's future is not at stake.

This institute concentrates on the presentation of mock cases before practicing, professional arbitrators who are willing to share their knowledge freely with the participants. The cases are carefully selected to be "real" and for their learning value.

During the week, there are practice sessions on the preparation of cases, the techniques of presentation with emphasis on two areas that union representatives find most difficult: opening statements and handling witnesses.

Participants tell us that the most helpful part of this week is the video taping of the mock arbitration proceeding, with the playbacks used as a basis for analysis and discussion. The arbitrator who has heard the case takes charge of this session.

There are discussions of what matters can be arbitrated, the selection of arbitrators and the law of arbitration. Since discipline and discharge cases are the cause of more than half of all grievance arbitrations, special attention is paid to the investigation of cases and to the rules which arbitrators use in deciding them.

★ Pension Bargaining

Offered twice:
Jan. 23-27 at the University of California, Berkeley and
May 8-12 at the George Meany Center

At the bargaining table, pension negotiators face a double-barreled cost problem: trying to keep benefit levels in step with inflation and, at the same time, meeting the increased administrative costs imposed by ERISA, the pension reform act.

The George Meany Center is continuing its series of pension courses covering the basics of pension planning, analysis of pension reports, and the actuarial, legal and administrative impact of ERISA. In addition, special attention will be given to investment policy.

The teaching staff for this institute includes union pension specialists, labor lawyers, actuaries and investment consultants.

The course is designed for union staff members who have negotiating responsibility as well as for pension administrators and labor trustees of pension funds.

Coordinators: Russell Allen and Joe Swire

★ Institute for Building Trades Business Agents

Offered twice:
Jan. 23-28 at the George Meany Center and
Feb. 27-Mar. 4 at the University of Oregon, Eugene

This institute is offered in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Department. Its purpose is to address problems faced by business agents in areas such as health and safety, Davis-Bacon wage determination and enforcement, labor law, the pension reform law, the legislative program of the Department, jurisdictional disputes organizing developments and other issues of current interest to building trades leaders.

Because of the special nature of this program, the usual limit on registration from any one union does not apply.

Coordinator: Fred K. Hoehler, Jr.

★ Negotiating Techniques for Bargaining with State & Local Agencies

Feb. 6-11

This Institute on Collective Bargaining Techniques is limited to participants concerned with negotiations in the public sector, other than Federal. (The latter is a whole, separate ball game). One day will be spent on the basic principles of collective bargaining and on proper preparation, with emphasis on analyzing budgets and audits .

Participants will be assigned to union and management committees and will attempt to bargain out an agreement in a typical public sector situation. Experienced factfinder-mediators will be on hand and will be assigned to the simulations if an agreement has not been reached. They will be given the kind of authority that such neutrals usually have.

★ Introduction to Computers

Feb. 6-11

Pop quiz: how many of these terms can you define?

- Hardware ☐
- Software ☐
- Mainframe ☐
- Database ☐
- COM ☐
- I/O's ☐

All these terms will be explained at the Introduction to Computers Seminar. Not only explained—but explained in layman's terms by specialists who understand the labor movement as well as the technology.

If your union is thinking of converting to a computer system this will be a good introduction to the subject.

The program will include these topics:

- What a computer can do.
- What hardware is.
- What software is.
- How to assess the computer size for your organization;
- Comparison shopping for computers and services;
- Where and how to get your data;
- Who will run the computer;
- What outside technicians will be needed;
- What training for your staff;
- Experiences of unions with computers;

You will visit and inspect the AFL-CIO computer center.

Coordinator: Lisa Portman

★ Organizing Techniques I

Offered twice:
Feb. 13-18, and June 19-24

This program is for full-time international or local union staff members who have responsibility for organizing activities.

Participants will discuss the changing nature of the work force. A simulated organizing exercise will be used to teach the mechanics of an organizing campaign. The exercise will be video taped so that participants can see themselves in action as organizers. They will work with prospective members, using worker interviews to determine interests and issues. They will discuss methods of developing leaders and making an organizing committee work effectively.

The course de-emphasizes the legalistic approach to organizing, but it will cover the law on organizing and Labor Board procedure—from the organizer's viewpoint.

Participants will study sophisticated anti-union techniques being used by employers and labor relations consultants to defeat workers' efforts to organize. Countervailing measures will be suggested.

Coordinators: Russell Allen and Harry Millstone

★ Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications

Feb. 27-Mar. 4

This workshop for union editors will concentrate on newswriting, feature writing, and headline writing. Classes will include daily writing assignments.

Participants will be asked to bring copies of their publications for analysis and evaluation .

Participants will hear from specialists on:

- How to make a union publication more readable, more credible, and more useful to union members;
- How to cope with problems of delayed mail deliveries and skyrocketing postal rates;
- How to avoid suits for libel and slander and copyright infringement.

One session on editorial resources will let editors know where to find cartoons, photos and other feature materials.

This workshop, cosponsored by the International Labor Press Association, is for any union editor or would-be editor of a local, district, council or state publication.

Coordinator: Gordon Cole

Labor Law

Mar. 6-11

Some knowledge of the laws that regulate labor unions grows increasingly important to all union officers and staff members. Issue after issue is being tested in the courts, bringing occasionally conflicting decisions and sometimes what seems a revision of the law.

Also, the NLRB shifts with new appointments, and it attempts to avoid court reversals. Even someone with a better than average awareness of labor laws, needs periodic updates on "what they've done to us lately."

The subjects covered at this institute are taught by prominent labor lawyers. The topics will include:

- Laws Governing Internal Union Affairs—Included here is Title I (members' bill of rights) and Title IV (election procedures) of Landrum-Griffin (Labor-Management Relations and Disclosure Act).
- Organizing and the Law—This Taft-Hartley Act session will cover campaign procedures, recognition, representation, unit determination, NLRB conduct of elections, and unfair labor practices.
- Bargaining and the Law—An analysis of Taft-Hartley continues with duty to bargain, good faith bargaining, subjects of bargaining, access to data, picketing, and secondary boycotts.
- Duty of Fair Representation—How far are unions obliged to go to represent members equitably under the law?
- Laws of Equal Opportunity—This class provides a better understanding of the Equal Pay Act, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the Age Discrimination Act. The implications of Supreme Court decisions will be included.
- Employee Retirement Income and Security Act—The current status, as it keeps evolving, of the ERISA law will be reviewed.
- The Occupational Safety and Health Act—The current status of this law will also be reviewed.

Union Skills for Union Women

Mar. 20-25

What does unionism mean to women? Obviously all the benefits of the labor movement are vital to women workers, but many problems particularly affect women that unions are increasingly addressing: pay equity, opportunities for non-traditional jobs, child care, freedom from sexual harassment, and the health and safety problems on their jobs.

Changes of recent years have brought more women into union activities. There are more women in the workforce—42 percent are women. Those fortunate enough to belong to a union are becoming active as stewards and local union officers. The number of women on union staffs has increased dramatically. These leaders, often undertaking new responsibilities, want training in leadership skills. They need to understand union structure and functioning, how to organize their work and how to be effective in that structure.

The institute will focus on both of these areas. It will provide:

- Training in skills women need to be competent in their union jobs
- Facts and perspective on issues important to working women in bargaining, organizing and day-to-day union administration.

Coordinators: Lisa Portman and Marjorie Rachlin

Mini Computers for Union Locals

Offered three times:
Apr. 5-8 at the University of California, Berkeley and
Apr. 24-29 and
June 26-July 1 at the George Meany Center

If your time and money are limited but you need to investigate computers, this survey course will help you. It can save you time, money and confusion. It is intended for local union officers who need a brief but thorough introduction to mini-computers before they set off on an expensive shopping expedition. It will cover:

Technical Aspects—The three days will be packed with information about hardware, software, computer language and other technical matters. Word processors and mini-computers will be exhibited at the Center so you can experience these "user-friendly" machines directly.

Data Base—What information will you computerize? Much of the data already exists in your records and can be electronically encoded to help your financial procedures and your membership records.

Purchase Considerations—Advice on finding reliable vendors and consultants will be offered. Service and purchase contracts will be discussed and recommendations for networking compatibility stressed.

Personnel—The new system will require new procedures; this means staff retraining and perhaps reassignment. Considerations of hiring technicians also arise. The change-over can be managed without causing personnel upheaval.

Security—Your records contain valuable information that should remain confidential and tamper-proof. Several kinds of security checks can be designed into your system.

The seminar will be taught in jargon-free language by union-related specialists who understand local union procedures. No prior computer knowledge is expected of the students.

How to Deal with the News Media

April 10-15

This is an institute to help union officers, international representatives and business agents make more effective use of the news media, to tell labor's story on television, cable and radio and in the press.

Sessions will be devoted to giving interviews, handling hostile questions, speaking more effectively in front of TV cameras, conducting news conferences, taping "actualities" for radio, and developing news releases that attract attention.

Speaking classes will be conducted in front of a video camera so participants can evaluate their own performances.

This program is co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Information Department.

Nondiscriminatory policy for students

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Inc. admits students of any sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin to all the rights, privileges, programs, and activities generally accorded or made available to students at the school. It does not discriminate on the basis of sex, age, race, color, national and ethnic origin in administration of its educational policies, scholarship and loan programs and athletic and other school-administered programs.

Who Is Eligible: General Rules

Eligibility

To participate in Labor Studies Institutes or programs at the George Meany Center, one must be a full-time officer, representative or staff employee of an AFL- CIO affiliate.

Registration

Early registration is advised. Labor Studies Institutes are limited to 25 participants, not more than three from the same union. The Center reserves the right to postpone or cancel any institute.

Hours

Registration for most Labor Studies Institutes begins at 4 p.m. on Sundays with the first session scheduled at 7 p.m., Sunday. Morning classes begin at 9 a.m. running until noon. They resume at 1:30 p.m. and run until 4:30 p.m. Advance notice will be given of evening events.

Accommodations

Unless their homes are within easy commuting distance, participants are expected to live on campus. The campus guest quarters can house 141. Most of the rooms are singles with queen-size beds; a few rooms are doubles with twin beds. Each room has its own private bathroom and study desk. Maid service is furnished. The rooms are spacious and pleasant. Participants are invited to bring their spouses.

Meals

Meals are served cafeteria style in the Dining Hall. Breakfast is from 7:30-8:30 a.m.; lunch, 12-1; dinner 6-7 p.m. weekdays. Wakeup calls are made at 7 a.m. for all students.

Costs

There is no tuition charge for a labor studies institute, workshop or program sponsored by the George Meany Center. Room and board charge for a student in residence is $60 a day, single occupancy; $45 a day, double occupancy. This includes three meals. Students who commute are charged $30 which covers lunches at the Center.

Deposit

A deposit is required with each application for registration in an institute, workshop or program at the George Meany Center. For students who do not live in the area, the deposit is $60 which will be credited to the final bill for room and board. For commuters living in the Washington, D.C. area the deposit is $30. Those applying for an institute at the University of California, Berkeley, or the University of Oregon, Eugene, must enclose a deposit of $25.

The deposit is refundable if registration is cancelled and notice of cancellation is received by the Wednesday before the beginning of the program. Please make check payable to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The Center asks each participant to settle for the bill by cash, personal check, American Express, Master Charge, Visa or Bank Americard before leaving the campus.

Dress

Dress is informal at all times. Those who want to take part in athletic activities should bring sports clothes.

Discipline

A labor studies institute is no junket. All who come should do so with serious purpose. All sessions start on time. Participants are expected to be prompt. The Labor Studies Center is free to cancel anyone's registration at any time.

Certificates of Completion

Participants will be expected to attend all sessions. The Center will award certificates on the basis of full attendance.

Deposits will be refunded if notice of cancellation is received by the Wednesday prior to the beginning of the program. Please make all checks payable to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Advanced Organizing Techniques Workshop

Apr. 10-22

This two-week institute on Advanced Organizing Techniques is co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Department of Organization and Field Services. Registration for this course is restricted.

Participants will be chosen from those nominated by organizing directors and union officials. Priority will be given to experienced organizers with the responsibility for directing organizing staffs. Total registration is limited to 30; no more than three will be accepted from any one national or international union.

The program includes the problems of organizing both large and small units and special approaches where a union is involved in a re-run election.

Effective Union Action for Civil Rights

Apr. 17-21

The AFL-CIO Civil Rights Department's annual conference on Effective Union Action for Civil Rights is planned especially for Civil Rights and Women's Rights Designees of unions affiliated with the AFL-CIO. The conference is useful as well for all union staff members and elected officers interested in this important subject.

The conference includes reports and discussion on important current issues of civil rights activities and law. Participants have an opportunity to exchange ideas with responsible government officials, with academics and leaders of organizations with a particular commitment to civil rights and equal opportunity.

Coordinator: Jacqueline Brophy

Unions in the Year 2000

May 1-6

The purpose of this institute is to discuss current social and economic trends and to explore the problems and opportunities that they present for organized labor through the year 2000.

Discussion will focus on:

Changes in the Economy—Sectors of economic growth; problems of employment and inflation; composition of the labor force; taxes and income distribution; the effects of change on jobs and productivity; and new problems in foreign trade.

The American System of Government—New forces in politics and their influence on political aims and effectiveness.

The American System of Unionism—Equal rights and equal opportunity; safety and health on the job; unions' growth and change; new strategies in organizing and bargaining; and structural changes.

Coordinator: Fred K. Hoehler, Jr.

The Annual Labor Song Exchange

May 2-4

The Annual Labor Song Exchange will once again bring labor singers and their songs and guitars to the campus. This three-day institute attracts labor people who write songs on labor themes and perform them for their unions. It provides an opportunity to learn new songs and music from each other, the staff and to perform before an audience.

The program will include:

- How to use songs for meetings, rallies, picket lines, demonstrations and celebrations;
- How to plan and present a lively program;
- How to lead a sing-a-long;
- How to improve your lyrics;
- Workshops and coaching to help you improve your presentation.

This short course is not designed for professionals but for those who sing, write or perform in their spare time or as part of their union work.

The finale will be a songfest in the Center's auditorium to which the public will be invited.

Coordinators: Lisa Portman and Gene Morrill

Week-in-residence starts Jan. 30 for college degree candidates

More than 70 officers and staff employees of AFL-CIO unions are expected to attend this year's first week-in-residence, Jan. 30 to Feb. 4, for students working for college degrees at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

The participants choose two courses to study during the next six months. Among the subjects offered this year are Collective Bargaining, Labor and the American Political System, Labor Movement Past and Present, Labor Law, Economic Policy Issues and Industrial Sociology.

While they're on campus the students meet daily with two professors and do the first written assignments for their courses. At the end of the week they go home and complete their remaining assignments over the next five months, sending each to the instructors and getting back comments.

Since the program started eight years ago, participants have come from 47 states including Alaska and Hawaii and from nearly as many AFL-CIO unions. Thirty-three have earned the Antioch University degree of Bachelor of Arts in Labor Studies.

The week-in-residence is held twice every year—in January and July. For more information write to College Degree Program, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Stress as a Union Issue

May 8-11

Stress on the job is killing workers. Stress is the basis of some compensation claims. What is stress? Who suffers from stress? What can unions do about stress?

This two-day workshop on stress is for union leaders and staff members who wish to explore this topic of current interest.

Subjects covered will be:

- Physiological basis of stress
- Causes of stress on the job
- Stress reduction techniques
- Labor issues related to stress in the workplace

The program will be under the direction of Eugene V. Martin, chief researcher of the Graphic Arts International Union Job Stress Project.

The main emphasis will be on-the-job stress, but job-related stress carries over to the worker's home and family as well. Therefore, personal costs of stress will be examined and some stress reduction exercises will be offered.

Coordinator: Lisa G. Portman

Advanced Techniques for Labor Educators

May 8-13

This program is set up for experienced staff members who teach and plan programs in labor education. While the basic Education Techniques institute focuses on fundamentals of labor education, particularly teaching skills, this institute will emphasize the use of the newer audio-visual methods and the skills needed by people who plan and conduct summer schools, conferences and other labor education programs. The program will include:

- Effective use of videotape in teaching, with demonstration and practice for participants;
- New audio-visual technology—videodisc, teleconferencing, videocassettes, etc.;
- Roleplaying and simulations—one-to-one and group;
- Planning, recruiting for and conducting institutes, schools and conferences.

Participants in this institute will teach practice sessions that will be videotaped for replaying and critiqueing with an instructor.

Coordinator: Marjorie Rachlin

International Affairs Conference

May 15-19

This conference is co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Department of International Affairs. Because of rapidly moving events in the international field, topics to be discussed will be selected two months prior to the conference. As soon as a program is prepared, all affiliates will be notified by letter.

Coordinator: Fred K. Hoehler, Jr.

Issues in the Economy

May 16-18

This program is co-sponsored with the AFL-CIO Department of Economic Research. It will emphasize alternative economic programs to the supply-side theory that is currently having its inning.

Principal topics will include federal budget and tax policies, monetary policy, and other proposals to control inflation and achieve high levels of employment, output and productivity.

This program is designed for union and university research and education staff, editors, and headquarters and field staff members.

Coordinator: Russell Allen

Occupational Health & Safety

May 22-27

This institute is designed to provide union officials with a range of skills necessary to respond effectively to the complex problems relating to chemical and physical hazards in the workplace.

Participants will be coached in recognizing health and safety hazards, the nature and cause of occupational diseases, relating specific OSHA standards to workplace conditions; worker and union rights under OSHA; using the media for safety and health purposes; and dealing with occupational safety and health issues in negotiating and administering a union agreement. The subjects will be geared to the current public policy on occupational safety and health.

Coordinator: David Alexander

Advanced Grievance Arbitration

May 22-27

Advanced training for grievance arbitration aims to polish techniques in the presentation of arbitration cases. There will be special exercises in examination and cross examination of witnesses and in the preparation of briefs. Attention will be paid to the researching of issues, and the uses of the arbitration services. We will also examine new developments in grievance arbitration.

Attendance will be limited to those who have attended the basic arbitration institute or who have experience in presenting arbitration cases.

Coordinator: Lawrence Rogin

The Automated Office

June 5-8

If your labor organization is running out of room because your files are filling all the floor space, if your financial posting is falling behind, if your reports, letters and contracts are hard to complete and easy to lose, if you have trouble tracking members, you may be ready for an automated office. It can solve these problems but is guaranteed to create new ones.

Experienced union and technical specialists will share their knowledge and offer advice on such topics as:

- Mini/micro computers—What size is right for your local, central body or department;
- Electronic record management—Microfilm, microfische record keeping;
- COM—Computer Output Microfilm;
- Vendor and Consultants—How to find the right one;
- Networking—Getting hardware and software compatible with other labor-based computers;
- Converting—Planning the coming changeover in your office.

Some of the hardware—including word processors—will be available for hands-on demonstration.

Kirkland asks action to solve jobs crisis

programs, subsidized loans for solar energy and conservation equipment, railroad repairs, maintenance and expansion of the national parks system, a schools and hospitals grant program, youth conservation programs, and job training.

The country is faced with an emergency situation, he said. Five million unemployed workers have exhausted their unemployment benefits beyond the standard 26 weeks' entitlement without finding work. One million have exhausted the extended and supplemental benefits.

In the week ended Nov. 20, initial claims for jobless benefits rose by 56,000 to 654,000, the largest surge since the total hit a record 73,000 new claims 10 weeks ago.

"They are not out of work because they don't want to work," Kirkland said. "Every time you see a couple of jobs advertised, you'll find a line forming of hundreds or thousands of people competing for those jobs, wanting those jobs, staying in line all night to try and get a shot at those jobs.

"What more telling evidence is there of the desire of people to work?"

Direct action

Kirkland warned that unless Congress acts soon to help the unemployed, American workers might feel the need to resort to direct action.

"If it takes riots in the streets to bring about movement, I would regret that," he said. "I think we have a democratic society that is supposed to be responsive.

"If all else fails and people come to the conclusion that the only way they can get people's attention is to create turmoil in the streets, then I guess perhaps we have to go out and organize some turmoil in the streets, if that's what it takes to convince people."

Nearly every industry and worker category experienced layoffs last month, although hard-goods manufacturing and adult men and women suffered the most.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the congressional Joint Economic Committee that nearly half the total job loss of about 2.7 million since the Reagan Recession began has occurred in four industries alone—machinery, primary and fabricated metals, and transportation equipment.

Since its pre-recession low of 7.2 percent in July 1981, the jobless rate has risen by more than 3.5 percentage points, with each of the three major age-sex groups substantially affected, BLS said. Over this period, the jobless rate rose from 5.8 to 10.1 percent for adult men, from 6.7 to 9.1 percent for adult women, and from 18.7 to 24.2 percent for teenagers. All were at record high levels in November.

Record rates

The jobless rate for whites also reached a record last month, rising to 9.7 percent from 9.3 percent in October. The rate for Hispanics rose half a percentage point to 15.7 percent, also a new high. Unemployment among blacks remained at 20.2 percent for the third month in a row.

Among blue-collar workers, the jobless rate rose from 15.9 to 16.5 percent. The rate for white-collar workers increased from 5.1 to 5.6 percent.

Altogether, some 436,000 additional workers found themselves unemployed last month. Total employment was about unchanged at 99 million.

Well over half the over-the-month increase in unemployment stemmed from persons re-entering the labor force, BLS said. But workers who had lost their jobs continued to account for 5 of every 8 unemployed workers.

Industrial states

Joblessness rose in eight of the 10 largest industrial states. In Michigan, where the jobless rate is the highest in the nation, the level rose from 16.1 to 17.2 percent over the month, a Depression-era figure equal to the national average in 1939.

As the recession wears on, the number of unemployed workers who have been out of work for long periods has increased. In November, 38 percent of the jobless had been out of work for 15 weeks or longer and more than half of these had been unemployed more than six months.

A further worsening of the employment situation was reflected in another drop in the average workweek of production or nonsupervisory workers on private nonfarm payrolls. BLS reported a decline of one-tenth of an hour to 34.6 hours.

Create jobs now

Immediate congressional action is needed to fund existing jobs programs and to enact new measures that would bring down the nation's "shocking" unemployment rate, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at a Washington press conference. Inaction, he warned, could trigger "turmoil in the streets."

Workweek drop chief factor in productivity rise

The productivity of nonfarm American businesses rose 4 percent in the third quarter of 1982, slightly more than the 3.6 percent increase originally reported, but the higher gain does not necessarily portend better times for the economy.

"The significant increase in productivity in the third quarter reflects the fact that employers have reduced the workweek even faster than they have reduced output," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald observed.

In its revised report on productivity and costs during the July-September period, the Labor Dept. said that "productivity increased as a result of a modest rise in output coupled with a significant cutback in employee hours."

No jobs gain

What this trend means, if it continues, Oswald said, is that, "as the recovery occurs, output increases will not be immediately translated into job gains, further emphasizing the need for jobs programs."

The third quarter's 4-percent growth rate in nonfarm business productivity was the largest since a seasonally adjusted 4.9-percent rise in 1981's first quarter. Improved productivity lowers unit costs, thereby reducing pressure to raise prices.

Manufacturing productivity, a sector of the economy where most recession layoffs have taken place and covering 19.1 million workers, surged 7.3 percent during the quarter, compared to 7.1 percent reported earlier.

White House floats scheme for tax on health insurance

An AFL-CIO fact sheet accompanying the letter pointed out that if Congress were to agree to such a tax increase, "workers who over the years have sacrificed other fringe benefits to maintain adequate health insurance for their families would find themselves owing Uncle Sam more money at tax time to maintain their hard-earned collectively bargained rights. . . . The big winners would be their employers who would no longer have to pay the full cost of collectively bargained health insurance."

Supporters in the Reagan Administration see the tax on health benefits as a way of raising revenue under the guise of controlling health care costs. The plan is drawing increased attention as the Administration works up its budget proposals for fiscal year 1984.

No solution

Ignagni pointed out that the labor movement is concerned about health costs and supports "effective cost controls," but she said this latest tax scheme doesn't get to the heart of the problem.

According to the New York Times, Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker, Budget Director David A. Stockman and Martin S. Feldstein, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, all support the tax.

Feldstein has called the current system a "special tax subsidy" for health insurance premiums and has said people have "too much" insurance.

In an article published in 1977 in the Journal of Public Economics, he said the current system "encourages excessive purchase of insurance, distorts the demand for health services and thus inflates the prices of these services."

But AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, testifying before Congress on health care costs, called such theories "highly unrealistic, fanciful and harmful" because they ignore the real source of cost inflation which is providers' fees and hospital costs.

The latest Administration plan follows closely earlier schemes that besides setting a cap on employer contributions would offer a small tax break to workers who choose cheap, minimum coverage plans.

These ideas amount to a "bribe" to encourage workers to "disinsure themselves and try to pay out of pocket for health services if they become sick," Seidman charged.

It assumes, he said, that consumers would "shop around" for cheaper physicians, hospitals, insurance and health maintenance organizations and that somehow "the invisible hand of competition" would force providers to lower their costs.

This theory ignores the fact that the medical care market is dominated by doctors, not consumers, Seidman stressed. After the patient makes the initial decision to seek care, the demand for medical services—hospitalization, laboratory tests and diagnostic services for example—is strictly in the hands of the doctor, not the patient.

Faulty assumption

Ignagni said the Administration's assumption that tax limits will lower health care costs could actually work in reverse.

In the search for low option plans, she said, people will have to put off preventive care, will be discouraged from joining HMOs and from seeking early diagnosis and treatment that averts serious illness. Physicians, she said, faced with a patient whose insurance will pay only for hospital care, will be more likely to have the person admitted for the more expensive treatment "because they know they will get paid."

While the real answer to much of the health care cost problem is enactment of a comprehensive national health insurance program, this is not feasible under the current Administration, Seidman pointed out.

As an alternative the AFL-CIO has endorsed a cost containment program developed by the Health Security Action Council.

RCA settlements provide pay, benefits for 16,000

Two AFL-CIO electrical unions overwhelmingly ratified a new agreement with the RCA Corp., providing wage increases and fringe benefit improvements for nearly 16,000 workers.

The three-year agreement, covering some 10,500 members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and 5,200 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, replaces contracts that expired Dec. 1. RCA workers approved the pact at membership meetings Nov. 28.

The IBEW members belong to seven locals in eight locations in the eastern United States while the IUE members are in six locals in New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

Identical in nearly all respects, the contracts are similar to major settlements negotiated by the two unions earlier this year with General Electric and Westinghouse. Wage increases are somewhat lower, however, and a cost-of-living agreement is slightly different.

Under the RCA agreement, workers received an immediate 5 percent pay increase plus raises of 3 percent in the second and third years of the contract.

Semi-annual cost-of-living adjustments, payable in June and December and based on a formula of one cent for each two-tenths of 1 percent rise in the consumer price index, are continued from the old contracts.

Job security advances under the RCA settlement include payment of layoff extension benefits equal to half an employee's pay until age 55 for workers with 30 years' service who lose their jobs because of plant shutdown or discontinuance of a product. These employees would then be eligible for full retirement at age 55.

Minimum monthly pension benefits were increased from $10 per month times years of service to $12 in March and to $14 in June 1984. The maximum will rise to $16 per month plus one-twelfth of 1.6 percent of all earnings above $15,600.

The unions beat back an attempt by the company to eliminate the lump-sum pension option that was part of the old contracts. Workers can still choose to accept a lump sum payment or a monthly pension upon retirement.

Phony labor papers still prey on gullible firms

Despite gratifying progress in putting them out of business, phony labor papers are still bilking gullible businesses for worthless advertising.

Diane Curry, president of the International Labor Press Association, noted that the labor movement's war on fake labor papers has been going on since the 1930s. ILPA's activities, including cooperation with law enforcement authorities in prosecutions, has helped cut deeply into their take over the years, but some operations still find the scam a money-maker, Curry pointed out.

One operation, the "Trade Union Courier" based in New York City, is still soliciting advertising 30 years after its ringleaders were given stiff fines for fraud and were twice ordered by the Federal Trade Commission to stop representing the sheet as an AFL-CIO paper.

Curry, who is publications director of the Railway & Airline Clerks, said that as recently as this month, high pressure telephone solicitations from the "Trade Union Courier" were received by a business in Ohio.

In that case, Curry said, the employer, who has a sound relationship with an AFL-CIO union, got suspicious and checked out the legitimacy of the paper with the local labor movement.

Unfortunately, she added, some businesses swallow the typical racket paper line that taking out an ad assures them "labor peace" or buys them "good will" with "the boys down at the union hall."

Telephone solicitation

A typical attempt to touch a small business for an ad usually consists of a phone call to the owner, Curry said. The solicitor claims to represent "all the unions" or even to be "the official AFL-CIO paper."

The owner is asked to buy an ad to show his or her good will, or the solicitor makes statements that imply the business could have "labor problems." Telephone solicitations are used because it makes the operation harder to identify and trace.

If the small business bites, the solicitor will often insist on sending someone right over to pick up the check. Larger businesses are usually quickly mailed an invoice marked "per our telephone conversation."

Curry noted that the solicitations can also take on a "frightening" tone. Businesses have been questioned about the state of their labor relations, and boycotts, strikes or violence have been threatened.

There are a small number of legitimate, fully labor-endorsed papers which take advertising, and the tactics of the rackets make it harder for legitimate papers to get the ad revenues they need to keep publishing, Curry said.

She stressed that ILPA member-publications must, and do, abide by a strict code of ethics governing advertising practices. The AFL-CIO has rules on advertising in state and local central body papers.

A key feature of the ILPA code is that papers may only carry ads for goods or services union members might have a genuine interest in buying. Blind ads, such as "compliments of a friend of labor" are forbidden.

Another problem, Curry said, involves operators who approach a labor organization with a proposition to put out "your labor paper" for no cost or possibly at a small profit in exchange for the right to use the organization's name to sell ads.

She pointed out that another popular scheme is the "labor directory" or "yearbook," or some other kind of "good will" mechanism, such as a "public safety" guide around which a promoter can wrap advertising.

Opportunists keep trying

No AFL-CIO headquarters publication accepts commercial advertising, but that has not stopped opportunists from trying to soak businesses for "official AFL-CIO convention program" ads or "official AFL-CIO Labor Day publication" advertising, Curry reported.

In 1981, the AFL-CIO's centennial year, the federation issued a statement widely circulated to business groups warning that racket operations would try to cash in on the event with phony papers or directories.

The ILPA, as well as the AFL-CIO, has actively cooperated with law enforcement agencies to combat fraudulent "labor" paper solicitations.

Football Players ratify new 5-year pact with league

The National Football League Players Association ratified by a 3-to-1 margin the new five-year contract it reached last month with the NFL franchise owners.

The vote, announced by NFLPA Executive Director Ed Garvey at the union's headquarters, officially ended the players' 57-day strike against the owners. NFL games resumed three weeks ago while contract language was being ironed out.

Garvey said he hoped the pact could be signed Dec. 10 in Washington and added he was "delighted" the strike was over.

"I am in no way suggesting that we got what I wanted or what the executive committee wanted," he told a news conference, "but a lot of improvements were made because of the strike. . . . Management will never again take lightly the threat of the union to shut down the industry."

Bonuses and severance pay

The settlement calls for substantial gains in player salary minimums, $60 million in bonuses this year, and a severance pay system, the first in professional sports. Under the bonus provision, first-year players will receive $20,000, second-year players $20,000, third-year players $30,000, and players with four or more years in the league $60,000.

Announcement of the ratification vote came after player representatives from 26 of the NFL's 28 teams collected signed ballots from their teammates and telephoned the results to the union.

The vote came 22 days after negotiators for the two sides reached a tentative agreement in New York that ended the walkout. In the strike period, eight weekends of games were canceled. One of those weekends will be made up Jan. 2-3. and two weekends were played before the strike began on Sept. 20, making this year's bobtailed NFL slate of nine games the shortest in the league's history.

Complaint pending

Garvey's target of Dec. 10 for the signing appeared threatened by remarks of Jack Donlan, the chief negotiator for the club owners, indicating that the league may insist on settlement of an unfair labor practice complaint pending against the owners before the new contract is signed.

The complaint, filed last month by the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, supported the union's charges that the team owners had violated federal labor law by refusing to give the union information essential to bargaining, changing working conditions unilaterally, coercing players, and attempting to bypass the union by dealing directly with the players.

A steward's gift

The giving spirit of Joe Kucera, a former member of the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild's unit at Merkle Press, recently enriched the Polish Workers' Aid Fund by $150.

Kucera, a native of Czechoslovakia, now a naturalized American citizen, won the Guild local's Shop Steward of the Year award, consisting of a plaque and a monetary sum, and promptly turned over the money to the fund.

"It's a matter of principle," said Kucera, who now is a customer service representative with Kelly Press. "If we let these guys down, there isn't anybody else in the world who will help them."

High court agrees to hear dispute on maternity benefits

The Supreme Court has agreed to decide whether the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has correctly interpreted a 1978 law in holding that hospital insurance maternity benefits for wives of employees must be equal to whatever maternity benefits the insurance plan provides for women employees.

Two federal appellate courts have taken differing positions on the issue.

The case the Supreme Court accepted for review originated with a charge that the Steelworkers filed with EEOC on behalf of a male employee of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. in Virginia.

Limited coverage

He claimed, and the EEOC upheld him, that the company violated the Pregnancy Discrimination Act by limiting to $500 the hospitalization coverage available for his wife's pregnancy in contrast to the virtually unlimited payments available to pregnant employees.

The EEOC sued the shipyard on the employee's behalf. A federal district court dismissed the suit, but the 4th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals backed the EEOC. Its 2-1 decision held that benefits for spouses serve an "employment-related purpose" and therefore are covered by the 1978 law's ban on employment discrimination because of "pregnancy, childbirth or related medical conditions."

In another case, the 9th Circuit appellate court came to a different conclusion, thus setting up a contradiction that the Supreme Court will resolve.

The Justice Dept. has supported the EEOC interpretation of the law, while the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has filed a brief supporting the Virginia shipyard's position.

Fund drive pressed to assist Polish workers, U.S. jobless

The American labor movement opened a drive to help workers both in the United States and in Poland through the hard times they face in the months just ahead.

"Many times in our history, our members have proven their generosity in helping those less fortunate than they," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a letter to state and local central labor organizations.

"If those who are lucky enough to have jobs show they care about those who are jobless at home—and about the brave workers of Poland fighting to restore their union—then this campaign will succeed."

Kirkland is asking affiliates and their members to collect funds for unemployed American workers, which would be distributed within the community through local unions, central labor councils, or other appropriate ways.

Funds collected for Solidarnosc (Solidarity), the Polish trade union, should be forwarded to the AFL-CIO Polish Workers' Aid Fund, Room 809, 815 16th St., NW, Washington, D.C., 20006. Unless contributions are specifically earmarked, they should be divided equally between these two purposes, Kirkland said.

Fund depleted

He noted that the Polish Workers' Aid Fund, which was established shortly after Solidarity came into being in September 1980, now needs replenishing.

"Although Lech Walesa has been released and rumors circulate that martial law will be lifted, the Polish people are now entering a long and bitter winter without the protection of the union which gave voice to their yearning for freedom," Kirkland pointed out.

In a letter to the presidents of national and international unions, he urged affiliates to organize a grass-roots fund-raising campaign, taking collections at plant gates, job sites, and union meetings in the holiday spirit.

"At this critical moment, it is vitally important that American trade unionists let the people of Poland know that our commitment to Solidarnosc is unwavering," he said.

Call for rallies

Kirkland also urged state and local labor organizations to help organize rallies and demonstrations in towns and cities across the country on or around Dec. 13, the first anniversary of communist-imposed marital law in Poland. In some areas, he noted, such activities may already have been initiated by Polish-American, church, and other organizations. Where such activities are not under way, trade unionists should initiate them, reaching out to other groups with similar concerns, he said.

Kirkland himself planned to participate in a Dec. 12 demonstration in Washington sponsored by the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO, the Polish-American Congress, and the federation. Following a mass at St. Matthew's Cathedral, he and PAC President Aloysius A. Mazewski are to address a rally in front of the church.

List of workers

In his letter to affiliates, Kirkland said there is another way trade unionists can help Solidarity members in Poland. He said the AFL-CIO has received a list of hundreds of Polish workers—miners, steelworkers, teachers, and others—who have been sentenced to prison terms for their Solidarity activities.

"If you are interested in 'adopting' one of these workers, please contact the AFL-CIO regional director in your area, and we will furnish you with the name of the worker and information on his or her situation," he said. "The families of these workers need our moral and material support. We suggest a sponsorship contribution of $100."

Charles McDonald, executive assistant to the director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, is coordinating the support effort nationwide.

Further hearings urged on nominee for NLRB chair

The AFL-CIO has asked the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee to schedule further hearings on the nomination of Donald J. Dotson to be chairman of the National Labor Relations Board after the new Congress convenes in January.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland wrote Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch that information received from affiliates "raises grave doubts" as to Dotson's suitability for the nomination. Dotson was a management labor relations lawyer for several major companies before his appointment as Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations at the start of the Reagan Administration.

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO needs more time to double-check allegations reflecting on Dotson, noting that in one instance a negative comment was found to be "not in accord with the facts." The federation recognizes "its heavy obligations" to the nominee and to the Senate committee to make sure that its testimony is "scrupulously accurate," Kirkland said.

He urged that additional hearings be held before the committee acts on a nomination that is "so critical to the proper enforcement of the national labor policy."

Mending the Net

THE EXTENDED unemployment compensation system that was in place when President Reagan took office was an important part of the safety net that was supposed to cushion the severity of recessions and allow workers left jobless for long periods a shred of dignity.

It had been tested in previous recessions and found at least serviceable. Until this Administration came into office, the debate focused on how best to improve the program.

Unfortunately, there was virtually no debate last year when Congress rubber-stamped Administration proposals to abolish the national trigger for extended benefits, raise the insured unemployment rate necessary for state programs to trigger-on, and hasten the trigger-off date by not counting persons receiving extended benefits in calculating the unemployment rate.

At committee hearings, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates argued in vain against this exceptionally callous way of economizing. But the White House had discovered a way to get its most drastic proposals enacted without the need for a vote on the merits. Thus, the unemployment insurance changes were incorporated, almost intact, in the budget reconciliation measure that a subservient Congress enacted into law almost before you could say "David Stockman."

You could hear the safety net rip.

NOW, WE FIND that same Congress struggling with the consequences of its actions.

The recession that is now a near-depression has swept over every section of the nation, and the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers tells us that it will be years before unemployment even drops below 7 percent.

Yet, thanks to the changes in law so hastily enacted, only 14 states now qualify for extended unemployment benefits.

Last summer, as unemployment worsened, Congress put a small finger in the dike with a temporary program of supplemental federal benefits. Even that, it should be noted, was to be paid for by the unemployed themselves—through a permanent change in tax laws that made unemployment benefits taxable for anyone whose income for the year was at least $12,000.

IT IS PERHAPS a welcome sign of the changed political climate that a plan being considered by the Administration to remove even that low exemption was dropped after a torrent of public protest.

Now, a House Ways & Means subcommittee has recommended another temporary benefit extension, although there is no assurance that the measure can hurdle all the legislative barriers in the few days left to this lame-duck session.

It should be enacted. The need is too urgent for delay.

And then the new—and one hopes much improved—98th Congress that takes office in January should make permanent repairs to a badly torn safety net.

The Right Bank

THERE IS no harm, certainly, in President Reagan's creation of a 29-member Committee on the Arts & Humanities to look into ways to encourage private support of the arts.

And if the committee he named happened to be a bit top-heavy with wealthy supporters of the President, the Republic has survived worse perils. Surely, they would at least set a good example with their checkbooks.

But it turned out that the Administration's plan to encourage private sector rather than government subsidy of the arts is to give its blue-chip committee $250,000 in spending money—to be taken out of the funds Congress appropriated for the National Endowment for the Arts.

The House Appropriations Committee very properly blew the whistle on that maneuver.

Washington Window

Jobless tax just another simplistic Reagan notion

By Press Associates, Inc.

While mass unemployment was casting a long shadow over the family dinner table this past Thanksgiving, the White House floated several proposals it said it was considering to deal with the problem.

One of those ideas looked so much like a turkey there was no chance it would get off the ground. The idea of taxing unemployment benefits was so sharply criticized by congressional leaders and organized labor that presidential advisers quickly killed it. From the western White House the word came that the President had first learned of the proposal in the newspapers.

White House spokesman Larry Speakes initially defended the notion of taxing jobless benefits as making it "less attractive" to be on the unemployment rolls. And presidential adviser Edwin Meese explained that "when unemployment benefits end, most people find jobs very quickly."

Stingy benefits at that

Far from being too generous, jobless benefits are generally stingy. In many states, maximum benefits are less than minimum wage income. In higher-wage industrial states that pay higher benefits, the maximum amounts are far less than the statewide average weekly wage. Moreover, only 42 percent of today's jobless are receiving any unemployment benefits.

The Administration also had said that the revenue gained from taxing jobless benefits could be used to finance jobs programs. But the AFL-CIO noted that raising revenue from the ranks of the unemployed would "punish twice the chief victims" of the Reagan economic policies.

Although the ill-fated tax-the-jobless proposal received most of the publicity, the White House tentatively advanced several other "jobs" proposals which merit the same fate.

One proposal would give vouchers for tax credits to employers who hire those who have been without jobs for long periods and who aren't likely to be hired even during an economic recovery.

But his tax subsidy for employers would do little or nothing to help these hard-core unemployed. A recent study by a Boston Federal Reserve Bank economist found that the New Jobs Tax Credit Program, a similar plan tried in 1977-1978, didn't work.

Subminimum wage

The third proposal, a subminimum wage for youth, is similar to the tax voucher idea in that the only real beneficiary would be the employer. Under this proposal, billed as a remedy for chronic youth unemployment, teenagers could be paid at some fraction of the minimum wage. The idea isn't new. It was defeated in the House in 1978.

Like the tax voucher, the subminimum wage wouldn't create new jobs but might transfer unemployment from one group of workers to another. With a subminimum youth wage, fathers and mothers might be fired and their sons and daughters hired.

The national minimum wage has remained at $3.35 an hour for the past two years. Its erosion by inflation already has turned it into a kind of subminimum wage.

The Administration prefers the kind of "jobs" programs that don't "cost" anything, unless one counts the cost, say, to those who receive jobless benefits.

But Congress is now moving on real programs to create hundreds of thousands of jobs. One program would rebuild and repair the nation's deteriorating highways, bridges and mass transit systems.

These are the types of programs that will help people to rebuild America and regain confidence—not the pennypinching, myth-perpetuating, failed ideas of the Reagan White House.

THE IDAHO STATESMAN, Boise, Sunday, November 7, 1982

Batt lost election on right-to-work

Gov. John Evans probably spent well over $400,000 on his re-election campaign, but he'd be a lame duck today had it not been for the wrong-way-corrigan efforts of the rigidly single-issue right-to-work fanatics.

Some people seem to take a lot of learning, as the good ol' boy said when he knocked his assailant down for the seventh time.

In 1959, a right-to-work initiative on the ballot virtually split the electorate, with the measure failing 51-49 percent. But the controversial issue wiped out every Republican statewide candidate except Gov. Robert Smylie, who opposed it, and turned the Legislature over to Democratic control.

Steve Ahrens

This year, right-to-work was not on the ballot per se, although both sides were keenly aware that it was the key issue in the governor's race. Labor, confronted with what it considered to be a "do-or-die" situation, mobilized its troops as they probably never have been in Idaho, and the result was that Republican Phil Batt will be going back to growing onions instead of preparing to move into the governor's office.

If that seems a harsh judgment, consider these statistics. Bannock and Nez Perce counties, the two most heavily union-dominated counties in Idaho, handed Evans a 12,115-vote head start, an enormous disadvantage for Batt.

Other areas with substantial union membership also hurt Batt — including the state's two most populous counties, Ada and Canyon. Batt lost Ada by 415 votes, but Republican candidates Dave Leroy, Jim Jones and Nolan Young carried Ada County handily. There are enough union members in the state's most populous county to make their presence felt, and they did.

In Canyon County — his home territory — Batt won by a disappointing 2,218 votes. Yet this rural county was carried much more heavily by a couple of lawyers: Leroy, of Lewiston and Boise, by 4,561 votes; Jones of Jerome by 3,453.

Does anyone imagine that the concentration of union members in Canyon's Legislative District 12 didn't vote against Batt on the right-to-work issue?

The point is clear: This was a good year for other Republican candidates in Idaho, yet the party's flagship campaign ran aground. It cannot be mere coincidence this was the campaign in which right-to-work was most directly an issue.

I understand Batt's dilemma. He needed an issue to create some late-campaign momentum, and his sudden passion for right-to-work accomplished that. But those who live by the sword die by the sword. Union forces rallied for a fight to the finish, and in a close race they obviously made the difference.

Yet the "slow learners" still are with us. Witness Friday's news release from Peter Bratt, co-chairman of the Freedom to Work Committee, saying "Right to Work legislation will remain an issue in Idaho politics."

That is bad news for future Republican candidates, good news for future Democratic candidates, for the same reasons we have seen demonstrated in 1959 and again in 1982.

In the spirit of fairness, Idaho Democrats ought to budget annual payments to Bratt's Bunch for their "help," because the right-to-workers are being at least as effective in keeping a Democrat in the governor's chair as the Democrats themselves.

In fact, here's the secret to getting a right-to-work law passed in Idaho, and it won't cost a penny: Close up the Freedom to Work office, don't send out any more abrasive news releases, and just wait patiently for a Republican state to elect a Republican governor, which is virtually inevitable.

Then, if there still is significant sentiment for right-to-work legislation, it will pass without bloodshed.

Column above is reprinted from Boise (Idaho) Statesman of November 7. It relates the price paid by the Republican candidate for governor for making "right to work for less" a major campaign issue, at the prodding of RTW forces in the state. Republicans—many of them, anyway—have a habit of shooting themselves in the foot with the for-less issue. The prime example was 1958, when open-shoppers, with the cooperation of the GOP, got their issue on the ballot in six states, turned it into a national issue and helped bring on one of the worst GOP debacles in recent history. It was as devastating to them as Watergate would be later. Maybe some day the GOP will drop support of for-less from its national platform, and maybe its candidates will cut loose from the "right-to-work" issue that costs them so heavily.

Odds 'n Ends

ECONOMIC 'REPORT CARD' compiled by two University of California professors hands President Reagan a "D," worst of any President in last 40 years. Economic categories used to arrive at grade were real growth of gross national product, real income growth, inflation increase, housing starts, unemployment. Harry Truman got the only "A" in the bunch; "A-minus" went to Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon.

1982 'DOUBLESPEAK AWARD' of the National Council of Teachers of English goes to GOP for its TV sweet-postman campaign commercial crediting Reagan with social security cost-of-living increase. Award is given for public language that is "grossly unfactual, deceptive, evasive, euphemistic, confusing or self-contradictory." The fact was, the English teachers pointed out, "the cost-of-living increases had been provided automatically by law since 1975, and President Reagan tried three times to roll them back or delay them, but was overruled by congressional opposition."

VOTER TURN-OUT ROSE November 2 over recent non-presidential election years. Early figures show it hit 41 percent—not great, but first up-turn in mid-term elections in 22 years, and three percentage points higher than 1978.

BAIL-OUT FOR SOCIAL SECURITY, if needed, should come from general funds, large majority of citizens feels. Recent Los Angeles Times poll shows public wants President Reagan and Congress to seek new funds rather than reduce benefits or raise retirement age. And by 2-1 margin—59-28 percent—Americans feel source of new funds should be general revenues.

ONE'S OVER, and another one begins. No sooner were the votes counted November 2, than thoughts shifted promptly to 1984 and the presidential race. Named new head of GOP National Committee, Sen. Paul Laxalt (Nev.) says he wouldn't have taken job if he weren't sure Reagan will run for re-election. On Democratic side, Sen. Ted Kennedy (Mass.) says no go on presidential try. But Sen. John Glenn (Ohio) will come out of gate with declaration of candidacy late this month or early January. Sen. Alan Cranston (Calif.) expected to follow hard on Glenn's heels, with former VP Walter Mondale ready to anounce an "exploratory committee" in late January. Early spring announcement planned by Sen. Gary Hart (Colo.). Other probables: Sen. Ernest Hollings (S.C.), former Gov. Reubin Askew (Fla.).

Corporate Spending in State Elections

The Vast Underside of the Iceberg

Spending for U.S. House and Senate elections—some $300 million—was a big story throughout the recent campaign.

Yet, that's only the tip of the political-money iceberg, whose massive underside floats in the boundless seas of state legislative and ballot-issue elections.

No national total is presently available on state campaign spending. It is known to exceed by a huge margin total outlays for 1982 federal campaigns. In California alone, the state's Fair Political Practices Commission estimates $100 million in political spending, one-third as much as the nationwide total for U.S. House and Senate contests.

Since ballot issues are as common as oranges there and involve millions of dollars, California might be untypically high, but not so much to challenge the notion that state political spending exceeds federal.

Major factors in the ballooning political outlays in state elections—as in federal—are corporate and trade group political committees (PACs) and individual corporations themselves, which in many states can legally pony up political money directly from the corporate kitty, as distinct from the corporate PAC.

In most states, the PACs and corporations can give to their heart's content. The restraints on contributions that exist at the federal level—$5,000 to a candidate for his/her primary, another $5,000 for the general election—are absent in most state campaign laws.

With the sky the limit, PAC money accounted for fully two-thirds of the funding for legislative candidates and ballot issues in 1982, compared to a 22-25 percent range of PAC funding in U.S. House and Senate campaigns.

The immense amounts of corporate/trade group money available create many campaigns for state legislatures more costly than most races for Congress. Several $1 million-plus state legislative contests were waged in California (a legislator receives a yearly salary of $28,000).

In California, 71 PACs and individual corporations exceeded $100,000 in contributions (probably a larger number than federally-registered PACs), compared with 49 two years ago and only 16 in 1978. Several big corporations kicked in more than $200,000. Biggest over-all contributor was California Medical PAC which gave $442,290 through June 30 and doubtless added a bundle to that between then and November.

Trade groups representing lawyers, insurance firms, realtors and bankers were the other most lavish spenders.

The focus on state elections by business/trade PACs, some commentators believe, comes largely from the idea that action of keen interest to them at the state level will increase in proportion to President Reagan's success in shifting federal programs to states and localities. The business people want to get in on whatever benefits this can provide them.

Jobs package adopted by House

Kirkland vows American labor's continued support for Solidarnosc.

$5.4 billion program tied to appropriations measure

By David L. Perlman

The House voted 215-191 to include funds for labor-supported emergency jobs programs in an appropriations bill that must be passed before Congress adjourns.

The next move is up to the Republican-controlled Senate, caught between constituent pressure to bring down unemployment and President Reagan's "stay the course" demand.

House Republicans tried unsuccessfully to put together a conservative coalition to delete the $5.4 billion earmarked for short-term public works that would employ those who have been out of work the longest, for emergency assistance to the jobless, and for additional funds for housing and other ongoing federal programs.

But the coalition came up short when only 20 Democrats supported the motion to delete the job funds, and seven Republicans broke the other way.

The expectation on Capitol Hill as the lame-duck session of Congress moved into its final hours was that Senate Republicans would try to pare the added jobs funds down to a level acceptable to the White House, with the final version shaped in last-minute House-Senate negotiations.

The jobs package wasn't the only controversial measure tied to the must-pass resolution that carries funds for government departments whose appropriations bills have not cleared Congress.

Additional riders

The bill sent to the Senate includes a partial lifting of the pay ceiling on the salaries of members of Congress, the judiciary and top federal executives. It reflects a House vote to kill further funds for the Clinch River nuclear breeder reactor. And if the military appropriations bill does not clear Congress separately, it also would be the vehicle for resolution of the MX missile controversy.

Meanwhile, the Senate's timetable was set back by a filibuster led by a small group of right-wing Republicans against the gasoline tax to finance a federal highway repair and mass transit program which would have a byproduct of an estimated 300,000 jobs.

The Senate invoked cloture with a 75-13 vote that allowed the House-passed bill to be called up. But a later attempt to limit debate on the bill itself failed when Democrats voted against cloture to block an attempt by the Republican leadership to sidetrack an amendment adding two to five weeks of unemployment benefits.

The Senate refused, by a 50-47 vote, to table and thus kill the amendment extending jobless benefits.

Senate Democrats lost by a 53-44 vote an earlier attempt to add $5.3 billion for jobs programs and additional weeks of unemployment compensation to the highway-transit measure—and to pay for the entire package by a three-year deferral of the portion of next July's 10 percent income tax that would go to persons with incomes over $50,000 a year.

Rally backs Solidarity

Polish workers given new pledge of support

By James M. Shevis

Even if martial law in Poland eventually is fully lifted, American labor will not rest until the independent Solidarity trade union is restored to the Polish workers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland vowed at a Washington rally in support of the Polish union.

"Until that goal is met, we will oppose any relaxation of sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union," Kirkland declared.

"Poland was a police state before the imposition of martial law, and dissenters were thrown into prison before the imposition of martial law," he observed. "We are not satisfied to return to that state of affairs, as if Solidarnosc had never appeared."

People's quest

The people of Poland want a free trade union movement; they want a voice in their own destiny, Kirkland said.

"Nothing the regime can do or say can erase that yearning. It is a specter that will haunt the Polish dictators—and their Moscow masters—long after they have passed into the history books in permanent disgrace."

Kirkland spoke outside Washington's St. Matthew's Cathedral, where earlier hundreds had turned out on a cold, snowy day to attend a mass marking the first anniversary of the Polish authorities' crackdown on Solidarity, the first independent labor union in a communist-ruled nation.

"We are demonstrating today to show our support for our brothers and sisters in Poland, who want nothing more than to associate freely and form unions of their choosing," said President Joslyn N. Williams of the Metropolitan Washington AFL-CIO, sponsor of the rally along with the Polish American Congress.

In a stirring homily at the mass, Msgr. George G. Higgins noted that the Poles have shown the world throughout their tragic history that they are "a fearless and valiant people, fully prepared to struggle against absolutely impossible odds for their freedom and their independence."

He asked prayers for both the leaders of the Polish Catholic Church and the Kirkland assails move to revive Caribbean plan

A last-minute maneuver to revive the labor-opposed Caribbean Basin Initiative and pass it in the final hours of the post-election Congress drew a sharp protest from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Kirkland wrote House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Majority Leader Jim Wright and other members of the Democratic leadership to stress the AFL-CIO's strong opposition to enactment of a bill that would wipe out U.S. jobs, "pushing this country into further economic distress."

Congress has already voted direct economic aid for Caribbean nations—a concept the AFL-CIO has endorsed. But the controversial second half of President Reagan's Caribbean Basin Initiative—allowing duty-free entry into the United States for the products of most Caribbean nations—appeared to have been sidetracked because of its obvious impact on unemploymnt.

Revival effort

Then, with White House prodding and the concurrence of the House leadership, the Ways & Means Committee approved the measure and the Rules Committee hastily cleared it for the House floor. A welcome mat was assured in the Senate if it passed the House.

Kirkland protested that the Caribbean measure flies directly counter to the legislative program to create jobs and start the nation to economic recovery, which he stressed should be the focus of the post-election Congress.

American workers, he said, aren't able to understand how domestic content legislation to create more jobs can be sidetracked short of final enactment, while Congress finds time to legislate job losses. If other job-stimulus measures are blocked from enactment, Kirkland warned, "we could come away from this session having legislated a tragic net loss of jobs."

He described the Caribbean initiative as "a misguided proposal tailored to the selfish designs of its supporters, the multinational corporations." They seek a "bonanza of cheap wages" and freedom from health and safety requirements, Kirkland charged.

2 more mergers completed, unions seek stronger base

Union merger agreements approved at special conventions united the 160-year-old Hatters with the Clothing & Textile Workers and brought the unaffiliated 80,000-member National Association of Government Employees into the Service Employees.

The 65 Hatters' delegates meeting in New York voted unanimously to bring the 8,000-member union into ACTWU while the 400 NAGE delegates in Washington voted by a 6-1 margin to merge with the SEIU.

The executive boards of both the SEIU and ACTWU approved the merger agreements. Under their constitutions no further action is required to consummate the mergers.

The SEIU-NAGE merger, which is retroactive to Dec. 1, brings the total Service Employees membership in the United States and Canada to nearly 800,000 workers.

About half the NAGE members are federal employees, mostly with the Defense Dept., Veterans Administration and the Air Force. Another 20,000 are state and local government workers and 20,000 others are members of the International Brotherhood of Police Officers.

SEIU President John J. Sweeney and NAGE President Kenneth T. Lyons welcomed the merger as providing a strong base for public sector organizing.

"The merger strengthens both unions and brings a halt to debilitating raiding between NAGE, SEIU and other AFL-CIO unions," Sweeney said. "Now we can bring our full attention and resources to bear on attacks on public employees and unwise budget cuts."

Management consultants

Stacking the deck against workers

On one side, an anti-union employer, guided by a union-busting law firm, encouraged by the local Chamber of Commerce and business community, and supported by national banking interests.

On the other, 150 rural low-wage North Carolina workers in a machining plant who want to form a union to overcome their intolerable working conditions.

A fair contest? Hardly.

But it is typical of the kind of challenge workers are facing in the anti-union atmosphere of the Reagan Administration which permits, and even encourages, management to resist at all costs worker attempts at union representation.

In the rural county of Robeson, N.C. (population 105,000, average weekly wage $105), employees at the Mueller Steam Specialty Co. in Lumberton have been attempting for three years to join the Molders union. They are still trying.

Their experience has all the anti-union ingredients that employers and their management consultant agents are applying to today's labor-management relations. It reflects, as well, the determination and courage that workers are showing in the face of enormous odds as they battle for their legal right to representation.

Robeson County was not the most favorable setting for union organizing when Carl "C.W." McDonald and other Mueller workers contacted AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. organizer Estes Riffe about forming a union at the plant. The only union members in the county were those covered by national contracts, including the telephone company, post office, and a grocery and retail outlet.

Poor working conditions

Mueller employees had been working at the plant, a vacated textile mill, on World War II surplus lathes, drill presses and milling machines, turning out precision valves for industrial pipes. There was no ventilation and an exhaust system blew hot air in their faces. There were growing complaints, despite good (for the county) wage rates of $4 to $8 an hour.

Worker frustrations finally gave way when management instituted a "point system" under which points were levied for being late for work or absent without a medical excuse or for mistakes on the job. Those workers accumulating a certain number of points were fired. The points, it turned out, went to workers the supervisors didn't like.

When the workers contacted the union organizer, Mueller management opened its counterattack. Its persistent and continuing attempts to keep the union out of the plant were recently recounted in the magazine Southern Exposure in an article entitled "Bucking the System." The Mueller employees are still bucking the system.

After contacting Riffe, a Steelworker on loan to an IUD organizing campaign at a local glass factory, the workers began signing cards "by the dozen." Mueller plant president Bob Whritenour countered by hiring a union-busting law firm from Atlanta—Elarbee, Clark & Paul.

The article recounts what happened when the management consultants came on the scene:

"Supervisors were instructed to interview workers for their attitudes about unions, and the lawyers kept a list with a running total of the pros and cons. Rumors spread that the plant might close if the union won. Bob Whritenour showed both shifts a movie which graphically portrays how a plant that voted in a union went through a violent strike.

"Workers charge they were repeatedly harassed about their union stance; several say that, as the election approached, they were offered promotions to supervisor positions 'for their loyalty.' "

The management tactics failed. On Feb. 14, 1980, the workers voted 89 to 46 in favor of the union in a National Labor Relations Board representation election.

But that was only the beginning. Instead of bargaining on a worker contract with Molders union representatives, Mueller ran an ad in the local paper "accepting applications for first and second shifts" at the plant. Mueller's move, the article notes, came after the town mayor and head of the local bank went to see Mueller's parent company, Core Industries, in Detroit, to complain about the union's victory.

Management's retaliation

Mueller followed up the ad by firing several union activists. Union supporters recounted how "supervisors harangued them that week with threats to shift them to more strenuous jobs, withhold their pay raises, close the plant and give their future employers poor job references." Mueller tried and failed to have the NLRB overturn the election results after claiming abuses on the union side.

Mueller management pushed the point system. Employee Wanda Campbell, quoted on supervisor actions, said they began "riding us, watching everything we did for something to give us points on. They'd follow me to the bathroom, or just stand there watching you do your job. You couldn't get upset, you had to outthink them."

The union began filing unfair labor practice charges against company threats and harassing pro-union workers. The company countered, filing "exceptions" to the election and attempting to delay NLRB certification. Then it fired union activist Donny Beck for an "unexcused absence."

Fears mount

Employee C.W. McDonald, who first contacted the union, said with the firing "the fear definitely picked up at the plant. A lot of those who had been with us stopped coming to the union meetings."

The Southern Exposure article recounts how Beck was blacklisted from finding another job in the community and discovered "his name on a list being circulated by the Chamber of Commerce." The company campaign went on, with 16 more pro-union workers laid off.

Under disputed circumstances, "after we spoke about what the company was doing to me and other workers," Beck reportedly went to company officials with information that the company used to file more objections against the election. A Molders' organizer told the magazine that Beck "privately apologized to him for betraying the union by giving the company false information."

Following the management consultant formula in fighting unions, a decertification move was initiated. With the assistance of the Chamber of Commerce, three Mueller workers drew up a petition to decertify the Molders union. A management newsletter said those involved in "the anti-union movement . . . adhere to management's wishes."

With the charges pending before the NLRB, the petition had no legal authority. Firings of union supporters continued. The Chamber circulated their names and they were blacklisted by other employers. "Even those union supporters who eventually signed found they too were blacklisted from other jobs when Mueller laid them off," the article noted.

But the union and its supporters persisted, with the aid of comunity organizations. The local chapter of the Clergy and Concerned Laity (CALC), after interviewing both sides said the "proceedings against the company have not stopped management personnel from intimidating employees who are openly pro-union and from creating an environment of fear in the workplace."

CALC staff representative Rev. Mac Legerton advised, "Business leaders have the Chamber of Commerce, doctors have their medical associations, lawyers their legal guilds, students their clubs—but laborers are denied their right to form labor organizations. That's the moral hypocrisy that we must challenge and change."

In another move, after discovering that the National Bank of Detroit was the prime lending institution to the parent Core Industries, union supporters began contacting the bank with complaints about its subsidiary, Mueller. In return, they got a bank form letter claiming these were union, not employee, allegations.

Then the Detroit AFL-CIO joined in, advising the bank of 12 large union funds that were invested with it. Quickly, the bank scheduled a meeting between union, bank and company officials. Bringing the corporate representatives into the situation for the first time was a significant achievement. But the company persisted in its anti-union stance.

As part of its strategy, CALC and union representatives purchased Core stock, attending its stockholder meeting last January. Core president Harold Marko promised to recognize the union after an "honest" election, even while laying off more union supporters. The workforce at Mueller has declined to some 85 employees. "Some speculate," the article says, "the plant will close before it signs a union contract."

More firings

In mid-year, the NLRB was still taking testimony on the charges. Along with many others, "C.W." McDonald had been laid off and has only been able to find seasonal work in the tobacco houses.

But the workers are far from defeated. McDonald says, "If I go back in there, I'm going to go after it like I did before." Ernest McDougald is working as a house painter after his discharge, but continuing the campaign. He told Southern Exposure:

"Change is going to come because of people like us. Getting the union elected shows others that you can organize, and that you don't have to walk around with your head down. You don't have to let the man tell you how it is."

Factory use declines to post-Depression low

The nation's factories operated at only 67.8 percent of capacity in November, a post-Depression low, Federal Reserve System economists reported.

The decline was blamed on "sizable production cutbacks" in the auto and business machine industries. Auto industry production was only 48.7 percent of capacity.

Overall factory production dropped four-tenths of 1 percent in November and the drop in utilization was five-tenths of 1 percent.

High court blocks R-T-W campaign fund scheme

The National Right to Work Committee violated federal election law by the manner in which it solicited funds to help elect congressional or presidential candidates who want to outlaw the union shop, the Supreme Court ruled.

The court's unanimous decision backed the position taken by the Federal Election Commission and supported by the AFL-CIO in a brief.

At issue was whether everyone on the Right to Work Committee's mailing list was a "member" of the organization who, under the Federal Election Campaign Act, could be solicited for a political action committee set up by a corporation.

Corporations and unions can't make contributions to federal political campaigns.

But business corporations may solicit stockholders and executive or administrative employees, and unions may solicit members, for a separately administered political action committee.

Non-stock corporations, a category which includes the R-T-W committee, may solicit only members.

The Supreme Court said the membership cards the National Right to Work Committee sent to anyone who contributed to the organization or even expressed a sympathetic view did not make them members in the sense Congress intended.

The supposed members "play no part in the operation or administration" of the National Right to Work Committee, the Supreme Court noted.

Those "members" elect no officials, "and indeed there are apparently no membership meetings." Nor do they "exercise any control over the expenditure of their contributions," Justice William H. Rehnquist wrote in the high court's decision.

The justices overturned a 1981 decision by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which held that a flexible interpretation of the term "member" was needed to meet constitutional tests on protected political expression.

If the appellate court's view had prevailed, the AFL-CIO noted in its brief, non-stock incorporated organizations would be able to use their funds to solicit political contributions beyond the boundaries set by Congress for unions and business firms covered by the law.

A federal district court, acting on the complaint brought by the Federal Election Commission, had levied a $10,000 civil fine for the R-T-W committee's violation.

Commenting on the case, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Lawrence Gold noted the frequency with which the National Right to Work Committee has filed charges, "usually groundless," against other organizations for federal election law violations. Now it has been found to be the lawbreaker, he said.

leaders of Solidarity in whatever form the labor movement may take in the future.

"They are in for extremely hard days as they struggle against tremendous odds to re-establish an autonomous trade union movement in Poland," he said. "May God be with them."

In a weekend of fast-moving events, Poland's military leader, Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, went on state-run television to announce that "the main rigors" of martial law would be suspended by the end of this year. But he made it clear that the Army would continue to play a major political role in Polish life.

Three bills to implement Jaruzelski's plan for a gradual phasing out of martial law were presented to Poland's parliament earlier this week. Taken together, the measures leave the state with sweeping powers —including the power to restore martial law restrictions at any point it chooses. The bills preserve press censorship, military courts, prison sentences for distributing anti-government leaflets, use of the hated ZOMO, or riot police, and the militarization of some factories, mines, and transport facilities.

Jaruzelski, who is Communist Party leader, premier, and defense minister of Poland, said that internment would no longer be used and promised a partial amnesty for those underground leaders of Solidarity who escaped detention when martial law was imposed a year ago. Solidarity itself was outlawed nearly two months ago.

For weeks, the military junta had hinted that it planned to suspend martial law—imposed after 15 months in which nearly all Polish workers abandoned the official, communist-run trade unions to flock to Solidarity's banner. The government hoped that Western nations in return would end their trade sanctions against Poland, imposed after the military takeover.

Both the United States and the 10-nation European Community have adopted a wait-and-see attitude until it becomes clearer just how much freedom Poles will have under the new government rules.

ICFTU charges

"The only things which have been suspended so far in Poland are human, civic, and trade union rights," Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions commented upon learning of the somewhat eased restrictions.

Vanderveken said at the ICFTU's Brussels headquarters that the Jaruzelski regime's claimed suspension of martial law will not improve the situation unless it is immediately linked with the lifting of all repressive measures against Polish workers, the full respect of human and trade union rights and freedoms, the release of all detained trade unionists, the re-installment of Solidarnosc and of people dismissed from their jobs because of their trade union activities, and an amnesty for those sentenced for the same reasons.

Alarming reports

"Information reaching us from Poland is more than alarming," said Vanderveken. He advised the ICFTU's 133 affiliates in 93 free world countries to maintain pressure on their national governments and credit institutions to view diplomatic, economic, and financial relations with the Polish government in light of the "real trade union and human rights situation" in Poland.

In a letter to Jaruzelski, Lech Walesa, the leader of the banned Solidarity trade union who was freed Nov. 14 after 11 months in detention, outlined several conditions for achieving national reconciliation in Poland.

Social and economic stability can be achieved "only if the August 1980 agreements are taken as the basis," Walesa said. Those accords ended the shipyard strike in Gdansk, and gave birth to Solidarity.

He called for the automatic release of all internees, reinstatement of all workers discharged for union activity, and "a breakthrough on the trade union impasse by the return to the principle of plurality" —an appeal for the restoration of the status quo before martial law when independent unions operated openly, frequently in competition with the government-run labor organizations.

In the United States, Solidarity's supporters were skeptical about the actions taken by the communist authorities. Eric Chenoweth, executive director of the Committee in Support of Solidarity in New York, observed that "the martial law decrees have been implanted into the laws."

Broad support

At the rally outside St. Matthew's Cathedral, expressions of support came from spokesmen for Polish-American organizations and groups representing Russians, Czechoslovaks, Latvians, Ukrainians, Vietnamese, Estonians, Lithuanians, and Afghans living in the United States.

A member of the National Alliance of Russian Solidarists, a Russian relief group, distributed leaflets urging support for SMOT, an unofficial organization formed in the Soviet Union four years ago to defend the rights of Soviet workers. SMOT, the Russian acronym for Free Interprofessional Labor Union, has goals similar to those of Solidarity.

Jan K. Miska, president of the Washington metropolitan area division of the Polish American Congress, thanked the AFL-CIO for the moral and national support it has given Solidarity and the Polish workers over the past two years.

"I believe the American people will not abandon Poland and its people under the yoke of communism," he said. "The spirit of Solidarity remains alive."

Chris Michejda, president of Friends of Solidarity, introduced some of the dignitaries in the crowd, including Senators Charles Percy of Illinois and Frank Murkowski of Alaska, both members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and former U.S. Ambassador to Poland Richard P. Davies.

Both at the rally and at a reception the AFL-CIO gave at federation headquarters for an exhibition of Polish art, contributions were collected for the Polish Workers Aid Fund established two years ago after Solidarity appealed for Western aid. Among those attending were Vice President George Bush, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), former Sec. of State Alexander Haig, Atty. Gen. William French Smith, and Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan.

Posters and pictures

The reception, cosponsored by the Graphic Arts union, honored Michael Judge for his photographs and Jan Sawka for his poster. Judge, a native of Washington, D.C., spent two years in Poland, capturing the life of the people at a time of great political unrest there.

Sawka, who was expelled from Poland in 1976 for his participation in a group of artists and actors who sought greater freedom of expression, was made an honorary member of the GAIU. Both artists are contributing proceeds from the sale of their work to the Polish Workers' Aid Fund.

Since the AFL-CIO launched a drive to replenish the fund a week ago, about $10,000 has come in. The art sale at the reception for Judge and Sawka realized a large share of this amount.

Contributions should be sent to the AFL-CIO Polish Workers Aid Fund, Room 809, 815-16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Suriname junta denounced for executions, suppression

The AFL-CIO and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions demanded that the military government of Suriname observe international conventions guaranteeing the right of all workers to associate freely, and deplored the wanton slaughter of trade unionists and other Surinamese nationals last week.

In telegrams to Lt. Col. Daysi Bouterse, chairman of Suriname's military Policy Board, Kirkland and the ICFTU's Gen. Sec. John Vanderveken called on the Surinamese government to respect International Labor Organization Convention 87, which that government has ratified, providing for freedom of association.

Opposition leaders killed

Their action followed the killings Dec. 9 of virtually the entire leadership of the oppositionists in Suriname, which in recent months had pressed the military regime for free elections and the creation of democratic institutions.

Kirkland said the killings were "outrageous violations of basic human and trade union rights" that constituted an insult to all civilized people.

"In the name of 15 million organized workers in the United States, we demand immediate cessations of violations and absolute guarantee for the safety of Cyril Daal and all other Moederbond members," Kirkland said. Moederbond is the nation's largest trade union organization.

It was later learned that Daal and at least 23 others were murdered by the military government under the pretext of preventing an escape. The junta had arrested the labor leaders, journalists, students, and educators under the guise of preventing a coup d'etat. After word of Daal's execution surfaced, a general strike broke out in the former Dutch colony, and an undetermined number of workers were killed by the military.

The AFL-CIO and the ICFTU have asked all affiliates to protest the junta's actions before appropriate international bodies.

State Dept. officials said that in light of the killings, the U.S. government is reviewing its entire relationship with Suriname, including its aid program. Economic aid to Suriname, which is on the north shore of South America, totals $1.5 million in 1982 and 1983.

Barbara Warden gets Consumers League post

Barbara Warden, executive director of the Budget Coalition, has been named executive vice president of the National Consumers League by the organization's board of directors.

She will replace Sandra L. Willett who has been the 83-year-old consumer organization's chief executive since 1976. Willett will join John Hancock Mutual Life Insurance Co. as a senior consultant for consumer affairs.

Warden will assume her new post Jan. 3. She has directed the labor-supported coalition since March 1981 in its efforts to oppose the Reagan Administration's deep cuts in the budget for social programs. She had previously held positions with Congress Watch, the Coalition for Children & Youth, the American Home Economics Association and the White House Conference on Families.

2 more mergers completed, unions seek stronger base

In recent years, NAGE, SEIU and other AFL-CIO affiliates ran into jurisdictional disputes over representation rights for government employees. Sweeney said the merger should resolve this situation because of the Article XX provision in the federation's constitution for the settlement of internal disputes.

Under the merger arrangement, Lyons reported, NAGE will retain its autonomy and continue to elect its own officers, while NAGE members will make monthly per capita payments of $2.25 to the SEIU. That is the same amount paid by members of other SEIU affiliates. NAGE is headquartered in Boston.

Existing NAGE locals will be chartered as separate SEIU locals, and five of the union's top officers, including Lyons, will be placed on the SEIU executive board.

Prior to the merger, the SEIU had about 15,000 members employed by the federal government, most at the Veterans Administration and the Public Health Service.

Under the Hatters merger agreement, the union becomes the Headwear Division of ACTWU, similar to the existing Apparel, Textile and Shoe divisions which evolved from earlier union mergers.

Merger provisions also call for Hatters' President Nicholas Gyory to serve as director of the new Headwear Division. He will become an ACTWU vice president and serve on the union's executive board.

Other details of the merger, including the per capita arrangement for Hatters' members, are being worked out.

In addressing the merger convention, ACTWU President Murray H. Finley underlined the need for unity in labor's ranks.

"Faced as we all are with a hostile Administration in Washington and with the depressed economy, it makes sense to join our forces and mobilize for the future," Finley stressed.

Gyory cited the Hatters' long and rich history and tradition, as well as the current problems workers are facing. He made a rousing call for affiliation with ACTWU.

The United Hatters, Cap & Millinery Workers International Union traces its roots to a group of New York journeymen, which in 1822 organized to form a closed shop. Local unions emerged in several eastern cities during the 1830s and led to the founding of the U.S. Hat Finishers Trade Organization in 1854.

In the 1890s, it was the target of an antitrust suit in the famous Danbury Hatters case in which employers sought to destroy the effectiveness of the union boycott.

West Virginia labor heard on Public Radio

Charleston, W. Va.—West Virginia's six public radio stations are now broadcasting a weekly series on labor issues provided by the State AFL-CIO.

The three-minute commentaries, by State AFL-CIO President Joseph W. Powell, are aired on National Public Radio's "Morning Edition" program.

Message on imports

Domestic content bill wins House approval

The House voted 215-188 for a labor-sought bill that would set a substantial domestic content requirement for motor vehicles sold in large quantities in the United States.

If it became law, the major Japanese auto manufacturers would be obligated to set up production facilities in this country and use mostly U.S. components.

With the Reagan Administration adamantly opposed, there was no likelihood of Senate approval in the final hours of the congressional session. But the strong House vote was being read as a message to America's trading partners that the United States isn't prepared to give up its industrial base in the name of "free trade."

The AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers and other unions whose members have felt the brunt of the capture by imports of a big share of the U.S. market have pressed the domestic content concept as an alternative to tariff and trade barriers. It would assure a broad choice for consumers while recapturing lost jobs.

Jobs at stake

At stake are jobs in steel, rubber, glass and other suppliers of the auto industry, as well as assembly-line production.

More than half the House membership had co-sponsored the bill, and substantive amendments to weaken its provisions were voted down during the debate. The House did adopt, 195-194, an amendment specifying that the legislation would not supersede the provisions of any treaty or agreement on tariffs and trade to which the United States is a party.

The Senate Commerce Committee held hearings on the legislation the day after the House vote, and the AFL-CIO told the panel that close to one million jobs could be gained if the bill became law.

Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan challenged the argument of opponents that domestic content legislation would lead to retaliation against U.S. products by other nations.

Overseas experience

Countries such as Australia, Brazil, Mexico, South Korea and Spain have domestic content requirements that have produced jobs, not retaliation, he noted.

The legislation would not affect firms that sell fewer than 100,000 vehicles a year in the United States. The domestic content requirement would rise with additional volume of sales. When fully effective, in the 1986 model year, firms selling more than 900,000 vehicles a year in the United States would have to meet a 90 percent domestic content requirement.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison applauded House passage of the legislation as "heading America in the right direction."

Only a handful of the hundreds of bills awaiting congressional action were given a realistic chance of final passage in the waning hours of Congress.

The House debated at length an immigration bill, but dozens of amendments were still to be voted on when the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Confirmation delay

Administration hopes of getting Assistant Sec. of Labor Donald Dotson confirmed as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board were dashed when the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee failed to muster a quorum two days in a row. The AFL-CIO had urged further hearings in the new Congress, and Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch said the nomination will be taken up early in January.

A Senate-passed bill to toughen penalties against corrupt union officials remained stuck in a House subcommittee despite AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's call for passage before adjournment.

Increasingly, with the Senate mired in delaying tactics over the highway and transit bill, the funding resolution for government departments was being looked at as the last-hope vehicle for bills that would otherwise die with the adjournment of Congress.

On the immigration bill, the AFL-CIO urged the importance of including provisions drafted by the House Labor Committee to assure that U.S. workers will not be displaced by temporary workers brought in from other countries. The AFL-CIO position was for inclusion of stiff penalties against employers who knowingly hire illegals, a work-related identification system, a generous and fair amnesty program for persons already in the United States, and a tightly-controlled temporary foreign workers program.

Also on the House schedule was a housing bill containing new authorization for low-income housing assistance, operating subsidies for public housing projects, funds to help develop housing for the homeless, and a new program to assist homeowners facing foreclosure because of inability to make mortgage payments as a result of unemployment or other substantial loss of income due to circumstances beyond their control.

Struck firm's false charges cost it $4 million

Greenville, Ga.—A jury in this rural county seat has awarded over $4 million in damages to a Laborers' shop steward falsely accused by his employer of violence during a strike.

Landis Ray Bishop, chief steward for Laborers' Local 246 at Georgia Kraft Co., was awarded $4.18 million in punitive and compensatory damages by the Meriwether County superior court jury. After hearing evidence that the company instigated trumped-up charges against Bishop as part of a plan to break a four-week strike in 1979, the jury agreed that he had been "maliciously prosecuted." Bishop charged that in November 1979, he was arrested and held for several hours after the plant manager, Garnett McCollum, urged another non-union employee, William Walker, to swear out a criminal complaint accusing Bishop of aggravated assault and threats of violence.

The strike was resolved by a contract settlement and the charges against Bishop were dropped in 1980 after Georgia law enforcement authorities discovered the company's complicity in making the accusations.

Bishop's attorney, B. Randall Blackwood, said the company had fabricated the accusations in order to obtain a court order against the union during the strike and to bolster its own case in a separate civil damage suit against Bishop, other union officials and the union itself.

In that suit, Georgia Kraft sought $1 million from the union, its officers and 21 members, alleging that violent acts by union members during the 1979 strike cost the company $263,166.

That case was thrown out on a technicality by the Meriwether County court judge in August of this year, but the company has since moved for a new trial.

Unfounded charges

Frank Barnes, business manager for the Laborers regional district and one of the officials charged by the company, said other incidents of violence cited by the company are just as unfounded as the case against Bishop.

Barnes said the company, while admitting it could not tie a single act of violence to a specific person, "went into a three-county area and collected any act of violence that occurred during the four-week strike and then charged that all those acts of violence were related to the strike."

The union has already produced evidence discrediting a number of the incidents in the company's case. Barnes said he and other union officers are also considering suing Georgia Kraft for making false accusations against them.

He asserted that acts of violence had been directed against the union and its supporters, including an incident in which shots were fired into his hotel room moments after he left it.

Bishop was awarded punitive damages of $4 million from the company and $500 from McCollum as well as compensatory damages of $175,000 from Georgia Kraft Co., $500 from McCullum and $100 from Walker.

Following the jury's decision, Bishop said he believed justice had been done. He said his arrest, permissible under Georgia law that allows prosecution based on statements sworn in a warrant, was an attempt by the company to break the strike.

Atty. James E. Butler, Jr., who also represented Bishop in the case, said the results should "send a message" to companies who abuse the criminal justice system to break strikes. Workers are entitled to their rights, Butler said in a statement, "and if you try to get them locked up wrongfully you are likely to have to pay for it."

Georgia Kraft Co. pursued the case, he asserted, not because Bishop had committed any crime, "but because they wanted to embarrass him and intimidate other striking employees."

Blackwood observed that this type of "corporate misconduct" is not uncommon. But it frequently "goes unrecognized and unredressed" because in most cases corporations can muster so much strength and legal muscle that "the economics" of fighting back are "not cost effective."

Unjustified harassment

Georgia AFL-CIO President Herbert Mabry applauded the court's decision, noting that the state federation frequently receives reports of similar "harassment of union members."

Paul Cappalear, Laborers' international representative for the area, observed that the decision shows that "even in a small Georgia town, people are not going to let a man be harassed for nothing." He said he hoped the decision "will stop or slow down" similar behavior by other employers.

Meanwhile, Local 246 and Georgia Kraft recently reached agreement on a new three-year contract, following expiration of the one that settled the 1979 strike.

Auto workers put Chrysler accord to vote

Detroit—Members of the Auto Workers employed by Chrysler Corp. in the United States were set to vote on a new contract giving them an immediate pay increase, plus a cost-of-living allowance.

An earlier agreement was rejected by the Chrysler workers in September because it tied pay increases to company profits, and did not include COL adjustments.

Some 43,000 UAW members in the United States are covered by the new agreement. The ratification vote was expected to be completed on Dec. 17.

Meanwhile, Chrysler workers in Canada overwhelmingly approved a separate agreement, 7,753 to 787, calling for an immediate raise of $1.15 an hour in Canadian money for some 9,600 workers. The Canadian workers will not receive company stock ownership plan negotiated earlier, however, whereas the plan will continue in the U.S. contract.

Strike settled

The Canadian settlement ended a 38-day strike against the auto maker. UAW members returned to their jobs Dec. 13, the day after the ratification vote.

The 13-month agreements give Chrysler workers in the United States and Canada a basic 3-percent raise, plus an hourly cost-of-living adjustment of 47 cents for those in the United States and 87 cents in Canada.

Workers in the two countries had been making identical wages but were paid in different currencies. The Canadian dollar today is worth about 81 cents in the United States. Union and company officials said the new contracts recognize differences in currency valuation and inflation rates.

If they agree to the new pact, American workers will receive an average pay boost of 75 cents an hour immediately. Of that amount, 15 cents is a cost-of-living adjustment. The hourly pay of an assembly line worker would rise to $9.81. If there is a 6-percent inflation rate over the next year, the pay would go up to $10.45 an hour by Dec. 5, 1983.

Key elements of the U.S. and Canadian packages were negotiated by a union team headed by UAW President Douglas A. Fraser and Robert White, the union's Canadian director. Fraser said U.S. members of the UAW understood the need for a larger Canadian wage increase.

Kirkland reaffims support for stiff corruption penalties

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland reiterated the federation's support for a Senate-passed bill that would toughen penalties against corrupt union officials and urged House approval before Congress adjourns.

Kirkland's statement to the House Labor-Management subcommittee endorsed the legislation as advancing "both the public interest and the best interests of the trade union movement."

A union official who takes an employer payoff or pilfers from a pension fund or union treasury betrays the workers he represents and dishonors the labor movement, Kirkland said.

In a letter to Subcommittee Chairman Phillip Burton (D-Calif.), Kirkland noted that the action on the bill the Senate passed last summer, and its statement to the subcommittee "reconfirms" that support. He urged quick subcommittee and committee approval so that the measure could be brought to the House floor before adjournment.

The Senate bill would upgrade employer payoffs to a union representative from a misdemeanor to a felony on the part of both parties if the sum involved is $1,000 or more, and would enlarge the list of offenses that result in disqualification from union or benefit fund positions.

It would also make disqualification from office effective on conviction, rather than only after appeals have been denied. The period of disqualification would be lengthened from the present five years to at least five and up to 10 years.

Kirkland said the provision for removal from office before an appeal has been decided is cause for concern. "It is not a small matter for an individual who has over the years been a colleague in arms and who continues to maintain his innocence to be turned out of his position," Kirkland noted.

Yet the reality is that a court verdict after trial that the defendant is guilty of a crime involving a breach of trust "tilts the balance against the presumption of innocence."

The disqualification from office, Kirkland acknowledged, imposes heavier burdens on union officials than on offenders in other types of work.

The AFL-CIO does not object to that, Kirkland said. "Union office is a calling, not a business. The morals of the marketplace will not suffice," he stressed in his statement.

cratic plan as the preferred way to fund needed jobs programs but said it would not oppose the higher gasoline tax because the employment need was so pressing.

The Democratic substitute had been endorsed at a party caucus, and there were few defections on the Senate vote.

Democrats Sam Nunn of Georgia and Harry Byrd of Virginia (who is listed as a Democrat although elected without party endorsement) voted against the substitute. Republican Bob Packwood of Oregon supported the Democratic motion.

Pay raises

Congressional salaries, currently $60,662 a year, are supposed to be $77,300 under an automatic formula tied to pay raises for other federal employees. But election-jittery House and Senate members have refused any substantial increase since 1977 and set the present cap on salaries in 1979.

One effect of the cap has been to compress higher-level civil service salary grades and deny any increase to top-paid executives.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the salary freeze deters people who aren't wealthy from seeking office or filling top government jobs.

If the Senate does get to a vote on the highway and transit bill, a House-Senate agreement will be necessary to resolve differences. The House bill has a strong Buy American clause, requiring that virtually all highway construction materials be made in the United States. Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio) proposed a similar amendment, but it was tabled on a 51-47 vote.

The House beat back attacks on Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage protections, but foes of the wage protection law were expected to renew their efforts in the Senate.

Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (Tenn.) kept the sessions going past midnight two days in a row in an effort to break the logjam. Congressional leaders earlier had set the target for adjournment of the 97th Congress as the close of business on Dec. 17.

Alaska AFL-CIO chief takes state labor post

Anchorage, Alaska.—Alaska State AFL-CIO President Jim Robison has been appointed state commissioner of labor by Governor-elect William Sheffield (D).

Robison, 52, has been president of the state federation since October 1981. He was formerly business manager for the 8,000-member Alaska District Council of Carpenters.

Mill closing shocks a steel community

Midland feels broad impact of Crucible plant shutdown

By David Parker
Communications Director
AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Midland, Pa.—The first thing you notice driving into this town in America's industrial heartland is the enormous Crucible Steel plant, sprawling for two miles along the Ohio river.

The next thing you notice is that no smoke is coming from the mill's enormous stacks. The 75-year-old mill, owned by Colt Industries of New York, was shut down Oct. 15, 1982.

At its peak several years ago, the plant employed 4,700 workers, members of the United Steelworkers. Now there's just a clean-up crew of a couple hundred.

Prospects are brighter now. Just before Thanksgiving, Jones & Laughlin Steel Corp., a subsidiary of LTV Corp., announced it intended to buy Crucible. But other deals for the sale of the plant have fallen through in the past six months. And even if J&L does buy it, initial employment will be only about 250, the company said.

Ron Friess, president of USWA Local 1212, said J&L was interested only in the melt shop because "they have facilities to do the other steelmaking processes in other places. Whether they've changed their minds and decided to start the whole thing is something I don't know. And that's why I'm not getting fired up about it yet. I've been down that road before."

The fate of the mill will have an impact far beyond Midland, because half the work force lives in Ohio, seven percent in West Virginia, and the rest in this town and other parts of Beaver County, Pa. The county's unemployment rate is a staggering 23.5 percent. About half the work force at J&L's Aliquippa works—not far from Midland—is laid off.

Shocking announcement

Colt Industries sent shock waves through the region when it announced last March that it would either sell or abandon the mill, which produces stainless steel sheet and plate and steel alloy bars.

The company said its decision to unload the plant was based on the continuing slack demand in the specialty steel market. The plant lost over $40 million last year on sales of about $500 million.

About the same time, National Steel Corp. stunned residents of nearby Weirton, W. Va., saying it no longer planned to invest in its huge mill there and wanted to sell it to its employees. Like Colt, National said it could get a better return on its assets elsewhere.

The Crucible workers and their families have been on an emotional roller coaster since Colt announced the plant would be sold or shut down. First it looked as if Cyclops Corp. would buy it. The USWA and Cyclops agreed in July on a new contract that would make operation of the plant viable. But the day after the agreement, Colt said in a terse announcement that the talks with Cyclops were terminated.

Subsidized imports

What has virtually destroyed Crucible and other specialty steel plants are illegal, subsidized steel imports dumped on the domestic market. Some foreign specialty steel products are selling at half the U.S. price. There's no way a U.S. plant like Crucible can compete with foreign competitors who play by a different set of rules.

Some U.S. steel plants have trouble competing because they haven't been modernized, but this isn't the case with Crucible. Over the past three years, Colt has spent $100 million modernizing the plant. For instance, two electric-arc furnaces were put into operation last year at a cost of $50 million. And the plant has a brand new $3.2 million heat-treating furnace (for strengthening alloy steels) that has never been in operation.

At least 50 percent of the 60,000 workers in the specialty steel industry now are unemployed. USWA President Lloyd McBride, along with industry leaders, repeatedly has called on the Administration to stop illegal imports.

The entire steel industry is in a perilous state of decline. Just 35 years ago, the United States produced over 56 percent of world steel production; now it's down to 15 percent. In the past seven years the Soviet Union surpassed the United States in steel production, with Japan moving into second place in 1980.

It's no coincidence that U.S. steel production has declined as imported steel has risen. In 1957, steel imports accounted for only 1.5 percent of the U.S. market; the level today is 27 percent.

While the United States continues to buy more and more steel from foreign producers, 165,000 U.S. steelworkers are unemployed and another 20,000 are on short workweeks, with the industry operating at 31 percent of its capacity. These figures are the worst since the Great Depression.

The combination of the Reagan recession and the dumping of subsidized steel by foreign countries has pushed many U.S. plants to the brink and closed others, devastating whole communities.

Impact on Midland

The shutdown at Crucible is a case in point. The hurt of it goes very deep into the lives of the Crucible workers and their families, along with the townspeople whose livelihoods depend on the income generated by the plant. The mill and Midland are as joined as Siamese twins. The death of one means death for the other.

The people of Midland are hoping for a miracle. They're hoping that the sale to J&L goes through, that eventually the whole mill will be back in operation. Meanwhile, they wait and they worry, wondering how long the money will hold out.

Local 1212's hall on Midland Ave., just a stone's throw from Crucible's main gate, is a hub of activity. Workers congregate outside and in, to share the misery and hear the latest news about the plant. They wait in line to sign up for unemployment and supplemental unemployment benefits.

Reminiscent of the 1930s, each Friday at the hall, the neediest members line up at the food bank organized by the union, where they are given staples.

Dick Fink, sub-director of USWA District 20, said he was concerned how families without the money to heat their houses were going to make it through the winter. The union's role had shifted to that of a social service agency, he said.

The union has joined with churches to coordinate clothing drives and with hospitals for stress counseling and free medical services.

The strip of businesses on Midland Ave. reflects the depressed economy of the community. All the stores and service establishments are feeling the pinch. Some have closed their doors for good.

Reflecting on Midland's situation, Father Prodonovich of a Serbian church denomination, said:

"The whole town is dying. The people who invested money in that plant don't care three cents about us. There will be more divorce, more neglected children. Store after store is shutting down. Still, I always have hope."

Spinoff crises

Crucible's closing has created serious financial problems for the town's operations. Mayor Martin Schulte, who teaches social studies at Midland's high school, said about 80 percent of the borough's budget of $1,043,000 is dependent on wage taxes. As a result, the shutdown has crippled municipal services.

Residents now have to pay for trash pickup from a private contractor, because nine of the 13 employees in the street department have been laid off. The town once paid the $10,000 annual electric bill for the senior citizens center and subsidized the local Meals-on-Wheels program to bring food to shut-ins. No longer.

Another serious problem brought about by the shutdown is paying for the town's drinking water. All the water for Midland's $2.7 million water treatment plant is pumped from the mill under an agreement with the company.

Mayor Schulte and the seven-member city council have forfeited their salaries, in cost-cutting efforts.

The mayor is bitter: "There's a social responsibility at issue here. We have a community where people planned their lives, bought houses, raised families. This company shouldn't just walk out."

The school system lost $90,000 in wage taxes and another $250,000 in property taxes from its budget of $2 million, as a result of the shutdown. The cost per pupil will get even higher when more people move out of the area.

Midland's nine police officers have had to take pay cuts to avoid two layoffs. Police Chief James DiTullio is trying to sell a vintage submachine gun to raise money for his department.

Interviews with several families in the Midland area revealed the emotional toll and financial plight caused by the mill shutdown.

Third generation

Nick Vuckovich's family has been working in the mill for three generations. His father spent 44 years there. Two of his brothers and a nephew also worked there.

Nick was six months short of the 20 years' service requirement for SUB benefits when he was laid off on June 11, 1982.

As a city council member and with a salary of $480 a week, Nick has had a good life in Midland. Now he's supporting his wife, Janet, and three children on his savings and jobless benefits of $198 a week.

"What happens when the unemployment runs out?" he asks. "You tell me where I can apply for a job as a straightener. I've lived here all my life, but I'd go anywhere for a job."

Mike Smith was born and raised in Midland. He played quarterback on the Midland High School football team. Like so many other Midland kids, his destiny was to work in the mill and raise a family in his hometown.

Now, at age 28, Mike doesn't know what's going to happen. After working at Crucible for nine years as a continuous caster, he was laid off on Oct. 1, 1981.

He and his wife Barbara and their 16-month-old daughter, Erica, have been living off his weekly unemployment check of $180 plus what she makes working part-time as a waitress at the Wonderbar restaurant. They had to give up their apartment and move in with his mother in April. Barbara is expecting their second baby in February.

Roles have changed for Mike since the shutdown. "Now I'm the babysitter and I've turned into a heck of a cook. I run the sweeper, wash clothes. The baby helps me clean. Clean was one of Erica's first words. I don't know what I'd do if I didn't have the baby."

Mike expressed a thought shared by his fellow Crucible workers: "I still can't believe I don't have a job."

Albert Bragg's family hasn't been as fortunate. The pressure has gotten to him, so much so that he almost blew his brains out.

"I had a 30-30 and put it to my head. Pulled the trigger. The shot missed. Maybe I jerked my head out of the way. The bang scared the hell outa me—and knocked some sense into me."

Daughter's plea

Al has been unemployed since July 25, 1981. He was a saw operator at Crucible earning $10.80 an hour. He turned 33 on Oct. 2 with not much to celebrate. Tears came to his eyes as he recounted his nine-year-old daughter, Angel, telling him: "Daddy, you only live once and I want to live with you."

Al's only steady income after his $145 a week unemployment compensation ran out last October has been a monthly $58 disability check from the Veterans Administration. (He was shot in the chest during a tour in Vietnam.) He has earned extra money baling hay, cutting lawns, and doing other odd jobs.

The electric company shut off the electricity in his totally electric house on July 1, after getting behind $800 in payments. He then ran a cable to his mother's house next door. He's now far behind in making his $225 monthly mortgage payments.

"I sent them $15 last month because that's all I got," Al said.

White House brushoff

Local union officials appealed for help in a mailgram to President Reagan, but were given the brushoff. A Treasury Dept. official responded that Crucible and its workers were on their own:

"This issue is primarily one between Colt Industries and the employees and management of Crucible Steel. It is not one where the federal government has an overriding direct interest, and consequently is not one that calls for direct federal intervention."

In contrast to the Administration's hands-off attitude, the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, including the Steelworkers, have called for a national program to revitalize basic U.S. industries like steel. Organized labor has stressed that government and industry must accept their roles as full partners in assuring economic growth and full employment.

A sign adjacent to a football field in Midland must have a hollow ring to Nick Vuckovich, Mike Smith, Al Bragg and the other laid off Crucible workers: It reads:

"Colt Industries—A company that cares about the future of our young people."

A Steadfast Commitment

A YEAR AGO, General Jaruzelski declared a state of war against the Polish people.

The object of that war—abetted if not decreed by the Soviet Union—was to destroy the first free trade union movement ever to emerge in the communist world.

The Polish government believes it has succeeded in that task.

We of the American labor movement are no strangers to adversity and defeat. But we are sustained by the certain knowledge, born of experience, that the impulse of working people to create their own free institutions is universal and ultimately irresistible—and that the setbacks of today are but the prelude to victories tomorrow.

The workers of Poland—the people of Poland—want Solidarnosc restored. They want a free trade union movement. They want a voice in their own destiny.

Nothing the regime can do or say can erase that yearning. It is a specter that will haunt the Polish dictators—and their Moscow masters—long after they have passed into the history books in permanent disgrace.

WE HAVE come here today to pledge our continuing support of Solidarnosc. We shall not be satisfied with the lifting of martial law or the release of political prisoners.

We want Solidarnosc restored to the workers of Poland. Until that goal is met, we will oppose any relaxation of sanctions against Poland and the Soviet Union.

Poland was a police state before the imposition of martial law, and dissenters were thrown into prison before the imposition of martial law.

We are not satisfied to return to that state of affairs, as if Solidarnosc had never appeared.

Others may find in the events of this week elegant rationales for accommodation or retreat, or for turning their attention to other problems.

We, for our part, remain steadfast to our commitment to the workers of Poland—and to the glorious movement they created.

Solidarity lives. Solidarity forever.

—From AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's remarks at St. Matthew's Cathedral, Washington, D.C., Dec. 12, 1982.

A Matter of Style

LAST WEEK, the question was whether the wealthy individuals President Reagan appointed to a proposed Committee on the Arts & Humanities should be given $250,000 so they could take trips to Washington at taxpayers' expense.

This week the question is whether some more Reagan appointees to part-time jobs can collect $29 a hour for "consultations" and while drawing generous expense allowances.

This group of worthies was named by the President to the board of directors of the Legal Services Corp., which is supposed to give free legal services to the poor. When he was unable to abolish the corporation, Reagan replaced the sitting board with 11 appointees of his own. These newcomers in a year managed to spend twice as much on themselves as their predecessors did.

THE NOMINEE for the full-time director's job, paying $57,700, was guaranteed that he could in addition join the "private club of his choice," and commute from Indianapolis for six months with the taxpayers paying the freight.

The argument is not over the amounts of dollars wasted by these dilettantes—the government spends more than that every few seconds. The argument is over the style and attitude assumed by Mr. Reagan's appointees.

While professing to cut spending, they are cutting spending only for others, mostly the poor, minorities and jobless individuals unable to defend themselves.

These Reaganites went to Washington promising to run it on a business-like basis. It would be better if they ran it like a government dedicated to serving all the people.

Washington Window

GOP sorely needs likes of Norris and LaGuardia

By Press Associates, Inc.

Two quarreling neighbors went into court in New York City and before they could say anything, the judge asked them, "Okay, ladies, what was it, the clothesline or the milk bottles?"

"It was the clothesline, your honor," one replied.

Judge Fiorello H. LaGuardia knew his people and their problems, their dreams and their struggles. He loved the common people and fought their fight as a progressive political leader in Congress and as a three-term mayor in 1933-45.

The clothesline anecdote came up while New Deal veterans were reminiscing in Washington, D.C., during the December centennial of LaGuardia's birth.

The occasion also paid tribute to the landmark Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932, a law which put an end to a decade of employer onslaught against unions, aided by judge-made law.

The tone of the 1920s was reflected in a remark by Chief Justice William Howard Taft in 1921. Speaking of unions, Taft remarked, "That faction we have to hit every little while." It was Taft who as a lower court judge decades earlier handed down one of the first injunctions to break a Locomotive Engineers strike.

Alarming decisions

While employer groups adopted the so-called American Plan to spread the open shop, the wholesale use of injunctions to break strikes and destroy unions alarmed fair-minded people.

Sen. George Norris of Nebraska, a progressive Republican campaigning for a Democrat in Pennsylvania, was shocked to see the conditions under which coal miners worked and lived. He learned of yellow-dog contracts which bound miners in servitude to the operators and of injunctions which broke strikes.

"I was shocked profoundly" that such conditions existed in a free country. After several years of effort, Norris won Senate passage of his bill to outlaw the yellow dog and restrict injunctions in labor disputes. LaGuardia sponsored the bill in the House and it became law in 1932.

LaGuardia also gave business fits when he was in Congress. When the business lobby tried to ram through a national sales tax in 1932, calling it a "manufacturers sales tax," LaGuardia countered with a "nuisance tax" on all kinds of wealth, plus a heavy surtax on millionaires. LaGuardia rounded up the votes and beat the sales tax.

Mayor of New York

When LaGuardia lost in the FDR landslide, he returned to New York, ran for mayor and won.

He took over a city with overwhelming problems of corruption, racketeering, unemployment and slums and offered a vision. He promised to make government a friend rather than an enemy of the people.

Aligning himself with the New Deal, he promised to create jobs, tear down slums, clean up the streets, build housing, foster music and art, create beer gardens and make New York "a great, living, thrilling adventure."

The irrepressible mayor was everywhere. He rode firetrucks, danced at weddings and cried at funerals. He cheered at baseball games and visited schools. He went on radio to read the funnies during a newspaper strike.

LaGuardia and Norris were both progressive Republicans and their kind is sorely needed today. The irony of politics is that a Republican sits in the White House today and looks back on the 1920s as some "Golden Age." It was, indeed, the era of Babe Ruth, Dempsey and Tunney, Knute Rockne and the Gipper.

But President Reagan also believes Calvin Coolidge was a great one. Coolidge chose not to run again in 1928, and he may have sensed something. Mrs. Coolidge called him Poppa and in early 1929, she remarked, "Poppa says there's a depression coming."

LEGISLATIVE ALERT!

Here's a Wrap-Up of the Major Issues We Lobbied on During the 97th Congress

Labor Laws Successfully Defended

▶DAVIS-BACON PREVAILING WAGE PROTECTIONS SAVED

The Davis-Bacon Act requires that workers on federally funded construction projects be paid at the wage scales prevailing in their locality. In November 1981 the Senate voted down an amendment to remove D-B from military construction; in August 1982 the House killed a similar amendment on local development grants. The Reagan Dept. of Labor in May 1982 proposed new rules to gut enforcement of the Act; a federal judge criticized the DOL and temporarily halted action pending a final court decision. Continued attacks likely in 1983.

▶RIGHT TO STRIKE: HOBBS AMENDMENTS STOPPED

Congress rejected efforts to single out union members for federal prosecution in picket-line disputes, while leaving management agents subject only to current state and local laws.

▶NLRB: VAN DE WATER NOMINATION REJECTED

President Reagan's nomination of John Van de Water for chairman of the National Labor Relations Board was rejected by the Senate Labor Committee after the AFL-CIO presented evidence showing him to have an anti-union bias. GOP attempts to bypass the committee and go to the Senate floor failed. Van de Water was forced to resign.

▶LABOR STANDARDS

America's oldest labor standard, the eight-hour day, came under attack as conservatives tried to allow ten-hour days on federally contracted work without overtime pay. In June 1982 the Senate wisely chose not to use federal dollars to gouge wages.

When the Reagan Administration tried to relax child labor regulations to expand the hours 14- and 15-year-olds are allowed to work, it ran into opposition from the AFL-CIO and was forced to retreat.

▶LONGSHORE WORKERS' COMPENSATION SAVED

The 1972 Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act is the best workers' compensation law in the nation. Sen. Don Nickles (R-OK), introduced a bill to take away this protection for thousands of workers in shipyards, warehouses and related areas. A revised--and labor-supported--bill passed the Senate, but as the 97th Congress neared adjournment House action seemed unlikely.

▶REPEATED ATTACKS ON MINIMUM WAGE PROVE FRUITLESS

Early in 1981, corporations which employ large numbers of teenagers urged Congress to undermine the minimum wage law by creating a "subminimum" wage for youths. But they only drew attention to the fact that the regular minimum wage, adjusted for inflation, has declined since 1967. The Reagan Administration tried to revive the subminimum proposal, but Congress took no action. Reagan likely to push subminimum in 1983.

▶OSHA LAW IS INTACT, BUT REAGAN ENFORCEMENT POOR

The Reagan Dept. of Labor is in effect dismantling the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, cutting back on inspections and weakening or removing health and safety rules for the workplace. But Congress has not weakened the OSHA Act, and a pro-worker Administration presumably will be able to pick up the pieces of OSHA left by Reagan.

In 1981 Congress took away Mine Safety and Health Act protections from sand, stone and gravel surface miners, only to reverse itself and restore the protections in 1982.

Congress Rubber-Stamps Reaganomics in 1981, Has Second Thoughts in 1982

▶FEDERAL BUDGET/WORKER PROGRAMS

1981: Congress approved the Reagan/Stockman budget, ignoring the AFL-CIO's warnings that the budget slashes would destroy more than 1 million jobs.

1982: By now Reaganomics had produced recession; Congress was more wary and rejected out of hand the new Reagan budget for FY 1983. The President was able to push a budget through only after extended negotiation. In September the House and Senate overrode Reagan's veto of a supplemental budget bill.

▶BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT DEFEATED

In October the House, refusing to enshrine Reaganomics in the U.S. Constitution, defeated the balanced budget Constitutional amendment. The AFL-CIO led the opposition to this measure.

▶TAXES

1981: Congress approved the Reagan tax cut, the biggest windfalls for wealthy individuals and profitable corporations ever enacted.

1982: Faced with oceans of red ink caused by the Reagan tax cut, Congress reversed gears and passed a tax increase that modified some of the worst excesses of the 1981 tax cut. The Reagan-backed tuition tax credit proposal, which would subsidize private education, went nowhere in the 97th Congress.

▶SOCIAL SECURITY

Congress approved several Reagan cuts in Social Security, including elimination of the $122-per-month minimum benefit for most future retirees. But other Reagan proposals, such as raising the retirement age to 68, were rejected. A major issue for 1983.

▶TRADE POLICY

In the closing days of the 97th Congress, as the unemployment rate neared 11 percent, Congress began to show interest in the AFL-CIO-backed "fair trade" policy. The House passed the domestic content bill for the auto industry. But the AFL-CIO worked to stop the Reagan "Caribbean Basin" package of trade privileges for products funneled through that region. Trade issues will be high on the agenda of the 98th Congress.

▶CONSUMER RIGHTS

Energy Prices: When the Reagan Administration pushed for faster decontrol of natural gas--meaning higher profits for the major oil companies and higher prices for consumers--the AFL-CIO rallied opposition and Congress refused to approve the plan. In March 1982 the government agency that enforces price controls tried to speed decontrol without Congressional approval. Once again, AFL-CIO opposition helped force the agency to back down.

Bankruptcy restrictions: As the 97th Congress neared adjournment, legislation to deny hard-pressed Americans the last-ditch option of bankruptcy seemed dead.

▶CONSTITUTIONAL AND CIVIL RIGHTS

Voting Rights Act: Tough battle, total victory. The most successful civil rights act was extended with key enforcement provisions intact or strengthened.

Integrity of the Constitution: Right-wing attempts to tamper with the nation's most sacred document were turned back. Congress refused to strip the courts of their Constitutional obligation to rule on certain social issues.

A Busy Year for AFL-CIO Lobbyists on Capitol Hill

The presence of the AFL-CIO on Capitol Hill was broad and deep in 1982, as Federation lobbyists worked on many issues of concern to working people during the 97th Congress.

HOLIDAY GREETINGS

Veto threat sinks jobs program

Welcome aboard

Merger of the National Association of Government Employees with the Service Employees is marked with the presentation of a per capita payment covering the 80,000 new AFL-CIO members. From left are SEIU Sec.-Treas. Richard W. Cordtz, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, NAGE President Kenneth T. Lyons, Federation President Lane Kirkland and SEIU President John J. Sweeney. Lame-duck Congress disappoints

By David L. Perlman

The lame-duck Congress abandoned emergency jobs legislation under the threat of a presidential veto and left the shaping of an economic recovery program to the new 98th Congress that will take office in January.

Its failure to deal with the nation's unemployment crisis was "a severe disappointment to American workers," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

A House vote for domestic content requirements for automobiles and the anticipated final passage of the highway bill with its additional jobless benefis were the bright spots in an otherwise dismal post-election session.

With job funds deleted, President Reagan signed a catch-all appropriations resolution to keep the government functioning for the nine months remaining in the fiscal year.

Reagan had warned that he would veto the appropriations resolution if it included any funds for a jobs program, even if it meant shutting down the government. The threat was sufficient for a House-Senate conference committee.

The conferees dropped from the funding measure both the $5.4-billion Democratic jobs package adopted by the House and the scaled down $1.2-billion measure passed by the Republican-controlled Senate.

Request to Reagan

Instead of money to hire the unemployed for public sector projects that need doing, the House-Senate conferees adopted a statement urging the President to include a comprehensive jobs program in the budget for fiscal year 1984 which will be submitted at the end of January.

While the jockeying over MX missile funding made the daily headlines, the final days of the 97th Congress were dominated by the behind-the-scenes maneuvering to get favored bills over the legislative hurdles—and to stop measures perceived as harmful from becoming law.

The Administration failed to get included in the continuing appropriations resolution language that would have reduced the number of state occupational health and safety inspectors by curtailing federal funding. Such a restriction had been in an earlier appropriations measure,

Drop in real pay dampens Yule shopping scene

By James M. Shevis

American workers did their Christmas shopping this year with less buying power than they had a year ago as the government reported "real" average earnings down 1.5 percent.

Gross earnings of production or nonsupervisory workers in the nonfarm sector averaged $269.19 a week in November, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. This was virtually unchanged from the $269.27 figure of the previous month. Real earnings, or pay expressed in constant 1977 dollars, averaged $166.27 a week compared to $166.32 in October.

Over the year, however, the $166.27 real earnings figure represented a decrease of $2.55. BLS said the 1.5-percent decline resulted from a sharp drop of 1.4 percent in the average number of hours worked per week, a direct product of the recession, plus a 4.6-percent rise in consumer prices.

A steep decline in housing costs and moderation in other key components held the November advance in the government's consumer price index to just one-tenth of 1 percent, adjusted for seasonal fluctuations in prices. The 4.6-percent over-the-year CPI increase compared with an 8.9-percent rise for all of 1981.

In an earlier report, BLS said whole-

Highway measure adds jobless benefit extension

Additional weeks of federal supplemental unemployment benefits were included by a House-Senate conference committee in the final version of the highway and mass transit bill.

The House adjourned immediately after adopting the conference report, but a filibuster waged by a handful of right-wing Republicans delayed final Senate action past the AFL-CIO News press time.

The highway bill, funded by a five-cents-a-gallon rise in the federal gasoline tax, is expected to generate more than 300,000 jobs as money spent on wages, materials and equipment ripples through the economy.

Because it was the last major bill to be acted on, the Senate used it as a vehicle for pushing through another temporary extension of unemployment compensation for the long-term jobless. The amendment was adopted by the Senate on a 93-4 vote and accepted intact by House conferees.

It adds from two to six weeks of entitlement to the supplemental unemployment compensation program that began last September and is scheduled to end on Mar. 31, 1983.

New entitlements

Under that program, workers in 36 states with the highest insured unemployment rates have been entitled to 10 weeks of federal payments after other benefits have run out. Workers in states with lower rates have been entitled either to eight weeks or six weeks.

The new legislation uses a different formula in allocating additional weeks of benefits. The Labor Dept. estimates that 27 states will qualify for six additional weeks of entitlement, 12 states for an extra four weeks, and 11 states for two added weeks.

With President Reagan's veto threat having killed direct job-creating legislation, the Administration-supported highway bill was the only measure of the lame-duck session that had the potential to spur economic recovery.

For that reason, the AFL-CIO endorsed it and did not oppose the increased gasoline tax despite labor's preference for other means to finance it.

The bill's troubles came from the President's party—a filibuster led by three right-wing Republicans, Senators Gordon J. Humphrey (N.H.), Don Nickles (Okla.) and Jesse Helms (N.C.). Their argument was that the higher taxes would retard recovery. It required a series of cloture votes, a session that ran 37 hours, and both Saturday and Sunday meetings of the Senate to get the bill to a vote. The necessity for a House-Senate conference agreement and final action by both bodies added to the frustrations of a Congress that had repeatedly postponed adjournment deadlines.

When Helms took the floor to renew his filibuster after the House had approved the conference report and adjourned, he was tongue-lashed by a member of his own party. "Seldom have I seen a more obdurate, more obnoxious performance," Sen. Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) said to the obvious approval of his colleagues.

The estimated $5.5 billion to be raised by the bill will be allocated to states for road, bridge and transit projects.

A byproduct of the legislation is the strengthening of the Davis-Bacon Act's prevailing wage protections against an effort to narrow the law's coverage.

The 1956 law that launched a major program of federal highway funding ap-

Recession worsens

A substantial drop in economic growth was forecast by the government's own economists as the Reagan Recession showed no signs of abating.

Preliminary indications show economic activity declining at an annual rate of 2.2 percent in the final quarter of 1982, Commerce Dept. economists said in what they call a "flash" report on the gross national product.

The projection is used for internal government budget estimates and is disclosed as the department issues its final revision of the previous quarter's economic performance. The final revision for the July-through-September period showed a growth rate of seven-tenths of 1 percent, up from the zero rate reported last month.

Real GNP, or the value of the nation's total output of goods and services, went up at a 2.1-percent annual rate in the second quarter after dropping sharply in the first quarter at a 5.1-percent rate.

Management consultants

How union-busters beat labor laws

Laws, it's said, are made to be broken.

When it comes to the labor laws, management consultants find it's often sufficient to bend them out of shape—just enough to permit them to ply their trade of union-busting.

Skirting the law is the lifeblood of the management consultant business.

They teach employers how to combat unions by stretching the rules of the National Labor Relations Act, even to leading them into violations because the penalties for doing so are an insufficient deterrent.

In the case of the Landrum-Griffin Act, management consultants take advantage of the ambiguities to avoid the law's requirement that they report their "persuader" activities. That way they can continue to operate in the shadows.

Fourth in a Series

The House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations exposed these tactics in its investigation of management consultants several years ago.

The penalties under NLRA are designed more to reimburse the victim for wrongdoing than penalize the violator, the subcommittee noted.

"This has led some employers to conclude that it often makes economic sense to violate the law, since the monetary cost of any possible legal liability is less than it might be if they had to deal with an organized workforce."

It found "evidence that some consultants help lead employers to think in these terms."

Violations surge

The evidence is in the records of the National Labor Relations Board which show unfair labor practice charges filed against employers have increased ninefold since 1957.

The most common tactic is firing union supporters. For each representation election in 1980, the NLRB reinstated 1.3 employees who were discriminatorily discharged. In 1957, one worker in every six elections was reinstated after being illegally fired.

Violations by employers are soaring, for the most part undeterred by penalties. Management consultants are telling them what to do and escaping the consequences altogether.

Modern Management (2M) is the biggest and among the most notorious management consultant firms. Its clients are diverse—in manufacturing, banking, insurance and the universities. But the bulk of its union-busting campaigns are in hospitals.

Modern Management ran one of its standard campaigns for St. Francis Hospital in Milwaukee. In mid-1979, the hospital hired 2M to combat an attempt by registered nurses to be represented by the St. Francis Federation of Nurses, an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers.

2M performed its typical services, with typical results. Early in 1982, an NLRB administrative law judge found the hospital had committed such flagrant violations against the employees that it was ordered to bargain with the union after the union lost the election.

But there was an extra ingredient to the case. The NLRB general counsel charged Modern Management with being equally responsible with St. Francis for the unfair labor practices committed in the campaign. The counsel said 2M was at least a "co-principal and/or co-manager" of the campaign.

The tactics employed by St. Francis supervisors ran the gamut of illegal activities. The ALJ found the hospital engaged in "numerous unfair labor practices, including promising and granting benefits for the purpose of discouraging union activities; threatening reprisals and denial of certain benefits; extensive interrogations; and maintaining illegal no solicitation rules. . . .

"The conclusion is inescapable," the ALJ declared, "that this extensive campaign of egregious unfair labor practices has had the tendency to undermine the union's strength and impede the election process."

As is standard operating procedure for management consultants, 2M agents at St. Francis worked through supervisors, meeting with them in frequent strategy sessions at the start and finally every day as the campaign drew to a close. The supervisors were 2M's antennae at the hospital.

The ALJ found "it is undisputed that they were given instructions by respondent 2M personnel on how to approach employees, what to say, and how to respond to questions. They, for the most part, followed the advice and carried out those instructions.

Consultant control

"It appears that . . . St. Francis gave respondent 2M representatives practically full control of the anti-union campaign," the ALJ determined.

Despite the clear evidence of 2M control of the union-busting effort, the ALJ declined to sustain the general counsel's charge against 2M. While Modern Management agents told the supervisors what to do, there was no evidence, the ALJ said, that 2M "unlawfully threatened, interrogated or promised benefits to employees. . . ."

The role of the management consultant firm was "that of a labor relations adviser to the hospital." Without evidence of direct contact between 2M and the employees, the firm could not be held responsible, the ALJ held, and the full board sustained that view.

As is the case with other management consultant campaigns, 2M avoided the responsibilities for its actions. Once again they could circumvent the intent of the law to "encourage" the collective bargaining relationship.

Instead, the effect was just the opposite. When the consultant leaves the scene, the House subcommittee pointed out, "management and workers are left to deal with the aftermath of what probably has been one of the most traumatic periods that either employer or employee has endured at the workplace."

Hit-and-run operation

The management consultant is seldom seen in an anti-union campaign. For workers and unions, it is difficult to counter such an elusive hit-and-run operation. Even when the presence of consultants is revealed in unfair labor practice cases before the board, they are almost always unnamed employer agents.

Management consultants extend their covertness to the Landrum-Griffin Act, refusing to fulfill the law's requirement to file reports on their activities. They have escaped exposure of their practices in the way the Labor Dept. interprets the law.

Under Section 203, employers and consultants must report any "agreement," "arrangement" or "payment" for "persuader" activity. However, the section also says a consultant is exempt from reporting "by reason of his giving or agreeing to give advice to an employer."

The Labor Dept. interprets "advice" to cover all behind-the-scenes contact between consultant and employer. They are only required to file where they make direct contact with employees.

Allowing management consultants to hide behind this questionable distinction, the subcommittee pointed out, renders the law "ineffective." It advised the Labor Dept. to adopt "a more reasonable interpretation so the act can reach consultants who set and control the strategy for employer anti-union efforts but who do not themselves communicate directly with employees."

As the subcommittee pointed out, "virtually every union is required to and does report its activities under the provisions of the act. It is inequitable that the department does not require consultants, even in instances where they are clearly running management's anti-union campaign, to disclose their involvement."

Failure to report

The extent of their failure to report was revealed in two surveys made public at the subcommittee hearings:

- A 1978 survey of labor attorneys by the University of California Law School at Davis disclosed that 64.6 percent of the respondents had performed reportable activities "under present interpretations during the previous five years," but only 1.8 percent had filed with the Labor Dept.
- A Northwestern University Law Review report, in a survey of 164 attorneys in the field, found that only three respondents had filed reports out of 106 who conceded their activities were reportable.

A majority of attorneys in the Northwestern survey claimed they were ignorant of the reporting requirements. The Labor Dept. under the Reagan Administration would keep them that way.

Instead of moving to require compliance of the law, the Labor-Management Services Administration, which administers the law, is drastically cutting back on its enforcement.

LMSA under the direction of Assistant Labor Sec. Donald L. Dotson has cut back field investigations of complaints against non-filing consultants from 10 percent of the agency's time to 5 percent. At the same time Dotson, who is the President's nominee for chairman of the NLRB, has increased the time alloted for investigations of unions to a minimum 50 percent.

The Reagan Administration has made clear its priorities. Management consultants can go about their union-busting business undeterred as long as this Administration has its way.

labor studies

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies will offer six institutes during January, three at the Silver Spring, Md., campus. Three unions will use the center's facilities for their own leadership training, as will the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The semi-annual week-in-residence opens Jan. 30 for union representatives working for bachelor of arts degrees in labor studies. The January schedule:

Education Techniques, Jan. 9-14—An institute demonstrating adult education techniques: discussion, role-playing, films, teaching outlines, conference planning.

Psychology for Union Leaders, Jan. 16-21—A session to help union leaders understand what motivates a union member, how to deal with stresses, leadership styles, group dynamics and systems analysis.

Fact Finding & Interest Arbitration, Jan. 16-21—A session to examine union experiences with interest arbitration, the use of fact finding to settle public employee impasses and effective strategies with interest arbitration.

Off campus sessions during January are: Secretary-Treasurers Seminar Jan. 16-19 at Williamsburg, Va.; Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation Jan. 16-21 at the University of Oregon, Eugene; and Pension Bargaining Institute Jan. 23-27 at the University of California, Berkeley.

Unions using the campus for their own staff training programs are: Teachers, Jan. 3-7; Communications Workers, Jan. 3-21 and Jan. 16-19, and State, County & Municipal Employees, Jan. 9-14.

Forty Spanish-speaking union leaders from Latin America will arrive Jan. 17. They'll be guests of AIFLD until Feb. 18 studying social security and job protection, and labor relations in the public sector.

Enrollment is open for five February institutes: Introduction to Computers, Feb. 6-11; Negotiating Techniques: State & Local Agencies, Feb. 6-11; Organizing Techniques I, Feb. 13-18; Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, Feb. 27-Mar. 4; Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications, Feb. 27-Mar. 4.

More information on these and other labor studies program is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone: 301/431-6400.

New law explored

HRDI parley focuses on union training role

By Susan Dunlop

Organized labor's role in the new job training act was the focus of a Washington conference sponsored by the AFL-CIO Human Resources Development Institute on efforts to combat mounting unemployment.

Although labor views the act as inadequate to meet the need for jobs, HRDI President Alan Kistler told the more than 100 union representatives, it is essential that labor move quickly to participate.

Kistler, who also is the federation's director of organizing and field services, pointed out that the new Job Training Partnership Act (JTPA) was passed by Congress in October to replace the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA). A key new feature of the measure is a program to aid "dislocated" workers, he noted.

JTPA emphasizes the use of block grants that will enable states to design their own training programs, he observed. Noting that the programs will be run by the private sector, Kistler urged conference participants to let their governors know immediately that organized labor is actively interested in helping to plan and manage these projects.

Limited impact

Labor is concerned, he said, that the new law, which does offer some hope of job training for unemployed, disadvantaged and displaced workers, will fall short of the need created by the nation's high jobless rate.

But organized labor has "traditionally taken a strong role in this nation's employment and training efforts," Kistler stressed. He said labor's participation can help assure that JTPA money "is directed into programs that will provide the most positive benefits."

Kistler emphasized the need for union participation to assure that labor standards and the terms of collective bargaining agreements are maintained. Unions, he said, must also play one of the key roles in retraining their members under the dislocated worker provisions of the new legislation.

HRDI Executive Director Michael Arnold said the institute has made it a "top priority" to help national and local unions familiarize themselves with the new law and to participate in the new program from the earliest stages, including the Private Industry Councils (PICs) that will run the programs.

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, said that while the JTPA unfortunately "does not address the immediate, overriding need to create jobs," it is a step in the right direction.

Young told the conference that the law provides for the first time retraining for workers "whose skills have become obsolete or redundant because of technological change and market dislocations."

Cooperation stressed

And it acknowledges that the federal government has a "fundamental responsibility" to help industry find good workers and "develop their occupational and human potential." The new law also recognizes that the federal government can't do that job alone but needs the cooperation of unions, employers and state and local governments to design programs that will benefit the greatest number of people, Young noted.

Organized labor, he urged, should monitor the development of JTPA projects to see that states properly use their block grants and that their programs meet high, uniform national standards. Labor can also help assure that the long-range training and job goals of workers are not "sacrificed to the short-term advantage of employers who want cheap labor."

Arnold stressed that JTPA will differ markedly from CETA, which it will replace by the end of fiscal year 1983. Under JTPA, funds for training programs will go directly to state governors who will have a major role in planning and overseeing them. JTPA, unlike CETA, has no funding for public service jobs.

Two-year projects

Governors will designate the localities in their states where programs are most needed, called "service delivery areas." Private industry councils will be formed in these areas to work with a local elected official to jointly develop two-year training programs.

Arnold explained that the local government officials will appoint the private industry councils. Under the law these will have a business majority, but will include members from organized labor and community, education and public service agencies.

Arnold said HRDI has begun a program of services to labor organizations to help them participate in the establishment of JTPA programs.

Quick action is necessary, he stressed, because the law calls for only a one-year transition from CETA to JTPA, and governors must be aware of labor's interest in the programs early.

Top award winners named in labor press competition

The message that 1981 was a year of challenge for the labor movement "comes through loud and clear" in labor publications, judges of the International Labor Press Association journalistic awards contest observed.

Entries in the contest, judged in 1982 for publications issued the year before, demonstrated the "essential requirements of any labor journal worth its name" including hard-hitting advocacy journalism and information union members can get nowhere else, the judges said.

The panel selected 113 winners from 1,034 entries in the competition.

In addition, 28 awards were given in a new ILPA contest for journalistic achievement in labor history.

Steinbock award

Jan Stankus was named winner of the Max Steinbock Award, named for the late president of ILPA to recognize "the best journalistic effort which exemplifies a humanistic spirit." Stankus won the award for a news story describing efforts by union employees at a nursing home in Somerville, Mass., to expose sexual abuse of patients by the home's owner and then to resist reprisals and firings by the infuriated boss. The article appeared in the September 1981 issue of the Service Employee, published by the SEIU.

Judges of this year's journalism competition were Dale McFeatters, reporter for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers; Marjorie Rachlin, senior staff associate at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies; Peggy Simpson, reporter for the Hearst Newspapers, and Lee White, former editor of the CWA News.

The labor history contest was judged by Herbert H. Gutman, professor at the City University of New York; Albert K. Herling, former editor of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers News and past president of ILPA, and Leon Stein, member of the Council for the Humanities, a former editor of the Ladies' Garment Workers publication, Justice, and also a past ILPA president.

Top winners in the overall general excellence categories in the journalism competition were:

International and national union publications—newspapers of 100,000 or more circulation, The Machinist; magazines of 100,000 or more circulation, American Educator, American Federation of Teachers, and Solidarity, Auto Workers. Newspapers under 100,000 circulation, the Seafarers Log; magazines under 100,000 circulation, Viewpoint, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; newsletters, Leadership News Update, SEIU.

State and local central body publications—at least 45 issues a year, Kenosha (Wis.) Labor; at least 22 issues a year, Milwaukee Labor Press; at least 10 issues a year, San Mateo (Calif.) County Labor; at least four issues a year, Ontario Labor.

Local union publications — 15,000 or more circulation, Utility Reporter, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 1245, Walnut Creek, Calif.; 7,500 to 15,000 circulation, the Oregon Public Employee, SEIU Local 503, Salem, Ore.; 2,500 to 7,500 circulation, the Washington Teacher, AFT Local 6, Washington, D.C.; under 2,500 circulation (except stencil), College Union Voice, AFT Local 1600, Chicago, Ill.; machine-duplicated publications, Action Bulletin, Greenburgh Teachers Federation AFT, Greenburgh, N.Y.

Regional publications—over 20,000 circulation, Bay State Employee, State, County & Municipal Employees Council 93, Boston, Mass.

Top winners in the labor history contest were:

Best story using history to explain current events, the Carpenter; Engineers News, Operating Engineers Local 3, San Francisco, and Public Employee Press, AFSCME District 37, New York, N.Y.

Best institutional profile: The Machinist, and Carpenters District Council Newsletter, Chicago, Ill.

Best human interest story: McLean County Union News, Bloomington, Ill.; Retail Reporter, Food & Commercial Workers Local 692, Baltimore, Md., and Public Employee Press.

Best use of art: American Teacher, AFT, and 1199 News, Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union, District 1199, New York, N.Y.

Best labor history series: Service Employee, SEIU, and 1650 Newsletter, IAM Local 1650, Riverside, Mo.

Fanning retires after 25 years on NLRB

John H. Fanning, the senior member of the National Labor Relations Board, retired Dec. 16 after completing a record 25 years' service with the agency that administers basic federal labor law.

Fanning's tenure spanned more than half the board's existence. A Democrat, Fanning was nominated by Presidents Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, and Carter—two Republicans and three Democrats.

The departure of Chairman John R. Van de Water the following day leaves the board with only three members—Howard Jenkins, Don Zimmerman, and Robert Hunter—until nominations by President Reagan are acted on by the Senate.

Reagan has nominated Donald J. Dotson to succeed Van de Water as chairman. He has also announced his intention to nominate Patricia D. Dennis as a member.

Dotson's appointment is opposed by the AFL-CIO, which has questioned his suitability for the nomination. He was a management labor relations lawyer for several major companies before his appointment as Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations at the start of the Reagan Administration.

Fanning, who is 66, spent 40 years with the federal government. He began his career as a lawyer with the Labor Dept., then became director of industrial relations for the Defense Dept.

In the Carter Administration, Fanning served as NLRB chairman from 1977-81. He also was acting chairman for a brief spell during the Ford Administration, serving from December 1974 to February 1975.

Role in 25,000 cases

During his 25-year career with the NLRB, Fanning helped decide some 25,000 cases involving unfair labor practices and employee representation elections. He filed approximately 2,000 dissents, and his dissenting position was adopted four times in NLRB cases reaching the Supreme Court.

Upon retiring, Fanning praised the 1935 National Labor Relations Act, which set up the NLRB, as a statute that works.

"It has promoted labor-management cooperation. It has generated industrial democracy, and as a result the nation has reaped a harvest of economic and social progress," he said.

Van de Water, a California Republican whose nomination as chairman of the NLRB never was confirmed by the Senate, left to take on the post of special assistant to the Secretary of Labor. He served the past 16 months under a recess appointment by President Reagan, an appointment opposed by the AFL-CIO because of his previous career as a management consultant to firms seeking to keep out unions.

Dotson, also a Republican, is a one-time NLRB attorney. His nomination is now before the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, where further hearings on his appointment have been put over to the new Congress convening in January. Dennis, a labor attorney for the American Broadcasting Company, is a Democrat.

Currently, the NLRB is without a chairman or an acting chairman. With the departure of Fanning, Republican Howard Jenkins becomes the senior member. He is in the last year of his fourth five-year term.

Next in terms of service length is Don Zimmerman, a political independent whose first five-year term will expire Dec. 16, 1984. Robert Hunter, a Republican, has until Aug. 27, 1985, remaining in his first term.

Schedule set for regional conferences

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland announced the schedule of 1983 regional conferences the federation will hold with state and local AFL-CIO council officers and other union officials.

In his announcement, Kirkland said the meetings would include "a full and free exchange of ideas" that would help strengthen links between AFL-CIO bodies.

The seven meetings will focus on programs and issues of foremost concern to the labor movement in the coming year. The first day of each conference will be for registration, with a day and a half of workshops to follow.

Meetings are scheduled for:

Mar. 21-23, Memphis, Tenn., to include Alabama, Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Tennessee.

April 11-13, Albuquerque, N.M., to include Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Utah and Wyoming.

Apr. 13-15, Los Angeles, to include Alaska, California, Hawaii, Idaho, Nevada, Oregon and Washington.

Apr. 25-27, St. Paul, Minn., to include Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota and Wisconsin.

Apr. 27-29, Niagara Falls, N.Y., to include Connecticut, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Vermont.

June 6-8, Cincinnati, to include Delaware, District of Columbia, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, Ohio, Virginia and West Virginia.

June 8-10, Kansas City, to include Arkansas, Kansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

Highway, transit bill adds jobless benefits

plied Davis-Bacon wage protection to "initial construction," which over the years has been interpreted to include all major resurfacing, restoration and rehabilitation.

But the Federal Highway Administration has reinterpreted the language to mean that only entirely new construction should be covered by Davis-Bacon wage standards.

Both the House and Senate Public Works Committees wrote into the legislation acted on by Congress a Davis-Bacon clause that dropped the qualifying word "initial" before the word "construction," thus putting Congress clearly behind the union interpretation of the law.

Amendments to restore the phrase, "initial construction," were rejected by both the House and Senate.

'Color Me Union'

New training programs to encourage participation of women in their unions and sharpen leadership skills are introduced by Coalition of Labor Union Women President Joyce D. Miller at a conference for labor educators held by CLUW. The educators were asked to evaluate drafts of the two "Color Me Union" training models which have been developed as part of CLUW's Empowerment of Union Women Project. With Miller are Richard Hindle, president of the University & College Labor Education Association, and AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields.

Walesa vows peaceful path to restore union freedoms

Gdansk, Poland—Lech Walesa, the leader of the outlawed Solidarity trade union, vowed to work for the resurrection of Poland's independent labor movement "but only by peaceful means."

At a news conference for Western reporters, Walesa said, "We shall win for sure, but we must not fight. Such methods are not appropriate in the 20th Century, and I want the other side to understand this. It is time to use arguments and not force as an argument."

Walesa spoke to reporters in his Gdansk apartment 24 hours after police held him to keep him from speaking at a workers' rally outside the Lenin shipyard. The unauthorized demonstration marked the 12th anniversary of the deaths of Polish workers who were protesting rising food prices.

Meanwhile, the military regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski announced formally its intention to lift martial law on Jan. 1. But, as was evident in enabling legislation approved by the Polish parliament, life is not going to get any easier for the Poles. The legislation gives the government the right to reimpose martial law anywhere, anytime, and it transfers some key martial law practices to the penal code, thus making them permanent.

In a letter to the parliamentary leadership by its Council of Bishops and by the Primate, Archbishop Jozef Glemp, the Roman Catholic Church in Poland criticized the legislation for moving the country in the wrong direction. The government will not regain its credibility by sharpening "the rigors and repressive character of the regulations while at the same time proclaiming a relaxation," the bishops' letter observed.

At his meeting with reporters, Walesa said he was willing to work with the government if it agreed to demands in his Dec. 4 letter to Jaruzelski for amnesty for Solidarity members jailed or fired from their jobs, and a restoration of the principle of "trade union pluralism" embodied in the agreements that created Solidarity two years ago. Walesa said he had received "no reply whatsoever" from the regime, however.

Struggle hailed

In a message of encouragement to Walesa, AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Irving Brown hailed "the great struggle that you and your colleagues are carrying on for peace and freedom."

"All of us in the free labor world believe that you are contributing to what we hope will be better times for working people everywhere in this world struggle for peace and freedom," said Brown in a Voice of America radio broadcast beamed to Poland.

Teachers beat NEA in votes for 25,000

The American Federation of Teachers has turned back five head-to-head challenges by the unaffiliated National Education Association over the past month, reaffirming its right to represent more than 25,000 teachers in school districts in Texas, Ohio, Florida, Tennessee and New Jersey.

In Cincinnati, Miami, Carter County, Tenn., and Barnegat, N.J., locals of the AFT defeated NEA units in what AFT Organizing Director Phil Kugler characterized as "clearly attempts to raid our union."

In the AFT's Dec. 15 victory in Corpus Christi, Tex., teachers voted by a margin of 63 percent for AFT to act as their exclusive agent before the school board. Texas law does not permit full-scale bargaining by public employees, but school boards may "consult" with teachers' organizations to formulate policies setting wages and working conditions.

Joint sessions

Before the election, the school board had held joint consultations with the AFT, the NEA and another independent organization, the Association of Texas Professional Educators.

The final vote awarding exclusive rights was 902 for the AFT, 422 for the NEA, 88 for the ATPA and 31 for no agent.

AFT President Albert Shanker, in a statement hailing the union's victories, said they are an indication "that teachers around the nation want to stick with the organization that addresses not only their needs but speaks responsively on the pressing educational issues of the 1980s."

NEA spending

Kugler pointed out that in the election in Dade County, Fla., (the Miami area), the NEA said it spent nearly $3 million in the attempt to wrest the unit from the local union that has been affiliated with the AFT since 1974. The AFT beat back the NEA challenge by a vote of 7,648 to 3,203.

In Cincinnati, AFT defended its right to represent the city's educators by a margin of 1,821 to 809. The AFL-CIO union has bargained for the city's teachers since 1976.

The Teachers won the challenge in Carter County, Tenn., by a vote of 216 to 160 for the NEA unit, and in Barnegat, N.J., by a margin of 61 to 40.

All five of the elections were conducted under the jurisdiction of state or local authorities, Kugler said.

He pointed out that in each of the cities where the elections were held, the AFT locals are affiliated with the local central labor council.

Supporting Polish workers

Worker repression in Poland goes on, even as the communist authorities announce a relaxation in military rule. At a rally outside the Polish consulate in New York City sponsored by the Committee in Support of Solidarity and the State AFL-CIO, the names of 938 Polish workers known to have been sentenced or detained during the communist crackdown a year ago are read from a flatbed truck. In Minnesota, State AFL-CIO COPE Director Treva Kahl, left, looks on as a volunteer "adopts" a Pole jailed for union activities. The Minnesota AFL-CIO has already sponsored 13 Solidarity members.

Caucus shapes package

House rule changes sought by Democrats

Democrats will press for changes in House rules intended to curtail legislative restrictions on appropriations bills and will claim additional seats on most committees when the 98th Congress convenes in January.

A caucus open to the 255 House Democrats elected to the new Congress also voted to continue Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (Mass.) as Speaker of the House and re-elected Jim Wright (Tex.) as majority leader.

The House Republican caucus, diminished by the net loss of 12 seats in November's election, re-elected Robert H. Michel (Ill.) as minority leader and Trent Lott (Miss.) as minority whip, or assis-sistant leader.

New two-thirds rule

The package of rules changes adopted by the Democratic caucus included a proposal to require a petition signed by two-thirds of the House to bypass the Judiciary Committee and bring to the floor a proposed constitutional amendment.

Under present rules, it takes a simple majority of the House—218 of the 435 members—to discharge a committee and bring to the floor a measure that had been bottled up.

The proposed rules change, which would have to be voted on by the House, would continue the 218 signature requirement for legislation that requires only a simple majority to pass. But it would require 290 signatures to force out constitutional amendments, which require a two-thirds vote for passage.

Last fall, supporters of a proposed constitutional amendment to compel a balanced federal budget obtained the 218 signatures needed to take the Senate-passed constitutional proposal out of the Judiciary Committee. But the measure was defeated when the vote for passage was 46 short of the needed two-thirds majority.

The legislative rider restriction would make it more cumbersome to use an appropriations bill to change basic law, although it could still be done after a separate procedural vote. Supporters of the proposal contend that policy issues should be dealt with through amendments to authorization bills rather than appropriations.

Nonbinding support

Fifty Democrats opposed the legislative rider rules change in the caucus and 83 voted against the discharge petition change. Tradition dictates but does not compel Democrats to support such caucus decisions when the full House adopts its rules next January, so the outcome is not certain.

There are not likely to be Democratic defections from less controversial caucus recommendations to tighten the House rules against delaying tactics, such as requiring a rollcall vote on the routine approval of the previous day's official journal.

Democrats began but did not complete the task of revising committee ratios to reflect election gains. Caucus decisions increased the existing 33-22 Democratic edge on the Appropriations Committee to 36-21 and increased the party's 18-12 Budget Committee margin to 20-11.

Other changes in the makeup of House committees will be considered at the start of the new Congress.

Turncoat action

The caucus did vote to strip automatically the committee assignment of a House member who changes political parties. In the outgoing Congress, Eugene V. Atkinson of Pennsylvania was allowed to keep his Democratic committee slots after turning Republican, and Bob Stump of Arizona kept his committee posts while he was running for re-election as a Republican.

It put off until the new Congress a decision on whether to strip Phil Gramm (D-Tex.) of committee seniority because of his role as floor leader for the Reagan Administration's economic program.

Tribute to UAW chief

Human rights award of the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council is accepted on behalf of Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser by UAW Vice President Owen Bieber, left. Making the presentation in New York with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland are JLC President Don Slaiman and Council Chairman Sol Hoffman, right.

Rights award cites Fraser as 'champion' of workers

New York—Douglas Fraser is "an eloquent champion of working people and their interests," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared at a banquet honoring the Auto Workers' president with the Labor Human Rights Award of the Jewish Labor Committee's National Trade Union Council.

The award was accepted by Owen Bieber, UAW vice president for General Motors, since Fraser was involved in negotiations in Toronto settling the strike against Chrysler Corp. by the union's Canadian members.

Kirkland stressed that it was under Fraser's leadership that the UAW reaffiliated with the AFL-CIO, "dramatically enhancing thereby the unity and strength of the entire labor movement."

He noted that in 1934, the same year the JLC was founded, Fraser became a shop steward in a DeSoto plant. Since that time, Kirkland said, "Doug and the JLC have remained steadfast in the eternal battle against every form of tyranny over the human mind and spirit—and especially every form of tyranny over working people and their free institutions."

Tyranny in Poland

A form of that tyranny is the "gloating" by the regime of Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski over "what it takes to be its victory over the working class of Poland," Kirkland told the gathering of over 450 national and local trade union leaders.

He stressed that the AFL-CIO's position differs from those who would appease the military regime in Poland "with the bounties of a new round of detente in the hope of averting a new round of repression."

It's not news that a police state can crush a trade union by force, Kirkland said. But he averred that such a state can't erase the memory of "a taste of free association," or mobilize a resentful workforce.

He said the AFL-CIO will continue to support the workers of Poland and their union, Solidarity, "as they explore new tactics and strategies."

Mixed policies

The federation president also underscored the AFL-CIO's continuing support of Israel, and he criticized "those who would punish Israel" by withholding economic or military assistance. They should "save that kind of talk for Gen. Jaruzelski and his Soviet masters," Kirkland declared.

The same Administration that is lifting sanctions against the Siberian pipeline, refusing to halt the flow of credit to the Eastern bloc and "begging" the Soviet Union to buy more American grain is also ignoring massive unemployment and economic decline at home, Kirkland charged.

Rather than "stay the course," the message of the November elections was to change the course, he said.

Fraser's acceptance remarks, delivered by Bieber, pointed out that when President Reagan was advised of the record high unemployment figures released earlier this month, he "ritually deplored the situation but said that his Administration had 'laid the foundation' for putting people back to work."

Bieber questioned whether the "foundation" President Reagan is digging "is about six feet deep, six feet long and two feet wide."

Wrong remedy

He was sharply critical of suggestions that skilled workers migrate from states like Michigan with high jobless rates to other areas.

"America needs light rail mass transit systems and needs to continue to supply mining, oil-drilling and petroleum processing industries worldwide," Bieber said, adding that "the tools and the factory space and the skilled people to make all of these things—and make them competitively—are available right now in Detroit, in Cleveland, in Pittsburgh and in Buffalo."

Fraser, who will retire when his term ends next May, is likely to be succeeded by Bieber who has been recommended for election to the office by the union's executive board and a steering committee of local union officials.

Marine Optical boycott ends as IUE local gains new pact

Brockton, Mass.—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers have ended the three-year-old boycott of Marine Optical, Inc., following the signing of a new collective bargaining agreement with the company.

IUE President William H. Bywater notified the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. that the boycott is "officially lifted" and that the dispute with the company that had tried to run away from a 25-year bargaining relationship with the union was "resolved" when the two sides signed a new three-year agreement earlier this month.

Runaway move

The AFL-CIO had backed IUE's "do not buy" campaign against Marine Optical which was touched off in the fall of 1979 when the company closed its Roslindale plant and reopened 17 miles away in Brockton, repudiating its contract with IUE Local 408. The union said only 26 of the 70 Roslindale workers were hired in Brockton and that the company was paying only minimum wages and benefits determined without consulting the union, even though the contract was still in effect.

Local 408, which had represented the Roslindale workers since 1954, filed unfair labor practices charges with the Boston office of the National Labor Relations Board which issued a complaint.

The NLRB in May 1980 upheld the charges and ordered Marine Optical to revoke the unilateral changes, begin bargaining with the union and reimburse any affected workers for lost wages and benefits.

Court appeals by the company to set aside the NLRB decision were rejected, but the firm still refused to comply with the NLRB order. Marine Optical finally agreed to abide by the rulings when the board threatened to seek a contempt citation.

The company began making payments to the welfare and pension funds last January and negotiations for a new contract also began at that time, IUE said. After nearly a year of on and off talks, agreement was reached this month on a new three-year contract.

The terms include settlement of back pay and benefits due to affected employees, guarantee of seniority rights, dues check off and a union shop clause.

The end of the dispute lifts the boycott against these brand names marketed by the eyeglass frame manufacturer: Bonjour, Givenchy, Voila, Vera, Aviance, Nefertite, Wings, and Cotton Candy.

Unions giving Meany book to schools

Union organizations in Chicago and Wichita, Kan., could be setting a trend in helping teachers and students expand their knowledge of labor history.

In Chicago, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 165 has donated copies of the book "George Meany and His Times," by labor journalist Archie Robinson, to the libraries of each of the city's nine community colleges, its 69 public high schools and trade schools and a number of parochial high schools.

The Wichita Labor Federation presented copies of the biography of the late AFL-CIO president to the city school board for the libraries of Wichita's secondary schools.

Both organizations bought the books through the AFL-CIO at discounts off the publisher's list price. Copies of the 445-page book are available from AFL-CIO Books, P.O. Box 37473, Washington, D.C. 20013. Prices, including postage, are $12.50 each for one to five copies, $11.50 each for six to 25 copies, and $10.50 each for 26 or more copies.

House rollcalls on trade, job issues

Both of these House rollcalls were on trade issues affecting U.S. jobs.

Flight of the Lame Ducks

IT IS A temptation, in the windup of a generally disappointing Congress, to summon up the words with which Oliver Cromwell dismissed Parliament in the year 1654.

"It is not fit that you sit here any longer," the lord protector of England chided. "You shall now give place to better men."

And indeed, the 98th Congress that takes office in January should be an improvement over its predecessors. So the election returns would indicate.

The improvement, though, is a matter of degree.

The new House of Representatives, surely, will not rubber stamp presidential policies that worsen unemployment, penalize recession's victims and reward the wealthy. And senators, of whatever party, surely have been chastened by the hardships inflicted on their constituents.

But we have been reminded in this lame-duck session what a barrier to progress an uncompromising White House can be.

EVEN THE dismally inadequate jobs measure approved by the Republican-controlled Senate was too much for President Reagan. He would accept no part of any jobs bill, even if it meant bringing the government to a halt through the veto of an appropriations resolution.

In the apt words of Rep. Henry Reuss (D-Wis.), "The President and Congress gazed eyeball to eyeball, and Congress blinked."

The House and Senate conferees who dropped all jobs funds from the final appropriations resolution then expressed a pious hope that Mr. Reagan will include a new jobs program in the budget request he submits to the next Congress.

Well, it certainly would be nice if the President were to do so. But it would be even nicer if the 98th Congress makes clear from the start that legislative authority is a two-way street.

WHEN PRESSED hard enough, even Mr. Reagan has shown an occasional willingness to compromise. Thus, a mild tax reform measure that the President initially opposed as a tax increase became acceptable when he was able to view it as "revenue enhancement." And the highway bill that was first pressed as a source of needed jobs escaped presidential disapproval because the White House decided it wasn't really a "jobs bill" because jobs were just an incidental byproduct of repairing highways and bridges.

Even with the best will, the time pressures and procedural obstacles of the post-election session stacked the odds against enactment of a comprehensive program to deal with an increasingly grim recession.

But there will be no such excuses after Jan. 3.

365 Days a Year

AT CHRISTMAS, under the exuberant giving, the donations to the food basket drive, to the sidewalk Santa or the toys for tots campaign, we often feel a guilty pinprick of sadness in the consciousness that the real world is anything but a Norman Rockwell Christmas card.

All that millions of jobless Americans wanted for Christmas this year was the simple dignity of a job, but most of them did not get one.

Throughout the world, too many people this Christmas are hungry and homeless. And in this season of peace on earth, we look around and see the horrors of war and the violence of terrorism.

But it's the easy way out to wallow in cynicism. Sneering about how the "Christmas spirit" doesn't last all year long is a cheap shot.

THE LABOR movement and all the great social and human rights movements of this nation take the harder but ultimately productive course, that is, to look at the world the way it really is and to do something about it.

Labor's goals encompass human dignity on and off the job, decent housing, the opportunity for a good education and for useful work. They embrace especially the Christmas message of peace and good will.

Reforms long overdue in U.S. immigration policy

By Press Associates, Inc.

The difficult problem of immigration reform has become one of the nation's priorities and it would seem helpful to separate some of the myths and the facts.

At a time when record numbers of Americans are out of work, it is important to examine the impact of illegal migration on jobs of U.S. citizens, wages, labor standards, and the immigrant workers themselves.

No one knows how many illegal aliens live and work here. The Census Bureau has estimated up to 6 million; others would put it higher. What is known is that the number has been increasing steadily over the years and that it is likely to increase even faster because of worsening economic conditions in the less developed nations to the south.

Some have claimed that the presence of large numbers of illegals has little or no effect on the job market. Americans don't want the kind of dirty, low-pay jobs held by immigrants, it is said.

But experts at a recent Capitol Hill seminar said their research showed that for every 100 illegal aliens working in non-agricultural jobs, 70 Americans are not working.

Employer exploitation

Some newspaper-run surveys showing little job displacement by aliens have relied too much on what employers say, the experts charged.

Many employers prefer to hire undocumented aliens instead of American workers because they're vulnerable, docile and cheaper.

Many employers in low-wage industries "attempt to justify the employment of illegal aliens by claiming that citizen workers cannot be found to do the work," said Vernon Briggs, a Cornell University professor of industrial relations.

Briggs added that the presence of foreign workers largely explains "why certain industries remain low-wage industries over time." American workers in these low-wage industries, often minorities and women, are the ones most adversely affected by illegals in the workforce, the experts agreed.

But contrary to popular belief, many illegals also work in good-paying jobs in manufacturing and construction, they said. Here too, they may be "preferred workers" since they are less likely to join unions, to complain about denial of equal opportunity, or seek improvements.

Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer of the Clothing & Textile Workers, recently conducted a survey of union officers around the country on "what, if any, effects illegal aliens were having on jobs in their localities and how serious they thought the problem was."

U.S. workers hurt

The results of the survey are "disturbing," Sheinkman said. "From one end of the country to another local trade union leaders report that illegal immigrants are taking jobs away from American workers, depressing wages and working conditions, and are even being used to break strikes and to undermine union organizing activities."

Briggs said that "in the long run, we'll pay a heavy price for the growing subclass in our society of those who are denied social welfare benefits, who can't vote, who are docile, and who fear a knock at the door in the night."

The price, of course, also is paid by those who must live in fear and whose labor is exploited.

Another price is misdirected and potentially dangerous anti-foreign sentiments among citizens.

It should be hoped that America will finally resolve this problem in a humane and democratic way. The jobs and standards of citizens must be protected. There should be amnesty for those who qualify for citizenship and there must be effective penalties against unscrupulous employers.

Fire fighters still highest in job deaths

Fighting fires continues to be the most dangerous occupation of all, the annual death and injury survey by the International Association of Fire Fighters shows.

Data compiled in 1981 by local fire departments showed an on-the-job death rate of 58 per 100,000 fire fighters, the IAFF reported.

The annual study, covering more than 125,250 professional fire fighters, also found that in 1981 some 45 percent of those workers—more than 55,000—suffered injuries on the job.

Labor Dept. statistics show mining and quarrying to be the next most hazardous occupation with a rate of 55 deaths per 100,000. Police work showed a death rate of 23 per 100,000, and the average for all industries was 12 per 100,000 workers in 1981.

In the year surveyed, 73 fire fighters died in the line of duty and 99 died from occupation-related diseases. Figures for 1980, the union said, showed 63 deaths in the line of duty and 98 from diseases. About 44,000 fire fighters sustained on-the-job injuries that year.

Improvements pressed

IAFF President John A. Gannon said the statistics underscore the need for "proper manning, protective equipment and working conditions" for fire fighters throughout the nation.

Gannon called for more research and development of personal protective gear and related equipment and said the survey findings reinforce the need for adequate numbers of fire fighters.

The survey found that in 1981, 404 fire fighters were forced to retire or change jobs because of work-related illness which in about 70 percent of the cases was heart disease.

Injuries forced another 578 to leave their jobs, up from 293 injury-related retirements in 1980.

Nearly 44 percent of the line-of-duty deaths were from heart attacks, the union said. Building collapses and apparatus accidents, each accounting for 11 percent of the deaths, were the next most common causes while just over eight percent were from inhalation of hazardous smoke or gases.

Of fire fighters whose deaths were linked to work-related illnesses, 60 percent succumbed to heart disease, 33 percent to cancer and 4 percent to lung disease.

The survey also estimated that lost time and hospitalization costs from work-related injuries totaled over $76 million in 1981.

Jerry Knackert of Allied Industrial Workers pleads case before International Trade Commission in efforts to save jobs at Harley-Davidson plants.

Import curb urged to save last U.S.-made motorcycle

Unless import relief is granted, the last remaining American motorcycle maker will be run out of business, union witnesses warned at International Trade Commission hearings.

They told the ITC that favorable action on Harley-Davidson's petition for tariffs and import restraints is essential to the company's survival and the jobs of members of the Allied Industrial Workers and the Machinists.

Harley is struggling to hang on to even a fraction of the U.S. market for heavyweight motorcycles — units with engine displacement of more than 700 cubic centimeters. It gave up on lighter models years ago because of the import onslaught.

The unrestrained flow of imports has slashed Harley's share of the heavyweight U.S. market to 13 percent, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald noted in a letter to the ITC supporting the Harley petition.

Japanese domination

Motorcycles imported from Japan, as well as those assembled in the United States with Japanese-made components, now account for 85 percent of domestic sales, according to industry statistics. Imports from other countries take less than 2 percent of the U.S. market.

As a result of the import surge, Oswald observed, "U.S. jobs have been a principal loss." He noted that 837 IAM members were laid off at Harley's parts and assembly plant in York, Pa., and 769 IAM members lost jobs at the company's plant in Milwaukee. Another 700 workers also have been on layoff during temporary plant closings, he wrote the commission.

"There is serious injury," Oswald stressed. "Further serious damage will occur if nothing is done."

The House-passed domestic content legislation, which would require a certain portion of autos and trucks sold in this country to have U.S.-made parts, does not extend to motorcycles.

Jerry Knackert, president of AIW Local 209, told the commission that imports have devastated the workforce at the Harley plant in Milwaukee. More than 500 of the local's nearly 1,000 members have lost their jobs since June 1981, he testified.

Layoffs mount

"Many of these laid-off employees are experienced workers who have been with Harley-Davidson all their working lives," Knackert said. "Indeed, the layoffs are now reaching people with as much as 12½ years seniority."

Knackert added a grim footnote: "Not a single employee who has been laid off in the last year has found other employment."

The unemployment rate in the Milwaukee area is over 13 percent.

Attesting to that was Glover Morgan, who had been with the company for 11 years before his job was eliminated last May.

"I've tried everything I can think of to get other work, but there just isn't any," Morgan told the commission.

"None of the plants around Milwaukee that could use my skills are hiring," he testified. "When I try to get a job for lower pay—working in a fast-food restaurant or grocery store—they won't hire me because I'm overqualified."

Relations strained

Knackert also noted that import-induced problems have strained the long-standing cooperative relations between the union and the company. Stampeded into cost-cutting measures, he said Harley resorted to contracting out work to a non-union firm. That action violates the provisions of the existing AIW agreement with Harley, Knackert said.

"The only reason we avoided a wildcat strike is that the workers understood that the company was facing financial collapse due to the imports," Knackert testified.

Representatives of Japanese motorcycle firms—Honda, Kawasaki, Suzuki and Yamaha—contended at the ITC hearings that Harley is being hurt more by the recession than by imports. They also argued that Honda and Kawasaki should be considered domestic manufacturers because of their assembly plants in Ohio and Nebraska.

But AIW President Dominick D'Ambrosio pointed out in a letter to the ITC supporting the Harley petition that those plants merely assemble components imported from Japan.

Drop in workers' real wages dampens Christmas shopping sale prices continued above average in November, rising another six-tenths of 1 percent over the month. The agency attributed much of the increase to higher energy costs. Wholesale prices, or what BLS calls producer prices for finished goods, rose five-tenths 1 percent in October.

While the White House claimed credit for the November moderation in consumer prices, many analysts tied the deceleration in prices increases to the depressed economy, the world oil glut, and bountiful harvests that have dampened food prices.

Aside from housing, there were declines in clothing prices in November. Entertainment stayed at October's level, and food prices increased by one-tenth of 1 percent, BLS said. Two other major categories of prices measured by the bureau rose sharply, medical care and a miscellaneous category of goods and services. There were also higher prices for fuel oil and natural gas prices.

Before adjustment for seasonal fluctuations in prices, the CPI was 293.2 percent of its 1967 base, which means that goods and services that cost $100 in 1967 cost $293.20 in November.

While the housing component of the index fell two-tenths of 1 percent over the month, mainly due to declines in mortgage interest rates, BLS noted a slight rise in house prices.

Christmas shoppers found that toys, sporting goods, hobby products, and other entertainment items were cheaper in November, balanced by increases in entertainment services.

The increase of one-tenth of 1 percent in food and beverage prices reflected a drop in grocery store prices, offset by rises in the cost of restaurant meals and alcoholic beverages.

Pork prices were down a sharp 1.3 percent, following increases earlier in the year with poultry, fish and eggs also getting less expensive. Beef prices were up moderately.

New car prices were down half a percentage point, and there was a large 3.4-percent drop in auto financing charges, especially on leftover 1982 models.

Reagan's veto threat scuttles jobs program but union lobbyists worked successfully to keep it out of the bill that went to the President.

The Administration was thwarted when it could not get the labor-opposed Caribbean Basin Initiative through the Senate, and when Congress ignored the President's controversial proposal to use tax benefits and exemption from government regulations to lure employers to inner-city "urban enterprise zones."

The House struggled to muster a majority for an immigration reform bill, but in the end was unable to come up with a formula that met the sometimes conflicting concerns of all interested groups.

A labor-supported housing bill died with adjournment, but Congress did complete action on a non-controversial farm labor contract law that includes stronger protections for migrant workers. It was backed by such diverse interests as the Administration and the AFL-CIO, the Farm Bureau Federation and the United Farm Workers.

A Senate-passed regulatory reform bill that the AFL-CIO said could hamper federal agencies in enforcing laws died in the Senate, and a bankruptcy bill that would have made it harder for individuals hit by unemployment to get out of debt failed to clear Congress.

Other bills die

Another bill that didn't make it was a trade reciprocity measure that labor viewed as a potential threat to U.S. jobs.

But also scuttled by adjournment was a Senate-passed bill the AFL-CIO supported to toughen penalties for union officials who betray their trust. And a carefully-drafted revision of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act didn't make it to enactment.

Congress did reach a resolution of sorts on a pay raise for House and Senate members—and for government executives whose pay has been held down by the congressional ceiling.

House members will get a 15 percent raise—the first substantive increase in many years. Senators won't get a raise—by that body's own decision. But they will be able to earn an unlimited amount from speaking fees and other private earnings while House members can't take in more than 30 percent of their congressional pay.

Oil Workers win pact in 11-month Petrofina walkout

Port Arthur, Tex.—Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers reached agreement on a new contract to settle an 11-month strike here against American Petrofina Co. and its subsidiary, Amdel Pipeline Co.

More than 400 union members will be back on the job by Dec. 27, ending a dispute that began last Jan. 8 when their contracts expired and the company rebuffed a request by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service to extend the terms while bargaining continued.

In the contract, which runs to July 1, 1985, a key issue was settled when American Petrofina agreed to meet the industry pattern for wages and benefits.

OCAW and the company also agreed to changes in certain work practices, including flexibility in crafts within the plant, staff size in operating units, and a restriction on the time that must elapse between workers' bids on different jobs.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 8, 1983, because of holiday schedules.

The staff of the AFL-CIO News wishes all readers a Happy New Year.
